For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2013

http://archive.org/details/ladieshomejourna77julwyet dies' ome

JOURNAL

The magazin
women believe in 35

July, 1960

JUN 21 1960
BURLIN PUBLIC
Burlingame, Calif.

The Mos
Glamorou Bachelor
in the Worl

DELICIOUS FOO
TO GET THIN O

Imaginativ
Beautifu
Table Setting
6 pages in colo

MR. AND MRS. DAVE GARROWA

Daddy brought us u
to be religious...and th has made our lives happ

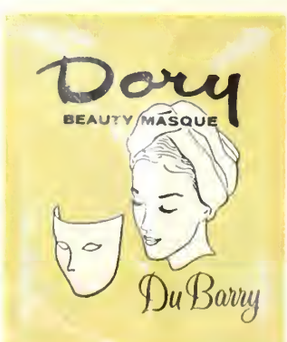
HOW AMERICA LIVE



Novella

A GOOD BLACK DRESS - 5 WAYS

by DUBARRY... helps you look years younger!

Brilliant discovery of a European bio-chemist is now brought to America for the first time by DuBarry

Out of the sea comes the Dory Beauty Masque . . . now accepted as the greatest cleansing and firming cosmetic ever devised! Long the secret of the seemingly ageless beauties of Europe, it works on a wholly unique and effective principle. One reason for its effectiveness being alginates, derived from marine algae, key to Dory's unprecedented flexibility! Like no other cosmetic mask! Dory lifts up and off like a veil. Your face feels refreshed, toned and firmed - looks smoother, softer - with just one treatment! Continuous use brings long-lasting beauty benefits. Discover Dory without delay. See for yourself . . . there is now a way to look years younger!
Individual Treatment, $1.50 . . . Money-Saving Beauty Kit of six Dory Treatments, $7.50. (You save $1.50!) Prices plus tax.

© 1960 Du Barry

Ladies' Home JOURNAL

July, 1960

219626

VOL. LXXVII NO. 7

JOURNALITIES

Kaatje Hurlbut

A Perfectly Horrible Week (page 56) the fictional experience of KAATJE RLBUT, who leads a double life. "With ee children in school, I write from ht until noon; housekeep from noon til evening. Then we read, talk or re at the fire. How do I manage two s? I do little else and I hurry!"

John McClelland

Sweet success story of artist JOHN cCLELLAND: "Born in Atlanta, Geora. Three years in the Air Corps. udied painting with Jerry Farnsworth Cape Cod. Married an Atlanta girl d now live in Connecticut. Have pes that our daughters, Susan and irk, will soon save a few model fees." e illustrated A Legacy, page 12.

Jean Freeman

JEAN TODD FREEMAN, JOURNAL associe editor, wrote this month's How merica Lives: That Old-Time Religion age 115); also the short story, Tamack (page 46). She is a Mississippirn Ea-terner via Mt. Holyoke College, oet and a great admirer of horses and en when she can find time for them.

Novella Complete in This Issue

You Know How Women Are	Catharine Barrett	40

Stories

A Legacy	Mackey Brown	12
Tamarack	Jean Todd Freeman	46
A Perfectly Horrible Week	Kaatje Hurlbut	56
The Mistress of Mellyn (Fourth part of five)	Victoria Holt	68

Special Features

Who Are the Aged?	Dorothy Thompson	11
Tell Me, Doctor	Goodrich C. Schauffler, M.D.	15
We Witnessed a Miracle	Margaret Hickey	23
Can a Handicapped Child Be Cared for at Home?	Benjamin Spock, M.D.	30
Journal About Africa	Beatrice Blackmar Gould	39
The World's Most Glamorous Bachelors		44
Mr. and Mrs. Dave Garroway	Gladys Hall	54
Looking Over the President's Shoulder (Third part of Four)	Alonzo Fields	58
Are You a Pioneer?	Pat Boone	67
How America Lives: That Old-Time Religion	Jean Todd Freeman	115

General Features

Letters Our Readers Write Us		4
Making Marriage Work	Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D.	18
There's a Man in the House	Harlan Miller	21
Fifty Years Ago		39
This Is a Me-Me-Right-Now	Munro Leaf	96
Ask Any Woman	Marceiene Cox	104

Fashion and Beauty

Remodeling an Old Model	Dawn Crowell Norman	60
The Girl in the Romantic Dress Made it Herself	Nora O'Leary	62
Black is New Every Time You Wear It	Wilhela Cushman	64
A Good Black Dress Spans the Seasons	Nora O'Leary	66
How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!	Bet Hart	82

Food and Homemaking

Delicious Food to Get Thin On		70
They Said it Couldn't Be Done	Margaret Davidson	106

Architecture and Interior Decoration

Summer Fashion Ideas for Gay Table Settings	Wilhela Cushman	48
House With Privacy From the Street	John Brenneman	100
Decorating on a Shoestring	Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland	131

Poems

Process of Erosion	Anita Raskin	12
But Your Soft Voice	Willis Eberman	16
Vacation for Two	Diana Charlton Van Deusen	28
There Once Was Such a Marriage	Elizabeth McFarland	33
Song	John Irvine	75
Rhymes From Young Mother Goose	C. S. Jennison	78
Flood Prevented	John P. Pawley	86
The Eleven-Year-Old Girls	Virginia Linton	95
The Other Side of the Island	Sara Van Alstyne Allen	98
Height 5'7"—Weight 141	Shelda Van Fleet	129

Cover Photograph of Margie Regan by John Engstead

Hat Designed by Vincent-Harmik

CHANGE OF ADDRESS. At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent. • Ladies' Home Journal, ©1960 by Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Thursday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Second-class postage paid at Philadelphia, Pa., and at additional mailing offices. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada. The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence. Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $10. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice. Unconditional warranty. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Van Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; E. Huber Ulrich, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Ford F. Robinson, Sr. Vice Pres. and Manager, Business Department; Brandan Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibban, Secretary; Maurice S. Gould, Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, Holiday and The American Home.

Your all day

veil of fragrance

scents, smooths, clings more lovingly, more lastingly than costly cologne

No cologne prolongs and protects your daintiness like Cashmere Bouquet Talc. Never evaporates. Never dries your skin. Leaves you silken-smooth, flower-fresh all over. Make Cashmere Bouquet ...pure, imported Italian Talc... your all day Veil of Fragrance.

Cashmere Bouquet Talc

the fragrance men love

BORDEN'S
VERY BIG ON FLAVOR

Mix a HOOLA COOLA with BORDEN'S BUTTERMILK
says Elsie, The Borden Cow

Borden's Buttermilk refreshes naturally, has important food elements that tone up summer faded digestive systems. Here's a colorful way to enjoy it—in tangy coolers. Get some soon.

HOOLA COOLA
To each cup of chilled Borden's Buttermilk, add one large scoop of your favorite Borden's sherbet—pick a tropical flavor such as orange, lime, lemon or pineapple. Brighten with food coloring and stir or beat 'til creamy smooth. Garnish, serve —and listen to the "Mmmm's"!

Available in Canada in Quebec & Ontario Provinces ©1960, THE BORDEN CO.

LETTERS
our readers write us

A WOMAN FLEES IN THE NIGHT

WASHINGTON

A gold star to you for publishing "A Shocking Story" (April JOURNAL). Unless the public is aroused, little will be done to correct the shocking laxity in releasing the mentally ill prematurely. The precautionary measures you recommended are good for large municipal areas. But even rural areas are no longer safe. Could you stress in bold, black type the necessity of KEEPING DOORS LOCKED IN PRIVATE HOMES?

North Bend — MRS. CARL SATER

VIRGINIA

You fail to suggest an obvious and effective solution; the woman should have had a firearm available for instant use. A pistol shot (aimed or unaimed) would have served two purposes: it would have frightened the intruder away, and it would have served as an alarm signal. Our present laws and attitudes discourage the use of firearms for self-defense. But if rape cases are increasing, why not give women the right and power to protect themselves?

Lorton — W. C. HALL, Brigadier General, U. S. Marine Corps, Retired

MASSACHUSETTS

I too was attacked, threatened with a knife and gun, bound, gagged and choked to unconsciousness. Subsequently I was represented by the district attorney's office, and I was left feeling further degraded and helpless. The public loudly condemns violence in comics, TV, movies, etc., but at the same time gustily turns to newspaper pages for sordid details of those criminally assaulted. Why can't legal procedures be handled with less public display? Wouldn't justice be more completely served if society not only assumed the responsibility of rehabilitating the criminal offender, but at least offered psychological assistance for those offended against?

Boston — Name Withheld

COLORADO

You've set progress in mental health back a hundred years. What about the many, many former patients who have quietly taken their places in society and are leading useful lives? Most of them are less dangerous than some of their neighbors who have never been institutionalized!

Denver — EUNICE W. BROWN

● JOURNAL editors were among the first to fight for humane care of the mentally ill and for progressive methods of rehabilitation. Protecting the public against the criminally insane is equally important. ED.

MAINE

IN THE GOOD OLD DAYS

Dear Editors: Lost: sixty minutes that were known as the children's hour. It was a special time which families set aside each day to spend with one another. It was a time for reading aloud; for games; for sharing the things that happened to you and the thoughts that came to you. It was a precious pause in the day's occupation; mightn't it be good for us—and our children—to find it again? Sincerely,

Portland — MRS. CHARLEMAGNE TOWER

INDIANA

DEAR EDITORS, SHE BEGAN . . .

Dear Editors: I wonder how many women came to a slow burn when they saw "I'm So Glad To Be a Woman" (February JOURNAL).

I've come to the conclusion you people live in a bird world! Either that, or you're all happily young and unmarried, or married "career-girl" types with someone else to wash your dirty dishes. The model who posed for your article is indeed lucky, lucky, for she is just as lovely as any woman could hope to be. I can almost smell her—Muguet des Bois, I'll bet.

But I'd bet my last dollar—and that is just about what I have till payday—that those hands of hers didn't polish that brass, or wash those sheets! And how do her sheets get a wild-fern fragrance? Mine usually smell like bacon because they have to hang overnight in the basement to dry, and cooking odors have a way of rushing straight down the stairs. And show me a Hausfrau who has the time to keep her hair bleached (does she, or doesn't she?) and put on mascara and eye shadow yet! My eyebrows haven't been plucked since my baby was born!

Nor does she look the type to scrub floors or burn trash in freezing weather. And is she perhaps the same one who

CONTINUED ON PAGE 8

LET'S PLAN A...

Chick-n-que!

CHICK-N-QUE SAUCE

½ cup MAZOLA Corn Oil
½ cup lemon juice or vinegar
¼ cup water
2 teaspoons salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
1 tablespoon sugar
1 teaspoon paprika
1 tablespoon minced onion

Measure ingredients into bowl. Let stand about an hour to blend flavors. As a marinade, arrange chicken in shallow pan; pour sauce over all and let stand one hour. Turn chicken occasionally. As a basting sauce, brush pieces with sauce before grilling. To barbecue, broil slowly; turn and baste frequently. Cook until tender and browned. Allow 1 to 1¼ hours on outdoor grill, 35 to 60 minutes in oven broiler.

Chick-N-Que or barbecue, the flavor secret's in the sauce. So be sure you use pure golden light Mazola® Corn Oil.

When you barbecue or fry with Mazola, foods turn out lighter . . . crisp and golden outside . . . tender, juicy inside. And no other oil is more digestible.

Mazola Pure Corn Oil is lighter than any other leading brand of salad and cooking oil because it contains less heavy saturated fat.

No other leading oil is richer in poly-unsaturates than Mazola Corn Oil. And, it's never hydrogenated! That's why Mazola is your golden guarantee of crispier, lighter fried foods.

Your doctor will tell you about the special nutritional benefits of corn oil in your daily meals!

OF ALL LEADING BRANDS. ONLY MAZOLA IS CORN OIL!

How new BAN guards against "nervous perspiration"

What causes perspiration?

Why is the odor caused by nervous tension more offensive than the odor caused by physical exercise?

Do deodorants have to irritate the skin?

BAN's lotion formula is gentle enough for the softest feminine skin.

Read the facts about a remarkable new deodorant—called BAN®—that stops odor all day—and is gentle to your skin, besides.

What causes perspiration?

Medical science recognizes two different types of perspiration.

1. Thermal perspiration: This is caused by heat or exercise—and comes from relatively small, widely distributed glands.

2. Nervous perspiration: This is caused by emotional or nervous tension. The offensive odor it produces comes primarily from larger, more powerful glands in the underarm area.

Why is the odor caused by nervous tension so offensive?

The larger, more powerful glands that cause nervous perspiration are constantly building up secretions that "spill over" at the slightest everyday anxiety.

Getting the kids off to school—hearing the baby cry suddenly—being caught in a traffic jam. Any of these common situations can trigger nervous perspiration.

And nervous perspiration produces even more offensive odor than the hardest physical exercise!

How does new BAN guard against nervous perspiration?

Amazing Ban contains 22% more protective ingredients than the average leading deodorants. Ban protects against perspiration caused by heat, by exercise, and by nervous tension.

Ban helps keep underarms dry. Stops odor all day—even the offensive odor caused by nervous tension.

Do deodorants have to irritate the skin?

Many women feel that deodorants have to be harsh and irritating in order to be effective. This is simply not true. They don't. In fact, one of the ingredients in Ban is akin to the body's own soothing oils and emollients. Ban is gentle to all types of normal skin.

Today there are no less than forty-seven deodorants that look something like Ban—that have tried to copy its unique roll-on design. But Ban is still far and away the deodorant most Americans trust. No other deodorant has duplicated the formula of Ban.

You can purchase Ban at drug stores, most food, variety and department stores.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

AS A HEALTH-AID... Just add a cup of Arm & Hammer Soda Bicarbonate to a tub of water and...relax

YOU feel you are enjoying a luxurious alkaline bath at a health spa . . . yet all you do is dis-lve one cup of Arm & Hammer soda bicarbonate ommonly called baking soda) in a tub of warm ter . . . lie back and relax. Soda baths are so sooth-g doctors recommend them for the relief of itching in; sunburn and other skin irritations.

Try a fresh-up soda bath whenever you feel hot d tired. No need to rub or scrub. The gentle action the soda leaves your skin marvelously clean and sweet. You feel cool and fresh all over. Keep Arm & Hammer soda in your bathroom. Buy several packages at your food store today.

BABY'S PRICKLY HEAT—Soothe baby's sensitive skin by adding 2 tablespoons of Arm & Hammer soda to his bath. Soda baths help relieve diaper rash; they are recommended by doctors to stop irritation.

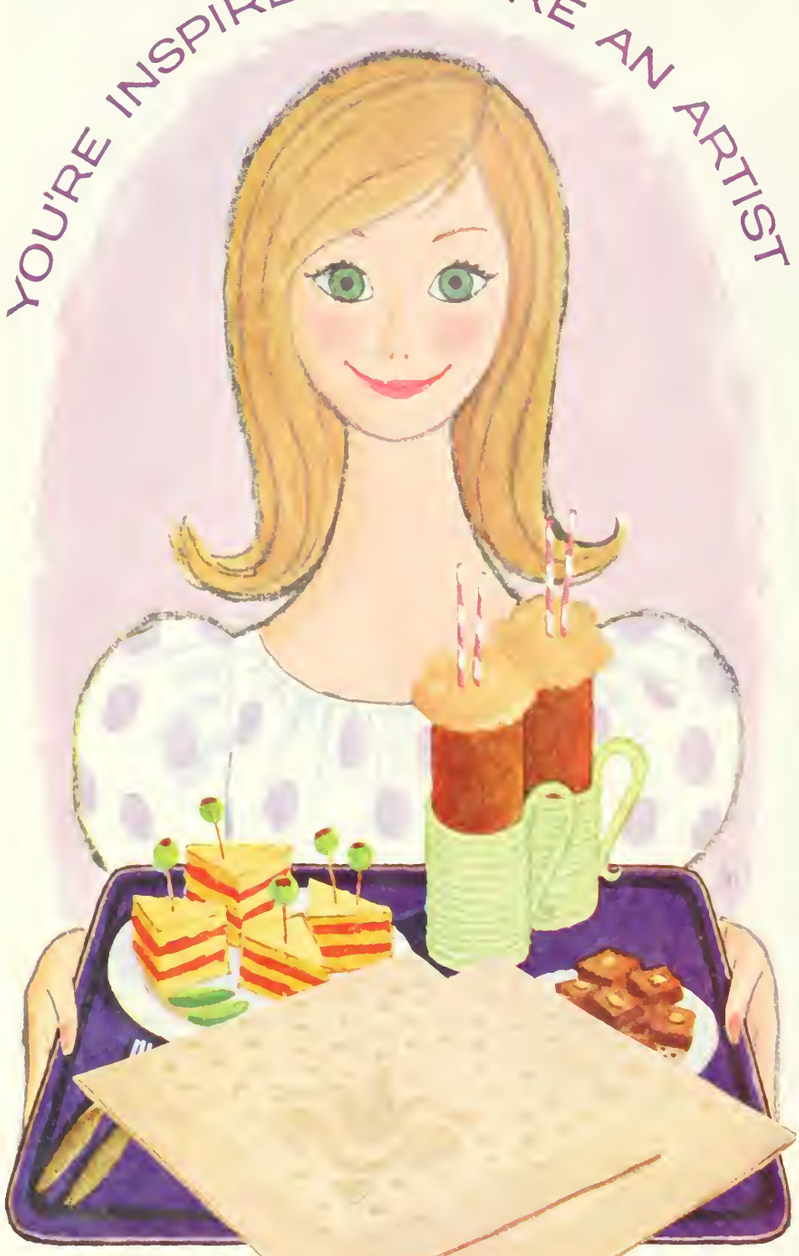
SUNBURN—INSECT BITES—POISON IVY—Take a soda bath, then apply a paste of soda and water to badly affected areas. Cover with wet cloths.

In certain areas, such as metropolitan New York, the same high quality soda is sold under the name COW BRAND.*

FREE

HOW TO LIVE BETTER AND SAVE MONEY

Illustrated booklet describes accepted ways to use soda bicarbonate for good health, baking, cleansing. Mail coupon now.



Church & Dwight Co., Inc., Dept. L-7
P.O. Box 2266, Grand Central Station,
New York 17, N.Y.

Please send free booklet "How to Live Better and Save Money."

PRINT YOUR NAME

STREET

CITY ZONE STATE

Now...
Scotkins in Color!

Linen-lovely shades you've never seen in a paper napkin before—to match, to accent your favorite china ...subtle tones set aglow by Scotkins' linen-like texture! And here's linen-like protection. Just one lasts the meal. Look for colored Scotkins in luncheon size. White too ..all in the new Scotkins® box.

Scotkins also made and sold in Canada

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

stands all dressed up, in high heels, with one hand on her hip, and smilingly pours cleanser into a toilet? That's all that's really needed?

"Our lives are blessed with such freshening variety!" You could at least spare us the mockery of that! Drag out of bed at 6:30 A.M., prepare breakfast, pack lunches, wash eggy dishes, make beds, wash clothes, iron clothes, scrub the floors, and the never-ending battle with dust, dust, dust! Freshening variety? Mine is every other Friday when my husband is off, and grumblingly babysits for an hour or two so I can go out and do the grocery shopping, go to the bank and pay the bills.

I could go on and on, but I'm sure by now you know how I feel. I've read and loved your magazine for years, but this is fulfillment?

Nuts! Sincerely,
Gary SHIRLEY B. SHEDLAK

NEW YORK

SEEDS OF GOOD WILL

Dear Editors: I love flowers, but hate to plant them. So I buy seeds and ship them to state hospitals and prisons. It's good occupational therapy for the inmates; I have fun; and the world is made prettier. Want to help?

Sincerely,
Bronx DALE FORSYTHE

ILLINOIS

LABELS FOR POISONS

Gentlemen: The American Medical Association is delighted to hear that LADIES' HOME JOURNAL shares our concern about the serious threat posed by improperly or inadequately labeled packaged hazardous chemical substances not now specifically regulated.

In one year, almost 1500 deaths resulted from accidental overexposure to such products, either in the home or on the job. Fully one quarter of these fatalities occurred among preschool-age children. Furthermore, it is conservatively estimated that nonfatal poisonings affect another 150,000 to 250,000 persons every year. These are shocking statistics for a cause of injury and death that is largely preventable.

To help remedy this situation, the A.M.A. has sponsored a bill (H.R. 7352), now before Congress, requiring manufacturers of potentially toxic substances to indicate plainly on the label the appropriate warning statements and to list hazardous ingredients. In this way, users would be forewarned of the necessity for handling these chemicals with care and of the importance of keeping them out of reach of small children. Listing ingredients will be of great help to the physician when an accidental poisoning does occur, since he will be able to pinpoint the toxic substance or substances and prescribe accordingly.

We are also recommending that the printed instructions be supplemented by picture symbols (such as the familiar skull and bones for poisons or a flame for inflammable substances) for easi recognition.

The need for uniform labeling la was clearly indicated in a recent estima showing that fully 80 per cent of household and commercial chemic products (dyes, varnish and paint movers, cleaning agents) need some for of precautionary labeling.

The American Medical Associatio strongly urges individuals to take t few minutes necessary to write the congressmen supporting this importa lifesaving legislation (H.R. 7352).

Sincerel
F. J. L. BLASINGAME, M.I
Chicago Executive Vice Preside

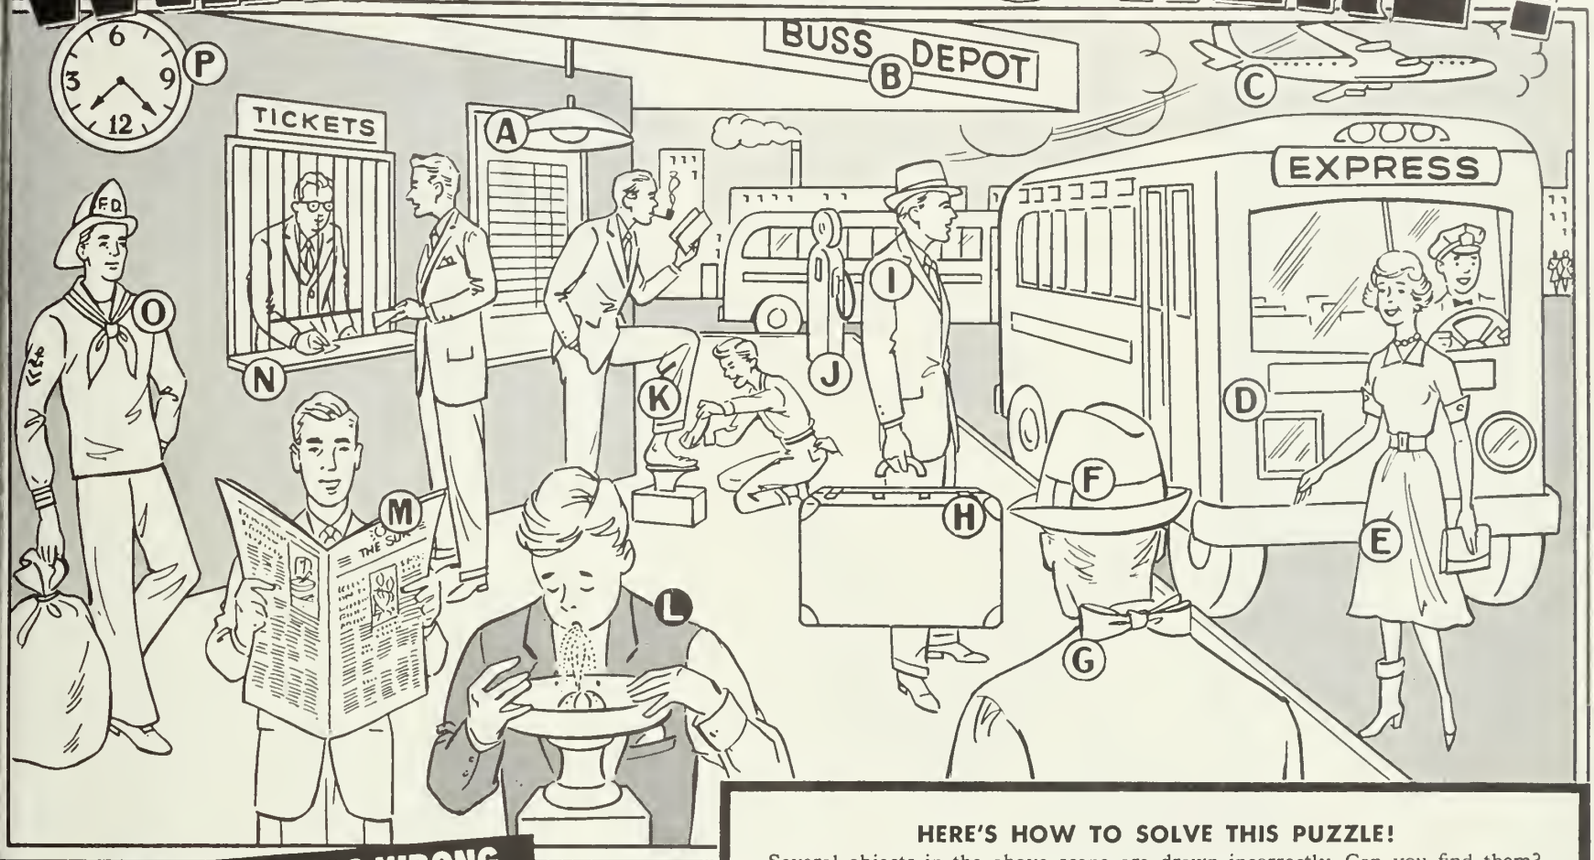
THAT SORORITY QUESTION

CALIFORNIA

Reader D. M. Wright (May JOURNA states that only when we are made to fe that others are "better" do we becom irritated. "Better" in what way? Havir more money, influence or beauty doesn make one man better than another in m view, yet these are the criteria upo which a prospective sorority pledge often judged. The "better" the sororit the more selective. The members a apple sorters who choose the big shin ones, leaving the dull, small apples fo whatever fate awaits them. The texture flavor and crispness, all found inside are overlooked. (I was a member.)
Duarte MRS. CHARLES G. NASSI

OHIO

These organizations do have good i them. However, few teenage people hav attained the maturity to handle the ev which is also in them. Growing up, i itself, is a hard enough job without de liberately added handicaps.
Columbus MARGARET E. GOODWI



VERMONT

There is truth in the statement: "Peopl who are willing or able to live up to thi higher standard are always acceptabl any place in the world"—provided they stick to their own kind. Provided the never question the assumption that higher social standard is automatically higher standard of values. Provided the never wonder if the kind of leadershi this world needs is best developed b emphasizing acceptability and conform ity. Is it the big fraternity man or th brain in "creep" house who will some day make that breakthrough in cance research that we all long for so desper ately, for example?
A College Town A FACULTY WIF

FLORIDA

I hope when my daughter is grown sh can enjoy a sorority. I hope I have in sight enough to help her attain the char acter that will make her a good sorority member—or to accept nonmembership True, there is not room for all. But le us not fall into the fallacy that becaus all cannot share an experience, none must have it.
Maitland MARY P. BUCHE

WHAT'S WRONG HERE?

FIND 8 THINGS WRONG IN THE SCENE ABOVE AND

WIN THIS DELUXE $1.50 SLIM NOTE PAD

WITH BLACK AND SIMULATED GOLD

Ball Pen IN AN ATTRACTIVE GIFT BOX

A beautiful, practical prize! Hard tan cover, made of washable grained leatherette, richly embossed in red and gold. Plentiful supply of fine white note paper. Built-in loop holds the beautiful black and gold color, smooth-writing ball point pen in place. A guaranteed $1.50 retail value, yours FREE when you answer our puzzle.

OR

FIND ONLY 5 THINGS WRONG AND

WIN THIS NEW $1.25

BOX OF 21 BEAUTIFUL

ALL-OCCASION

GREETING CARDS

Brand new original designs in 3 favorite sizes. Stunning colors, rich decorations, gold bronzing, delightful sentiments—all combine to make this an exquisite Greeting Card Assortment. 21 cards and 21 matching envelopes—for Birthdays, Anniversaries, Get Well and other occasions. Guaranteed $1.25 retail value.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

HERE'S HOW TO SOLVE THIS PUZZLE!

Several objects in the above scene are drawn incorrectly. Can you find them? (Look carefully, this puzzle is tricky. All the objects are identified by a letter, but not all of them are wrong.) Here's a hint: the boy lettered "L" has only one sleeve on his jacket. Now find the other mistakes and put an "X" through each letter in the coupon that refers to an incorrect object. The gift you receive depends on the number of mistakes you discover. Cross out either 5 or 8 letters in the coupon and mail for your FREE GIFT!

YOU CAN MAKE $50–$100–$500 AND MORE IN YOUR SPARE TIME!

We are running this puzzle test to find alert, ambitious people who want to make money easily and quickly, without experience. Simply show friends, relatives and neighbors beautiful new Artistic Christmas and All-Occasion Greeting Cards. The original designs, rich colors and wide selection are truly remarkable ... and they are amazingly low in cost. 50 Name Imprinted Christmas Cards for only $1.50; deluxe 21 card assortments as low as $1.00; and many other tremendous values that sell themselves. You can make all the EXTRA MONEY you need with our exclusive Greeting Cards, Personal Stationery and unusual Gift Items.

GET YOUR FREE GIFT NOW!

We'll send you the beautiful Slim Note Pad and Ball Pen (guaranteed retail value $1.50) or the Deluxe Greeting Cards (guaranteed retail value $1.25) ABSOLUTELY FREE if you answer this Puzzle Test. With your FREE GIFT we'll send FREE Christmas Card and Stationery Imprint Samples, complete instructions on how to make money in your spare time, and Christmas and All-Occasion Greeting Cards ON APPROVAL, to be paid for or returned if not satisfied.

HURRY! SEND YOUR PUZZLE SOLUTION TODAY!

Don't wait if you are going to try for your FREE Slim Note Pad or FREE Box of Greeting Cards. While you have the puzzle before you, solve it and rush coupon to us. We reserve the right to reject entries dated 60 days after the date of this publication. Only one entry to a family. Write to:

Puzzle Editor, STYLART CARDS, INC.
Dept. 416, 1717 W. 9th St., Los Angeles 55, Cal.
(In Canada, write 103 Simcoe St., Toronto 1, Ont.)

PASTE ON POSTCARD OR MAIL IN ENVELOPE

Puzzle Editor, STYLART CARDS, INC.
Dept. 416, 1717 W. 9th St., Los Angeles 55, Cal.

HERE'S MY SOLUTION (CROSS OUT 5 OR 8 LETTERS)

Ⓐ Ⓑ Ⓒ Ⓓ Ⓔ Ⓕ Ⓖ Ⓗ Ⓘ Ⓙ Ⓚ Ⓛ Ⓜ Ⓝ Ⓞ Ⓟ

Rush my FREE Gift—also FREE Samples of Name Imprint lines, Spare Time Money-Making Plans, and Christmas and All-Occasion Greeting Cards ON APPROVAL, to be paid for or returned if not satisfied.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

*City*_____ *Zone*____ *State*_____

ORGANIZATIONS! Ask for tested Fund-Raising Plan that has helped thousands of church groups, clubs, lodges, schools and community associations raise money. Check here ☐

The sparkling choice for chicken

...lighter, clearer Wesson–the pure vegetable oil

Chicken Almondine . . . Brunswick . . . Chow Mein . . . Dauphine . . . 101 bewitching, delicious reasons to make the modern change from solid shortening to Wesson in your skillet. You pour Wesson from its neat No-Drip bottle, brown chicken to a golden turn without smoke. You cut down on saturated fat when you change for good to poly-unsaturated Wesson—the pure vegetable oil.

Planning a picnic? Wesson never leaves a film on cold chicken the way solid shortening does. Serve up the best of all chicken tonight—hot or cold, starting with the sparkle of Wesson, lighter and clearer than any other leading oil.

Poly-unsaturated

Wesson®

The Pure Vegetable Oil

Just send one Wesson label to The Wesson People, P. O. Box 3333, New Orleans 17, La.

ecutive Editor:

Mary Bass

ociate Editors:

Wilhela Cushman
William E. Fink
Louella G. Shouer
Mary Lea Page
Dawn Crowell Norman
Margaret Davidson
Nora O'Leary
Glenn Matthew White
Donald Stuart
Helen Everitt
Peter Briggs
Anne Einselen
Margaret Parton
Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland
Geraldine Rhoads
Nancy Crawford Wood
William McCleery
John H. Brenneman
Jean Todd Freeman
Nelle Keys Bell
Betty Coe Spicer
Neal Gilkyson Stuart
Stanley Freeman
Hal T. Williams

ontributing Editors:

Richard Pratt
Laura Lou Brookman
Hugh MacNair Kahler
Bernardine Kielty
Margaret Hickey
Gladys Denny Shultz
Barbara Benson
Elizabeth McFarland

ditorial Associates:

John Werner
Ruth Mary Packard
Ruth Shapley Matthews
Joseph Di Pietro
Elizaheth Goetsch
Eileen Sharpe
Virginia Price
Joyce Posson
Elizabeth Hart
Dorothy Anne Rohinson
Albert Serwazi
Liane Waite
Ahbot Mills
Conrad Brown
Anne Fuller

Assistant Editors:

Victoria Harris
Alice Kastberg
Dorothy Markinko
Jean Anderson
Grant Harris
Jean McClory
Ann Blackmar
Lee Stowell Cullen
Elaine Ward-Hanna
Mary Lee Jones
Carole O'Brien

Editorial Assistants:

Hazel Owen
Helen Olchvary
Sally Platt
Mary Jane Engel
Janet M. Boe
Kathleen McDonald
Judith Harkison
Dorothy Shuler
Eileen Tolchin
Natalie Schram

Who Are The Aged?

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

I say the "aged," not the "old," beeause in bureaucratic and sociological language "old" is now an obsolete word.

I don't like the word "aged." Reams of adulatory poetry has been written to or about the "old," but I can't think of one written to the "aged." Shakespeare (who died in his early 50's) detested age, and on numerous occasions compared it, most unfavorably, with youth. (One of his sonnets declares, "Age, I do abhor thee; youth, I do adore thee.") Robert Browning (when he was 52) wrote, "Grow old along with me! The best is yet to be"—which was, to say the least, optimistic.

"Aged" thus has the connotation of decrepitude which "old" does not. People speak of "gay old blades," but not of gay aged blades, and of "spry old ladies" but never of spry aged women.

How old really are individuals? Mrs. Anna Eleanor Roosevelt will be 76 in October of this year.

Justice Learned Hand was 88 in January. His mental vigor, precision of thought and expression, interest in and knowledge of contemporary books and events are surpassed by very few of his fellow citizens.

Sir Winston Churchill, by all clinical estimates, should have been in his grave long since. He will be 86 in November; was on his way to 66 when he became Prime Minister, First Lord of the Treasury and Minister of Defense for five of the most grueling war years in British history. He nearly broke the nerves and health of numerous young seeretaries. Sir Winston defies doctor's orders. Though no physician would recommend smoking to a man who has had three strokes, or even one, he still enjoys his Havanas; and although there are various views about drinking, he follows his own, which is that champagne and brandy are good for him. His biography shows that he has lived every moment of his life to the hilt.

Ilona Smithkin, who sketched this wistful girl in red pastels, is known best for her portraits and impressionistic oil studies of nudes. Born and educated in Germany, she also studied at the École des Beaux Arts in Paris and at the Art Students' League in N. Y. Her studio is in Greenwich Village.

Gen. Charles de Gaulle, President of France, will be 70 in November. He is, like Churchill, a soldier, an intellectual, an artist, and a patriot for whom France is a grand passion. Franee, rent end to end and on the verge of civil war, ealled him from his long retreat to save the nation because, literally, no one else eould do so. Too old to take up such a burden? Ninety per eent of his prestige in France rests on the virility of his character. He makes no concessions to political opportunism; when he says "no" he means exactly that.

Nowadays the aecent is on youth, and many people believe we should choose a young President. I shall not here express my preference for any candidate, nor do I believe his years should be determinant.

But what of the record of relatively young heads of great states in contemporary times? All of them were dictators.

Stalin became Secretary General of the Russian Communist Party at 42. He gradually absorbed all the powers of the state, killed his own leading colleagues, and sent millions to slave camps where they perished, initiated policies that led to the death of millions of peasants, made military blunders that nearly lost the war in Russia, and when he died was in an advanced condition of paranoia. This is the testimony of his survivors and successors, among them Mr. Khrushchev.

Mussolini came to power at 39. He did some tremendous things for his country, but by a fatal misjudgment and against the wishes of almost all the Italian people (he was convinced of a German victory) took Italy into a disastrous war, and perished at the hands of his own countrymen.

Hitler came to power at 43. Quite apart from the horrors that he perpetrated as a result of his racial theories, he precipitated a war, against the advice of his ablest staff officers (aided by the agreement with his fellow dictator Stalin), which reduced Germany to a shambles. He died a theatrical suicide, unmourned by anybody.

These men were not only corrupted by power and ambition. They made errors of judgment, fatal or near-fatal to their nations. They lacked wisdom.

This is not to say that wisdom is confined to people well past middle life; but if one can generalize at all, there does seem to be an "age of discretion."

If how old one really is depends on many factors besides chronological date, several things are almost universally true. Although vital energy is immensely stronger and more durable in some people than in others, somewhere in the 60's energy, and especially physical energy, manifests a decline. An enormously greater percentage of our population reach the age of 60 than did thirty or forty years ago, but the life expectancy over 60 for men has increased startlingly little—by only about two years. For women it has extended notably—old cemeteries which record family histories of fathers' burying a succession of wives and their children, born one after another, year by year, are from a past epoch.

There are health needs peculiar to the old, and the question is to what extent these are adequately being dealt with on a private, public, semipublic or philanthropic basis.

How many of the aged are able financially, or with the aid of financially able close relatives, to take care of their own health needs? How many need only partial assistance and how much? What kind of assistance do they need? What assistance is already available?

There is almost unanimous opinion that all existing forms of aid for the old are inadequate and need reconsideration. As I write, it is most probable that some legislation will go through Congress before this session adjourns—perhaps before this article appears. The Democrat-sponsored bills are backed and have been nationally publicized for months by the most powerful pressure groups in and out of Washington—the CIO-AFL and the Americans for Democratic Action.

For these organizations, whatever Federal health legislation is introduced will be only an entering wedge. Their goal is socialized medicine, on the model of many European countries. Whatever one argues for or against this, one thing can safely be predicted. The cost of modified Federal health insurance for the old cannot be accurately computed. Insurance experts and the experience of all countries with which I am familiar testify that costs will not be covered by the fraction of a per cent to be added to payroll taxes. Everywhere people tend to abuse services falsely described as "free."

Whatever Federal old-age health insurance is offered will not be available to some 3,000,000 adult persons who are not covered by Social Security or any other Government retirement scheme.

It will furnish no service to elderly people in a mental or tuberculosis hospital.

It will probably furnish no services physician or nurse performed in one' home or place of residence.

It will not be related to need.

It will predictably overcrowd hospita nursing homes, both of which are the expensive places in which to be ill, no r who pays the bills.

It will be a blow to insurance compar which many thousands of old people equities.

In short, it will create new problem leave many basic ones unsolved.

What is the economic status of the ol

It is statistically true that a conside percentage of people over 65 have incon not more than $1000 a year. But the takes no account of other assets, or of these oldsters are living, or of the incon close relatives able (where necessary) to tribute to their support.

A larger proportion of them are living one or another of their children than doing so a generation ago. To an unk extent such living facilities are, by f agreement in exchange for financial co erations. A parent or parents with a hom has become too large for their needs or c ity to manage may deed it to a son or dau in exchange for the right to share it, contributing from a small income to its ning expense.

And this is not all that thousands of contribute. Where both a son and daug

PROCESS OF EROSION

By ANITA RASKIN

Shoes rub at the toes,
Shirts fray at the collars.
As the pants knee goes
So go the dollars.

in-law, or daughter and son-in-law, are w ing outside the home, mother often do large share of the housework and is an un baby sitter. Older people in good health to be idle, and nothing ages them more qu than uselessness.

The actual economic status of people 65 has just never been satisfactorily br down. If it is true that a considerable centage are poor in relation to other groups, it is just as true that they form a high percentage of the richest people in country. Where wealth is not inherited, viduals who amass fortunes usually beg do so around the age of 50, and thereafte fortune, if wisely invested, grows by itsel Compulsory government health-insur plans may be excellent for low-wage-salary countries where government ser supplement otherwise very inadequate fa incomes.

It does not follow that they are the means for dealing with this social proble the nation with the highest per capita inc and one which on average, is keeping w advance of the cost of living—to the ri which Government spending is the chief tributory.

It may be that we are drifting with ab the inevitability of a law into an all-embra welfare state, ever more centralized, wher anonymous bureaucrat governs all, with and more responsibilities removed from states, communities and free institution this vast and so diverse nation.

If so, we shall be moving farther and fa from the American way, and into a mo form of feudal society.

The welfare state is a copy of Euro systems in countries which have quite traditions and experiences from ours. A icans have always been an inventive pe Should we not be able to invent social pol that are better for us than European sys sparked by socialist parties?

New! Gold Medal recipe from Betty Crocker –

Cooky Sundae Pie

Betty Crocker's recipes and her flour — Gold Medal — give you an extra measure of confidence . . . they're both "Kitchen-tested" just for you!

COOKY SUNDAE PIE

1/2 cup soft butter
1/4 cup sifted confectioners' sugar
1/2 tsp. vanilla
1 cup sifted GOLD MEDAL Flour
1/8 tsp. salt
1 qt. ice cream

Mix butter, sugar and vanilla thoroughly. Sift flour and salt together. Add to butter mixture and blend. Chill 30 to 45 min. Heat oven to 400° (mod. hot). Pat dough evenly into ungreased 9″ pie pan. Flute edge. Prick. Bake 10 to 12 min., or until lightly browned. Cool. Just before serving, fill with ice cream and top as desired.

For tempting chocolate, nut and spice variations of this recipe, directions for making the "Baby Shower" centerpiece and other exciting new Betty Crocker ideas, write: Gold Medal Party, Box 168, Minneapolis 60, Minn.

Bake it Better with Gold Medal – the only "Kitchen-tested" flour

NO STICKINESS, NO DRYNESS, NO DULLNESS EVEI

New finger-rest lever...
easy to press...
easy to aim

Now there's a spray that's made for real live beautiful hair-dos. Made to hold them longer...with none of the varnish-y feeling, none of the sticky stiffness you're used to in other hair sprays. How come? The secret's in the super-fine "lano-lized" mist that keeps hair soft, soft, soft...that gives your hair body, brilliance, springiness. Could you ask for anything more? Well...more there is! You spray with an exclusive finger-rest lever that gives you a super-fine spray with perfect comfort, perfect aim! So spray away with new 3 Way...and don't let old-fashioned hair sprays get in your hair. 1.50 plus tax

NEW 3 WAY® CURL SPRA

SHULT

Holds without stickiness...conditions dry hair...brightens dull h

By GOODRICH C. SCHAUFFLER, M. D.

Tell me, doctor...

There are many questions which women would like to ask a trusted physician, but there is not always the opportunity. In this series, Tell Me, Doctor, Doctor Schauffler will discuss some of the problems which have been sent to him by readers. The situations are all real, but all the names used are fictitious.

"Mrs. Manchester, I wish you would see one of my specialist friends about that lump. There are times when we like to have another expert opinion even about doing a biopsy, when it's a matter of breast lumps."

"Mrs. Manchester is on the phone, Doctor. She has discovered some lumps in her breasts—she insists on seeing you today. She sounds nearly hysterical."

The doctor had a crowded schedule. But he remembered Mrs. Manchester's tendency to worry, and her childlike faith that "Doctor" could make everything right. "Let's try to work her in. Cancel my luncheon engagement if you have to."

ABBOT MILLS

When he saw Mrs. Manchester's tragic face a little later that day, the doctor was glad he had asked his secretary to make a place for her. However, he took time to glance over her case record, as in a routine visit. "It has been quite a while since you've been in to see me, Mrs. Manchester," he remarked genially.

"I have been feeling very well, Doctor. I hadn't the faintest intimation there was anything wrong until ——" Her chin quivered. "I had just read about the way a woman can examine her breasts, for lumps, and thought I would try it. There they were!"

"I'll take a look at those lumps in just a minute, see what the situation is," the doctor said soothingly. "But first I'd like to ask you a few questions. Have you noticed any pain or tenderness in your breasts lately?"

"They have felt a little tender, at my period times mostly."

"If I remember correctly, you were not able to breast-feed your babies. Is that right?"

"Yes. I never had enough milk to make it worth while."

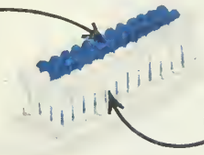
"Have you noticed any kind of discharge from your nipples?"

"What would it be like?"

"The discharge I have in mind is usually yellowish or greenish, a thin, sticky fluid that you would notice on your clothing. Sometimes, though, there are traces of blood, making the color red or pinkish or brown. That's rather more important."

"Does a discharge like that mean cancer?"

"Only rarely. Though any nipple discharge not connected with pregnancy calls for immediate investigation."



"Well, I haven't noticed any kind of secretion from my nipples since my last baby was tiny."

Now polish teeth bright
WITHOUT PUNISHING YOUR GUMS!

The new Pro Double Duty Tooth Brush never scratches or scrapes— but it's tops in cleaning power!

Here at last is a tooth brush that cleans teeth sparkling clean —and massages gums gently and safely at the same time. There's not even a slight, imperceptible scratch or scrape in the Pro Double Duty, yet it has the "backbone" to rout stubborn food particles and polish teeth really bright. All nylon, or nylon and natural. There's a child's size. Get a Pro Double Duty for everyone in your family.

THE INSIDE STORY is firm blue bristles that clean teeth better . . . polish brighter!

THE OUTSIDE STORY is gentle white bristles that massage your gums safely, automatically as you brush.

PRO-PHY-LAC-TIC BRUSH CO., FLORENCE, MASS.
Makers of regular PRO Tooth Brushes, JEWELITE Hair Brushes and PRO Combs.

Make up to $300 or more In Spare Time
Over 300 New Items For Quick EXTRA MONEY Now To Christmas
Just Show Fabulous New 1960 Evans Line
No-Money-Down, No-Risk Starting Sample Plan. You keep up to $1.00 per item. Self-selling EVANS Line, huge plant mean more sales, faster service. Send today for salable boxes to be paid for or returned—plus big Free Album of Personalized cards, 2 big Order-Getting Illustrated Catalogs of over 300 items. Write now.
21 Lovely CHRISTMAS Cards
NEW ENGLAND ART PUBLISHERS, North Abington 721, Mass.

CORNS REMOVED BY MOSCO
Your money refunded if not satisfied. The Moss Company, Rochester, N.Y.
also Calluses. Quick, easy, and economical. Just rub on. Jars, 35¢ and 60¢. Buy Mosco at your druggist.

EARN MORE! Increase your earnings this year by forwarding new and renewal subscriptions for Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post, The American Home, Holiday, Jack and Jill and other popular publications. Generous commissions. For details write to
CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
371 Independence Square Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania

STOP PAIN INSTANTLY
COMBAT INFECTION-PROMOTE HEALING WITH SOOTHING
Campho-Phenique
(PRONOUNCED CAM-FO-FIN-EEK)
USE IT FOR FEVER BLISTERS COLD SORES, GUM BOILS

Not only do fever blisters heal faster, but the same thing happens when Campho-Phenique is used on cold sores, gum boils. Wonderfully soothing too, for minor burns, poison ivy, itching of insect bites. And Campho-Phenique is a highly effective, pain-relieving antiseptic for minor cuts and scratches from paring knives, can openers, tin cans, etc. Used on pimples, Campho-Phenique helps prevent their spread and re-infection.

Powder + foundation (no grease)

Covers flaws and tired lines

Won't streak, won't change color

Cutex

French Flair

Complete compact make-up 12 flattering shades

NEW TORTOISE CASE $1.35*
Luxury golden metal case $2.00*
Refill $1.00*
(*plus tax)

© LOFT, INC., 1960—ALSO AVAILABLE IN CANADA

The doctor nodded as though Mrs. Manchester's answer was what he had expected. "Suppose you go along to the examining room now. Mary Ann will help you get ready."

By the time they were back in the consulting room, Mrs. Manchester was much calmer. "I didn't dream you would examine me all over!" she exclaimed. "Do you always go through all those tests for something like lumps in the breasts?"

The doctor laughed. "I guess that's a sort of obsession with me. But in my particular specialty, I feel I must check everything that may have any bearing on a patient's difficulty. And I hadn't looked you over for some time. Anyway, my examination established that your troubles are entirely local. Aside from the breast lumps, I can't find anything wrong with you at all."

"You really dug your fingers in under my armpits and above my collarbones, Doctor. Why was that?"

"Those are the areas where secondary growths usually appear first when there is malignancy in the breast. You probably know about metastasis—the process by which cancer spreads. The lymph glands in those two places are very apt to pick up the cancer cells, if any are going through the system. Your lymph glands seem absolutely clear."

"Oh, Doctor, does that mean we've caught it in time? The cancer can be cured by removing my breasts?"

"I think the news may be even better than that," the doctor said with a chuckle. "It may not be necessary to remove anything at all."

"But I thought you always removed lumps from breasts!"

"We do if there is the slightest reason to think they may be cancerous. But the lumps you pointed out don't suggest malignancy at all. You are forty-five. Around this age, and sometimes earlier, there is quite a common tendency for a woman's breast glands to undergo some rather harmless changes. Small sacs of fluid, like little cysts, may develop. The condition is called fibrocystic disease, or chronic cystic mastitis. Usually several lumps are clustered together, or there may be a general area of lumpiness. They may appear in one breast or in both, as in your case. Actually, it's a little better if they do appear in both. Fibrocystic disease seems to be more prevalent in women who haven't been pregnant or nursed babies, though it can occur in others too. It is a common cause of persistent pain or tenderness in the breasts. It doesn't seem to predispose to cancer. We have to watch it, though, for it may cover up or confuse the diagnosis of true cancer nodules."

"When my sister was sixteen or seventeen, she had a lump removed from her breast. The doctor suspected cancer, but it proved to be just a cyst."

"Girls of that age or even younger occasionally do have harmless lumps. Generally they are simple cysts, with less of the fibrous development that occurs in older women. But breast cancer occurs in girls and young women, too, though infrequently. The doctor was probably right to get that lump out."

"She never had any more trouble, I know. Are my lumps due to this condition you mention?"

"Those you found have every characteristic of the harmless type," the doctor told her. "But there is one little lump in the outer extremity of your left breast—you had overlooked it—that has me puzzled. In most ways it is like the others, but not entirely. It is sort of special. I'm glad you came in so promptly to let me check it."

Mrs. Manchester, who had become quite animated, looked woeful again. "Do you think that one is cancer?"

"No, I don't think it is. But there is more reason to watch it than the large fibrocystic areas. For one thing, it is off all by itself, whereas the other lumps are more or less grouped together. It is not tender to the touch, like most of the others. Also, it is just the tiniest bit fixed. That is, it doesn't move about as freely in the surrounding tissue as the others do."

"You don't like its not being painful or tender? That seems very strange!"

"One of the bad features of breast cancer is that it doesn't hurt in early stages. Hence cancer cells often may be disseminated rather widely before they are discovered. I wish more women knew that. It's a reason why they should examine their breasts periodically, and report to the doctor immediately if they find any lumps. Mrs. Manchester, would you think it peculiar if I asked you to see another specialist about that particular lump? I can't quite decide whether or not I should do a biopsy. I would like to see what Doctor Schenley has to say about it."

"Doctor, if you would like to do a biopsy, go ahead. Your opinion is good enough for me."

"I appreciate that, Mrs. Manchester, and it makes me especially anxious not to put you to unnecessary bother and expense. My difficulty is that the differences between that one lump and the harmless ones are very slight and vague. And biopsy, in the case of breast lumps, involves rather more than a simple biopsy elsewhere—in the cervix, for instance.

BUT YOUR SOFT VOICE

By WILLIS EBERMAN

Where is your voice that once was in this room?
Silence is here. There is not any trace of your once-laughter; nor is your loved face ever to be found again. . . . I heard that doom
was clarion: this place is like a comb devoid of bees, of humming, that the lace of wind threads endlessly; yet I can trace
something of you above the amber loam:
movements of leaves are yours;
gesture of vine
against the sunny wall; the attitude of birches on the hill. . . . All these are yours.
But your soft voice will never sound again,
in any room; and only in my blood can it be heard upon my spirit's shores.

"First of all, the lump has to be removed. That is easy in itself. But we also have to be all ready to go ahead with a major operation if the lump should prove to be malignant. This advance preparation means a good deal of fuss and bother and a fair amount of expense, even though it shouldn't prove necessary to proceed with the major operation."

"But Doctor, it's just one little lump. We've caught it early and you don't find any signs that it has spread. Wouldn't it be enough just to remove the lump?"

"Yes, if it proves to be benign. That is to say, if it is nonmalignant. But if any malignancy were found, regardless of how small or apparently localized, we would have to proceed immediately to remove the entire breast with some of the adjacent tissues.

"When a lump is suspicious, the trouble and expense of being ready to proceed with a major operation are well worth while. But we doctors frown on putting patients through it without any good reason. I have known of surgeons who would remove every little breast nodule they happened upon. Just last week, a surgeon in a local clinic was criticized by the surgery committee for doing a great many breast biopsies, when the condition always proved to be benign. The other doctors thought he operated too soon and too often for the welfare of his patients. I don't want that kind of reputation.

"I don't believe this particular lump is malignant. On the other hand, we must take no chances. So I will really appreciate it if you will go to see Doctor Schenley. I don't think he will charge you. We have a friendly exchange system about cases in which either of us has some doubt."

The doctor was rather more pleased than surprised when Doctor Schenley advised waiting and watching the lump for two months before doing anything about it. At the end of the waiting period, he examined Mrs. Manchester's "special lump," as they had come to call it. He said at once, "We are going to take that lump out day after tomorrow. This time I don't need another opinion. I am still willing to wager it isn't malignant. But it is a little bigger than it was and it is a little more fixed in the surrounding tissue. I'm not going to feel easy until I have had a look at it."

In the hospital two days later, Mrs. Manchester was given a very light anesthetic—one of the special barbiturates—injected into an arm vein. The lump was removed in a matter of minutes through a small incision, then turned over immediately to the pathologist. The tissue was frozen quickly, and cut into incredibly thin slices. While the patient remained under the light anesthesia, the slices were stained and examined thoroughly. In exactly twelve minutes the report came back: no cancer.

The incision was then closed with unusual care, by very fine stitches underneath the skin. This was to eliminate stitch marks. The breast was bandaged with elastic adhesive to prevent further bleeding by pressure. Such bleeding might cause later swelling, or even infection.

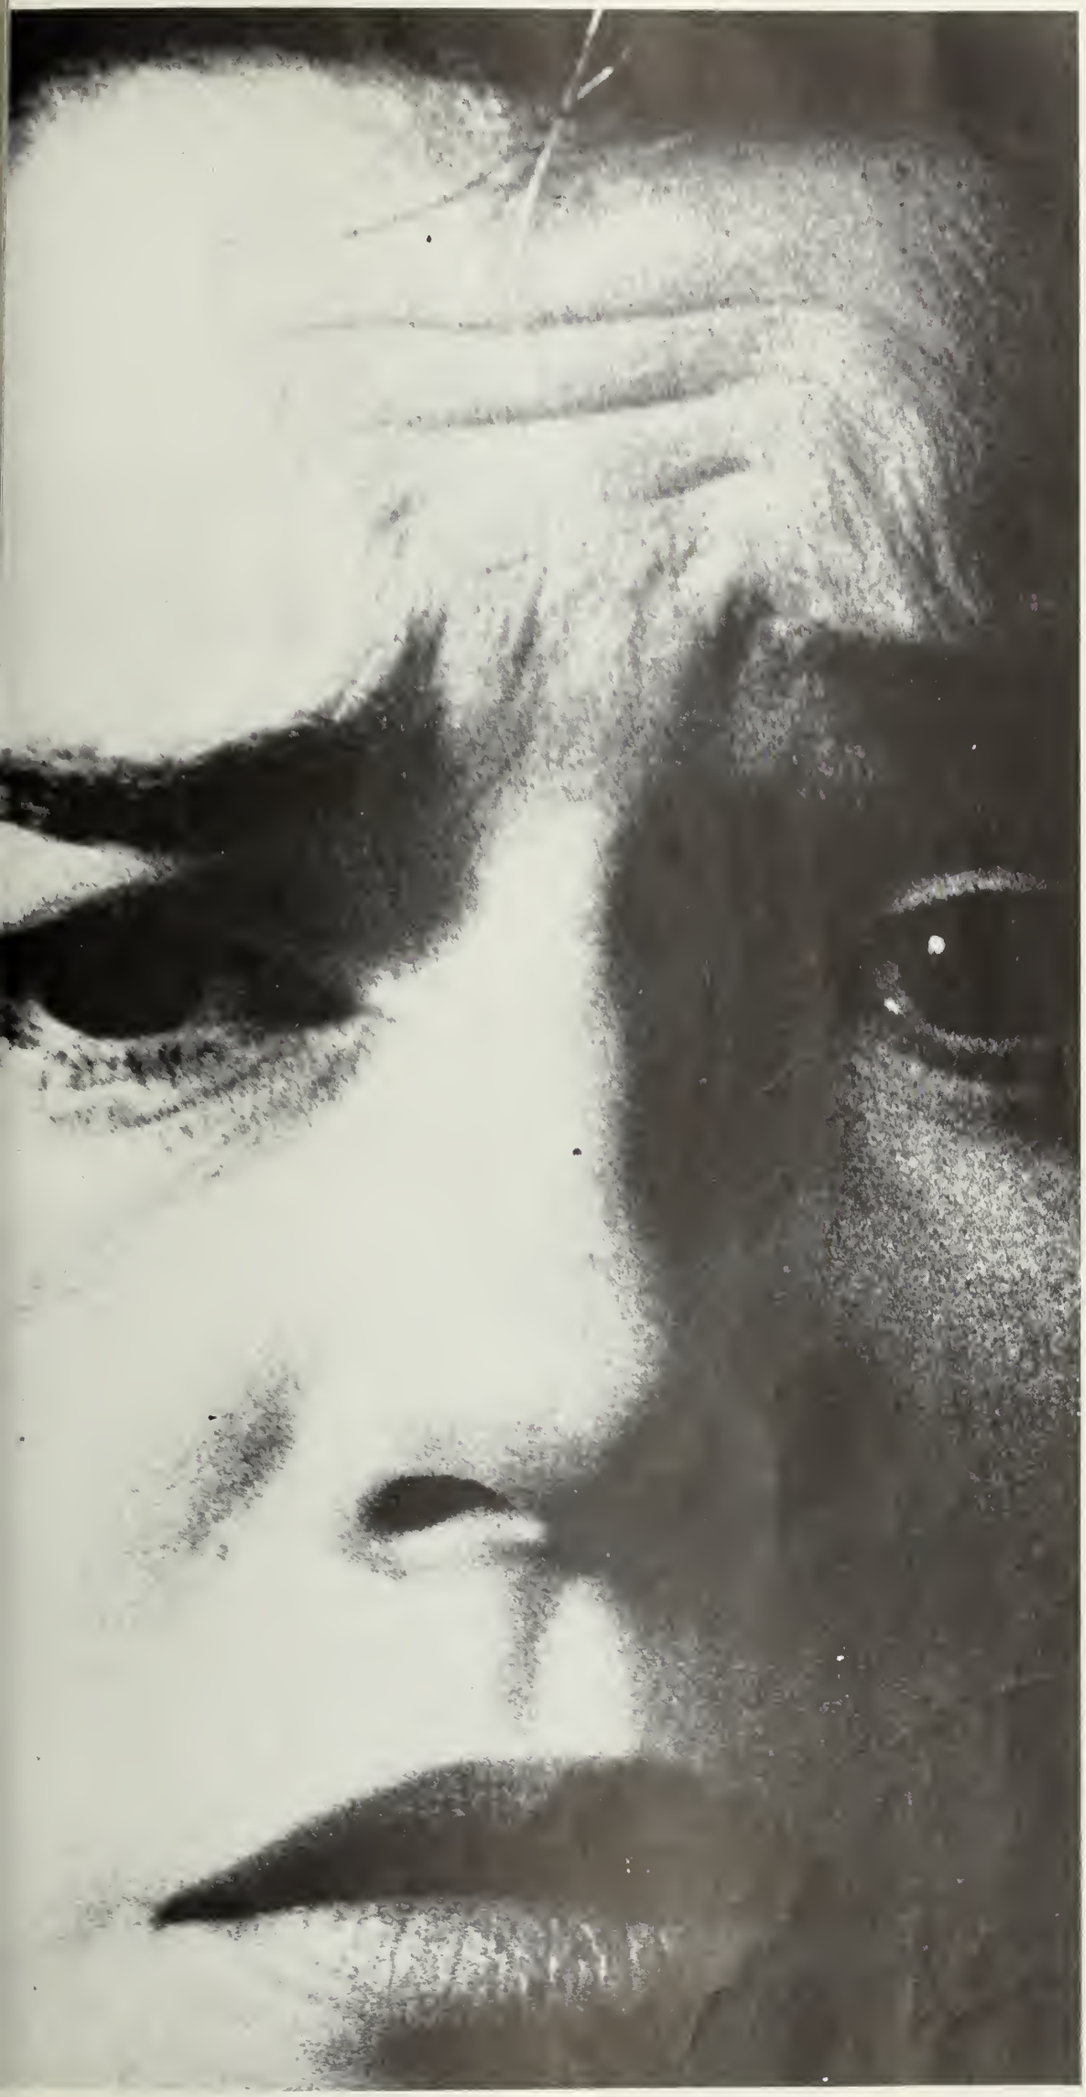
When the doctor entered her hospital room that evening, Mrs. Manchester was finishing a hearty supper. "Your nice resident gave me the good news as soon as I came out from under the anesthetic," she said happily. "He said you told him to."

"I was sorry I couldn't be here myself when you woke up to let you know there was no malignancy," the doctor said, "but my office was jammed. Of course we still haven't heard from the permanent sections, just the immediate frozen sections."

"Do you mean there's still a chance that I have cancer?"

"Not really, Mrs. Manchester. Once in a great while we pick up cells in a permanent section that had been missed on the frozen section. But I'm not a bit concerned in your case. As a matter of fact, I was sure there was no cancer in the lump as soon as I took it out, just from the way it looked and felt. I'm going to send you home tomorrow. I hope you aren't too upset because the operation proved to be unnecessary after all?"

"Don't give that another thought, Doctor! You didn't rush into it, and you had to be sure. The truth is, I'm glad the bothersome old lump is out." She looked down at the bandaged area. "I suppose I will have an ugly scar, and my breast will look kind of deflated, the way my sister's did after her lump was taken out. But that's a lot better than having a cancer, and losing a whole breast!"



The doctor exclaimed warmly, "Mrs. Manchester, you are wonderful! But if the way your breast is going to look is all that bothers you, you can forget about it. I took special pains to avoid the things you mention. Don't be concerned if you have a little dark drainage for a day or so. Too, the tissue may feel thickened and sort of hard under the scar for several weeks, months even. But after healing, the scar will be almost invisible. The breast tissue will fill in and restore the normal contour and consistency. There will be hardly any signs of an operation."

"It's good to know that not all breast lumps are malignant, Doctor. I feel I've been pretty lucky."

"But a good many breast lumps are malignant, so they should never be ignored. You will come in regularly from now on, won't you, Mrs. Manchester? We'll watch all these local troubles carefully. Then none will have a chance to get really worrisome."

Next month Dr. Schauffler discusses "desterilization" of males.

ADVERTISEMENT

How to ease the pain of sinus headache...

Sinus disease is one of the more widespread and painful ills of our time. It occurs when the sinus openings in the head are blocked and cannot drain. Pressure is then exerted on the sinus walls—and the inevitable sinus headache results.

When recovering from a cold or any infection that lowers your resistance, you may be prey to acute sinusitis, which later may become chronic. You can also get the disease if you swim—and especially if you dive—when you have a cold.

Sinus headache is one of the most prominent and painful symptoms of sinus congestion. And as sinus pain builds up, nervousness and irritability can result. That's when many sinus sufferers turn to Bufferin®. Bufferin quickly relieves the throbbing, irritating pain.

In fact, clinical studies prove that Bufferin's great benefit for millions is that it actually works twice as fast as plain aspirin. And Bufferin helps relax ragged nerves, makes a person feel better all over—fast.

A dulling sinus headache can plague a person for a day or two, even longer. Here, again, Bufferin is particularly effective. Plain aspirin and similar remedies can cause stomach discomfort when taken repeatedly.

Not so with Bufferin. Bufferin can be taken —as directed—without fear of stomach discomfort. That's because Bufferin contains an exclusive combination of anti-acids, known as Di-Alminate*, which only Bufferin adds to aspirin. The result is welcome pain relief without stomach discomfort.

Whenever your sinuses signal another bout with headache, take two Bufferin. You'll find that Bufferin can ease your tormenting headache speedily, safely and effectively.

 Bristol-Myers Registered Trademark for aluminum glycinate and magnesium carbonate.*

Preparing for the honeymoon

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

DO YOU AGREE?

Does premarital intercourse during engagement entail risk?

Yes, as shown by the fact that 15 to 20 per cent of brides are pregnant on their wedding day.

ASK YOURSELF:

Do We Agree on Our Children?

Beyond the love and affection that parents give to their children, nothing is more crucial to adolescent stability than the agreement of father and mother on matters of training and guidance. Think carefully before answering "Yes" or "No" to the following questions:

Do you both agree on:

1. The children's religious training?
2. Methods of discipline?
3. The home duties they should perform?
4. Hours they should go to bed?
5. Supervision of the TV programs they watch?
6. Their choice of friends?
7. Special privileges they receive?
8. Their use of the telephone?
9. Manners and actions while eating?
10. Their money allowances?

Are you and your husband:

11. Happily married?
12. Free from serious conflicts?
13. Agreed on standards and ideals?
14. Sharing freely with your children?

Credit one point for each "Yes" answer to the first ten questions, but count two points for each "Yes" to questions 11 through 14. Important as general agreement on the children is, their well-being may still be in doubt unless you and he are in personal accord with each other. Total scores of 15 and higher are very good; but if your score is 10 or less, discuss each "No" answer with your husband to see what can be done about it.

WHEN THE BRIDE-TO-BE IS ILL INFORMED ABOUT SEX

"John and I are to be married next month and naturally we both want to be happy. He is twenty-five and I am twenty-two. Waiting for the honeymoon has been hard for him, but I have insisted that we keep our feelings under control until we have the right to be two people in one. My worry is that I won't meet his expectations, because I believe that love is mostly a meeting of minds and not nearly as sexual as he thinks.

"I've tried to talk to my mother about it, but she is shocked by my questions. Except for telling me about menstruation and pregnancy, she never explained anything to me or discussed sex.

"John has tried to discuss it with me, but I know if I show any interest it will get too personal. I'm not cold, but he hints I am inhibited. I hope you can help me and other girls to get ready for the honeymoon."

Laura is overestimating the importance of the honeymoon as either a portent or the foundation of successful marriage. She feels that ultimate happiness for herself and her husband depends on their success in adjusting to each other, particularly sexually, during the honeymoon.

Actually, the honeymoon is a unique interlude between two ways of life, remote from the realities of either. Though the bride and groom have abandoned the single role and become a married couple, they have not yet assumed the full responsibilities of their new status.

Laura's letter indicates somewhat less sophistication than is usual among engaged girls. This may be because she has never enjoyed the kind of relationship with her mother that permitted them to discuss intimate matters. Since we know from research studies that the lack of a confidential mother-daughter relationship constitutes something of a handicap to a bride in achieving a satisfactory sexual adjustment, we will confine our suggestions to Laura (and others like her) largely to this area. In doing so, however, we do not intend to imply that the sexual adjustment is separate and distinct from the rest of marriage; on the contrary, it is only one aspect of the total relationship, and it will both influence and be influenced by all other elements of the marriage.

Consult a physician. A premarital medical examination is required by law in most states, but is desirable in any event as an opportunity to discuss methods of family planning and to raise questions concerning anatomy, physiology or the reproductive process. Many doctors are qualified to comment helpfully on the psychology as well as the physiology of sexual adjustment.

Read several books recommended by qualified advisers—your physician or minister, or a recognized expert. Reading will give you new information and insight; equally important, it will help you to consider the matter of sexual adjustment in marriage impersonally and objectively.

Accept differences in the sexual reactions of male and female. The male usually has greater sex drive and more easily attains satisfaction than the female. The bride who recognizes and accepts this fact has already taken a significant step toward adjustment.

Recognize the mutuality of the sex relationship. Neither can attain true satisfaction without the co-operation, good will and generosity of the other. Exclusive preoccupation with self on the part of one partner precludes a satisfactory adjustment for either. Compromise is invaluable, in this as in all aspects of marriage.

Encourage communication. Do not let diffidence or false modesty restrain you from talking over with your future husband this vital and most intimate aspect of your marriage. If, like Laura, you are somewhat inhibited, discussing a book you have both read may offer a more comfortable way of approaching the subject.

So long as a young couple can talk about their problems, exchange views, try new approaches and make compromises, no difficulty need be classified as hopeless, whether it concerns sex, finances or in-law relationship. If Laura bears this in mind, she will be well prepared for the honeymoon—and for marriage.

TOO-EARLY DATING

"I'm at my wit's end. Tom is just past 16, but he has his driver's license, and he expects to use the family car for his dates three or four nights a week no matter what our plans. At 14½, Jane is out on a date every weekend night and often for school affairs in between. She and Tom seldom get home before midnight—too late for Jane especially—but if we protest they say everybody else does the same. And already Patty is beginning to date, though she isn't even 13. It seems to me they're trying to live like adults before they're old enough, but I don't know how to stop it."

Though Mrs. Baker mentions several specific problems (use of the car, late hours, choice of friends) note that all are associated with dating, and particularly with dating at an early age. Like many another mother, she is confused and bewildered by her responsibilities to her children, who have begun dating much younger than was common a generation ago, in her own girlhood.

Authorities agree that the custom of dating serves useful purposes. It helps the individual to mature socially by providing opportunity to understand the opposite sex. It contributes to personality development by encouraging the individual to cultivate traits and adopt behavior that will enhance social acceptance and popularity. It offers a chance to make friends with both sexes through paired group activities. Finally, varied dating experience gives the individual standards of judgment when the time comes to choose a mate, and offers training in adjustment to the personality of another.

To some extent, most boys and girls can benefit from these functions of dating from fifteen on. But informal everyday school contacts are probably just about as effective for young teenagers, and certainly much less hazardous.

Though age and maturity are not the same, they tend to go together. Maturity is characterized by both willingness and ability to accept responsibility. Assumption of responsibility involves knowledge, judgment, standards and resources, attributes which the young teenager has not had time to develop. Irresponsible dating is competitive, exploitive and destructive. Unless your child has demonstrated a responsible attitude, too-early dating is likely to result in inconvenience and embarrassment at best, serious trouble at worst.

How can parents control the situation? Probably they can't completely control, but they can modify and guide. The pressure of "all the others do" is hard to withstand, but if the mother has established a relationship of confidence and trust with her children, her counsel will at least be heeded (if not always implicitly carried out). Beyond that:

Give in when you conscientiously can, stand firm when you must. You must do the first if you are to do the second.

Welcome your child's friends. This will serve the double purpose of acquainting you with your son's or daughter's associates, and providing an alternative to formal dating.

Avoid criticism. Don't force your child to defend an undesirable acquaintance by expressing your disapproval.

Be interested but not inquisitive. Ask a friendly general question—"Did you have fun . . . do anything special"—but don't demand a play-by-play account.

Above all, give generously of love. The adolescent desperately needs attention and affection. It is an established fact that extremely early dating, going steady and premature emotional involvement are much more common among teenagers who have had inadequate affection at home.

The adolescent who is made to feel loved, wanted and needed has no urge to find a premature substitute for adult appreciation.

KOTEX and KIMLON are trademarks of Kimberly-Clark Corp.

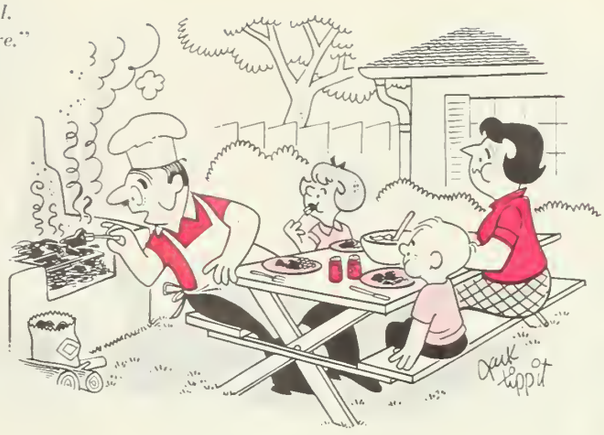
Beautiful Hair

B R E C K

4 ounces 60¢

THERE ARE THREE BRECK SHAMPOOS FOR THREE DIFFERENT HAIR CONDITIONS

To keep your hair looking its loveliest during the summer months use one of the Three Breck Shampoos. A mild, gentle Breck Shampoo cleans thoroughly and helps bring out the natural lustre of your hair. One Breck Shampoo is for dry hair. Another Breck Shampoo is for oily hair. A third Breck Shampoo is for normal hair. When buying a shampoo select the one Breck Shampoo that is right for your individual hair condition. A Breck Shampoo leaves your hair clean, shining and beautiful.



The Three Breck Shampoos are color marked to help you select the correct type.

■ Red for Dry Hair ■ Yellow for Oily Hair ■ Blue for Normal Hair

AVAILABLE AT BEAUTY SHOPS AND WHEREVER COSMETICS ARE SOLD – 2½ OZ. 39¢ 4 OZ. 60¢ 8 OZ. $1.00 16 OZ. $1.75

Copyright 1960 by John H. Breck Inc.

"You're right, Helen. . . .
We are eating the charcoal.
The steaks are still in here."

There's a man in the house

By HARLAN MILLER

Our block's brightest teenangel clarifies why
e helps his pa and ma with chores this summer vacation.
I want to keep 'em alive," he says, "so they can upport me in the style to which they've accustomed me."

I'm keeping my French artificial geraniums in the ving room all summer," brags Betty Comfort shamelessly, rapping an heirloom gravy spoon for a June bride.
They look so real I'm tempted to water 'em."

We'll vacation in the Yorktown-Williamsburg-
Bull Run hotbed of history this summer.
By a pleasant coincidence, our young flier and his family happen to be stationed nearby.

've learned more about Henry VIII, his six wives and heir times in six installments of a JOURNAL serial han in high-school and college history. Yet doubt the heroine was quite so pretty as Henry nd the illustrator, Coby Whitmore, seemed to think.

Even if they de-emphasize football, each student ought to grow good enough as participant in one sport to fascinate him all his life.
(We have four men of seventy in our town who play fair tennis.)

My wife cunningly hides a boudoir color picture of Marilyn Monroe in our folder of bills to pay. Thus she chemes to focus my attention monthly on our finances.

like to astonish our young ones with a bizarre titbit.
ike the news that Nome, Alaska, is farther west han Honolulu. It awes 'em more'n a long lecture.

What a difference twenty pounds make!
I realized it fully when my 1959 tennis shorts kept falling down at the River Club
the first time I played tennis in 1960.

My Dream Girl hesitates to let me install a TV set in her bedroom, even as a birthday present. "My resistance to uch goop," she says, "is lowest when I'm lying in bed."

Another feminine foible husbands resent jealously:
heir wives' adoration of doctors. They quickly detect a esemblance to the late czarina's devotion to Rasputin.

"I'd better draw up a new will," muses Peter Comfort, mixing a batch of weed spray. "It makes me feel important, and it always stimulates my Betty's solicitude."

Our town's teachers demur to a written English heme daily. They'd have to spend nights and veekends correcting 'em. No solution?
Like finessing students or parents to pitch in?

"Those bloody dispatches from South Africa," says the autocrat of our luncheon table,
"make us Americans pretty smug about Dixie's gentler approach to the same problem."

I gained less weight during seven days in New York than during a three-day visit at my wife's alma mater. (She thinks the pretty coeds affect my appetite.)

I confessed to a lovely matron at a potluck party that the suit I had on was twenty-one years old, made at Brooks in 1939. "First pair of pants with zipper they ever made!" I recalled proudly.

What a red-letter day when Debbie Reynolds brought her mom to our garden for tea!
I discerned Debbie was the last Hollywood star who never sassed her ma.

My wife smiles at my whimsey to display my books in book ends in related clusters, as she displays flowers in vases. (I can find 'em quicker that way too!)

Every time we slope off for a swim in the old quarry I think of Teddy Roosevelt diving off a ninety-foot cliff.
This I admire just short of emulation.

In one week came letters from faraway readers in Africa and New Zealand, and from an American matron in Argentina who's writing a new cookbook in Spanish.
(I crave a simpler bouillabaisse recipe!)

At a back-yard picnic with six recent college graduates, we agreed that juniors and seniors need phys ed worse'n freshmen. (We voted to make it compulsory all four years, and for graduate students especially.)

We marvel at the acumen of cherubs and teenangels at our door to sell nuts, cookies, candy and tickets for lofty causes. They manage to catch each of us alone, and sell us each separately, unbeknownst to the other.

My Dream Girl, who dearly loves chocolate-nut sundaes, is refusing desserts this summer, so she can get into her slim gold-aluminum swim suit for her daily plunge.
Eyes at the old quarry are critical.

. . . When we get phone calls from both coasts on holidays and anniversaries (instead of small arms around our necks).
. . . Or our redhead's one-year-old paints
the kitchen wall with her squashed banana.
. . . And Junior undertakes to build a new house, where I merely remodeled an old one thirty-three times,
. . . And we worry more about their skiing or flying than they ever worried about me overseas.
. . . Or our youngest agrees to study law before he becomes a teacher.
. . . And my Lady Love buys me the gaudiest golf-bag-toting cart in town (with sitter attachment) for my birthday.
Then I discern the true flavor of happy marriage is not molasses but bittersweet.

Unguentine for a skinned elbow?
Mother always says
it's for burns...

Now science finds Unguentine effective for all kinds of everyday skin injuries!

UNGUENTINE®
BOOSTS NATURE'S HEALING POWER
as no plain antiseptic can!

1. Nature sends its healing serum to the surface of a skin injury. But tension may keep serum droplets apart. As germs get through, healing slows down!

2. Unguentine instantly spreads this healing serum, creates a protective blanket to lock out germs and to promote healing more effectively than nature itself!

Unguentine gives instant aid to injured skin
Relieves pain, fights germs, promotes healing and forms a protective antiseptic dressing as no cream or liquid can! Nothing's safer for children, the whole family—for all kinds of skin injuries: cuts, scrapes, scratches, burns; painful sunburn, too!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

NOW—GET YOUR MONEY-SAVING UNGUENTINE-CURAD*
FIRST-AID KIT.

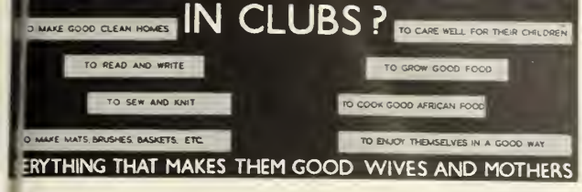
PLAY IT SAFE—
let Unguentine take over!

*T.M. of the Kendall Co.

Old Gold Spin Filter spins and cools the smoke

Average temperature of Old Gold Spin Filter smoke is a pleasant 78 degrees

AND the cooler the smoke ... the better the taste!



© 1960, P. LORILLARD CO.

... the best taste yet in a filter cigarette

FIRST WITH THE FINEST CIGARETTES—THROUGH LORILLARD RESEARCH

1760 P. Lorillard · 200th Anniversary 1960

TWO HUNDRED YEARS OF TOBACCO EXPERIENCE

PUBLIC AFFAIRS
EDITED BY MARGARET HICKEY

We witnessed a miracle

UNICEF at work for children in Africa

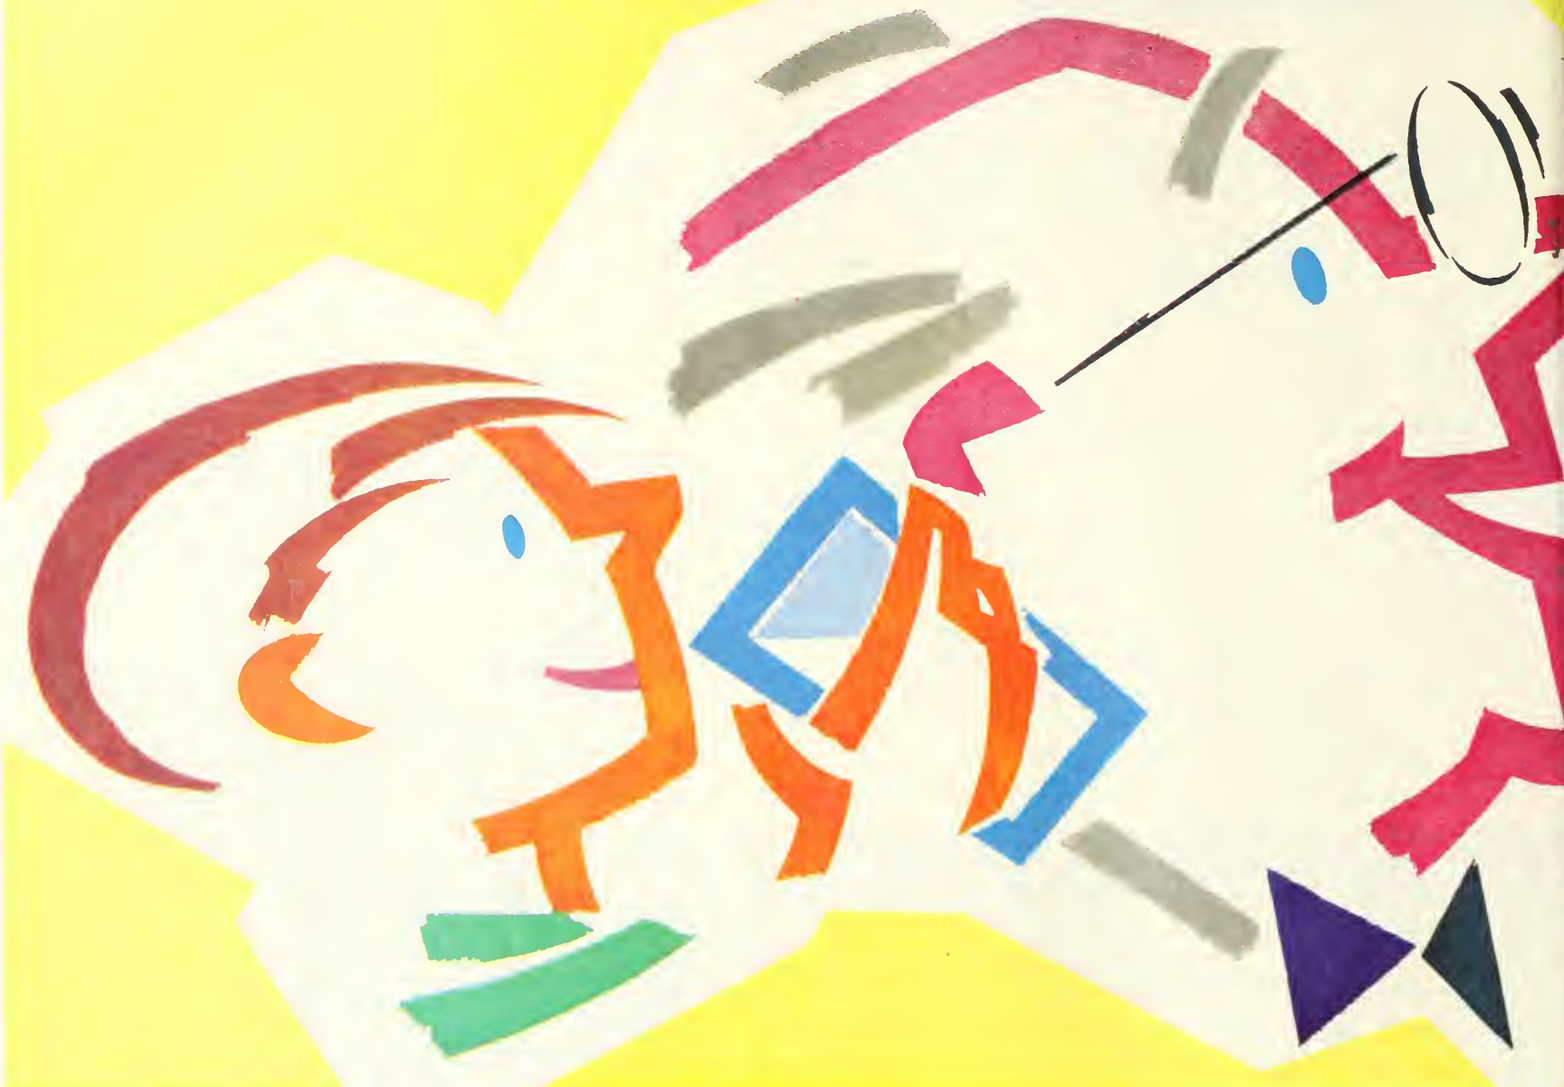
By MARGARET HICKEY

The children of all nations are appealing, but the small, bright-eyed youngsters of Africa have a special charm, heart-tugging and unforgettable. Traveling across their vast homeland (Africa is nearly four times the size of the United States), Beatrice Gould and I went "on safari" to see how UNICEF, the United Nations' own world-wide agency for children, helps them grow to healthy adulthood. Everywhere they greeted us in low, humming voices; sometimes we heard the Swahili "Jambo, jambo." Gay, rollicking children romped the mission schoolyards; subdued, weaker ones waited in crowded hospital corridors. So many alluring little faces—how many would finally reach maturity?

The mortality rate for children in Africa is still unbelievably high (over one third die before the age of three); they must fight ravaging diseases such as yaws (induced by conditions of poverty and filth and disfiguring the sufferer), malaria, leprosy, sleeping sickness and tuberculosis. Even more widespread is the constant danger of kwashiorkor, a severe protein-calorie malnutrition occurring between the ages of one and three years. But actually seeing the rapid advances made through the work of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) was like witnessing a miracle. Since 1959, nearly 5,000,000 mothers and children in Africa have been benefited by the UNICEF programs (the World Health and Food and Agriculture organizations help). These programs we were able to glimpse against the beautiful scenery and animal life.

At Mulago Hospital in Kampala, where Makerere College has established its first chair for the study of children's tropical medicine, we saw a dramatic illustration of just how this world-wide concern brings almost-starved waifs back to life and health. A little CONTINUED ON PAGE 28

There's not enough mother's milk for two. Since the baby's arrival, the child at right has experienced near starvation, as witness his bloated, swollen belly. It's to prevent such conditions that UNICEF milk is used.



At the women's club UNICEF reaches mothers with instruction and demonstration in homemaking projects. One village mother teaches all the others what she has learned of child care, cooking, planting crops.

Traditional way of cooking on stones on the floor is still a common cause of accidents. But women are now learning to build mud stoves high enough to prevent a baby crawling on floor from pulling steaming pots of food onto itself.

Be sure your family is nC

Save these Caps...Get Valuable Premiums at Big Cash Savings

Tear off and save caps from any brand of milk, dairy products, or fruit juices in Canco cartons of any size

These caps make you eligible for wonderful money-saving premium offers. Join the many thousands of families who are making their dollars go further by participating in the Canco Cap-Saver Program.

You can always identify Canco cartons by their unique caps . . . so easy to open, so easy to close. The flat tops of Canco cartons really save space. Canco cartons are safe and sanitary. Children serve themselves easily . . . open and pour without mess.

CANCO Division AMERICAN CAN COMPANY

Calcium Starved

28 CONTINU

"Young or old, it's a good thing for diet to be calcium rich...The outstanding food for calcium is milk," says U.S. Department of Agriculture whose studies reveal that, regardless of income, millions of American families are not getting enough calcium in their diet. Calcium is indispensable to the proper function of nerves and muscles, including the heart. Lack of calcium can retard the growth of children, and cause bones to become brittle in older people. Calcium starvation is serious... its slow degenerating effects may be hidden for years.

ADULTS NEED MILK. "Our ability to absorb calcium decreases after middle age and our milk intake should increase...," says an authority in the Journal of the American Medical Association.* The National Research Council recommends 800 milligrams of calcium daily for adults and 1,000 to 1,400 milligrams for children, depending on age. This is the amount of calcium in three to five glasses of milk.

*Source: Dr. Genevieve Stearns, "Human Requirement of Calcium, Phosphorus and Magnesium," Journal of the American Medical Association, February 18, 1950, vol. 42, p. 478ff.

Source: "Recommended Dietary Allowances," Revised 1958, National Academy of Sciences—National Research Council.

Buttermilk, skim milk and other milk products also help provide the recommended daily dietary allowances of calcium.

FREE...

FROM AMERICAN CAN COMPANY

If you have not sent for your free pastel broadcloth drawstring cap-saver bag and full-color illustrated 16-page brochure containing valuable money-saving premium offers; calcium-milk-health information; a chart to help you make sure your family is not calcium starved; and swatches of the blouse-premium material, mail the above postage-paid card or write to:

CANCO, P. O. Box 1166, Chicago 90, Ill.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 23

boy of six, weighing less than 20 pounds, had been brought in from a rural health center with only the faintest flicker of a pulse. His skin had the typical grayish cast of advanced malnutrition; his hair had a reddish tinge; the bloated belly gave a macabre appearance to his slat-thin skeleton. Yet blood transfusions (thanks to the Uganda Red Cross) had renewed his weak heartbeat to life-sustaining regularity and he was now receiving the liquid milk-protein diet supplied by UNICEF through a fine polyethylene tube taped to his scalp. Many such children are seen every day at this modern hospital. They show growth failure, edema (pitiful swelling of the feet and lower legs), wasted muscles, often accompanied by painful skin rashes and open ulcers.

"Our most difficult task is to reach these children before they are permanently damaged," explained Dr. D. B. Jelliffe, who is the first UNICEF professor at Makerere College. "The tragedy of the African mother is that she loves her child so much, yet is so often completely ignorant of the essentials needed for normal growth and nourishment. The average mother breast-feeds her baby until her supply of milk is exhausted or cut off by another pregnancy. When this occurs, the child under two years may literally die of starvation because other suitable foods are not offered to replace mother's milk."

To bridge the almost impossible gap between knowledge and need, UNICEF is assisting 31 countries and 13 territories in Africa. Born of the postwar emergency which threatened the lives of millions of children with famine and neglect, it now brings health and nourishment to children by encouraging their own governments, voluntary organizations and, most of all, the people themselves to help themselves. Millions of Americans give directly to UNICEF through Halloween Trick or Treat contributions, purchase of Christmas cards; our Government, through funds and surplus foods. Our JOURNAL safari took us to places where, because of the UNICEF dollar (joined with two, three or even more from the country or local community), a child can reach for a glass of milk; a young trained midwife packs her kit on her bicycle and speeds away; children, playing in the schoolyard of a leprosy village, are receiving treatment that will save them from a disease which starts so often in childhood.

Every type of aid and help given by UNICEF has as its purpose the improvement of the lot of children. The spotlight now is on a network of simple buildings, each labeled "Health Center." Although the organization of maternal- and child-health services varies from country to country in Africa, the most workable plan depends on village centers and subcenters, directed and helped from urban hospitals or public-health offices. The centers range in type from the small country maternity hospital, cool and quiet, with the Irish Sisters of the Apostles in charge, to the crowded single-room dispensary at Jos in Nigeria, where expectant mothers sitting on the floor listen intently to simple health rules in their native dialect. There are over 400 of these rural health centers, 800 village outposts and 93 town health officers assisted by UNICEF in all Africa. Even so, midwives, health visitors and the too few doctors must travel hundreds of miles over rough and almost uncharted terrain to see that pregnant mothers and young children get food and medicine.

Threatened with a milk famine because of the curtailment of surplus stocks from the United States and Canada, UNICEF is pushing local production of safe milk and other protein-rich foods which can be distributed at low cost. We visited a new modern processing plant in the high plateau country. Along jungle roads, handsome Fulani women carry on their heads in gourd calabashes milk from their tribal herds to outlying collection centers. At the central processing station another local product is added—to one part milk powder, three of powdered groundnuts, one of Nigeria's main crops.

"It is not just poverty which is the problem," Dr. E. E. Ecoma, maternal and child-care specialist, explained during our three-day tour in Nigeria with him. "It is helping the women to understand how to make the best use of foods available. The basic diet here is yams—something like potatoes—with a sauce of groundnuts or red beans, mixed with oil. This, properly cooked, with powdered milk added, is very adequate. The mother can be taught to widen the variety of foodstuffs which she grows in her garden. But this knowledge is slow to be accepted in the remote rural areas."

Even in these far villages, however, women realize that a mysterious agency somehow brings nutrition within the reach of their families; they even know it by its strange alphabetical name. Under medical supervision at mission hospitals or health units, dried skim milk is distributed in 4½-pound units (amount sufficient for a month) in plastic bags. Mothers are instructed to add the milk to cooked vegetables which have been prepared for the adult family and to boil the water they use if they mix the milk to drink. The water supply of many rural areas is contaminated, and is a constant danger to the families depending on it.

The mobile health teams still crisscross the jungle, wade deep in malarial swamps or climb halfway up the mountainside in the disease-control projects: the malaria control in Nigeria; tuberculosis control in Kenya; leprosy in Uganda. UNICEF provides the penicillin, syringes, blood-testing supplies and the vehicles with the blue medallion—the symbol, too, for first aid or quick transfer to the hospital or health center.

Under special UNICEF grants health centers also train desperately needed auxiliary medical personnel, as they are called, to help those who have spent long years abroad getting ready for the work now made possible by their own new governments.

Doctor Ecoma himself is typical of these young people. Educated at a Scotch Presbyterian mission school, he won the coveted Cambridge Certificate before leaving for seven years at the University of Edinburgh with two years' residency, still two more years at the University of Calcutta for maternal and child care. He took us to Aba's training center (in Eastern Nigeria) for maternal and child-care health visitors and midwives, where we met Mrs. Catherine Chukwuka, the sister in charge.

Slim, crisp in her starched uniform, she is typical of many young African women trained abroad. Born in villages or under the hot roofs of overcrowded towns, they know how difficult life still is for women. With technical help, valuable supplies (drugs and equipment) these young women at Aba and other training centers (Tanganyika, Uganda, Kenya have them too) are working against a tragic deadline of pain and suffering. To meet it, they have begun a domiciliary type of service for pregnant women.

Delivery at home means much more than safeguarding mother and child; it means education of the whole family. In nearby Aba, where as many as 600 people live in a city block, expectant mothers are visited once a month during the first seven months of pregnancy, then twice a month until delivery. Each visit is an opportunity for the health worker to suggest improvements in simple sanitation and housekeeping. The patient learns to tidy her room, keep in readiness the articles needed for delivery. The young midwife, cheerful and friendly, is addressed as Miss or Mrs.; no "mamma" or "auntie." Most important of all, the mother is told how to reach the midwife on duty at the health center when her time is near.

After the birth (in the home unless there are complications) the worker visits the new mother and baby twice a day for the first three days, watching for puerperal infection, instructing in ways to keep the new infant clean and healthy.

Speaking the dialect of the village (often an unwritten one), African women with such training bring lifesaving knowledge. Consider the conditions under which homes are established, families started, life carried on in the rural areas. Mud-and-wattle rondawels with thatched roofs are the typical dwellings. The rondawel has no window, no cross ventilation, no entrance or exit save one doorway. Possessions are hung from the roof in goatskin bags; privacy (such as it is) is achieved by a partitioning curtain. Polygamy is still the rule in many places, but each wife is supposed to have her own rondawel for herself and her children.

The women till the land, plant the food, keep the gardens weeded and the harvest picked. They also fetch the firewood, carry the water (sometimes the source is miles away), cook the meals and care for the children. Somehow knowledge of nutrition and sanitation must be brought to them, the desire must be awakened to learn more and more—to help themselves and their families.

UNICEF is also reaching these women through homecraft and mothercraft activities sponsored through clubs, training centers, informal teaching from mother to mother. In the churchyard, at the village health center, under the shade of convenient trees we saw these practical demonstrations in homemaking projects. A village woman will show others what she has learned about baby care, cooking or planting.

This movement, called "maendeloe ya wanawake," literally means "the natural leadership of women." UNICEF has given its support to government community-development programs for a two-year period in Uganda, Tanganyika and Nigeria. These programs offer a new kind of classroom to which mothers come

CONTINUED ON PAGE 137

VACATION FOR TWO

By DIANA CHARLTON VAN DEUSEN

We pulled the suitcase from a shelf and particles
Of dust danced in a shaft of light.
We quickly packed Vacation clothes and wedged in toilet articles Without a check list. We would buy the things we lacked.
We gaily joked! Our children played behind
The suitcase; they would stay with grandma. They were small To take with us. We told them we would try to find Some gifts. Our four-year-old requested a new doll.
Our son said he would like a bigger Teddy bear.
We did not think about the children much that day.
New sights refreshed us; we had time to spend or spare
As we desired. How nice that we could get away!
That night, we opened up the suitcase on a chair
And found a doll face down upon my folded blouse;
A Teddy bear was wrapped inside
a shirt with care.
Our eyes met, and our thoughts raced back to our own house Four hundred miles, where two small children were in bed Without their favorite toys. My husband found, as I,
That there had been no clothing left behind. Instead,
We missed two treasures we could not go out and buy.

Here are some of the fine products created for your enjoyment by

GENERAL FOODS KITCHENS

Maxwell House Coffee
Birds Eye Frozen Foods
Jell-O Desserts
Kool-Aid Soft Drink Mixes
Log Cabin Syrup
S.O.S. Soap Pads
Minute Rice
Swans Down Cake Mixes
General Foods Kitchens Cookbook
Post Cereals
Yuban Coffee
Minute Tapioca
Good Seasons Salad Dressing Mixes
Tang Breakfast Drink
Tuffy Plastic Mesh Ball
Minute Potatoes
D-Zerta Dietary Desserts
Certo and Sure-Jell Pectin
Sanka Coffee

A CONSUMER TEST EVERY WOMAN UNDERSTANDS

A drop on the wrist, and you know when the bottle's just right for baby. ■ It isn't always so simple for General Foods Kitchens to make sure things are just right for you. ■ Sometimes our tests get pretty complicated. Take the going-over Post Cereals get. One machine keeps tab on moisture—to keep it out. Another machine helps us determine vitamins, minerals and proteins—to keep them in. We even call in experts, ages 6 to 12, to try new forms, new shapes, new flavors. ■ Before a product wears the General Foods Kitchens Seal, you can be sure the product has been thoroughly tested.

GENERAL FOODS
KITCHENS

New Curity®

S-T-R-E-T-C-H WEAVE GAUZE

DIAPERS

The revolutionary new Curity gauze diaper with the stretch-and-return weave gets stretchier with washing. New, streamlined size is easier to handle . . . folds conveniently to provide more absorbency where most needed.

Stretches with stomach. Adjusts readily to all size babies, especially after feeding when infant tummies are enlarged. No hems to irritate tender baby skin.

- NO BINDING
- NO SEAT SAG
- EASIER PINNING
- NO GAPPING

Curity washes softer, smoother in quality products like Ivory Snow, Ivory Flakes or Dash Detergent. Don't forget Curity dress-up diapers and double duty night diapers, too. At leading stores and diaper services.

All Curity Diapers
DRY FASTER
WASH EASIER ABSORB MORE WEAR LONGER

THE KENDALL COMPANY
Textile Division, Walpole, Mass., Dept. J70
Enclosed is 25c (coins only) for a new Curity Stretch Weave Gauze Diaper. Print clearly. Only one to a family.
Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____
Good in Continental United States and Hawaii

DR. SPOCK TALKS TO MOTHERS

"If parents act as if the handicapped child were a regular child except for the defect, other children will tend to accept him on the same basis."

Can a handicapped child be cared for at home?

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

Two months ago I discussed a number of different factors which may contribute to the distress which parents feel when they have a handicapped child: sympathy with him; a sense of responsibility in having created him; the reawakening of all kinds of guiltiness left over from their own childhoods; new guilt which sometimes comes from an impulse to turn away from the child. Then the attitude of the diagnostician may play a part. If he is stern in manner, or emphasizes the categorical difference between this child and others, or suggests sending the child away from the family, he may intensify the parents' feelings of shame.

All of us to a greater or lesser degree will try to avoid or at least postpone accepting the diagnosis. We may even put off the treatment and rehabilitation measures that are urgently recommended because we can't acknowledge the fact yet.

Some of us will gladly spend more money than we can afford or is fair to the family. We will travel to another continent if there seems any hope. We will take our child to someone we half suspect is a charlatan if we can half believe his promises. These are the responses of those of us who solve our problems through going into action. Any action seems better than none.

THE NATIONAL FOUNDATION

The handicapped child (this one was born with an open spine and hydrocephalus) should not be confined at home because parents are sensitive about strangers' tactless remarks.

Others of us will be inactivated instead—almost paralyzed—by a depression in which we endlessly, fruitlessly reproach ourselves. Eventually our mental self-punishment atones for the sense of guilt and we can begin to function more constructively.

Some of us will be affected in another human pattern. When we have received a deep hurt and can see no way to escape it, we may surrender to it. In a sense we embrace it. By thinking of ourselves as victims of an inexplicable fate we can avoid the sense of responsibility—for the future as well as for the past. We pity ourselves and we ask others to pity us. Insidiously we learn to get a grim kind of satisfaction from our suffering. This weakens and delays our impulse to find a more constructive solution.

In time the shock of any kind of family crisis wears off, and as parents we settle down to live with the situation. It is much the same whether there is a handicap in the usual sense, or whether the problem is marital or financial or one of delinquency. This is the stage where the difficulty is either coped with or left unsolved. This is where the basic strength and resourcefulness of the parents really count.

There are two extremes which tempt us. The first is to dedicate every hour of our lives, and the main concern of the family, to the care of the handicapped child. Our uneasy consciences may urge this course. It will make us feel more comfortable emotionally, at the end of each physically exhausting day. But what should make us realize that this is a mistake is simply to ask the question: "Would this degree of concern be wholesome if the child were entirely healthy?" Of course it wouldn't. We've probably all known a family in which the parents' only topic of conversation, only excuse for existence was an idolized only child, or we've read about the rearing of some child prodigy. The child who is such a focus of attention is forever being waited on, dragged here and there, groomed, talked about, urged, cautioned, drilled.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 33

RINGING UP BABY®

HINTS COLLECTED BY MRS. DAN GERBER, MOTHER OF FIVE

a place in the sun for your little one

With summer upon us, you'll want to sun your little ray of sunshine. Points to remember for happy basking:

TIME IS OF THE ESSENCE. Start with 2 minutes a day, divided between tummy and back. Increase 2 minutes a day. Limit exposure to 30 minutes no matter how tan you think baby is. Free-wheeling toddlers need watching too.

POSITION IS EVERYTHING. Place baby so the top of his head is toward the sun to spare his eyes. A pad on the ground makes a better spot for sunning than baby's hot carriage.

BATHING BEAUTIES are usually gry, but occasionally little tites lag during warm weather. ncourage appetite interest and keep 's mealtime disposition sunny, otating different kinds and colors od. Easy as 1-2-3 with over 50 er Strained Foods to choose from. pecially processed to please your 's palate and preserve the utmost in ious food values.

'T FORGET that fruits and s are especially appealing in mer. Gerber offers 10 luscious fruits, reshing juices.

FRESHER COURSE" FOR TODDLERS

tbs. Gerber Strained Egg Yolks
n of Gerber Strained Orange Juice cup cool milk 2 tsp. sugar
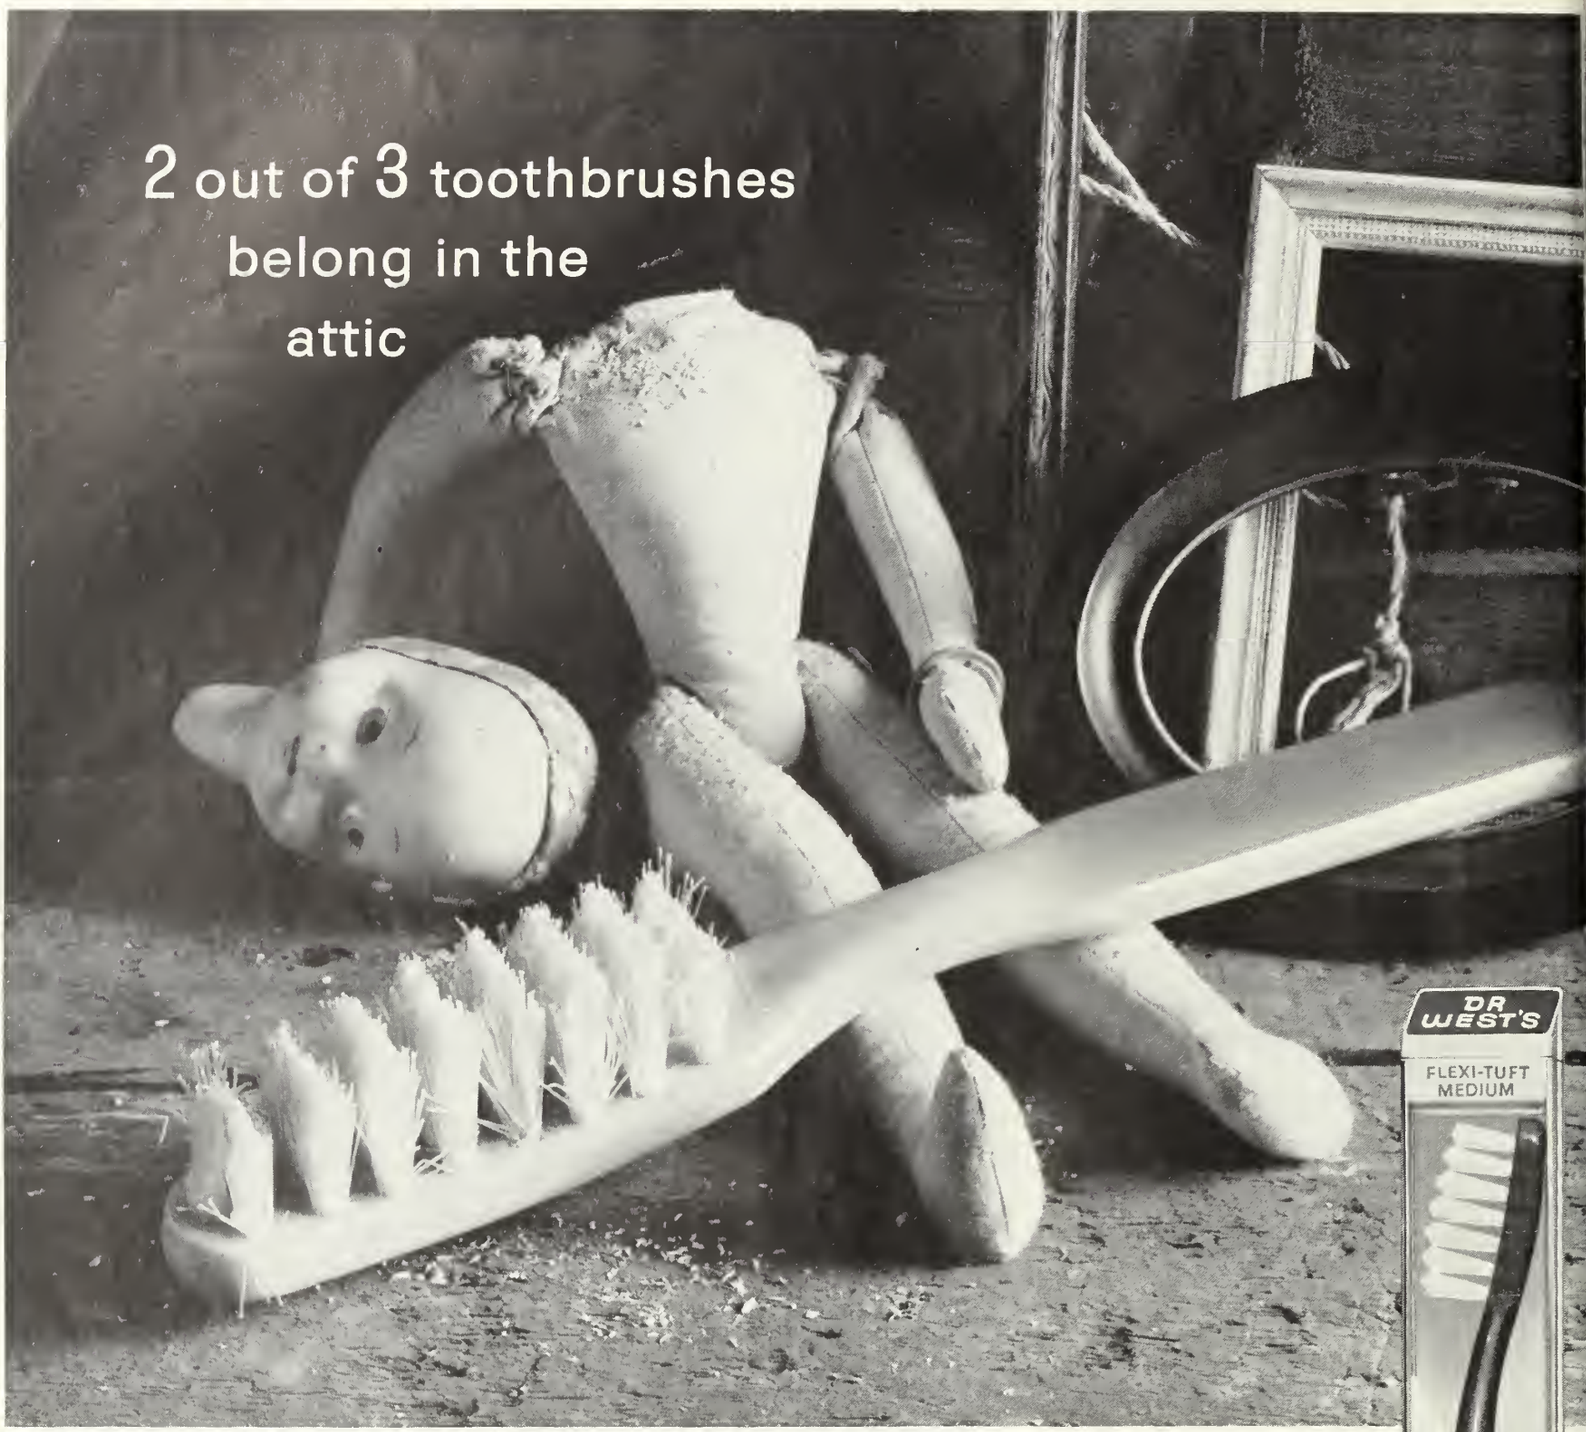
d with rotary beater. Serve on spot to a happy tot.



SHORT-SHORTS (1) For the ng baby: soakers double-duty ely as trunks for sunning ions. (2) For the older tot: if le overalls get worn in the knees, p off the legs to make a sun-suit.

NOTE FROM DAN GERBER. According to nutritionists, your baby needs all the essential amino acids (among the substances that make up protein) to maintain a normal growth pattern. Gerber High Protein Cereal is a good example of a single food which provides these amino acids. In developing this special cereal, our research staff spent many months studying the protein values of various ingredients. Those selected offered an appropriate combination of protein factors. Gerber Baby Foods, Fremont, Michigan.

Gerber®
BABY FOODS
5 CEREALS · OVER 100 STRAINED & JUNIOR FOODS

babies are our business...our only business!®

American Dental Association survey finds 2 out of 3 toothbrushes have outlived their usefulness—can't clean teeth right.

Copr. 1960 by Weco Products Co.

Time to get a new DR. WEST'S "GERM-FIGHTER" BRAND

The Toothbrush That Won't Pass Along Germs!

No other toothbrush cleans so well—protects so safely as a Dr. West's. Designed to reach every tooth surface—inside, outside, in-between. Famous non-wilt bristles. The entire brushhead "inoculated" not to pass along germs. A choice of three shapes all in new fashion colors to brighten your bathroom scene.

ONE'S RIGHT FOR YOU!

ONTINUED FROM PAGE 30

Excessively devoted parents are a bore to heir relatives and friends. They must be a ore to each other, even if they don't recog- ize it. If there are other children in the family ney may be so overawed by the parental edication that they dare not protest. But, nderneath, they can't avoid resenting the hild in the center of the stage. Most impor- ant of all is the fact that the child who is the ocus of all the commotion is being cheated f his opportunity to acquire independence, ociability and charm. He can't really enjoy eing constantly fussed over, but he has no ay to fight it, and each year he has less mpulse to try.

Much the same principles apply in the case f the handicapped child. Overconcern is un- holesome for him, for his brothers and sis- ers, and for his parents. Its only use, really, s as a tranquilizer for the parents' uneasiness.

The other extreme is less dramatic. Studies ave shown that many a handicapped child as fewer playthings, picture books, parties, ewer stories told him, fewer trips to the shop- ing center, fewer excursions to museums and oos, than his brothers and sisters. This is not ecause his parents are not concerned about im. Quite the contrary. Rather it is that their nner preoccupation with his basic problem

THERE ONCE WAS SUCH A MARRIAGE

By ELIZABETH McFARLAND

There once was such a marriage
Of greentown girl and boy.
Not all the lights of Paris
Could scintillate their joy.

It opened casement windows
Upon as fair a dawn
As shining roofs of Paris
With all the stars still on.

causes them to be less aware of his actual resence, his occupations of the moment, his mmediate needs and moods.

The subject of playthings reminds me of how often parents of a retarded child ask just what toys and activities will be appropriate nd beneficial for him. In the case of un- handicapped children, I as a pediatrician have been asked thousands of different kinds of questions, but almost never about what kind of toys and play equipment to buy. Parents know what to get, just from watching their own and other children play, and from re- membering their own childhood delights. The same guides would serve as well in the case of a handicapped child. What blocks the parents must be the feeling of strangeness and over- concern, and the mistaken assumption, fos- tered by our overdiscriminating civilization, that this child is in an entirely different cate- gory. It is like the adopting mothers of the blind babies I spoke of two months ago who said with such definiteness, "I wouldn't know how to take care of a blind child."

Another factor that plays a part in the in- frequency with which handicapped children go outside the home is, of course, the parents' sensitivity about the stares and remarks of strangers. This reminds me of the touching story a mother told me about her two-year-old son who had been born with only one hand. The mother shrank from taking him out in public. But his six-year-old sister had been delighted with him from birth. She wanted to take him along, not only on special excur- sions, but every morning and afternoon when she went out to play with friends. The mother had come to ask me, among other things, whether in the long run it would be better to protect the young child from the crude curi- osity of the public or to expose him. It was easy for me to see that the sister's attitude— that the child was completely acceptable, won- derful—was a better armor against the tact- lessness of outsiders than concealment.

Every child has to learn to accept the mean- ness of the world, if only because he is taller or shorter, or has red hair or pronounces some word differently. How he accepts this will depend largely on how he accepts himself as a person. If he is self-conscious and inse- cure, the mildest teasing may shatter him. This in turn invites more persecution. If he is outgoing and fun-loving, taunts roll off his back. The other kids quickly realize that he is worth a lot more as a pal than as a victim.

Where does any child acquire his sense of himself? Primarily from the way his parents view him. Whether they consider him weak or husky, attractive or unappealing, good or bad, pathetic or terrific, he will tend—other things being equal—to accept their view. This impressed me so startlingly when I began to work in a crippled children's home during college vacations. I had assumed, in my inno- cence and smugness, that all cripples and their parents would be sad. Instead, the children ranged all up and down the scale—just like noncripples. Some were mopey. But others, with equal handicaps, were hearty, sociable eager beavers. Some were great swimmers and ballplayers, despite crutches, splints and wheel chairs.

The same principle applies to what brothers and sisters think of a child's handicap. Obvi- ously when they are very young they don't think anything. But as they grow up they take their cues first of all from the parents. If the parents can act as if the handicapped child were a regular child except for the defect, love him, enjoy him, expect his best efforts, require his co-operation, punish him when punishment is due, feel no great embarrassment about him, the other children will tend to accept him on the same basis. I'm not going so far as to claim that if the parents' attitude is ideal, brothers and sisters will never feel em- barrassment. Children vary greatly in their self-consciousness, even in the same family. Adolescents are particularly touchy—often for no valid reason. They may become ashamed of the family car, of the color of the paint on the front door, and especially of their parents. But still there is no need for parents to as- sume—ahead of time—that their children will be disconcerted or maladjusted by having a handicapped brother or sister in the home.

It's good for brothers and sisters to see that the handicapped child is expected to conform, be polite, be generous, be helpful. It's even more important for the child himself. This is what really convinces him that he's a regular member of the family.

But then, what about the special privileges that any handicapped or sick child must have? And what about treats and ordinary pleasures that the rest of the family enjoy, but which one child must be denied for one practical reason or another? I've often been asked the latter question even about children who had such strictly medical problems as diabetes or celiac disease, both of which require restric- tions of diet. I think the reason parents feel so baffled about how to manage these in- equalities of treatment is not that they don't have horse sense, but that their troubled feelings get in the way of their horse sense. After all, when the children in a family are all healthy, a sensible mother doesn't have to search her soul about making different rules, based on age and sex. She doesn't feel guilty when she sends the younger ones to bed early or tells her twelve-year-old that he can't smoke, like his eighteen-year-old brother. Of course all children will argue at least a little about privileges, because they are all lawyers. But they won't feel lasting resentment if the parents' attitude is one of assurance. You may well answer, "But the fact is I am uncertain and troubled about what is fair." I'm only saying that if you are able to remember, each time you make a ruling, that what will bother the child is not the decision itself but the hesitancy or guilt you show in giving it, it will encourage you to be a bit more masterful than you would have been otherwise.

A question that usually looms large in the case of the severely retarded child is whether

NORTHAM WARREN: NEW YORK • MONTREAL • LONDON • PARIS • COLOGNE
STOCKHOLM • MADRID • MILAN • RIO DE JANEIRO • BUENOS AIRES • MONTEVIDEO

Lady Mary Hardwicke, renowned beauty and leader in London's social circles.

Lady Mary Hardwicke says:
"So many of my friends, in fact most fashionable women in London, rely on Odo-ro-no for extra assurance of per- sonal daintiness."

She's right. Odo-ro-no Cream is the largest selling deodorant in London, in fact, in most of the world's fashion capitals. Loved for its soft cosmetic touch—its sure, lasting protection against perspiration dampness and odor. Gentle to your skin; safe for your finest fabrics. Discover the excel- lence of Odo-ro-no yourself—in cream, stick or spray.

did you know ODO-RO-NO is the leading deodorant in London?

it would be better for him to stay at home, or live in a school elsewhere. Parents often assume that this must be answered first. Some professional advisers in the past have given the impression that to send such a child to boarding school is always the right decision, and that it should be made promptly. In my limited experience there are few parents in a position to make this decision in a hurry. Their feelings are so stormy at first that they are unable to think. Besides, they have little basis for knowing, yet, the answers to such vital questions as: What will the care of the child at home mean to the parents and brothers and sisters as the family matures? Will the child make progress and be happy with the schooling which is available locally? Will companionship be available as he grows? And how satisfactory are the boarding schools which are available? It takes time and living with the actual situation to find answers to such questions. To decide them hurriedly, on a theoretical basis, is as foolish as when an eighteen year-old declares pompously, "I will want to marry, four or six years after graduation from college, when I am earning a good salary, some girl who is slender and a brunette, about five feet seven inches, who is a good pianist, a good bridge and golf player, who wants to have two children but will not feel tied down by them."

No woman can do more than guess whether the care of a handicapped child will, in the long run, make her increasingly tense, or will give her a sense of fulfillment and self-confidence such as she always lacked before; whether the growth of the child in the home will, in fact, prove disturbing to the other children or whether it will foster their generosity and co-operativeness, and strengthen the solidarity of the family. The adequacy of school facilities, in the neighborhood or far away, will change from year to year.

In earlier decades the very special training that is necessary for blind and deaf children was available in very few schools, so a majority of the children throughout the country who sought it had to go to these schools as boarding pupils. This not only necessitated separation from family at an early age but intensified in the child the feeling of being set apart from the rest of the world. In recent years there has been a strong desire on the part of many professional people in these fields, and of parents, to make these facilities available in all cities, as part of the public-school system, so that more pupils could continue to live at home and go to a "regular" school.

Furthermore, in local schools which have had special classes for children with various problems such as impaired hearing, visual defects, crippling conditions, slow learning, there has been an increasing effort on the part of educators to have these pupils join regular classes as much as is sensible, so that they will be used to associating with unhandicapped children and think of themselves as ordinary human beings in most respects.

The organizations established by parents themselves in recent years to tackle the challenges presented by various handicaps have been beneficial in many ways. They have raised impressive sums of money for research and services. They have forcefully presented to school boards and government officials the need for special facilities. They have conducted educational programs for their own members. Most important of all, they have provided a meeting ground where parents can share common problems, learn from one another's solutions, feel they are no longer alone.

I believe that the most important need of any family with a handicapped child is a wise counselor to guide the parents—not just briefly but regularly and for an indefinite period. The parents often need opportunities to discuss the best ways to carry out the specific recommendations made by the physician or other specialist. They will certainly need counseling in the everyday management of the child as a person, and of his brothers and sisters. And they need help in straightening out their own thoughts and emotions. Despair is often overpowering at first and prevents clear thinking. There is usually lots of anger, whether it is recognized or not, whether it's against the diagnostician, or the spouse, or the child, or fate, or God. After the feelings settle down there is still resentment against the professional adviser, who can't ever help the parents to help the child as much as they would like, and who always seems to the parents to be expecting them to accept a situation that is still really unacceptable.

Anger is sometimes helpful in getting action, but it is a disturbing emotion. It will interfere with the course of the family's progress, until it can be put to work. If it is suppressed and hidden, it needs to be got out into the open.

A counselor can give a parent help in sorting out and outgrowing his self-reproaches, which interfere so often with the sensible handling of the child. Most of all, the parent needs someone who will understand him and sympathize with him and accept him as he is. This will help him overcome the common feeling of being apart from other people.

Usually it is the mother who most wants counseling, because the job of managing the child twelve to twenty-four hours a day falls on her shoulders. Women are also more able to ask for assistance when they are in trouble. Men are less natural in this respect. They have been brought up, in America at least, to feel they are confessing inadequacy if they ask for help. Even in such small matters as when they get lost in driving on country roads, they will balk against stopping for a minute to ask directions of a farmer. They have also been brought up to be ashamed to show their feelings. Even when faced with serious problems they often recommend to their wives that the best course is to muddle along. But we shouldn't be fooled by them. They do have feelings and they need assistance in facing unusual crises too. Once they swallow their pride, once they get over the hump, they will co-operate. There's lots of reasonableness and levelheadedness in them, which is valuable.

> We can do more good by being good than in any other way.
>
> ROWLAND HILL

Who can give parents the understanding and advice they need? There's no one answer. There are too few such people in any field. The minister, the priest may be ideal if he is an accepting person, especially if the parents' doubts involve their religious beliefs. The family doctor may be the right one.

Some of the best boarding schools for handicapped children and some local schools with special classes have social workers or visiting teachers whose main job is to provide counseling service to parents.

Most cities have one or more family social agencies (usually classified as Catholic, Jewish or Protestant) whose workers have been selected and trained to understand the various problems of parents.

Clinics which have been established for specific handicaps—blindness, deafness, retardation, cerebral palsy, polio, muscular dystrophy, heart disease, diabetes, nephrosis—usually have social workers on their staffs nowadays who know about the particular difficulties which parents face in these conditions, as well as the universal problems of family life.

Even if a hospital has no special clinics, it will probably have a general clinic for children, and a staff of social workers to give guidance to parents. The nurses of a city health department or of the Visiting Nurses Association do a lot of counseling with mothers and fathers.

For families who live far from cities there may be a county health department, with nurses on its staff who will help parents in carrying out treatment of a child and in tackling their other problems. If there is doubt about where to get assistance, one can write to the Department of Welfare in the state capital, which will have a directory of clinics and social agencies, and may even have social workers who visit different localities.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

One simple change will make a remarkable difference in these deviled eggs...cross out "salad dressing"....specify

MIRACLE WHIP

Actually, Miracle Whip is more than a "salad dressing." It is a truly different dressing, luxuriously rich and smooth...and so wonderful tasting.

To make Miracle Whip, Kraft uses more expensive ingredients and more of them—plenty of good country eggs and the very best salad oil.

And Kraft combines these fine ingredients in a special way that gives the creamiest, smoothest texture imaginable.

But it is Miracle Whip's flavor that's really exciting. A lively, teasing, uniquely delicious flavor that no one has ever been able to copy.

Try it! You'll see why Miracle Whip Salad Dressing by Kraft is America's favorite by far.

New from Pillsbury

For people who are

NEW Pillsbury
Deluxe
CAKE MIXES

A deeper, darker chocolate flavor_with twice as much of it

Nothing says lovin' like something from the oven and Pillsbury says it best!

lose to crazy about chocolate

Pillsbury Deluxe

DOUBLE DUTCH DEVIL'S FOOD CAKE MIX

(Worthy companion to America's best-liked chocolate cake, Pillsbury Chocolate Fudge Cake Mix.)

NEW!

If your family is close to crazy about chocolate, as so many otherwise normal families are, it is now relatively easy to get yourself covered with glory and Dutch Chocolate kisses.

You start with this new Pillsbury cake mix that has what must be one of the world's longest names—Pillsbury Deluxe Double Dutch Devil's Food Cake Mix.

You get a deeper, darker chocolate flavor and twice as much of it.

This comes from almost two full ounces of pure Dutch cocoa.

You wind up with a cake that's darker and moister than any chocolate mix cake you've ever baked. To say nothing of a highly approving family. Get some and prepare to be approved.

THIS MUCH MORE PURE DUTCH COCOA

Almost two full ounces of pure, rich Dutch cocoa—imported from the world's best chocolate-processing land—fill this cake with fabulous chocolate flavor. See how much more you get.

EVEN THE BATTER LOOKS DIFFERENT

Because of the extra cocoa that gives your cake much more chocolate flavor than any you've made before, the batter looks so rich and dark, you can hardly wait till the cake is baked.

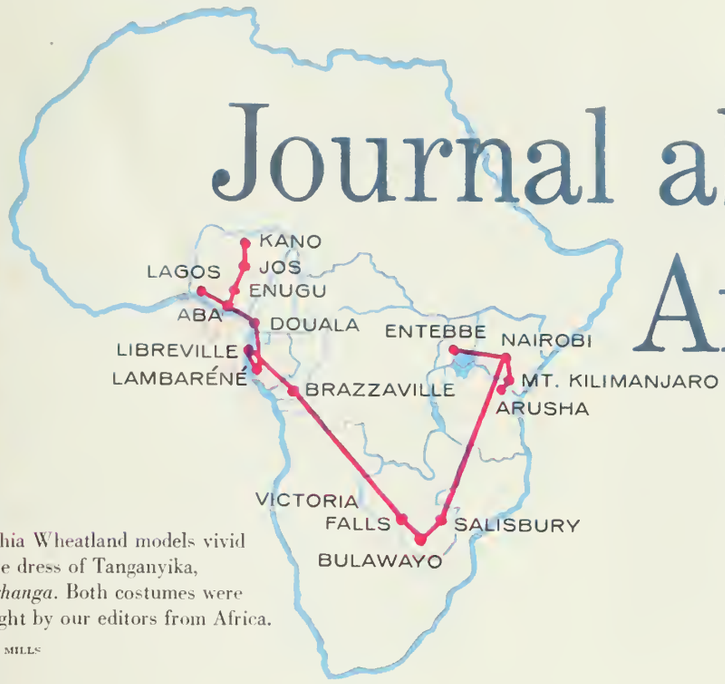
Over the years, America's best-liked chocolate cake

BE REALLY REFRESHED... AROUND THE CLOCK!

RECIPE: 1. Stuff hot franks with coleslaw. 2. Roll franks in slice of mustard-spread bread. Fasten with wooden pick, brush with melted butter, brown in hot oven. Garnish. 3. Mix relish into canned baked beans, pile into sliced franks. 4. Garnish hot franks with dill pickle and sash of pimiento, all enclosed in a bun.

KING-REGULAR

At cook-out time...serve these Extra-Fancy Franks with King Size Coke and be really refreshed! Only Coca-Cola gives you that cheerful lift... that cold crisp taste that brightens any bite. Sign of Good Taste



COPYRIGHT © 1960 THE COCA-COLA COMPANY. "COKE" IS A REGISTERED TRADE-MARK.

Journal about Africa

Cynthia Wheatland models vivid native dress of Tanganyika, the khanga. Both costumes were brought by our editors from Africa.

ABBOT MILLS

ABBOT MILLS

Beatrice Gould holds back her skirt to show the three or four folded petticoats worn by women in Buganda under their bisuti. Basket illustrates beautiful native handcraft.

By BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD

In the wide equatorial belt from ocean to ocean, below the Sahara, primitive Africa is changing: from mud huts and witch doctors to houses with windows, and maternity and child clinics; from nakedness, eating and sleeping on the earth, with the diseases dirt and ignorance can bring, to mosquito nets, boiled water, simple sanitation.

"Independence" and "freedom"—watchwords of the political struggle—have been in some places quietly achieved; in others they are still revolutionary. Moving toward the dream and the realization of self-government, Africans suddenly find schools, literacy, European skills and knowledge crucially important.

Many Zulu houses still hoist a white flag over the thatch roof when there is a marriageable girl—a bride—for sale. This bride now in changing Africa may bring a better bride price if she is educated.

Women's clubs, thousands of them fanning out from community-development or rural health centers, government backed, often aided by UNICEF. Y.W.C.A. and Red Cross, are the centers where African women meet and learn. Bright-eyed young mothers with babies tied to their backs, smiling grandmothers wrapped in one piece of cotton, glowing black-skinned marriageable girls walk miles to study nutrition, child health, sewing, reading from elementary primers in Ibo, in Hausa, in English.

Margaret Hickey and I, during our month in Africa, visited many such village clubs, in the green jungles near the Cababar coast, in fertile Uganda bright with flowering trees and flower-colored dresses, on the rich coffee-growing slopes of Kilimanjaro, in Tanganyika. Here we saw an unforgettable pattern of a society which needs help from women who have new knowledge. Here we were movingly aware again of the deep truth: when you educate a woman you educate a whole family.

We landed in Kano, Northern Nigeria, in Midwestern Africa, at 6 A.M. after an all night sit-up jet flight from London. By 9 A.M. we were in purdah. Kano is an ancient brown city, mud-walled, Moslem, important as a trading center since early camel trains crossed the Sahara in the great days of Timbuktu. We visited pretty, plump women in harems, sometimes the proud first wife, sometimes the petted third; two that day were 13 and 15. Each lived apart in her own room, surrounded by her dowry—her possessions, her only wealth. In mud cottages, a few bowls, a cooking pot or two. In richer homes, of traders, headmen, there were six or eight aluminum kettles, vacuum bottles ranked round the room, brilliantly flowered enamel plates and bowls papering the walls, European cups and CONTINUED ON PAGE 100

Margaret Hickey is welcomed with smiles and outstretched hands by day-nursery children in Kampala Housing Development.

Some African houses raise a white flag when they have a bride for sale. This bride will now, in many places, bring a higher price if she is educated.

50 years ago in the Journal

In July, 1910, Jack Johnson became the first Negro heavyweight champion of the world. His mother's pithy comment, "He said he'd bring home the bacon," became part of American slang. Gum-chewing youths had a new hit song: Oh, You Spearmint Kiddo with the Wrigley Eyes. Open sleeping porches were all the rage, and Marie Dressler gave her one hundredth performance in Tillie's Nightmare.

Wrote A Plain Country Woman in the July, 1910, JOURNAL, "I look at the girls of today swinging along bareheaded, their corset covers with pink ribbons shining boldly through their transparent 'peek-aboo' waists, their thin skirts outlining their figures, and I wonder where it will all stop."

"Is it correct to eat corn right off the cob?" Willie worries. "Yes; however, the ear should be held in one hand only, not balanced between both."

"Turkey red for porch pillows will stand sunshine and laundering better than anything else. Buy several wire frying baskets, plant them with moss and ferns, and hang them about the porch."

Household hints: "When making pies in hot sticky weather, fill a bottle with ice water and use it for a rolling pin. The pastry will be delicate and flaky."

"Business Girl's Vacation: All the wardrobe you will need is a blue serge suit for traveling, a black taffeta tailored dress and a dainty white one, a white linen skirt, sweater, black oxfords, high boots and a Panama hat."

"When serving afternoon tea on the porch, a pretty screen may be made of a folding clotheshorse covered with wire netting. Attach to the netting fresh roses, daisies, feathery asparagus or wild flowers—charming!"

"Barbara: The dotted veil drives many a girl to the oculist."

You know how Wom

Janice was no longer the loving girl he'd married, and Neal, puzzled and resentful, was unable to understand what had changed her. He hadn't done a thing—perhaps that was the whole trouble! By CATHARINE BARRETT

THE JOURNAL'S COMPLETE NOVELLA

The tailor made one more chalk mark. "That will do it, Mr. Buckley. It will be ready for you any time after one tomorrow."

Neal Buckley looked at his image in the full-length mirror. He was a moderately tall man of moderate good looks. I'm thirty-nine years old, he reminded himself chidingly—because he was aware that the pleasure he felt in the new suit was absurdly boyish.

Well, it was a handsome suit. It ought to be; it cost three times as much as any he had ever owned. And brown. Janice didn't like brown.

He took off the brown suit and got into his dark gray one again.

On the way home he caught himself up abruptly: he had begun to rehearse in his mind what he would say to Janice. He set his mouth firmly. I'm not going to explain to her. I'll just say I liked the material and I ordered the suit made up. After all, if I'm going to take trial cases, I have to give some thought to my appearance. Next month the Humphrey case comes up.

On the surface it seemed simple enough. Humphrey had called and asked him to take the case against Pryor Company for breach of contract; it would mean a jury trial. And Neal had said he would. Then later, he had passed the tailor's window, seen the wool material—brown with indistinct threads of tan and an occasional fleck of orange—and had ordered the suit.

All through law school he had intended to do trial work, but after he got out of the Army he acquired this practice and it was all office work—wills and contracts and titles and taxes; and when, later, he had been asked to take trial cases, he had declined and turned them over to someone else. Why?

And why, then, should he suddenly say yes to Humphrey? Neal shrugged. He had just felt like saying yes, that's all.

That telephone call, last Thursday—did that have anything to do with his ordering the brown suit? "Captain Buckley?" the hearty twangy voice had asked over the wire. "Sergeant Zimmerman reporting, sir."

"Zimmie!"

"Yes, cap'n, ole sarge himself." Zimmie explained that he was in town until the next morning; he was handling a line of hardware, and when they assigned him this territory he figured it would be a swell chance for looking up his old captain. "Believe me, I haven't forgotten you," Zimmie said, "but I'm not much good at letter writing."

Neal grinned. "I remember." When they were in the Pacific, and later in Japan, Neal, as company commander, had received repeated inquiries from a Polly, a Marie and an Ada, from Zimmie's mother and the Red Cross, all wanting to know if Sergeant Harry Zimmerman was (a) alive.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 122

EN AARE

Janice loved me once," Neal told self. "But now, whether she knows it or not, she despises me."

FOR THIS FAMILY, CLIMBING TO THE CREST OF THE CONTINENT ON THE 4th OF JULY WAS A LABOR OF LOVE.

a Legacy

The Fourth of July is a stone on a mountain in Montana; no, not a stone, but a cairn each year rising higher and higher as grandfather and grandmother, their seven children, their twenty grandchildren—and now their great-grandchildren—lay stones carried not only from Montana, but from Georgia, California, Wisconsin, Maine and Florida. For ours is an American family, scattered to all points of the Union, and each year those of us who will climb search through all the months for exactly the right stone.

The cairn stands on the Continental Divide at the point where great-grandfather looked down and saw the land he wanted to claim as his own. As you look down, you can see the ranch with its back up against a limestone canyon and its skirts spread out over the bench and coulee land of the Missouri River.

Great-grandfather had walked the land looking for a place to ranch. But grandfather had ranched the land, had seen Montana change from territory to state; and it was he who gave the rest of us to know that the United States was not to be comprehended in the pop of a firecracker or the flare of a skyrocket. And it was he who sent to Scotland for a stone to be a marker for great-grandfather, and it was grandfather who took his children and climbed the Continental Divide to lay that stone as the first of the cairn.

The day of the climb was born each year in a blaze of sun; I have never known it to rain. Those old CONTINUED ON PAGE 130

By MACKEY BROWN

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN MCCLELLAND

THE WORLD'S MOST GLAMOROUS BACHELORS

— who are they?

Toni Sailer's life story is fabulous and meteoric. Son of an Austrian tinsmith, he entered the winter Olympics in 1956, won 3 medals for his skill at skiing within a week. Received 3300 fan letters that month. Retired from competition (after 7 medals), he has made 5 motion pictures, owns a hotel in Kitzbühel, a textile factory in Milan. He is 25 and 5'11". Last winter in Japan, in New York in April, he is likely to be on any continent.

KEYSTONE PRESS

Besides being a cousin of Queen Elizabeth, the Duke of Kent is also cousin of the Duke of Edinburgh. Tall, lean, with an exuberant disposition, he will be 25 in October. Has no large personal fortune, but owns Coppins, magnificent country house. In London, he lives in Kensington Palace. Like his Cousin Margaret, he enjoys the theater, rock-'n'-roll dancing, and has a flair for fashion innovation. An officer in the Royal Scots Grays, he is now eighth in succession to the throne.

UPI

Michael Rockefeller, best man at his brother Steven's wedding last August to pretty Anne Marie Rasmussen, who came to U.S. from Norway as a student, is youngest son of Nelson Rockefellers; one of only twins in entire family. Michael is 21, was graduated from Harvard last month. Although a multimillionaire's son, he still shines his own shoes (as the Rockefeller children always have). Great interest: modern painting.

EUROPEAN

John Fell Stevenson, who was the Aga Khan's roommate when they were both undergraduates at Harvard, has traveled almost as much as his famous father—to Alaska, Formosa, Southeast Asia, and thirteen European countries including Russia. The youngest of Adlai Stevenson's three sons, John Fell has worked as purser on a Pacific Ocean liner, now is employed in a real-estate office in New York City. He is 24 years old, and likes dancing, especially to the rhythm of Latin-American dance bands.

Whatever your definition of glamour may be, personal charm, good looks, wealth and an assured place in topmost society are generally accepted—in varying degrees—as part of the compound. In the forefront of other candidates for the list of the world's most glamorous bachelors are the ten young men on these pages.

Maybe there is somewhere an inconspicuous undergraduate, hard at work over textbooks, who—with a flash of the Teletype news—will become world-famous, as did a Harvard undergraduate known to his classmates as "K" three years ago with the announcement that he was to succeed his fabulous grandfather, the Aga Khan III, as spiritual leader of 20,000,000 Moslems of the Ismaili sect. It was the Aga Khan III who at an annual ceremony received his weight in gifts of gold, platinum and diamonds from his followers—in 1946, $2,200,000 to match his 253½ pounds avoirdupois.

Maybe there is a young man of twenty-two, completely unknown, who within a week will become world-famous as Toni Sailer did by winning three Olympic championships in that space of time in 1956. Before long he had won four more Olympic medals, and "the world's greatest skier" is a title generally accorded him.

The glamorous bachelors on these pages are among the ones best known in the world. All are young. Almost all of them are tall (six feet or more). All have money, and three are millionaires. Four of them attended the same university—Harvard, where two of them were roommates. Two can assuredly offer their brides a crown, royal jewels, and a palace in which to live on strawberries and cream. Several of them are friends. All travel widely and might be seen in almost any part of the world.

Maybe across the street from you tomorrow?

TONI FRISSELL

Handsome Douglas Burden, member of the U. S. world-champion ski team of 1954, has had offers from motion-picture studios and is now studying at actors' school in New York, on winter weekends teaches skiing at Sugarbush, in Vermont. He is the son of William Douglas Burden, naturalist, scientist, owner of Marine Studios in Florida, California and Monaco. Douglas Burden is 28 years of age and 6'4" in height. He attended Middlebury College, in Vermont, and also Columbia University, and spent two years in Canada developing mining interests which he owns.

COMBINE

The girl Crown Prince Harald of Norway marries will have, besides a future crown, royal jewels and, as a home, one of Europe's most elegant palaces. She will, on state occasions, be served on the magnificent gold dinner service valued at between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 and may entertain on $1,500,000 royal yacht, Norge. Likely bride for the young crown prince: Princess Alexandra, sister of the Duke of Kent, who was photographed with Harald at royal ball in Stockholm last March. Harald is 23 years of age and 6'3" tall. He has completed his training at the Norwegian War College.

UPI

In addition to winning five world championships for figure skating, Dick Button has a law degree from Harvard and is a member of the Washington, D. C., bar. (His Olympics' point total is reputedly the highest in history.) He has appeared as an actor and as a panelist in a number of TV shows, starring in the television spectacular, "Hans Brinker." He is also a singer of more than average ability, and during the last two years has played leading roles in "South Pacific" and other musical comedies in summer-stock productions. Versatile Dick Button is 31 years old and makes his home in Englewood, New Jersey.

The Aga Khan IV is 22, 6' tall, Harvard '59 (straight-A student, on varsity soccer team). Serious-minded, he does not like girls who are too frivolous. Of one Radcliffe belle he said, "She's like the foam on a glass of beer." (He neither drinks nor smokes.) Rather shy but, as he puts it, "Girls talk to me. I don't know them very well, but those I do know are good friends—platonic, of course." Karim is the Aga Khan's given name. His most influential adviser: the Begum Aga Khan, grandfather's widow, who controls bulk of an incalculable fortune.

UPI

EUROPEAN

Prince Raimondo Orsini, 28, a member of one of Europe's most distinguished families, gives lavish parties at his Italian Renaissance palace, attended by such fashionable guests as Soraya, former queen of Iran. He enjoys night clubs, Riviera resorts. Orsini family has provided 5 popes, 40 cardinals and 21 saints to Roman Catholic Church. Prince Raimondo's home is Villa d'Este at Tivoli.

KEYSTONE PRESS

By royal standards, Greek Crown Prince Constantine's family is poor, living on yearly $383,000 for all expenses. Constantine, 20, is 6'2". Last year spent 6 months in U.S., made a hit with cadets at Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs, rode horseback in fox-hunting region of Pennsylvania where hotel telephone operator said, "I think the crown prince is a living doll." Constantine is an officer in Greek army, navy and air force. In photograph he dances with a general's daughter in Athens.

TAMARACK

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN

"Twenty-three and not married!" Mrs. Ferris said. "And not only not married but not even aware that not being married is anything to worry about, if you follow me, Monroe. Now tell me frankly, don't you think that's abnormal?"

"I'm not married, and I'm twenty-six," said Monroe.

"That's entirely different: you're a man." Mrs. Ferris paused to take a sip of coffee, regarding Monroe narrowly over the rim of the cup. She decided that he had changed since he had been living out in Houston. He had always been tall, whip-thin, pale as milk the way some dark-haired people are, with deep-sunk eyes that could look a hole straight through a wall. And he had always had that easy, disarming grin. But now he seemed . . . controlled; was that it? She put down the cup and smiled. Yes. Steadier. All those years when he was growing up, practically in her back yard, she had felt obscurely nervous around Monroe, as though he trembled on the verge of some gigantic explosion which she, or Lucretia—anyone—might set off. But now, she felt, he had managed to get all that intensity and vitality under control: if he exploded, it would be deliberate.

"—— and then there you are in Houston, living on that lovely farm your uncle was considerate enough to leave you in his will, with all those beautiful horses, and riding around in jodhpurs and polished boots ——"

"Dusty boots," Monroe corrected with a grin.

"—— shouting orders at everyone in sight and exuding glamour. No, Monroe, I hardly think you need to worry about getting married; I am only surprised that you have managed to stay single this long. Houston girls are noted for their beauty," Mrs. Ferris said sternly.

"I'm not worried," Monroe said. "And I'm not complaining about the Houston girls." For a moment his uncomfortably direct eyes shifted; he looked out the window with an expression Mrs. Ferris could only describe as reminiscent. She felt cross. "I wouldn't call the farm glamorous, though—man, I work and work on that place and believe me there are CONTINUED ON PAGE 74

YOU HAVE TO SEARCH WITH ALL YOUR HEART—

SHE HADN'T KNOWN THAT SOON ENOUGH.

Summer Fashion Ideas

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Today entertaining is gay and impromptu, the table looks new and colorful. Try a little daring, use the unusual with the usual. For example, left: a piece of flower-printed yard goods, at $1.25 a yard, makes the prettiest tablecloth of the summer. Fill in with sky-blue glassware, fuchsia napkins, white plates.

Right: pink, yellow and pale-green color scheme delights all eyes. Copies of antique lattice plates can be had for a few dollars. Pink demitasse cups, $1.75, match the finger bowls. Goblets, $2.25, are two-toned. All this charm is easy to achieve and not at all costly. Also, doing it is part of the fun of being a woman.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN Fashion Editor

...imagination more than money

patio...

This table (below) bright with marigolds uses two table runners, one silk, one cotton. Mexican pink napkins and ruby goblets (only $1.50 each) make a South Sea artist's color scheme. Gay fashion for gold in the gold-glazed salad bowl and gold-tipped knives and forks. Pastel flower pottery plates and matching coffee cups and saucers.

...dining

A bright touch opposite: each chair lacquered a different color. Chinese fish plates, $1.75, go with stainless-steel knife and fork (copied from old silver). Blue glass mugs, bright yellow glass candleholders (for $2.00). The flower container is split-level.

Summer Ideas for Gay Table Settings

outdoors

TABLE BY JOHN VESEY

A bright red or yellow casserole from the kitchen ($13.95) makes an original centerpiece for the simplest garden flowers. Captivating contradictions: Roman-striped glass goblets and finger bowls on china plates, $1.25 — and 69c red napkins.

Youngest, easiest, most-fun way of entertaining is the buffet: the chance to use the gayest, least expensive arrangements — paper, plastic, straw, bright ceramics and pottery. Here we have the individual-tray fashion, each a different color in straw, with paper plates (14 for $2.00), plastic flatware (service for 6 for $9.50), and a flowered pottery bowl for $10.00.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

PHOTOGRAPH BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Cool and beautiful, this marble-top table set with pale greens and mauves combines graceful leaf-shaped Italian glass bowls and plates ($2.50 each) with antique glass cups and saucers. Place mats are hand-painted canvas, shell-shaped. Napkins echo the flower shades, and the blue cup and candles introduce a new color.

indoors

Today famous old china is copied for a song, and the rarest antique looks right with contemporary linen and glass. Copies of the old Meissen plates can be found for $1.00 to $2.00; the chocolate pot, $8.00. The plaid Belgian linen cloth is $4.98, and an extra one can be used to cover chair seats.

TURN TO PAGE 138 FOR PRICES OF PLACE SETTINGS, AND HOW-TO-DO-IT IDEAS.

PHOTOGRAPH BY HORST

MR. & MRS. DAVE GARROWAY

By GLADYS HALL

Dave Garroway recently paid tribute to his wife, Pamela, when he said, "After four years of marriage, our only tribulation is that we don't have much time together."

On NBC–TV's Today, Garroway is relaxed, easygoing, leisurely, soothing. When he does a commercial, or interviews a guest, there is no feeling of urgency. Yet those who know him best will tell you that an acute sense of time with a compulsive need to make the most of it drives Garroway's life. Garroway agrees. Recently, for example, Dave decided that people chitchat too much when they get together. So now the Garroways meet once every other week with similarly minded couples to listen for two hours to someone especially knowledgeable in a particular field. One of the guest speakers was Tom Lamphier; subject, guided missiles. Another was novelist Stuart Cloete; he talked about Africa. A token fee of $10 per couple was given to the speaker's favorite charity.

Slim, chic, 5′ 5½″ Pamela Wilde (the former Marquise de Coninck) and 6′ 3″ 210-pound, wholly masculine David Cunningham Garroway first met at a weekend house party. For Pamela it was love at first sight. "I suspect," she says, "my emotions were showing. For just before dinner my hostess whispered that she was seating me next to David at table. 'Please,' I said, 'seat me opposite him. My full face is better than my profile.'"

Dave later told Pamela that he, too, was attracted at first sight.

"I can only say," says Pamela now, "there was no indication of it that first frustrating evening. Not one word did we exchange, either during dinner or after it. Three days later, however, he called me for a date. Twenty-six months after the first date (David was very cautious) we were married at City Hall in New York."

Dave describes himself as a very adjustable man. Before his marriage he was wont to say, complacently, that he had never owned a foot of ground in his life. Projects and problems to which the houseowner is heir were not for him, he bragged. Today the Garroways own two houses. One, a remodeled brownstone in New York's East 60's, is described by Dave as a "weird little house 105 feet long and 13 feet wide. It has been suggested that we name it Garroways' Narroway." The other is a Westhampton, Long Island, beach house on the ocean, "or in it," Dave says, "since any day now I expect to hear that it's been washed away."

Actually, the "weird little house" in town is a four-story, twelve-room-and-six-bath dwelling with room and to spare for the Garroway family, which includes sixteen-year-old Paris, Dave's daughter by a previous marriage; eleven-year-old Michael, Pamela's son by her previous marriage; two-and-one-half-year-old David Cunningham Garroway, Jr., and Joey, a long-haired dachshund that occupies a built-in doghouse in Michael's room. "A crazy dog," Dave says, "absolutely mad. Barks at people who are not there; or—a spine-chilling thought—are they?" Although they have a housekeeper, and a nurse cares for Dave, Jr., Pamela does the family cooking.

"Dave would be very unhappy," she says, "any other way. He likes the personal touch, not a wife who supervises. He offers to help but, having been brought up in France, a man in the kitchen makes me uncomfortable. Besides, my happiest time of the day is the cozy married-feeling hour I spend in the kitchen while David sits in the living room reading his evening paper."

Pamela, as eager as Dave to put time to good and fruitful use, enrolled last September for a premedical course at Columbia University. She hopes, eventually, to specialize in adolescent psychiatry. She also acts as Dave's personal manager in every area except that of the Today show. She is in total charge of the family finances.

Garroway's salary from NBC is $300,000 a year, which, after taxes, gives them approximately $50,000 "for keeps." Dave (whose first job was that of tourist guide for NBC at $65 weekly) considers it exorbitant. "On the show," he says, "I inform, I exhort. I sell. I record the breathless passing of time. I amuse—sometimes. I philosophize. A potpourri of talent, if you like, for which, I nevertheless maintain, I am terribly overpaid."

Minimizing his own importance Dave calls the show "a massive undertaking, requiring the daily efforts of from thirty to forty people to get it off the launching pad." For his daily associates on Today, Florence Henderson, Jack Lescoulie and Frank Blair, Dave has one word: "Inexpendable."

Generally speaking, the Garroways' daily schedule is as follows: Since Today is taped, Dave sleeps until 8:30 A.M. instead of getting up at 4 A.M., which was his rising hour for many years. After breakfast of cold sliced oranges and grapefruit, he plays with Dave, Jr. Pamela plans the day's menus and does her ordering. Or they watch the last few minutes of the Today show together. Young David accepts the phenomenon of seeing his father simultaneously in the substance and the shadow with more amusement than awe. At 9:45 Dave leaves for the studio, where he puts in a better-than-eight-hour day, finally taping the show that will be aired the next morning at 7:00. He is usually home by 7 P.M., hears young David's prayers, tucks him in for the night and then spends half an hour or so with Mike and Paris, while Pamela is in the kitchen getting dinner. At 8 he and Pamela have a cocktail together, then family dinner with Paris and Mike at 8:30 or thereabouts.

Except for going to a Broadway opening once or twice a month during the season, the Garroways spend their evenings at home. They have many acquaintances, but, they state flatly, no friends, nor do they feel the need of them. "When we get an hour out of schedule Dave says, 'It's kind of precious.' We guard it carefully. We sit and talk. Or we may go out and have a date—dinner in some small café, perhaps, which is kind of fun. It is essential to be husband and wife, as well as parents and breadwinners."

After Pamela goes to bed, Dave, who suffers from insomnia, reads. Never novels; they are "time-wasting." Books on nuclear warfare, astronautics, political economy, books about reality in the world today, three or four a week. Or he works at any spare hour of day or night on one of the many projects upon which, a skilled do-it-yourself workman, he is permanently engaged. Last spring he built a bomb shelter in the basement of the town house, and on the roof of the Westhampton house an observatory dome which houses a 16″ Newtonian telescope.

During the past months two things of warm significance have come to pass for the Garroways. The papers that make young Michael legally Garroway's son finally came through; and Paris, who, except for summer vacations in Westhampton, had formerly lived with her mother in St. Louis, came east to stay. "This in no way reflects upon the remarkable job done by my first wife," Dave was at pains to explain. "But the time had come for Paris to widen her horizon. New York offers her the opportunity."

"Where there are children of diverse parentage," Pamela says, "there are problems. Paris didn't accept me as her father's wife right away. Nor did Michael accept Dave as his father. But if you are mature, and kind enough, you can solve the problems and heal the wounds of the young. David has a particular talent for kindness in that he is aware of the problems and needs of others, whether or not the problems have ever been his problems, or the needs his needs. For example, as an only child Dave never had the occasion to know how the birth of a new baby affects an older child, yet he is aware that in the circumstances children do suffer, and are in need of help. Accordingly he spent every evening while I was in the hospital after Dave, Jr., was born, with Michael. They had dinner together every night, played records, had wrestling matches, watched TV. For a time Michael did have an emotional problem, but thanks to Dave he also had the ability, as events have proved, to come to terms with it.

"If I could use one word for Dave, it would be 'wise.' His heart is wise."

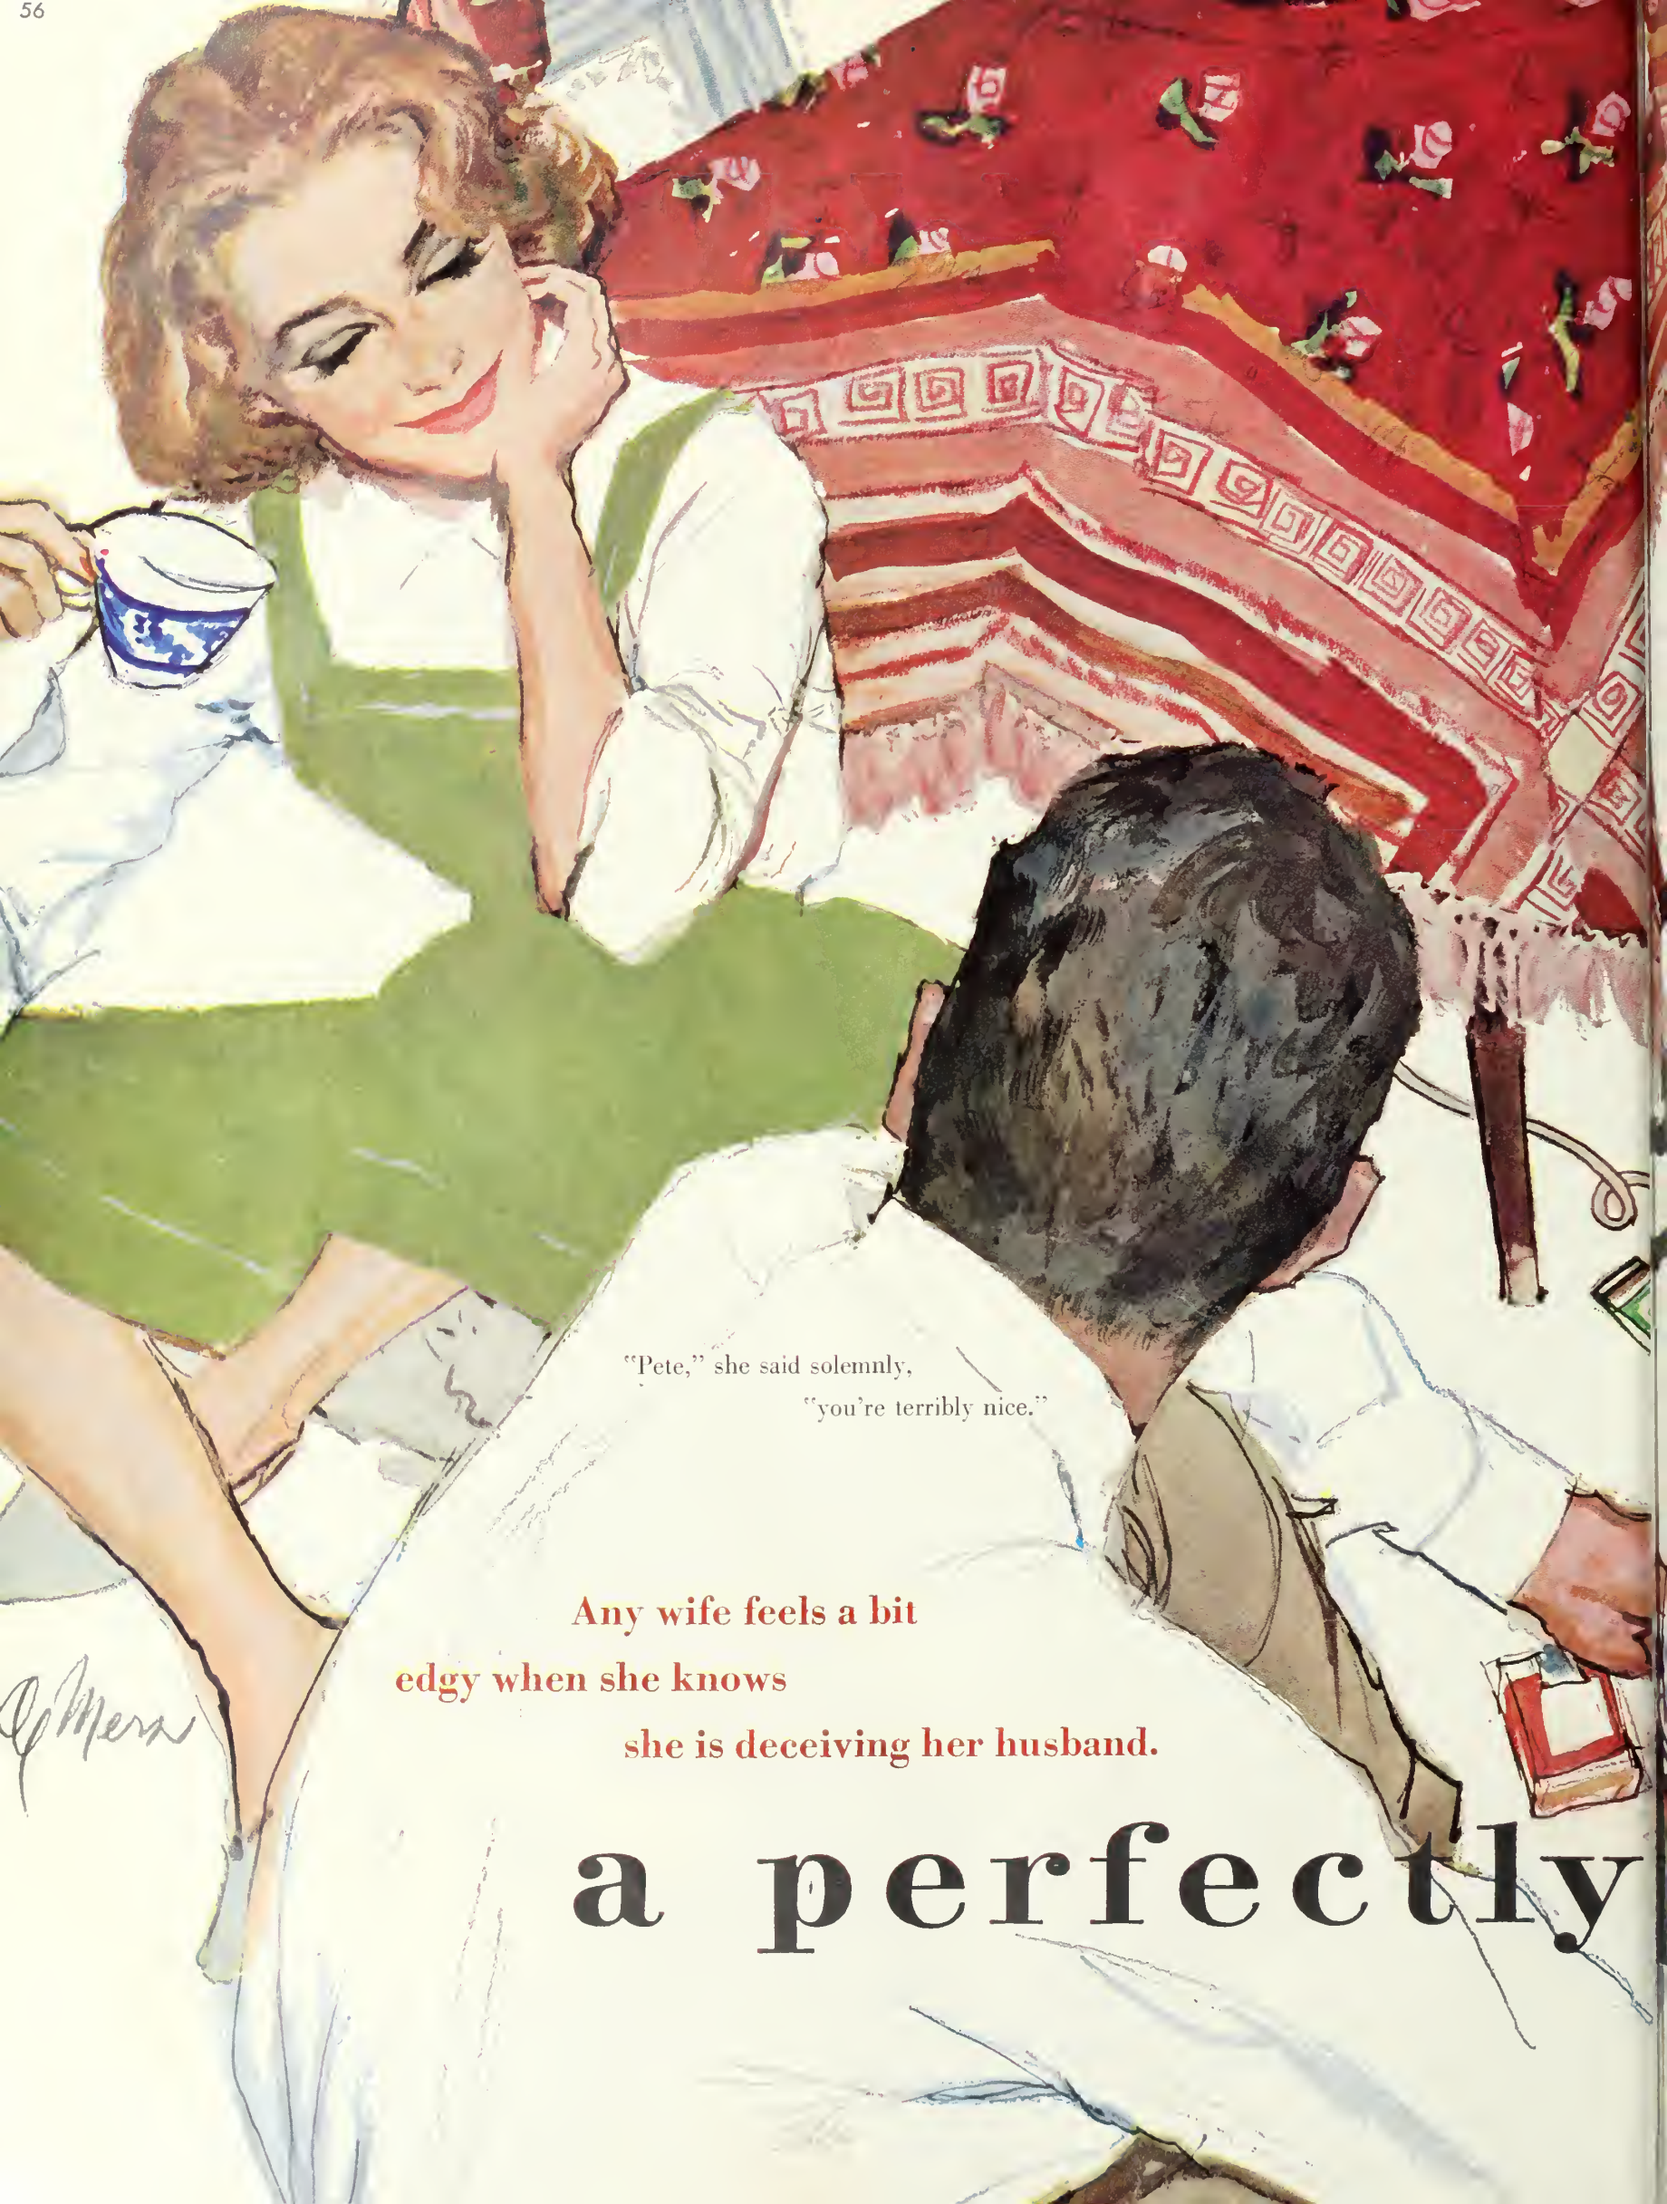
Dave Jr. sometimes catches taped "Today" show with Dave, thinks two daddies funny.

JACQUES DEMARECEAUX

Dave has close relationship with his now adopted 11-year-old Michael, Pamela's son.

ABBOT MILLS

Paris, Dave's 10-year-old daughter by previous marriage, has joined family this year.



MARTIN SCHWEIG

Dave says, "One of the essentials is to be husband and wife as well as parents."

ABBOT MILLS

"Pete," she said solemnly,
"you're terribly nice."

Any wife feels a bit edgy when she knows she is deceiving her husband.

a perfectly

By KAATJE HURLBUT

horrible week

Peter Northam always walked home from the station when the weather was fair. After a forty-minute train ride he enjoyed the walk, especially on Friday when, with a feeling of weekend leisure, he slowed down to a stroll. Today the week-long rain had cleared and the spring evening was lit to a soft brilliance by the late sun.

As he strolled under pale trees and past flower beds, his thoughts touched less on clients and problems and the insurance business in general and more on the house that sprawled on the corner up ahead, and on Joyce and the way she laughed or got mad or the way she slept; and on the children: how Jimmy and Tommy held their little boys' world so precariously against their younger sister, Flo—so small, Flo, whose weapons ranged from dispassionate logic to earsplitting shrieks.

Approaching his corner, he could see the picket fence before he saw the house. He was proud of the fence: it made a safe yard for the children and added immeasurably to the appearance of the property. He gave Joyce full credit for it. It was one of those things he had said they couldn't afford, and she had said, "But the value is so much greater than the cost." Well, he had managed it. Value, he found, had a way of working in your favor.

As he came abreast of the house, he glanced toward the garage beyond and noticed that Joyce, as she sometimes did, had backed the car in. "The Penny Saver," she called it. He didn't care what she called it: it was a good, economical little car. Its headlights, low and close-set, stared morosely out of the gloomy interior.

He had put his hand on the gate when he remembered to go around to the back door. If he went in by the back door the children would say, "Daddy's home!" But if he went in by the front door, they would say, "It's only daddy."

In the kitchen he found the three of them being dogs, crawling on all fours and barking. He had forgotten about the dog—a stray that had wandered by three days before, forlorn and starved. There he lay in the corner. Joyce, standing before the open refrigerator holding an eggplant and a bottle of bleach, turned and gave Peter a long, dark, cloudy stare. Then she put the bleach and the eggplant in the refrigerator and nudged the door shut with her elbow.

The children didn't notice him until he closed the back door behind him.

"Daddy's home!" Jimmy, who was seven, announced it and Tommy, a year younger, confirmed it: "Daddy's home."

"Hi, kids," Peter said, and Flo said, "Hi, daddy. We're not kids. We're dogs."

The dog's eyes were not visible, but the cascading eyebrows went up and he walloped the floor with his tail and let his eyebrows down again.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 78

EUROPEAN

Looking over the President's Shoulder

"The old place quieted down so much you couldn't believe it was the same place." Life in the White House with the Trumans (after the Roosevelts) was punctual, orderly. But hot rolls had to be hot to please Mrs. Truman.

By ALONZO FIELDS

The Trumans moved into the White House in time for the President's birthday, May 8, 1945, and Elizabeth Moore, who was then the head cook, baked a cake for the President. It was rather funny, for the kitchen had never baked a birthday cake in twelve years: for that matter, no hot rolls, doughnuts, coffeecake or breads either. Sometimes they made popovers for breakfast. Otherwise a local bakery supplied all the breads; hot rolls at the White House meant warmed-over bakery rolls.

President Truman was so pleased with his birthday cake that after dinner he wanted to see the cook and personally thank her. But Elizabeth and her crew had cleared out as soon as the cake had been sent up. Next morning I told her, with a long face, that the President had wanted to see her the night before about the cake she had baked.

She said, "Oh, Fields! What happened? What was wrong with it?"

"You baked it," I said. "Don't you know?" Then I pulled up a chair and said, "Girl, take this seat before you faint. The President was so pleased he merely wanted to thank you personally."

She found it harder to believe that the President wanted to thank her than that something was wrong with the cake. So on his way to the office next morning the President did stop by the kitchen and met the whole crew. This was the first time a President had been in the White House kitchen since Coolidge, and he was in

CONTINUED ON PAGE

1960 by Alonzo Fields

Always just behind the President. Alonzo Fields at his post in the state dining room.

Queen Elizabeth, "a charming, angelic-appearing young woman," was still a princess when she and Philip were White House guests in 1951. Trumans entertained at state dinner and reception. When Philip, in shirt sleeves, was late for breakfast with Elizabeth, Fields admired his audacity.

Preparing the great horseshoe table for state dinner. Alonzo Fields directs his staff. The Lenox plates are Truman china, white trimmed with gold and green to match green walls. Tall gold epergnes hold fruit. flatware is gold. Room was redecorated after restoration of White House completed in 1952. In Pres. Theodore Roosevelt's day walls displayed stuffed animal heads, his hunting trophies.

White House guests, though they didn't know it. To a family from one of Washington's worst housing areas—such as this one "within sight of the Capitol"—President Truman yearly sent Christmas dinner with turkey roasted in White House kitchen. This gift was always anonymous.

U.P.I.

"Don't let yourself look dated" was our first thought for Barbara McCraine, whose Powers-model look of 1943, despite its glamour then, seemed passé for her today. Bringing Barbara up to date was a simple matter of giving fresh and current touches to her hair, make-up, clothes. We believe any imaginative reader can do the same thing for herself.

REMODELING AN OLD MODEL

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor

As Barbara looked during her modeling days in the 1940's. The bride picture is from an old JOURNAL. The hairdo is lovely, but after 15 or 20 years a girl needs a change!

CUSHMAN-LAUMAILLET

ROGER PRIGENT

Here's Barbara as she arrived at our Beauty Workshop asking for help.

Wayne, New Jersey

Dear Mrs. Norman:

I have been reading your beauty articles with great interest. I was a Powers model during my college days, and did quite a bit of work for you and Mrs. Cushman. Enclosed are some pictures to refresh your memory.

I am thirty-four years old now and my hair is graying rapidly. I need a more flattering hairdo, I'm undecided about make-up, and would appreciate some help with clothes.

Of course I'm very busy with my husband, home and two young sons, leading an active suburban life with Cub Scouts, P.T.A. meetings and all the rest. But that's no reason to let myself go. Can you help?

Very truly yours,
BARBARA LUFF MCCRAINE

With basic good features to start with (lucky girl!) Barbara McCraine nevertheless looked "old hat" when she arrived at our Beauty Workshop. As you see in her picture on this page, her hairdo was neat but unexciting. Premature gray hairs mingling with her ashy-blondness produced an over-all drab look. Black in dress did nothing to counteract her monotone fairness, especially since Barbara confined her make-up to a minimum of powder and lipstick.

Barbara's "after" picture, on the opposite page, was taken on the same day five hours later. Here are the steps she took to her livelier, lovelier look.

A new, more flattering color for her hair. As a fashion model, Barbara's natural corn-silk-colored hair was her prettiest feature. With the passing of time, however, her hair lost much of its youthful luster, and the color faded. In addition, the early sprinkling of gray drabbed down Barbara's color even more.

Not wanting to appear bleached, yet reluctant to settle for gray hairs at her age either, Barbara asked her big question: "What color should I choose?" Our suggestion: a soft honey-blond, rich enough to serve as a flattering setting for her fair skin, yet close enough to her own coloring to avoid the problem of ugly "growing out" periods between touch-ups. (Any effort to duplicate the corn-silk color of her teens and early twenties was purposely avoided because that excessive paleness, now, would look

CONTINUED ON PAGE 74

With flattering current-looking hairdo, livelier make-up and more becoming clothes colors, Barbara emerges, once again, as an All-American beauty, 1960 style.

THE GIRL IN THE Romantic dress MADE IT HERSELF

This romantic organdy blouse has a double cape collar and a matching flower. The beautiful skirt is black-and-white-checked taffeta with a woven ribbon stripe in cherry red. Vogue Design No. 5052.

Black-and-white surah silk ma this enchanting Nina Ricci design The front bodice is blac lace. Vogue P.O. Design No. 14

Are You a Pioneer?

A Big, Happy Birthday

"Happy birthday to you, happy birthday dear——, happy birthday to you!" You're supposed to fill in your name here, because I'm honestly singing this to you, and I do mean you. Because you and I and about 179,999,998 other people celebrate on July 4th a birthday that belongs to every single American.

This year when our Uncle Sam has 184 candles on his birthday cake, there will be 50 states to give him parties, backyard pin wheels and skyrockets. Now on these pages for the past eight months it's been the custom for you to ask me questions, but having to set down answers in black and white has made me do a powerful lot of thinking. So I'm turning the tables. I'd like to ask you a few questions. I've got a feeling our Uncle Sam's very life, and whether I'll be singing Happy Birthday to our great-grandchildren when Uncle has 244 candles on that cake, may depend on your answers.

Have You Ever Been Really, Deeply Moved by Pure Patriotism?

I mean moved like chills running up and down your back and tears coming to your eyes? I have. And it's a thrill, believe me.

Three of these occasions are still etched in my mind, and I get a lift just remembering them. One was a Memorial Day Parade in a small town in New Jersey. One was the national convention of 4H Clubs in Chicago. One was the Soap Box Derby in Akron, Ohio.

I had never seen a Memorial Day Parade before. Shirley and I sat in a neighbor's yard and watched the marchers come down the side street from under the shadow of an arch of trees into bright sunshine, under a vault of brilliant blue sky—uniforms, color, flags, a real community spirit reflected in a thousand faces, many of them those of my own neighbors.

Every local organization was represented: churches, civic clubs, Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, veterans in uniforms worn proudly in our defense, some of them before you and I were born. Many of them we knew: busy housewives who gave their little spare time to service, volunteer firemen who worked all day at regular jobs and helped put out fires whenever they happened. I couldn't help that shiver along my spine, or that quick smart in my eyes when I realized that they, and millions like them, make America. They are America!

And that word—volunteer. In many other lands, the word is compulsory. In our land it's the essence of freedom. Service comes from the heart.

In Akron at the Soap Box Derby there were more flags and more music, but again the stars of the show were the people. This time boys up to 15 years of age, who had been encouraged by industry and the American climate to put forth their best. Each one started with an allowance of $12.50 with which to build a racer. Each boy had to start from scratch and make a dream into a reality. There they were, more than 100 boys, each a champion in his home town, at the meeting of champs, while 75,000 Americans cheered their efforts.

So you blame me if I felt that thrill again? In America, even at the age of eight, your dreams can come true.

And then in Chicago I saw the 4-H Club winners gathered for their national awards. The two and one quarter million members of 4-H Clubs learn to become "good, productive citizens" and try to "make the best better, grow more, preserve more, use more." Boys and girls raise their own cattle, sheep, hogs and chickens. The girls are homemaking whizzes. Here again were young American champions, not selected for popularity or looks but being honored because they had distinguished themselves through dedication and hard work that they chose to do.

I had been invited as a guest speaker, but of course we got around to singing, and when I led them in two of their favorite songs I got those thrills and chills again (I can see why it's called Patriotic Fever). Doesn't it give you a dash of red, white and blue flu to ask yourself, "Where is life so free?" Or to think that here, from ocean to ocean, we are lords and not slaves of our land? Brother, if you've been taking it for granted, wise up!

CONTINUED ON PAGE 84

Pat Boone talks to teenagers

The Ol' Pioneer Spirit: an 1870 cartoon, "The Two Young Giants," shows Ivan and Jonathan (Russia and America) reaching for Asia by opposite routes. That's Hawaii (this month she adds the 50th star to our flag) Uncle has his hand on.

CULVER PICTURES

The MISTRESS of MELLYN

BY VICTORIA HOLT

"Wait until morning!" he mocked.

"Do I look the sort of man who would wait until morning?"

He kissed me as I had never dreamed of being kissed.

SYNOPSIS OF PARTS 1 3 • I, Martha Leigh, a young gentlewoman, was governess to Alvean TreMellyn, eight. Alvean's mother, Alice, and her lover, Geoffrey Nansellock, I was told, had been killed while eloping. Nansellock's brother and sister, Peter and Celestine, remained close friends of Alvean's handsome, wealthy father, Connan. Gossip said he would marry beautiful Lady Treslyn when her old, sick husband died.

Connan paid scant heed to Alvean and, in the horse show for which I schooled her, she recklessly bade for his attention. But her horse stumbled and Alvean's leg was broken. Though Connan was more considerate now, I understood his indifference. Alvean was not his child. She was Geoffrey Nansellock's daughter. So, too, was Gilly, strange wraithlike granddaughter of Mrs. Polgrey the housekeeper.

I longed to bring happiness to this house. But it was not pity alone which held me. For I was haunted by the inescapable image and mystery of Alice. She was dead, yet I felt her presence, and heard her anguished cry. "You must not go. . . . Help me!"

And there was Connan. Connan, whose smile had many meanings, whose Christmas gift was Alice's diamond brooch. I knew then . . . I was in love with someone quite out of my world. I was in love with the Master of Mellyn.

PART 4

I had dined in the middle of the day in the small dining room with Connan and Alvean, the first meal I had taken with them in this intimacy. We had eaten turkey and plum pudding and had been waited on by Kitty and Daisy. I could feel that certain significant looks were being directed toward us.

"On Christmas Day," Connan had said, "you could not be expected to dine alone. Do you know, Miss Leigh, I fear we have treated you rather badly. I should have suggested that you should go home to your family for Christmas. You should have reminded me."

"I felt I had been here too short a time to ask for a holiday," I answered. "Besides ——"

"In view of Alvean's accident, you felt you should stay," he murmured. "It is good of you to be so thoughtful."

Conversation in the small dining room was animated. The three of us discussed the Christmas customs, and Connan told stories of what had happened in previous years, how on one occasion the wassailers had arrived late so that the family had gone to church and they had to wait outside and serenade them all the way home. I kept reminding myself that it was merely because it was Christmas that I was sitting here. That after the festivities were over I should revert to my old place.

But I was not going to think of that now. Tonight I was going to the ball. Miraculously I had a dress worthy of the occasion. I had a comb of amber and a brooch of diamonds. It would be quite unlike that occasion when I danced in the solarium.

I took Connan's advice that afternoon and tried to rest so that I might stay fresh until the early morning. Much to my surprise, I did manage to sleep.

Daisy brought me a cup of tea at five o'clock. On Mrs. Polgrey's instructions, she told me.

"I've brought 'ee a piece of Mrs. Polgrey's fuggan to take with it," she said, indicating a slice of raisin cake. "If there's more you do want, 'tis only for you to say."

I said, "This will be ample."

"Then you'll be wanting to get ready for the ball, will 'ee not, Miss?"

"There's plenty of time," I told her.

"I'll bring 'ee hot water at six, Miss. That'll give 'ee plenty of time to dress. The CONTINUED ON PAGE 86

© 1960 Victoria Holt

MENU I

LITTLENECK CLAMS WITH CAVIAR
ROCK CORNISH GAME HENS
ZUCCHINI PROVENÇAL
GREEN SALAD
BUTTERMILK DRESSING
BAHAMIAN LIME SHERBET
MERINGUE KISSES
ICED COFFEE — BLACK

(PLANNED FOR 8—
554 CALORIES PER PERSON)

LITTLENECK CLAMS WITH CAVIAR

48 small littleneck clams on the half shell
8 teaspoons red caviar
4 teaspoons slivered fresh horse-radish
8 lemon wedges

Place 6 clams for each serving in crushed ice. Top each with a little caviar and a sprinkling of horse-radish. Serve with lemon wedges. Makes 8 servings. 86 calories per serving.

ROCK CORNISH GAME HENS WITH CELERY-MUSHROOM DRESSING

8 thawed, frozen Rock Cornish game hens
Salt Pepper
9 tablespoons butter, melted
4 cups coarsely chopped celery
4 cups coarsely chopped mushrooms
2 teaspoons salt
½ teaspoon rosemary
½ teaspoon thyme
⅛ teaspoon pepper
⅔ cup coarsely chopped water chestnuts

In a large skillet, melt 1 tablespoon butter. Add celery, mushrooms, 2 teaspoons salt, rosemary, thyme and ⅛ teaspoon pepper and simmer until celery is tender. Add water chestnuts. Stir until evenly mixed. Place hens on a tray, backs up. Brush evenly with 4 tablespoons melted butter and sprinkle with salt and pepper. Broil 12 to 15 minutes. Remove hens from tray and spread dressing over bottom of tray. Place hens on top, breast side up, and brush with 4 tablespoons melted butter. Broil until golden brown. Turn oven temperature to moderately slow, 325° F., and bake 20 minutes, or until very tender. Baste occasionally with the pan juices. Makes 8 servings. Garnish with radishes and parsley. 231 calories per serving.

ZUCCHINI PROVENÇAL

6 cups sliced zucchini
8 tomatoes, peeled, cored and diced
2 teaspoons salt
1 teaspoon sugar or ⅛ teaspoon liquid sugar substitute
2 cloves garlic, crushed
¼ teaspoon thyme
⅛ teaspoon basil
⅛ teaspoon pepper

Mix together zucchini, tomatoes, salt, sugar, garlic, thyme, basil and pepper in a saucepan. Simmer very slowly until the zucchini is just tender, and flavors blended, about 40 minutes. Makes 8 servings. 60 calories per serving.

delicious food to get thin on

Littleneck clams jeweled with red caviar . . . golden Rock Cornish game hens . . . cool Bahamian lime sherbet . . . meringue kisses. Sound like a dieter's dream? It is—a luxurious dinner that's actually low in calories (and frankly, more a matter of mathematics than magic). We've subtracted calories and added glamour to a trio of menus designed to delight the dieter and produce dramatic results without drudgery.

A winning luncheon for weight watchers begins with a beautiful broth, this one an amber essence of chicken adrift with chopped fresh mushrooms and dots of chervil. For the entrée: cool, lean slices of beef, their savor sealed beneath a tarragon-scented glaze. To add excitement, a spicy sauce, piquant hearts of artichoke, a magnificent medley of fruit, cooked and curried. In the third menu, equally elegant: an array of vegetables au naturel—slim stalks of celery, for example, carrot and turnip strips, and radishes—made all the more delectable for a dipping in hot anchovy sauce. To follow, sweetest young shrimp simmered with tomatoes and herbs, and a luscious salad: plump strawberries, green grapes, succulent grapefruit sections wreathed with cantaloupe crescents and topped with a frost of coconut flakes.

What a lovely way to lose weight! Our formula (both foolproof and fabulous) simply substitutes fascination for frustration in the diet.

STUART-FOWLER

MENU II

CHICKEN BROTH WITH MUSHROOMS AND ALMONDS
BEEF EN GELÉE
SPICED BEEF SAUCE
ARTICHOKES À LA GRECQUE
HOT CURRIED FRUIT
COFFEE—BLACK

(PLANNED FOR 8—
544 CALORIES PER PERSON)

GREEN SALAD WITH BUTTERMILK DRESSING

⅔ cup buttermilk
½ teaspaan grated leman rind
2 teaspaans vinegar
2 teaspaans chapped fresh chervil
2 teaspoons chapped fresh tarragan
Salt Pepper
2 quarts mixed greens

Blend buttermilk with lemon rind and vinegar. Add chervil and tarragon. Seasan ta taste. Let stand 30 minutes. Tass with greens. Makes 8 servings. 24 calaries per serving.

BAHAMIAN LIME SHERBET

2 envelapes sugar-free lime-flavared gelatin dessert
1 cup hat water
½ cup sugar
3 cups liquefied nanfat dry milk
½ teaspaan grated lime rind
¼ cup lime juice
3 large peaches, peeled and sliced

Dissalve gelatin in hat water. Add sugar, milk, lime rind and juice. Mix well and freeze until firm. Remave and break inta pieces in a cald bowl. Beat until pieces are completely braken and mixture is fluffy. Freeze again until firm. Serve with peaches. Makes 8 servings. 130 calaries per serving.

MERINGUE KISSES

1 egg white
Pinch salt
⅓ cup superfine sugar
¼ teaspaan vanilla

Beat the egg white with the salt until stiff but nat dry. Add sugar gradually, a tablespaan at a time. Beat after all the sugar is used until the mixture stands in stiff peaks and the sugar is dissalved. Fald in vanilla. Shape with a pastry bag ar tube inta 24 small spiral cones, ar shape them with a spaan an a well-greased baking sheet. Bake in a very slaw oven, 250° F., far abaut 45 minutes until they are dry but nat brawned. Makes 2 dazen meringues. 23 calaries per serving.

delicious food to get thin on continued

CHICKEN BROTH WITH MUSHROOMS AND ALMONDS

8 cups chicken broth
½ teaspoon orégano
1½ cups chopped mushrooms
2 tablespoons lemon juice
Salt, pepper
¼ cup toasted slivered almonds
2 tablespoons chopped fresh chervil

Skim all fat from the chicken broth and simmer with orégano and mushrooms for about 10 minutes. Add lemon juice, and salt and pepper to taste. This will vary with the type of chicken broth used. Add almonds and chervil and serve immediately. Makes 8 servings. 47 calories per serving.

HOT CURRIED FRUIT

6 (8-ounce) cans artificially sweetened mixed fruits
¼ cup brown sugar
2¼ teaspoons curry powder
½ cup yoghurt

Place fruit and liquid in a large skillet. Sprinkle with sugar and curry powder. Heat gently until warmed. Do not stir; baste from time to time. Serve hot with yoghurt. Garnish with mint. Makes 8 servings. 85 calories per serving.

BEEF EN GELÉE

One 7-pound boneless shell roast of beef
Salt, pepper
4 cups water
2 envelopes gelatin
3 (10½-ounce) cans consommé
2 teaspoons dried tarragon or 4 teaspoons chopped fresh tarragon
1 tablespoon lemon juice
2 bunches fresh chervil
Lemon peel
Truffles

Rub meat with salt and pepper. Roast in a slow oven, 300° F., for about 2 hours, or until a meat thermometer inserted in the center of the meat registers slightly less than 140° F. If you like your meat rare, be sure to remove from the oven before the thermometer reaches "Rare," as the meat continues to cook after being removed. Chill meat well, trim off all fat and slice into pieces about ½" thick. Soften gelatin in 1 cup cold water. Heat consommé, 3 cups water, tarragon and lemon juice for about 10 minutes. Strain and stir into gelatin mixture. Stir until gelatin is dissolved. Cool until quite sirupy. Arrange meat slices on a rack on a tray. Spoon some aspic over meat to form a thin coating. Decorate as you wish with sprigs of fresh chervil and slivers of lemon peel and truffles. Coat again with thickened aspic and chill. If aspic gets too thick to pour at any point, reheat a little. Pour remaining aspic into a shallow pan, chill and chop or dice. Garnish platter with radishes and chopped aspic. Serve with spiced beef sauce. Makes 8 servings. 311 calories per serving.

VEGETABLE STICKS WITH ANCHOVY SAUCE

2 large carrots
2 celery hearts
1 red pepper
1 green pepper
½ yellow turnip
8 radishes made into roses
4 (2-ounce) cans flat anchovies, drained and washed
3 tablespoons vinegar
1 clove garlic, peeled and crushed

Cut all vegetables except radishes into strips. Crisp in ice water until ready to serve. Sauce: Heat anchovies, vinegar and garlic over low heat, stirring until a smooth sauce is formed. Arrange vegetables in crushed ice and serve with hot anchovy sauce as a dip. Makes 8 servings. 92 calories per serving.

SPICED BEEF SAUCE

½ cup bottled chili sauce
¼ cup minced water cress
⅛ teaspoon liquid pepper seasoning
2 teaspoons prepared horse-radish

Mix ingredients, chill and serve cold. Makes ¾ cup sauce. 22 calories per serving.

SHRIMP AND SCALLOPS CALABRESE

1 tablespoon butter
3 cloves garlic peeled and crushed
1½ cups chopped onion
¾ cup grated carrot
3 large ripe tomatoes, peeled, cored and diced
¾ cup beef broth
3 tablespoons lemon juice
4 teaspoons sugar
2 teaspoons salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
Pinch cayenne
⅛ teaspoon crushed saffron
5 pounds raw shrimp, cleaned and shelled or 2½ pounds raw shrimp, cleaned and shelled and 2½ pounds raw scallops
½ cup chopped parsley
3 tablespoons flour
¼ cup water
4 cups cooked rice

Melt butter in a large skillet. Add garlic, onion and carrot. Cook over low heat for about 10 minutes. Add tomatoes, broth, lemon juice, sugar, salt, pepper, cayenne and saffron. Cover and simmer gently for about 15 minutes. Add shrimp, or shrimp and scallops, and parsley and simmer 10 minutes. Mix together the flour and water and stir into the mixture. Cook five minutes longer. Serve in soup plates with rice. Makes 8 servings. 358 calories per serving.

ARTICHOKES À LA GRECQUE

3 (15-ounce) cans artichoke hearts
¼ cup vinegar
1 bay leaf, crushed
4 sprigs celery leaves
¼ teaspoon thyme
1 clove garlic, crushed
1 medium onion, peeled and chopped
1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
2 slices lemon

Drain artichokes, reserving liquid. Simmer artichoke liquid and remaining ingredients 15 minutes. Strain and pour hot marinade over artichoke hearts. Cool. Marinate 3–4 hours. Drain. Serve with meat. Makes 8 servings. 79 calories per serving.

FRUIT SALAD

1 cantaloupe
2 cups strawberries
1 large grapefruit
2 cups seedless green grapes
2 cups thinly sliced pineapple
2 tablespoons shredded coconut
8 lettuce leaves

Remove seeds from cantaloupe and cut into crescent-shaped pieces. Trim off rind. Wash, hull and slice strawberries. Peel grapefruit and cut into sections. Chill fruit. To serve, arrange on lettuce. Sprinkle with coconut. Makes 8 servings. 100 calories per serving.

MENU III

VEGETABLE STICKS WITH ANCHOVY SAUCE
SHRIMP AND SCALLOPS CALABRESE
FRUIT SALAD
ICED TEA

(PLANNED FOR 8—550 CALORIES PER PERSON)

SAUCE IT!

—the good and easy way with Campbell's Soup

Let Campbell's Soups add creamy goodness and rich, full flavor to your favorite meats and vegetables. See how easy it is to make delicious main dishes everyone will enjoy.

Chicken Divan. Arrange 1 lb. broccoli, (or 10-oz. pkg. frozen), cooked and drained, in shallow baking dish; top with 3 to 4 servings sliced, cooked chicken. Blend 1 can Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup with ⅓ cup milk; pour over all; sprinkle with ½ cup shredded Cheddar cheese. Bake in a very hot oven (450°F.) till lightly browned, about 10 min. Or broil about 5 inches from heat, for 8 min. 3 to 4 servings.

Tuna Croquettes. Mix 2 cans (7 oz. each) tuna, drained and flaked, ¼ cup Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup, ½ cup fine dry bread crumbs, ¼ cup finely chopped onion, 1 egg (beaten), 3 tsp. lemon juice. Make 8 croquettes; roll in crumbs. Cook in 2 tbsp. butter. Sauce: Blend remaining soup, ⅓ cup milk, 2 tbsp. mayonnaise; heat; pour over; top with parsley. 4 servings.

Creole Hamburgers. In saucepan, cook ½ medium onion, sliced, and ½ medium green pepper, sliced, in 2 tbsp. shortening until tender. Add 1 can Campbell's Old-fashioned Tomato Rice Soup, ⅓ to ½ cup water, ⅛ tsp. whole thyme. Cook over low heat about 10 minutes. Stir now and then. Makes about 1⅔ cups. Serve over sizzling hamburgers. There's a tempting main dish the youngsters are sure to go for.

Good things begin to happen when you cook with Campbell's Soup

TIMELY TIPS ON WATER SAFETY...

Boat with Safety. If possible, you should take a course in seamanship and master all the "traffic laws" of the waterways. Keep these important points in mind:

Before going out always check the weather forecast. If storm warnings are up, stay ashore.

When two motorboats meet head on, both should bear to starboard, i.e., right.

When near swimmers, operate your boat at dead slow. And don't speed near wharves, fishing boats and sail boats.

Never overload a boat. Should it swamp or tip over, don't panic. Cling to it, keep calm and wait for help.

Never go boating without approved life-preservers for everyone aboard.

Swim with Safety. "Always go in the water with a buddy." Stick to this rule at all times.

Until you're an expert swimmer stay out of deep water and swim only where there are life guards or with someone trained to give artificial respiration. Learn the new lifesaving technique. It is described and illustrated on Metropolitan's first aid chart, offered below.

Never force a child into the water, until he is ready to take the plunge. Around water—even shallow water—watch a young child constantly.

Dive with Safety. Skin diving demands the utmost skill, caution and good equipment. Don't attempt it unless your doctor finds that you have the physical and emotional stamina for it.

Plan your dives. Always be sure where you're going, how deep and how long you can stay under. Avoid outgoing tide.

Whatever you do, be prepared. Don't take chances or play practical jokes on others—especially unskilled swimmers. It's the skilled, courteous person able to cope with any emergency, who really enjoys the wonderful world of the water.

Can your child swim? Parents who wish to give their children swimming lessons should see the film, "Teaching Johnny to Swim." It covers the basic elements of swimming and water safety. This motion picture was contributed as a public service by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company to the American Red Cross.

To arrange a showing in your community, call your local Red Cross chapter.

COUPON MAY BE PASTED ON POSTAL CARD

THE LIGHT THAT NEVER FAILS

Metropolitan Life

INSURANCE COMPANY©

A MUTUAL COMPANY

FIRST AID

Metropolitan Life (Dept. A)
1 Madison Ave., N.Y. 10, N.Y.

Please send me the free "First Aid Chart," 7-60-J.

Name (PLEASE PRINT)

Street

City & Zone State

REMODELING AN OLD MODEL

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 60

artificial and hard.) The choice of color, as you see in Barbara's "after" picture, is becoming and natural-looking.

Barbara's all-out eagerness for a fresher, more youthful appearance prompted her to try permanent hair coloring, even though she knew it would be costly and time-consuming. "I would be all thumbs about tinting my hair at home," says Barbara, "and I'd hate to run the risk of getting a harsh, unbecoming color!" Aside from monthly touch-ups, she will have to treat herself to weekly hair-conditioning treatments to counteract the drying effects of the bleach.

For women who are wary of permanent hair coloring, but who would also like to brighten, deepen or slightly lighten the color of their topknots, there are temporary rinses in capsule, liquid or spray-on forms. (The spray-ons are handy for "streaking" or "tipping" hair too.) These colors are made with vegetable dyes, wash out with each shampoo, and are harmless. The newest "temporary" rinses are those designed to last through from five to eight shampoos before reapplication is necessary.

Hairdo up to date. Even more dramatic than Barbara's new hair color is her new hair style. From the old one-length bob, Barbara's hair was cut and shaped in layers all over her head. It was then set on rollers for the fullness, high sweep at the forehead, and deep soft waves at the sides. See how much more gracefully this style frames her face. (It even flatters her figure, since it makes her appear taller and slimmer.)

Make-up light, bright, right. Without sp attention, Barbara's potentially striking c ing gave way to a faded monotone look. fresh difference in her "after" picture re from discovering how quickly and e make-up can be applied.

To provide pretty contrast between skin hair, Barbara wears a creamy liquid mak in a pinky-beige shade. To cut applica time in half, we suggested using a clean sp (instead of finger tips) to spread the c evenly and lightly over her face and n Another timesaver: a roll-on mascara. bara's shade is navy blue, chosen to inte the blue of her eyes. An eye-shadow stick the shape of a miniature lipstick) takes guesswork and smudging out of using shadow. Barbara's shade is a soft turqu blue chosen to further intensify and brigl her eyes. Fadeaway eyebrows take on nee color with a soft eyebrow pencil in a medi brown shade. By having a slight lift pencile at the top-center arch, Barbara's newly sha eyebrows add more dash to her appearar Final touches: a light dusting of powder, stick lighter and brighter than before.

Colors to do something for you. As woman grows older, her hair and skin to change, if only imperceptibly. Where st black was dramatic for Barbara in her ea twenties, it became harsh later on as her s and hair lost some of their youthful vital See how the soft pink, in Barbara's "aft picture, adds a glow to her appearance. S ilar effects can be achieved by adding a to of pretty color to a basic dress shade such navy, black or gray. Pale yellow, clear t quoise, pinky mauve, softest shades of blue brilliant greens all add lovely accents—ta your pick, depending on which shades the most for you. Add them, a touch at a tir in a scarf or earrings, a decorative flower, l or lovely blouse.

TAMARACK

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 46

plenty of times I wish ole Uncle Mon hadn't been quite that generous. And I haven't got but one horse that's any good. Marsh Hill Troubadour."

"What a pretty name," Mrs. Ferris said doubtfully. "Well, back to Lucretia ——"

"Where is Lucretia?" Monroe asked, and Mrs. Ferris frowned.

"Where indeed? Not two hours after her plane gets in from New York, she's dug an old pair of jeans out of the bottom drawer where I could have sworn she'd never find them, and has vanished into the woods with Lochlan and Duff at her heels, and they will all three come back covered with cockleburs and probably ticks." She sighed. "I had so hoped Lucretia would come home sophisticated."

"She still studying ballet?"

"No, she is not studying ballet," said Mrs. Ferris. "Monroe, you are at least three years behind. The ballet craze didn't last a year, and after that it was drama school. Oh, I cannot tell you the trouble we have had with Lucretia! Do you know that her father and I were complacently sitting here in the living room one night under the impression that Lucretia was applying herself to her acting when the Joe Lamberts burst in from their trip to New York and told us—with a certain amount of relish, I might add—that they were sightseeing in one of those Bohemian night clubs in Greenwich Village, and there was Lucretia singing with the band? In black tights."

Monroe burst out laughing. "She always did say she wanted to sing with a band."

"She wanted to do a lot of things," Mrs. Ferris said grimly. "Well, by the time I could get a plane reservation and fly up there, she had been fired—I can't imagine how she got the job in the first place. Of course I firmly intended to drag her back to Mississippi, by the hair if necessary, but somehow she persuaded me to let her study music in earnest. So now she is enrolled at Juilliard."

"You hope," said Monroe, looking amused.

Mrs. Ferris said firmly, "No, I'm almost sure she's still at Juilliard; she's determined to become a famous composer."

There was silence for a moment, as th both tried to visualize Lucretia as a famo composer. Monroe shook his head dubious

"Yes, I agree." Mrs. Ferris sighed. "A that's why I was so delighted when y dropped in, Monroe. I said to myself rig away, 'If anyone can make Lucretia listen reason, Monroe can; after all, he is like brother.' Why, you taught her to ride, a helped her with geometry, and brought h home from that country-club dance wh Pokey Palmer got so infatuated with that g from the Delta and just left Lucretia ——

"I'd forgotten about that," said Monroe.

"And maybe you could show her, Monro that it's high time for her to stop wasting h energy on these mad enthusiasms and sta concentrating on men and marriage." H voice trailed off; she looked at Monroe sadl "When I think of all the boys she has let sli through her fingers. Tommy Lambert. Georg Ernest Askew. Pokey Palmer. All here in town and from good families. To say nothing the men she has met in New York. But wi Lucretia give any of them a chance?"

Monroe frowned, drank the last of his co fee, and leaned back in the chair, stretching hi long legs out comfortably. "Might hav known it would be a mistake to stop by here," he said gloomily. "Had these two week planned; I was going to fish all day and part all night. Now here I am, involved with th Ferrises as usual."

"But you're like our son!"

"I'm not sure that's such an advantage," said Monroe, getting up. "Look; I haven even seen Lucretia in three years, I can't guar antee she'll listen to me, but O.K., I'll give it a try. Long as it doesn't interfere with my fish ing," he added, grinning. Mrs Ferris got up too, and walked with him to the door, where they both stopped abruptly. "Here she comes now," Monroe said, "and mad look at her run! Must be a rattlesnake cha[illegible]er."

They both stood back from th[illegible]as Lucretia burst through, muddy, [illegible]evel[illegible], breathless, and obviously in the gr[illegible]me violent emotion.

"Mother!" she cried at once. "What p pened to Tamarack?"

"Tamarack," Mrs. Ferris repeated [illegible] eretia, don't let those muddy colli[illegible] ook, darling, here's Monroe. Isn't it rful to see him? He just got in from on this afternoon."

retia swung around and threw Monroe stracted smile. "Monroe, how great," id. "Look, mother, I went all through sture and down to the creek and he isn't You've got to tell me this instant where he didn't die, did he?" Her voice rose nately. "Tamarack didn't die!"
. Ferris looked quickly from her daugh-Monroe, who was standing stiffly aside, jammed in his pockets and a faint staining his cheeks. "Lucretia, really!"
id impatiently. "No, of course Tamdidn't die. Your father can tell you all it when he gets home. Now calm down ave a cup of coffee with Monroe; after u haven't seen each other in three years know you have lots to talk about."
addy can tell me!" Lucretia's stormy rightened, she whirled and ran into the
They heard her at the telephone dialing, en her rapid intense voice.
s. Ferris went to the door and ordered ollies out before she risked looking at
oe. "You see what I mean," she said.
es," said Monroe. He sat down on the nd lighted a cigarette; he looked partly

SONG

By JOHN IRVINE

hen first my love lay in my arms,
Oh, little did she say,
ut looked too deeply in my eyes
And wept, and turned away.

nd yet, for that sweet moment's grace
Of ecstasy and pain,
bartered all the deep heart's peace
I shall not know again.

sed and partly annoyed. "Who is this arack, anyway? Or what?"
A horse. Lucretia's horse which she has only about four times since he was born, use she was in New York. Tamarack was ing Larch's foal, you remember that ly black mare that died? Well, Lucretia d Larch so, she wouldn't hear to selling arack even though it meant her father and d all the responsibility of taking care of and seeing that he was exercised and ——"
And so you gave him away, without conng me or anything!" Lucretia cried from hall. She came into the living room and into a chair, looking at her mother re-chfully.
Darling, be reasonable. We didn't exactly him away—didn't your father explain?—
imply thought it would be better for Tam-k to be ridden regularly and loved and d for, so we let Puss Turner have him bese she and her husband are both just crazy ut horses. Now doesn't that make sense?"
ucretia looked dubious. "But you didn't write me! When did this happen?"
Let's see, it must have been about two rs ago. We didn't write at first because it a temporary arrangement—actually it was time I had to go see about your singing in night club, and your father was so busy, it seemed such a clever idea to let Puss
e Tamarack while I was away. Then she Percy were enjoying him so—well, Tam-k stayed out there a month, and then an-er, and then it was a year. I suppose we ught we had told you."
Two years," Lucretia said incredulously.
onroe, how would you like it if someone e away your horse?"
Monroe, pleased at being spoken to, said he ught it sounded like a pretty good idea.
he only thing is, I never did think Puss was y reliable," he added reluctantly. "I mean, 's one of these speed demons who think the y way to ride a horse is at full gallop."

"What!" cried Lucretia, leaping from her chair horrified.

"Now, Monroe, Puss Turner is a perfectly lovely girl," Mrs. Ferris said rapidly, sending frantic signals across the room to Monroe, who had already realized his mistake and sat with closed eyes, braced for a storm.

"Speed demon," Lucretia repeated. "Why, Tamarack is a gaited horse, not a race horse!" She looked about her wildly for a moment and then snatched the car keys up from an end table. "Tamarack's probably ruined," she moaned. "Oh, I'm going to kill that Puss Turner. Kill her!" She marched out the door and slammed it very hard. In a minute they heard the car start up with a great deal of unnecessary racing of the motor.

"Well, I guess the time she spent in drama school wasn't wasted," Monroe said. "She learned how to make an exit, all right. You think I better follow her out there, in case Puss needs protecting?"

"I think," said Mrs. Ferris with a small smile, "that is an excellent idea."

When Monroe walked into Puss Turner's living room, he knew at once that something was very wrong. Lucretia no longer looked angry, but she was pale and, if Monroe knew anything about women in general and Lucretia in particular, about to cry. Puss, on the other hand, seemed both embarrassed and defensive. They both looked up when he entered, and cried out his name—Puss with obvious relief at the interruption, Lucretia with such anguish that his heart turned over.

"Monro-o-o-oe!" she said, dragging it out like a dirge. "Puss hasn't got Tamarack."

"I was just trying to explain to Lucretia," Puss said rapidly and nervously. "I feel awful about it, but the fact is Mrs. Ferris didn't make it clear, I mean didn't say anything about wanting Tamarack back, and I just assumed she was only too glad to get rid of him, having to feed him and curry him and all that, so when Percy said, 'All that horse wants to do is trot ——'"

"They gave him away," Lucretia said heartrendingly.

"Well, we were building this house, and had so much expense, and then with the twins I didn't have any time to ride, so when Percy said ——"

"'All that horse wants to do is trot,'" Monroe finished, and thought, Speed demons. "O.K., but who did you give him to?"

"Andrew," Puss said. "You know our old yardman? Well, he got too old to work, so daddy fixed him up with a little place out near Marsh Hill—actually, Monroe, right close to where you used to keep all those ponies. Andrew's a lay preacher, and the church is about five miles away, so we thought he could take care of Tamarack and ride him to church, and he really does get a big kick out of it. I mean, the other Negroes mostly ride mules, and here's Andrew with this fancy saddle horse."

"That's nice for Andrew," Monroe said. "But what does Tamarack do from Monday to Saturday? Pull a plow?"

Puss flushed. "Really, Monroe. I expect if Tamarack does anything, he just eats grass and gets fat. Andrew is crazy about horses."

"That's what mother said about you and Percy," Lucretia said sadly, getting up. "No, Puss, don't look offended. I'm not blaming you and Percy; after all, I should have kept better track of my horse. Monroe?"

"Sure, I'm coming," said Monroe. "Look, we'll drive out to Marsh Hill and take a look at Tamarack and see if he's O.K. How about that?"

They left Puss still looking half guilty and half angry, and walked out to the two cars. "We'll pick up yours later, all right?" Monroe asked, and Lucretia climbed into his car without a word and sat disconsolately regarding her muddy loafers. She looked small and pathetic, Monroe thought, with cockleburs stuck to her jeans, her checked shirt pulled out from the narrow belt, a wisp of fair hair hanging over one eye, and her mouth turned down. He felt a wave of tenderness, and then a surge of irritation.

"I wish you could see yourself right now," he said. "You've got a smudge of dirt on your cheek and your hair needs combing and I bet

How to Send Your Baby to College on $9.50 a Week

A good college education today costs as much as $65 a week. But, the same education can be bought with much less financial strain if you start now, putting $9.50 a week into U.S. Savings Bonds. At college age there will be more than $11,000—and over $2,750 of it will come entirely from interest. That's like getting a whole year of college free.

HERE'S WHY U.S. SAVINGS BONDS ARE SUCH A GOOD WAY TO SAVE

• You can save automatically with the Payroll Savings Plan. • You now earn 3¾% interest at maturity. • You invest without risk under a U. S. Government guarantee. • Your money can't be lost or stolen. • You can get your money, with interest, any time you want it. • You save more than money—you're helping your Government pay for peace. • Buy Bonds where you work or bank.

NOW every Savings Bond you own—old or new—earns ½% more than ever before.

You save more than money with U.S. Savings Bonds

The U. S. Government does not pay for this advertisement. It is donated by this publication in cooperation with the Advertising Council and the magazine publishers of America.

you haven't put on any lipstick since you left New York."

Lucretia, startled out of her misery, turned and stared at him. "We're not going to a tea dance, Monroe; we're just going to see an old colored yardman. Andrew won't care how I look."

Monroe pressed down on the accelerator. "And I reckon it doesn't matter what I think?"

Lucretia began to laugh. "Oh, Monroe, you're so funny. Why, you've seen me looking worse than this a million times." She looked out the window and said more cheerfully, "Well, at least Tamarack's got a pretty place to live. Look at all those pine trees!"

OUCH! DON'T TOUCH!

New "wonder drug" lotion flows on... needs no rubbing

STOPS SUNBURN PAIN...instantly!

From Florida comes a new medicated miracle for sunburn, kitchen burns, all kinds of "burning" skin irritations. A flowing "anti-pain" lotion, it stops blistering skin fire... cold!

That's because snow-white Solarcaine contains "wonder drug" anesthetics (such as benzocaine) that put pain nerves to sleep. As other ingredients cool, soothe, promote fast healing of inflamed tissues.

No need to rub tender skin. Solarcaine comes in a plastic squeeze bottle. Greaseless. Wonderful for itching and detergent hands... for all skin pain. Solarcaine is a quality product of Plough, Inc. Get the large size—and save.

Stories of grateful users:

"A druggist recommended Solarcaine for the severe sunburn I got during Easter vacation in Palm Springs. It is impossible for me to say enough for this wonderful product." Lucille Beck, Monterey Park, Calif.

"I had the most awful case of detergent hands. They were red, cracked and sore. Solarcaine is the only thing that gave me relief."
Harriette Brudner, Glen Oaks, N. Y.

"I have a very dry skin and break out in a rash very easily. Solarcaine stops the itching and burning pain. It's just wonderful."
Esther G. Neenan, Lynn, Mass.

"My husband had a bad burn on his arm. Solarcaine soothed it right away. Also used it on my 3½ year old granddaughter's skinned knee and it healed in no time at all."
Mrs. John Rourke, New York, N. Y.

SOLARCAINE ⊕

They were driving up Marsh Hill now, across land that had been in Monroe's family for generations, and they held quiet, looking appreciatively at the pines swinging gray against a sky faintly stained by the failing sun.

"Over there is where you used to keep your ponies, isn't it?" Lucretia asked suddenly, pointing. "How many did you have, anyway? Forty?"

"Fifty, about," Monroe said, steering carefully around mudholes.

"And you weren't more than twelve when you started breeding and selling them," Lucretia said thoughtfully. "Everybody said what an enormous success you were going to be. But then you never even tried to be a brilliant lawyer or a doctor or go to Europe or anything, you just kept on farming. The trouble with you, Monroe, is you're so one-way; you don't have any ambition."

"Not by your standards," Monroe said evenly. "By your standards, anyone who doesn't go to New York to be a ballet dancer or an artist or one of those atonal composers is totally lacking in ambition."

"Now don't tease," said Lucretia.

"I'm dead serious. I just think your standards are cockeyed. I've got a good, working farm, and I've got a couple of gaited horses, and one of them—Marsh Hill Troubadour—may be good enough to show in New Orleans this fall. I don't have a lot of money, but I care about what I'm doing, and I think I'm doing it well, and I believe that's just as important as studying to be a famous composer."

"Oh, you take everything so literally!" Lucretia said. "Right now I don't care if I'm a famous composer or not. Right now all I want to do is find Tamarack."

"If that's true," said Monroe, "then I think you might benefit by being a little more one-way. Looks to me like you're every which way at once."

By this time they had bumped along the dirt road to its end, to where it ran against a barbed-wire fence and stopped. Monroe said, "I don't know where Andrew's house is, but he probably keeps Tamarack in the field here—it's the only part that's fenced."

He held the barbed wire apart while Lucretia crawled through, and they walked over the springy grass, whistling and calling. They saw two shaggy brown ponies that jerked up their heads and galloped away, and farther on, near the barn, they saw a horse grazing.

"There," said Monroe. "There he is."

But Lucretia shook her head. "No, that's not Tamarack," she said.

"You sure? After all, you haven't seen him for a couple of years."

Lucretia sighed elaborately. "I may not can tell you Tamarack's exact height or how long his tail is, but I do know he isn't a gray. Tamarack's chestnut."

"Well, let's look in the barn."

But Tamarack wasn't in the barn; he wasn't anywhere. Lucretia trudged doggedly on, across the pasture and under the fence again and into the pine woods and across a little creek and through another field. It was getting dark; she tripped on a clump of huckleberry, and Monroe put out his hand to steady her.

"Listen," he said. "We're not going to find Tamarack or Andrew or anything in the dark, except maybe a snake. You come on back to the car now; we'll clean up and go somewhere for dinner, and I promise to drive you out here tomorrow morning. O.K.?"

"All right," Lucretia agreed reluctantly. "Only I don't think I want to go anywhere for dinner. I'm just going to go straight to bed. I'm too depressed about Tamarack to care about having fun or anything, Monroe."

Monroe opened his mouth, and then shut it. O.K., he thought. We'll find this horse first, that's the way she wants it. Then we'll see.

Just as they reached the car, a shooting star curved across the sky. Lucretia grabbed his arm. "Quick!" she said. "Make a wish!"

Instinctively he shut his eyes and wished. When he opened them, Lucretia was smiling happily. "Now I know we'll find him!" she said.

At first Andrew acted innocent. "Tamarack," he said. "Don't know no horse name Tamarack."

"All right," Monroe said patiently. "Maybe his name was Buster. Or Ole Red. You know what horse I mean, Andrew—the one Mrs. Turner gave you to ride to church on."

"Please, Andrew!" Lucretia begged.

"Miz Turner." Andrew screwed up his old face in a frown, looked at the sky, looked at his feet, looked everywhere but into their faces. "Miz Pussy Turner?" he said finally.

Monroe exploded. "Andrew! How many Mrs. Turners ever gave you a horse? Think, now."

Andrew thought. "Seem like it coming back to me. They used to be a big red horse out here, sure enough. Ain't here now, though. That red horse been gone maybe one, two years." He peered at them cautiously. "Fact is, Mr. Monroe, seem like I done sold that red horse."

"Sold!" Lucretia gasped, but Monroe motioned her to hush.

"How come you sold him, Andrew?" he said mildly. "Why, I heard you were so proud of that horse you couldn't hardly stand it."

"Yes, sir," Andrew agreed vigorously. "That was a mighty fine horse. That horse start singlefooting down the road, everybody better look out! Never seen a horse could beat that one."

"Then why did you sell him?" asked Lucretia, baffled.

Little by little they coaxed the story from Andrew. Yes, sir, he rode that horse to church every Sunday. Yes, ma'am, wasn't nobody didn't stand around in the churchyard with their eyes popping out and their mouths hanging open when he rode up, in his long black coat and creased pants, with that big red horse chuffing and snorting and chomping on the bit. Look like he couldn't hardly help parading up and down a few times, so everybody could get a good look. But this one day, when he was tipping his hat to the ladies and nodding to all the gentlemen ——

When a man gets too big for his breeches, his hat doesn't fit either.

"And acting an even bigger fool than you are ordinarily," Monroe put in.

Andrew gave him a hurt look. "I expect you right, Mr. Monroe. Well, sir, that big red horse lay back his ears and rared up and before you can clap your hands, ole Andrew's setting in a mudhole."

Monroe burst out laughing, and even Lucretia had to smile. But then she said severely, "That's no reason to sell a horse, Andrew—just because he threw you."

"No'm," said Andrew. He sighed. "Reckon not. But I never did hear the last of it. Look like every time I got on that horse, they was somebody cutting his eyes at me and grinning. Got so I was right sensitive about it."

"Well," Lucretia said helplessly, "well, I guess I understand, Andrew. But who did you sell him to?"

"Man name Gophe," Andrew said. "Come from Wiggins."

Lucretia and Monroe nodded, got up from Andrew's porch steps where they'd all been sitting, and started off to the car. But Monroe couldn't resist hollering back, "I hope you got a good price for him, anyway. I guess you know he was out of Leaning Larch by Black Commander and would have brought maybe seven hundred dollars at auction."

As they drove off, he noted with satisfaction that Andrew was standing like stone on the steps, his mouth hanging open and his eyes popping.

"I'll find Tamarack if it's the last thing I do!" Lucretia vowed, blinking back tears. "You hear me, Monroe?"

"I hear you," he said. "That's all I have heard for the last four days," he added.

"He couldn't just vanish off the face of the earth!" she exclaimed. "But where is he, then? Where's Tamarack?" And, counting on her fingers, she rattled off the places where Tamarack wasn't. "First we go to Wiggins, to find Gophe, and they tell us Gophe got run out of town for bootlegging; so we have to ch into Harrison County. Find him the bootlegging merrily away, only he's Tamarack off for a mule. A mule!" I repeated, indignant.

"He had to have some kind of an pull his whisky cart around," Monr reasonably. "And you heard him- arack didn't like being hitched to a rick wagon, and just about kicked it to piec

"I cannot conceive of Tamarack ki Lucretia said. "Well, so Gophe trad off to that man in Lumberton, that Kiddy Carnival. So off we go to Lumb

"Instead of going to the lake to wat said Monroe.

"And the carnival turns out to be affair with a rusty Ferris wheel and a that didn't even scare me, and four s ponies—and that man had been renting rack out to children! It's a miracle n them got thrown before he decided Tar was eating too much and sold him ——"

"To Mrs. Hiram Guthrie," said M "Now there was a nice old lady. I be horse had a fine time pulling her little around, with ribbons braided into his and bells jingling. Too bad she got too drive any more."

"And that tacky mercenary niece o sold him to that awful Henry Lee Sugg the traveling rodeo, and we spend a whc trying to track down the rodeo ——"

"A whole day which turned out to day my Great-aunt Kate came through on her way to Atlanta, and particularly w you to have lunch with her."

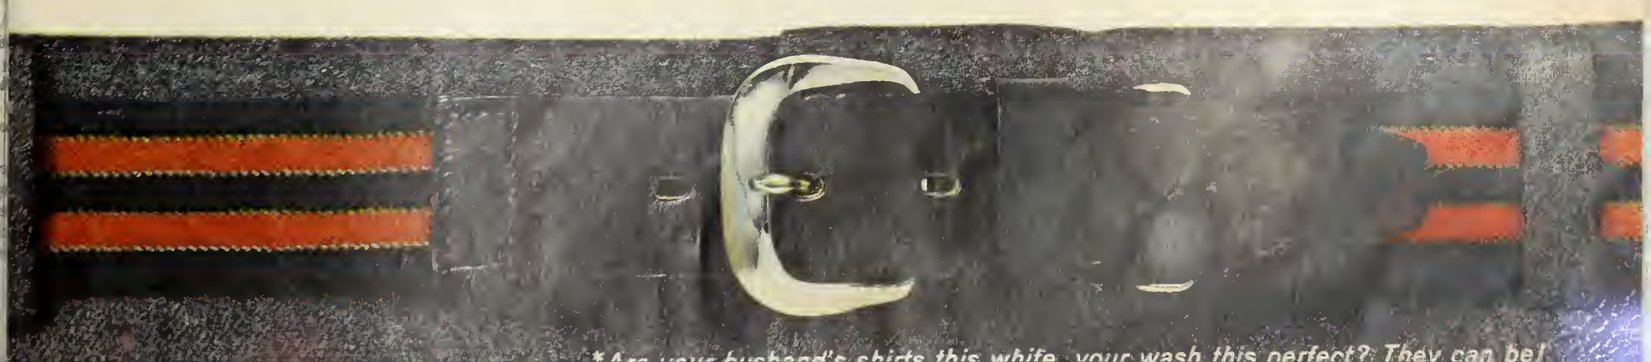
"—— and when we find the rodeo," tia swept on, "we find out Henry Lee has given up trying to teach Tamarack to like a cow pony, and has sold him t Lucky-O Dude Ranch on the Gulf Coa we have to drive all the way to Biloxi."

"And here we are, so we might as enjoy it," said Monroe. After all, he the it wasn't such a bad place to be. True en they had spent all afternoon poking thr the stalls at the Lucky-O Dude Ranch now, at sundown, they were having din Liveoaks, and he was pleased with his pano and the view of the deserted stret sand and the choppy gray water; and more pleased at the prospect of going the Surf-and-Sand to dance. Lucretia looking very pretty in her light green st dress, and he didn't really mind knowing she probably had her shoes off under the t He buttered another hot biscuit and "You haven't eaten a bit of your shrim molade, Lucretia. How do you expe have strength for dancing if you don't eat

"Dancing!" she said. "How can you t about dancing? What we ought to do straight on to New Orleans this very min

Monroe put down the biscuit. "Lister you know how big New Orleans is? know how many horses there are in New leans? Do you realize we don't even k the name of the man the Lucky-O I Ranch sold Tamarack to?"

Lucretia bit her lip; she looked worrie know it's going to be hard," she said. we do know Tamarack was sold in April we have to do is find out who bought a h in April, and ——"



"You listen to me," Monroe said. don't even know that Tamarack's in New leans by now. Andrew said he was in Wig and Gophe said he was in Lumberton Mrs. Hiram Guthrie's niece said he wa Picayune and Henry Lee Suggs said Biloxi the dude ranch said New Orleans and the in New Orleans will say Baton Rouge the man in Baton Rouge will say Tucson, zona. I have driven you all over South Mi sippi, but if you think I am going to drive to Tucson ——" He broke off, surprise his own anger.

Lucretia stared at him. "Monroe! Yo not going to give up, are you?"

"I'm just tired of hearing about Tamar from morning till night," he said as calml possible. "If Marsh Hill Troubadour him got lost I'm not sure I'd spend as much t traipsing around the countryside after hin

CONTINUED ON PAGE

This shirt was washed in blue Cheer*

*Are your husband's shirts this white, your wash this perfect? They can be!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 76

you have spent on this crazy Tamarack that pulls whisky wagons and throws poor old darkies into ditches and wears ribbons in his mane."

"What's the matter with you?" cried Lucretia, looking alarmed.

"I have asked you to go fishing with me, swimming with me, and out to the club to dance," said Monroe, sweeping his plate aside and leaning both arms on the table. "But all you want to do is hunt for Tamarack. I have got to go back to Houston one week from today, and I haven't caught one perch or gone to one party, and what's more I have probably lost all my friends and insulted all my relatives by ignoring them entirely. All I have done is drive you around, and you are so busy looking out the window in case Tamarack might just happen to be standing at the side of the road you never even look at me."

"At you?" Lucretia said. "I'm looking at you right now."

"And I'll tell you what you see. You see a chauffeur, that's all."

"Now you're being silly," Lucretia said. "You know I can drive a car—have had my license since I was fourteen. If you don't want to help me find Tamarack, then you most certainly don't have to. I'll find him myself."

She had turned pale; she dropped her napkin on the table, stood up, and walked out to the car without speaking. He followed her, and stood for a moment on the oystershell drive, looking at the white sand and the dark, gently lapping water until his anger drained away and left him feeling tired and obscurely cheated. There was a new moon up, just a crust, and the night was mild and windy.

"We could go swimming," he said through the car window.

"People don't go swimming with their chauffeurs," she said stiffly.

The drive home was interminable. To break the silence, Monroe turned the radio on, and Lucretia, perversely, began to sing. She had a light, pleasant, unremarkable voice, and he found himself wondering what sort of songs she had sung in the Greenwich Village night club, and how she had looked in black tights. He turned the radio off.

At last they pulled up at her house and stopped. Through the open windows they could hear the pine trees soughing, a sad, lonely sound. Monroe cut the ignition off and sat motionless; Lucretia sighed; they could hear the click, click of the car cooling off. Lochlan and Duff paced sedately out of the darkness and stood waiting, guarding, at the end of the flagstone walk, their plumy tails waving softly in welcome.

"I'd better go in," said Lucretia.

Monroe got out instantly and opened the door for her with a flourish; he was still annoyed. But when she came out into the moonlight, her shoes in her hand and her face pale, tired, he suddenly drew her into his arms and kissed her. She dropped the shoes.

"Why, Monroe," she said, slowly drawing back. One of the collies barked—Lochlan, he thought; but it was an encouraging bark. "Monroe, I don't understand you at all. What did you do that for?"

He felt confident and masterful. "Never mind," he said. "Just tell me. Are you going to get up tomorrow morning and pack a picnic lunch and spend the day with me at Lake Shady? Or are you going to go crashing after that horse again, all by yourself?"

Her face changed; her brows drew together. "I'm going to look for Tamarack," she said. "All by myself." She whirled and ran; she was halfway to the house before she remembered her shoes, and came back more slowly. "What I don't comprehend," she said, not really angry now, but simply curious, "is why you came along with me in the first place. I mean, if you didn't care whether or not we found ——"

"Tamarack," finished Monroe. "And if I hear that name one more time ——"

It had been a long time since he had lost his temper completely; now he felt the familiar symptoms: his hands clenched, his head was light, he was caught up in a sort of dreadful exhilaration. "If you don't know by now why I let myself be dragged into this lunatic horse hunt," he said, "then you won't ever know, because I'm not going to tell you, and you are so blind you would walk straight into a stone wall and knock yourself out and still not believe it was there."

"Have you lost your mind?" said Lucretia, looking fascinated.

"Your mother said I could straighten you out," he rushed on. "Well, you can just tell her I give up. I absolutely give up. You are so far off in this make-believe fairy-tale world in which you are a ballet-dancing heroine composing symphonies with one hand and rescuing imaginary horses with the other, you can't see what's real and what's two feet in front of your nose."

"Tamarack's real," Lucretia said.

"No, he's not. He's got wings on his feet and a horn on his head and a plaited tail."

"He's a five-year-old chestnut gelding with two white socks and a blaze face and a rack that needs working on!" said Lucretia, and burst into tears.

"Cry away," said Monroe. "You go chase your Pegasus, and I'll go back to Houston to Marsh Hill Troubadour. If you ever catch him, you can fly over and wave at us."

He slammed into the car and roared off, not looking back, not letting himself think of her standing there barefoot, crying, with the pine trees sighing over her and only the collies for comfort. He held hard to his anger, driving too fast, heading out into the country, heading toward Houston. His thoughts skipped and skidded. Let her cry. Who cares? She's not crying about me. All she cares about is that horse she hasn't even seen in three years. Probably wouldn't recognize him if she fell over him. What did she say? Chestnut gelding with two white socks and ——

"Oh, no," he said aloud.

—— and a rack that needs working on ——

Monroe took his foot off the accelerator and stared down the empty road as though tranced. When the car had coasted almost to a stop, he pulled it off onto the grass and sat for a long time in silence.

"I don't believe it," he said softly. Nevertheless, he pulled out his wallet, dragged out a faded snapshot, and held it under the dim lights of the dashboard. After a while he started the car again and drove on down the road, driving steadily now, headed toward Houston.

It was so unusual for Lucretia to be listless that at first Mrs. Ferris refused to credit what her own eyes told her. Lucretia drooped; she thought, It's only the heat. Lucretia languished; she thought, She's working out that symphony in her head. Lucretia sighed; she said, No, that was a yawn—she stayed up too late last night reading.

By the third day she could no longer ignore it.

"Ever since you got back from New Orleans," she accused, "you've been moping. Is it just Tamarack you're brooding about? Is that all?"

Lucretia was lying in the hammock; she lifted her face, as forlorn as a wilted chrysanthemum. "I didn't even expect to find Tamarack in New Orleans," she said. "I never will find him, because he's not real, he's Pegasus, that's what Monroe said." And she closed her eyes wearily.

"Pegasus," repeated Mrs. Ferris, frowning. "Yes. Well, where is Monroe?"

"Gone back to Houston," said Lucretia in a dead voice.

"Houston!" Mrs. Ferris gave a little cry, and sank down in a wicker chair. "Are you sure?"

"Oh, and I don't care!" Lucretia said with sudden heat. Her bare foot came out of the hammock, she gave a violent push, and the hammock swung crazily. "Let him stay there. But yes, I'm sure," she continued, obviously trying to hold her voice steady. "I finally called his mother because I hadn't heard from him and I thought, well, suppose he had a wreck or something, and was in the hospital, he was certainly driving like a maniac that night. But his mother said, no, he hadn't had a wreck as far as she knew, he had simply gone back to Houston. That very same night. Phoned her from some filling station between here and Purvis, didn't even bother to go back for his suitcase. Just roared off to Houston."

Mrs. Ferris sorted all this out. "That night you got back from the Gulf Coast? Lucretia, you didn't do anything to make him leave?"

Lucretia didn't answer. She let the hammock swing back and forth, back and forth, all the while staring up at the sky, where the tips of the leaning pines met in a green arch. At last she asked, rather pathetically, "Mother, do you think I'll ever be a famous composer? You reckon I am just wasting my time up there, studying harmony and counterpoint and all?"

Mrs. Ferris managed not to smile. "What do you think?" she countered.

"Well, the funny thing is," said Lucretia. "I'm not sure I want to be a famous anything. I'm not even sure I want to go back to New York."

"Darling," Mrs. Ferris said cautiously, "have you ever thought about—oh, marriage, for instance. Having a family?"

Gradually the hammock slowed and stopped. "Why, yes," Lucretia said. "Actually I've thought about it a lot. Just these last days. That's why ——"

It was at this critical moment that they heard Monroe's voice.

Lucretia might have learned in drama school how to make an exit; Monroe knew instinctively how to make an entrance. He had left his car and the small van parked behind the arborvitae, and managed to get the big chestnut horse down the ramp with a minimum of commotion. "Steady, hoy. Easy now, Troubadour," he soothed, and led him across the lawn so quietly that not even the collies barked. He was almost up to the front porch before he hollered for Lucretia.

She came flying around the side of the house, calling, "Monroe! You're back!" Then she stopped dead, the color drained from her face; he thought she might faint. "Tamarack," she breathed. "You've found Tamarack."

"Only I've been calling him Marsh Troubadour," Monroe said.

She raced across the grass and flung arms around the horse's neck; he jerked startled, and tried to rear. Monroe pulled down. "Look out, now, Lucretia!" he "Good night, you don't expect him to you!"

"Oh, I don't!" Lucretia cried happily. I know you don't remember me, you sill horse, but where did you come from? Mo where did you find him?"

"I told you," Monroe said. "He's M Hill Troubadour. I bought him last spri New Orleans, worked on his rack, showed in Houston and won the junior stake, s him in Dallas ——"

"I don't believe it," Lucretia said, starin him.

"I didn't either, at first. But it was enough to check. All I had to do was call Orleans and find out the fellow I bought from had got him from the Lucky-O R Ranch in Biloxi. After that, there wasn't thing else to do but go to Houston and him and bring him back to you." He dr deep breath and put the reins in her h "And here he is."

"But he's your horse now," Lucretia tered.

"I'm giving him back to you. You can s him in Madison Square Garden, teach ballet, do anything you want with Maybe you can even paste wings on his and teach him to fly."

He gave Troubadour a hurried, awkw pat, and started off toward his car, not da to look back—not at his horse nor Lucretia. But he didn't get any far than the camellia bushes before Lucret voice stopped him.

"Wait, Monroe!" she called. "Ple please wait!"

He waited. And she came crashing into arms, and Tamarack-Troubadour came cra ing into them both, so that for a moment t were all three tangled up with Mrs. Ferr prize Pink Perfection. Then, before he co stop her, Lucretia dropped the reins and g her horse a solid slap that sent him shying snorting off across the lawn.

"Lucretia Ferris," he said, "do you m to say I'm going to have to chase that ho again?"

"You can chase him all you want to," said. "I might even help you, later on. right now, I think that horse has come tween us once too often."

After a while, Mrs. Ferris, who had start to follow her daughter out to welco Monroe and had then made a tactful retre cautiously emerged from around the side the house. She took care not to disturb L cretia and Monroe, still locked in a gratifyi embrace in the middle of her camellias. B down by the crepe myrtles she caught Tam rack, and tied his reins to a pine tree.

"I don't know who you belong to now, what your name is," she said, brushing t pink petals from his mane, "but I expe you're worth keeping."

RHYMES FROM YOUNG MOTHER GOOSE

By C. S. JENNISON

Higgledy, piggledy,
What? Again!
Baby's toys are out of the pen.
THIS time, baby
Can shriek and glower.
. . . Mommy has lost
Her pickup power.

A PERFECTLY HORRIBLE WEEK

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 57

Peter laid his briefcase and the evening paper on the table. He watched Joyce for a long moment, not so much looking at her as studying her with an inner eye engineered by eight years of experience, and decided, after due reflection, to take the defensive position his findings indicated and to advance only with extreme caution, if at all. He was not ignorant of the theory that the best defense is an attack; he regarded it as a good theory, as long as you thought of it first. Well, he hadn't. He knew that dark, cloudy stare.

He wondered if it was possible that Joyce had smashed the exhaust pipe again, and experienced a pang: he was beginning to feel protective toward the little car. He decided the law of averages was in the car's favor an dismissed the idea. The thing to do w draw Joyce into the open, because she w deadly in ambush. He wondered idly why always noticed how pretty her neck was whe she was mad, and decided it must be the wa she held her head.

He gave himself one final instruction as h removed his hat and smiled politely at he Don't laugh.

"Good evening, ma'am."

With a box of detergent under her arm an a can of cleanser in her hand, she was pawin among the groceries on the counter. He con cluded that she was probably looking for th bleach.

She turned. "You're home early," she sai accusingly.

"Nope," he said cheerfully. "Same time a usual, my dear."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 8

Summer's newest bath-time beauty secret

The new wrap tells you— it's the new Lux!

New Lux with skin-purifier added

New Lux helps keep your skin clear...all over —keeps you bath-time fresh...all day!

YVETTE MIMIEUX, co-starring in MGM's presentation of G. Wells' "THE TIME MACHINE," A George Pal Production

A gentle but marvelously effective new skin-purifier goes into every Lux bar. New Lux keeps you bath-time fresh. Helps keep your skin beautifully clear!

Now your luxurious bath with your bath-size Lux does something new and wonderful for you. New Lux with skin-purifier added keeps you bath-time fresh, bath-time sweet all day. And, as you bathe, New Lux actually helps prevent skin blemishes. Helps keep your skin looking lovely and clear—all over!

New Lux smooths your summer tan, too! Smooths it to a new silkiness—because new Lux is cream-enriched.

You'll love new Lux in the luxurious big bath size . . . the way new Lux helps keep your skin so beautifully clear . . . and most wonderful of all, how it keeps you bath-time sweet, bath-time fresh!

9 out of 10 Hollywood stars love new Lux. Glamorous Yvette Mimieux says: "There's nothing so lastingly refreshing as a Lux bath. Or more wonderful for helping to keep my skin beautifully clear!"

Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees you'll love new Lux—or money back!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 78

"Oh? And I suppose that makes me late. Well, don't worry. Your dinner will be on time."

With his hand he smoothed a grin from his face. "It's a darned good thing. That's why I rushed home: to eat."

Disdaining his levity, Joyce lifted her chin higher and said with acid courtesy, "Sit down and have a cup of coffee while I finish putting things away. Marketing took longer than usual."

He stood watching her as she poured the last of the coffee from an electric coffeepot. It didn't quite fill the cup. She unplugged the pot and set the coffee on the table. He waited until she turned away and then, grabbing her by the arms above the elbows, he kissed the back of her neck. (She had never slapped him, but he could never rid himself of the feeling that she might.) She shook off his hands and once more began to search among the groceries on the counter.

Peter sat down and tasted the coffee. He winced, replaced the cup in the saucer, and pushed it away. "The bleach," he said, "is in the refrigerator."

She mastered a startled expression, glanced at him with displeasure and, as if condescending to a tiresome half-wit, she opened the refrigerator, removed the bottle of bleach and put it away under the sink.

As a safeguard, Peter put his hand over his mouth and went on watching her. At last everything had been put away except a box of drinking straws; she picked that up and looked at it. She glanced at the refrigerator, made and checked a movement toward the dish cupboard, looked at the breadbox and then, furiously, she snatched open the knife drawer, threw the straws among the knives and slammed the drawer shut.

Grim-faced, she flung herself into the chair opposite Peter and glared at the cup of coffee. She picked up the cup, took a sip, made a face and pushed it away.

"Children," she said sternly, "go out and play."

They paid no attention to her.

"Children!"

Still on all fours, they were growling, lying down to sleep, rousing suddenly to listen, alert and snoot-faced, at imagined noises. The dog was awake now, according to his eyebrows, and watched them contentedly.

"Children!" Joyce spoke sharply.

"We're dogs," Flo said and growled elaborately.

"Dogs!" said Joyce.

"What?" All three of them answered her.

"Kindly go outside and play. I want to talk to your father."

Flo had lately advanced to the age of automatic argument. She sat back on her heels and calmly folded her hands. She said, "Well, he's your father too, isn't he?"

Joyce said shortly, "No. He's my husband."

"But he's not my husband," Flo said patiently, prepared to see it through. "He's my daddy, so how can ——"

"Flo, go outside with your brothers, and do it now."

Flo began crawling toward the door. "Well, they're your brothers too, aren't they?" she asked reasonably.

"No, stupid, we're not," Jimmy said.

"You are so brothers," Flo said. "Everybody says so. Even mommy."

Jimmy looked baffled. "Stupid!" he said.

"Take that dog with you." Joyce pointed at the dog. He raised his nose at her and wagged his tail.

"We're all dogs," Tommy said. "Come on, Curly. Here boy, come on."

"Here, Prince, here, Prince," Jimmy called.

"Come on, Susan," Flo called. "Come on, boy."

"What," Peter asked, "is the dog's name?"

"It's Prince," said Jimmy.

"It is not," Tommy said. "It's Curly."

"The dog's name," Flo stated, frowning fiercely, "is Susan."

"You can't name him Susan," Jimmy said to Flo. "He's a boy."

"Ha, ha, stupid," Flo said triumphantly. "He is not a boy. He's a dog!"

"Go," Joyce said with dangerous quiet. "Now."

Tommy whined and pawed at the door. Peter reached over and opened it and, when the four dogs had filed out, closed it.

"Why can't they agree on a name?" Peter asked.

"Why can't they agree on anything?"

"Well, to save an argument, you could name him."

"Why should I?" she snapped. She was sitting with her chin propped on her fists, looking, he thought, much like Flo. The same fierce frown. "He's not my dog."

He decided to draw her fire, just a short volley, to see where it would come from. He said quietly, somewhat confidentially, "Joyce, if you will clear up just one small point for me, I'll—uh—apprcciate it."

"Well, what is it?"

"Are you mad at me or Joe?"

"Joe? Joe who?"

"The dog."

Her eyes ignited and she drew a deep breath, held it, and said between her teeth, "This has been a perfectly horrible week."

He relaxed a little, just a little, and said in a voice he hoped was noncommittal without being unsympathetic, "H'm. Tough week, eh?"

But she only nodded grimly and was s

He drummed his fingers on the table stopped abruptly when he saw her t

"Well," he said. "H'm."

Silence.

He sighed. "All right," he said, "I giv What happened this week?"

"Haven't you been around?" she snap

He looked at her steadily for a mi "No," he said, "except to eat and sleep. rest of the time I've been loafing aroun office, neglecting my family. And tonight going out and blow my pay check on b and women. As usual," he added.

It worked.

"For one thing," she said furiously, "it rained and rained and rained. And a r is lodged in the clothes dryer and I've got laundry piled up to the ceiling. And Jir has entered the second-grade poster cor about good health habits or something a can't convince him that he might not win his heart is set on it. And Tommy found a of praying-mantis eggs on Monday and lo And do you know where he lost it? Under radiator in his bedroom and it's hatched. Tl are about ninety million tiny praying mant creeping around the room! And on top that, the dog came! That ridiculous, hairy dog who sits around giving me sneaky lo from under his eyebrows and flopping his tail at me."

When she stopped for a gulp of bre Peter said, "I thought you were going to t phone the pound."

"Oh, you did. You thought, did you! N that was a contribution! It happens that I phone the pound. Today."

GENIUS: a promontory jutting out into the future.
VICTOR HUGO

"Well?"

"Nobody had reported him missing," said shortly, not looking at him.

"Yes. Well?"

"They—they said they'd take him off hands," she finished quickly, tensely rega ing the coffee cup. "I said I'd call them bacl

Peter considered a moment. "You do want to locate a possible owner before they ah—'take him off your hands'?"

"Locate!" She stared at him as though had lost his mind. "Locate? If we can't affc to keep a dog, as you have so often point out—and goodness knows it costs lit enough—how can we possibly afford to r ads in every newspaper in the state trying locate an owner for a stray dog? I think," s added, "you must be crazy."

"All right. All right," he said soothing "Did you call them back and tell them come get the ——"

She interrupted him furiously. "What you think I do all day? Sit around the tel phone chatting interminably with long-wind dogcatchers? Why do you think I'm late wi marketing and late with supper and la with . . . everything? With everything that happened this week and all I've got to do, haven't time to turn around! You and yo eight-hour day! And your five-day week! Ar furthermore," she plunged on, "if that smar aleck little car of yours had the exhaust pi in the right place, it wouldn't get itself smashe every time I back into a curb!"

He felt the quake of uncontrolled mirt begin inside him. He clamped his teeth t gether for a minute and said softly, "Joyc you didn't. Not again."

"I did!" she said. "On Wednesday."

"Why didn't you tell me?"

"Why didn't you notice?" she said. "Any way, I knew you'd be perfectly furious."

He shook a little, but frowned and said "Well, I am. I'm mad as ——"

"Well, you're not as mad as I am," sh yelled, and just as he exploded into a shout c laughter she burst into tears.

She jumped up from her chair, sobbing, an he followed her, wondering why, when woman cries in the kitchen, she always goe to the sink. As soon as he put his arms aroun

What every baby dreams of—going "bye-bye"... saving Mommy money, too!

50¢ BACK ON

Chux
DISPOSABLE DIAPERS
The all-in-one disposable—water-proof back, no panty needed.

or

Chix
disposable pads
Use with Chix Waterproof Panty—no pins necessary . . . exclusive inside straps hold Pad securely.

Here's how to get 50¢ back:

Cut product name from side-panel of either Chux "Carry-Box" or Chix Disposable Pads box. Write your name and address on the back and send to Chux, P.O. Box 75A, Mount Vernon 10, N.Y. on or before Oct. 1, 1960. Limit 50¢ per customer.

Offer good in all 50 states. Subject to state and local regulations and not valid where restricted or forbidden by law.

MADE BY A Johnson & Johnson COMPANY

she dropped her hands from her face and d between his neck and shoulder. He ed a long, peaceful sigh.
Practically everything that's happened this k has happened before," he said presently, ing her ear and temple. "Except that con-nded dog."
That's just the trouble," she sobbed. "Evhing—evcrything—over and over. Your r little car. I'm so stupid."
Sh-h. Just cry," he murmured soothingly.
felt lightheaded with victory. Uncondial surrender! And he hadn't fired a shot.
the sobs and sniffs thinned out, he said,
w listen, swectie. After a while I'll get se bugs upstairs with the vacuum cleaner;
e aren't many in one egg case—less than undred. After dinner I'll take the wet hes to that place downtown and have m dried. And I'll call the repairman for the er and I'll have a talk with Jimmy about tests. Monday I'll leave the car at the shop n I catch the train and pick it up that
t. And I'll attend to the dog."
Oh Pete, stop being so nice."
Now sit down and read the paper or some-ng, and, if you'll let me, I'll cook supper."
Darling." She hugged him. "I wouldn't k of it. You're tired; and anyhow, you uldn't want to outrage a good sirloin k, would you?"
Peter considered. "Frankly, I wouldn't."
"You read the paper," she said and kissed mouth, "and I'll hurry dinner. You must starved. And while the potatoes are getting art, I'll run up and swoosh up those bugs;
cleaner's upstairs so it won't take a minute.
I could think of before was bug spray and re out of it."
When she had lit the oven, she dumped ne potatoes in the sink and began scrubbing
m. "Pete, don't worry about Jimmy. I've ked to him about doing his best and letting o at that, and he just needs time to let the a sink in."
"O.K., baby, if you think so."
She put the potatoes on the oven rack, set temperature and closed the oven door.
en she stood up and faced Peter.
"Pete"—she dropped her eyes—"I'm so ribly ashamed about the exhaust pipe. I omise you I'll never do it again. If I can lp it."
He suppressed a laugh and winked at her.
"orget it, baby. I told you I'll take care of it."
She looked horrified. "Oh, you mustn't! I d it and I'll get it fixed. I'll take it to the shop the morning when I go down to get the wash ied. And, incidentally, I've already called the pairman; he'll be here Tuesday." She started t of the kitchen but paused in the doorway.
By the way, you'd better mention disposing the dog to the children. Sort of explain it, u know." She smiled at him and hurried stairs.

It wasn't until she had snapped off the cuum cleaner that she was able to hear the rrible noise from below. She ran down-airs at full speed and rushed into the kitchen find the children clutching the dog and ying as if hearts and lungs might burst, hile the dog, after a frantic struggle to raise s head from out the encircling arms, conibuted a prolonged and blood-chilling howl.
When Flo caught sight of her mother she rieked, "Daddy's going to make the dogatcher steal Susan!"
"Don't let daddy send Prince to the pound," mmy wailed. "They'll kill him!"
Tommy was moaning, "Poor Curly, poor urly."
Pete, stricken, utterly defeated, stood with is back to the wall, trying hopelessly to make imself heard. "Kids, listen, kids, I didn't ean it, it's all a mistake. Kids, listen ——" Joyce fell on her knees and managed to ather all three children and the dog in her rms.
"Hush, all of you. Hush! Did you hear laddy? He says he is not going to send him
o the pound. He's going to stay right here;
e's our dog. He's our own little Timmy."
"Who? He's who? What's his name?"
"His name is Timmy," said Joyce.
"It is? Who told you? How do you know?"
"Because I just know," Joyce said con-dently. They had stopped crying and listened with interest. "I had a dog just like him once, long ago. He was all scraggly with only his nose showing and his name was Timmy." She took the dog's face in her hands and kissed the silky patch in front of one ear. "Yes, he was," she crooned absurdly. "He's just like my old Timmy."

"Timmy," the children cried delightedly and hugged him until he groaned.

"Yes, but daddy said ——" Tommy began loudly in new alarm.

"Sh-h!" Joyce said hurriedly, and rushed on: "You know perfectly well daddy wouldn't do such a thing and anyhow it was my idea and—and I changed my mind and I didn't mean it in the first place so just hush, all of you." Breathless, she sagged.

"That's right, kids. It was just for laughs," Peter said and looked at Joyce without humor. She gave him a desperate glance, colored deeply and looked at the floor.

"It's almost time for Lassie," Jimmy said, looking at the clock. "Hey, I bet Lassie is Timmy's favorite TV program. Come on, Timmy."

They left her abruptly. Still kneeling on the floor, she eased off her knees and sat. She sighed wearily.

Peter sat down on the floor in front of her.

"Look at me," he said. "If you can."

"I can't," she said, gazing steadfastly into a corner. "I loved him from the minute I saw him."

He gave her a long, speculative stare. "That was some maneuver, sweetie!" His shoulders shook with profound, silent laughter.

"Pete," she said, "you're terribly nice."

"Think so? I don't know," he said, shaking his head. "I don't know what I am. There may not even be a word for it. But whatever I am, I seem to be working out all right. All I need," he said, taking her chin in his hand, "is a little expert help."

Quickly he kissed her. It wasn't the time to laugh. END

Fresh Cream Deodorant lasts and lasts and lasts!

No wilting with wonderful Fresh . . . the cream deodorant with a "Perfect Balance" of gentleness and effectiveness. Fresh Cream pampers your delicate skin, yet protects you because it's a deodorant and an anti-perspirant, too!

there's nothing fresher than Fresh

HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!

Midsummer Additions

For warm summery days now and the many on the way, Mollie Farnham, Barbara J., looks pretty and cool. She adds easy-to-wear and easy-to-care-for cottons which add up to a minimum of fashion $'s. Mollie makes three new additions to her wardrobe, and the total for all is less than $20.00. Taken separately, any one of them would be a cool morale booster for a midsummer's day. By BET HART

© VOGUE

For early morning or to slip into before bedtime, Mollie chooses an aqua cotton peignoir. The tiny, almost nothing-of-a-sleeve and yoke are in white eyelet. $7.95.

Mollie adds a turquoise bow to the peignoir. The matching ribbon goes through the side seams and ties at the front to make a pretty waistline.

PEIGNOIR BY EVELYN PEARSON

Mollie's first addition: a blue-and-white-striped sleeveless cotton that wraps to the back and ties. The apron effect is in a gaily printed chintz. Both this and the pretty neckline are outlined with blue rickrack. Price of first investment, $7.95.

The coolest addition colorwise: lemon-yellow cotton. For easy July sewing, Mollie chooses Vogue's "Easy to Make" Design No. 5044.* For a summer's evening, she adds white jewelry and gloves, black patent belt and shoes. Dress to make costs Mollie $2.90.

*For other views, sizes and price, see page 1

Another day, she can accessorize with two additions from last month: her denim play shoes, gold-and-white pin. She adds a white scarf at the waistline.

WRAPAROUND BY JACK NACHMAN

"TECNIQUE Color-Tone"

All the ease and gentleness of a fine color rinse...but look, it lasts up to 8 weeks! Blends naturally...no drastic change, no artificial look!

EVER BEFORE, a hair color with rinse mildness plus long-lasting venience; it conditions, too! Tecnique ly touches your hair with high- ts, and accents its natural color . no drastic change, only new uty. Always your own color is re. But unlike a rinse, Tecnique tly penetrates hair to last up to eeks, often longer.

TOUCH-UP PROBLEM, won't sham- out, streak or rub off. Tecnique, ike ordinary rinses, tints and s, never looks less than beauti- fully natural. Exclusive ACTOGEN, a mild creaming agent, works color into individual hair strands instead of just coating the surface. Tecnique also blends in with new hair growth —never a tell-tale "dye line."

TECNIQUE WILL:	TECNIQUE WON'T:
• Highlight, accent natural hair color.	• Need touch-ups (never a "dye line").
• Last up to 8 weeks, often longer.	• Harm hair or add unnatural color.
• Condition hair with fine oils.	• Wash out, streak or rub off.

CONDITIONS, TOO . . . fine oils add luster, make your hair soft to the touch and easy to manage. Apply Tecnique any time . . . even right after a permanent . . . use it for years and never see hair go harsh.

ADDS THE ACCENT your hair needs for true natural beauty—the just-right dash of auburn, spicy brown or glowing gold. Shampoo-simple, you can't make a mistake, color action stops automatically. 12 shades to choose from . . . at all leading drug and department stores (also available as a moderately-priced salon service). Satisfaction guaranteed. SHULTON, 630 5th Ave., NYC. Price 2.00 plus tax.

"TECNIQUE Color-Tone"

. . . a glimmer . . . a gleam . . .
soft color glows in your hair

ARE YOU A PIONEER?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 67

HAVE YOU GOT THE FRONTIER SPIRIT?

Wernher von Braun, our foremost missile expert, looks on the conquest of space as the new frontier for young Americans. But he recently said he was "profoundly worried as to what has happened to the American frontier spirit." Now I don't think anybody's questioning our courage or daring. What seems challenged is our ability to face sacrifices or hardships in order to keep in the space race. In other words, are we too soft to care?

The question was put to students at Pierce Junior College in Southern California this way: "Do you think the present generation is too materialistic?" Sally Loeffler, a pretty coed, said, "Yes . . . it is a terrible thing to discover that we spend more time collecting and redeeming Blue Chip stamps than we do in prayer." A negative answer from another student was, "I can't see anything wrong with my mother using an automatic washer rather than a bar of soap and a scrub board. So what's wrong with stereo, a car, a TV set, nice clothes, and so on?" But Sally makes a good point. I'd say there is absolutely nothing wrong with stamp collecting or TV, but it's a question of the order of their importance on your scale of values. To have the true American pioneer spirit, you have to put God and prayer ahead of stamp collecting and your country ahead of television sets.

Did you ever wonder about the "Early Americans"? Who they really were? How they really felt? Well, I've got news for you. You're finding that out right now. Because we, you and I, are the "Early Americans."

I wish I'd thought that up myself, didn't. I heard Conrad Hilton, who pion $5000 from a little hotel in Texas to a w spanning hotel empire, say it. "We're a n in its youth," he said. He meant that France was 184 years old Charlemagne w even born; England at the same age hadn been swallowed up by the empire of J Caesar; at that point in Ireland's hi Saint Patrick was just driving the last sn out of old Erin.

To me, Uncle Sam is just in his teens someday I'm going to draw Uncle Sam see him. He probably won't look so wise distinguished as he does in top hat and but he'll look like a lusty young man, w is the way he appears in my mind. Some to me, Uncle Sam is still having growing p And you and I are growing up with him has all the vigor, stamina and imagina that you and I have, and no more. If we the spirit of "Early Americans," Uncle S be weakened by those modern viruses o difference and materialism.

Let's look at the record of how far w come—and how fast. It can inspire us to up the momentum. It can also show us s of the growing pains we've lived through some that still knot and ache.

The year the Pilgrims landed at Plym the estimated colonial population was 2 I pass that total population on the wa work in the morning. At about that time of culture took a dim view of the New W Samuel Purchas wrote, "America is younger brother, and hath . . . almost no heritance at all." Yet sixteen years after Pilgrim landing, Harvard College was foun and three years after that the first docun in English was printed in America. Tw years later, the estimated colonial popula in the New World was 27,947 and New Y City was already developing its unique sonality. On Manhattan Island there w twenty different nationalities and sects spe ing eighteen different languages. And tho there were as yet no Blue Chip stamps, N England wives were delighted when the p of shoes was regulated by law: "Five pe half penny a size for all plyne and woo heel'd shoes, and about seven pence half pe a size for well wrought 'French Falls.'"

Fifty years after the Pilgrim Fathers' rival teenagers were functioning normally thirty young men were arrested for wear their hair too long and an ordinance in Sale Massachusetts, regulating church attenda required "All ye boyes of ye towne are pointed to sitt upon ye three paire of sta in ye meetinghouse, and Wm. Lord is pointed to look after ye boyes upon ye p pitt stairs." Girls sat with their mothers. even then they were having trouble getti young people to go to church.

When the Declaration of Independen Uncle Sam's birth certificate, finally came. was first published in the Pennsylvania E ning Post under the title: "A Declaration the Representatives of the United States America, in General Congress Assemble The Post sold for "only 2 coppers" and t four-page paper devoted its entire front pa and the first column of the second page displaying our passport to freedom.

Twenty years before the Declaration of I dependence, there were over a milli colonists in America. When the peace trea was signed ending the Revolutionary W there were 2,781,000. On Uncle Sam's 184 birthday this year, there are 3,686,736 B Scouts alone in the United States. Son growing, yes?

The "younger brother" hath much inhe tance now. And to keep growing and gettin stronger and wiser and more mature, what required is that you and I keep alive the spir of "Early Americans." Are there any thin our forefathers did, whether they landed o the Mayflower, pioneered the West, came earl or late, whether they sacrificed, sweated offered their lives for our principles, are the any of these things that you and I couldn or wouldn't do? If there are, then Unc Sam's in bad shape. If not, then he's stron ready for anything including the conquest space; in fact, just entering the fullness manhood.

How does a mother know which Antiseptic is best for everyday cuts, burns, scrapes?

Among the hundreds of antiseptics sold today, Mycitracin, with its 3 powerful antibiotics, gives you a new way to guard against skin infection in minor cuts, burns and scrapes.

Nearly every day, a young mother has to treat minor cuts, burns and scrapes. At this point, she has a problem. If she uses tincture of iodine, it's so harsh it may burn tender tissue—if enough is used to destroy all the bacteria. Should she use mild solutions or salves? Better than nothing, of course, but often not effective.

What, then, should be done?

For best protection, follow these simple steps:

1. If the wound is serious or fails to heal, a doctor should be consulted.

2. Minor cuts and scrapes should always be washed with water and mild soap. Most bacteria will wash out with the dirt. (Do not wash a burn.)

3. After washing, apply a nonirritating antiseptic agent to fight bacteria and cover the wound with a sterile dressing. The modern antiseptic should be a non-burning ointment containing antibiotics powerful enough to destroy bacteria promptly. Mycitracin, Upjohn's sting-free antiseptic, is just such a product.

No single antibiotic destroys all bacteria. Mycitracin contains 3 antibiotics—Neomycin, Bacitracin and Polymyxin B. The antibacterial action of the three combine to give you greater protection. Neomycin, for example, destroys 20 of the 22 bacteria most likely to cause infection in skin injuries. Bacitracin and Polymyxin B are included to protect against those bacteria on which Neomycin has no effect. In this way, Mycitracin creates a zone free of infectious bacteria around the injury, and keeps it that way as long as it is applied.

The ointment base is important, too, since it keeps the antibiotics in contact with the injured area much longer than a liquid. Mothers also appreciate the fact that Mycitracin's ointment base is stainless, odorless. Its triple antibiotic strength . . . its sting-proof, soothing formula, makes this new antiseptic a must for your medicine chest.

Available only at your Pharmacy:

Mycitracin*

(My-si-tray'sin) *Trademark, Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

Medicine designed for health . . . produced with care. Upjohn

THE UPJOHN COMPANY, KALAMAZOO, MICHIGAN

OU HONESTLY KNOW

a little almost nothing
a very great deal about our form of government and the other forms that threaten it?

al-life drama enacted early this year in or high school in New Brunswick, New made a deep impression on me. You have read about it. A social-studies r, Ewing McKown, suddenly an- ed to a class of thirty seniors, "The s supreme." . . . "People over sixty- ust be exterminated for the good of the . . . "Anyone defending democracy in lass will be punished." . . . "A dictator- s the best political system, and the in- al is only an insignificant cog in the machine." The twenty-eight-year-old r allowed no one to smile, talk, cross n the classroom. The students stood at ion to recite, and if anyone differed in on with Mr. McKown, he had to copy for word editorials from local papers. w, this teacher hadn't tapped out men- "I was searching for some way to make arianism come alive, to show some of its ness." And so, when the class voted its val, they began a live experiment: tarianism practiced and propagandized American classroom. (Totalitarianism, e way, is the system in which govern- is boss—completely.) But at the end of weeks the class was in an uproar. Using informer" and "traitor" methods, the er set up a realistic spy system and even- one girl, according to Mr. McKown,

Of two evils, choose neither.
C. H. SPURGEON

n actually to believe her parents were ming on her. When Mr. McKown cli- d his performance by insisting that only state religion should be allowed, the vol- erupted. But this teacher had done his First, he taught thirty young Americans alue what they had formerly taken for ted, and, as one seventeen-year-old said, aught me how very little I really know it democracy."

ven if they don't use the ingenious tactics wing McKown, our schools, newspapers, azines, every modern agency for com- ication, try to see that we know "a very t deal" about our form of government—only because we've got the greatest, but use you've got to know about it. You're t's you!

he difficulty with us, when we find we w only a little about democracy, is that igh the facts are shouted to us from every rter, we have to supply the listening ear the imagination.

o you see that though the word "freedom" lies the right to "volunteer" as those won- ul marching folk I saw in the Memorial parade had done, it also implies the right it back and "let George do it"—and that ough of us relaxed into this attitude Uncle would lose his hands and feet, his heart brain?

Ve all know that George Washington had adventure with an ax and a cherry tree. We w him as the Father of our Country, the who stood up in a rowboat crossing the aware; but do you know what he said be- signing the Constitution, which the great glishman, Gladstone, said was "the most nderful work ever struck off at a given time the brain and purpose of man"? Conven- President Washington said, "Let us e a standard to which the wise and honest repair; the rest is in the hands of God."

You and I hold up that standard—a Con- ution that proposes to "form a more per- t union, establish justice, insure domestic nquility, provide for the common defense, omote the general welfare, and secure the ssings of liberty." Wow! What an order! ere I go running that fever again! Thrills d chills! How's your temperature?

As far back as the landing of the Mayflower, William Bradford wrote of its passengers: "They knew they were Pilgrims . . . so they committed themselves to the will of God and resolved to proceed," from which statement they drew their title "Pilgrim Fathers" as well as leaving us a record of the source of their strength. As recently as three hours ago when I paid for a fresh haircut I "committed" our country to God, because it says on every coin in my pocket, on the dollar bills you or I spend, "In God We Trust."

Mr. McKown's social-science class boiled but didn't explode until his pretend propaganda stepped on the students' freedom to worship. President Calvin Coolidge once said, "Our government rests upon religion. It is from that source that we derive our reverence for truth and justice, for equality and liberty, and for the rights of mankind. Unless the people believe in these principles, they cannot believe in our government." When our Presidents take the oath of office, they place their hand upon some particular verse or chapter of the Bible, and in doing so seem to say in effect what Coolidge stated above—and what I think Sally Loeffler was trying to say. It would be a blessing for all young America if we remembered those two words, "God and liberty," because they are inseparable.

Now for the fourth and last question:

AM I A GOOD AMERICAN?

This is the million-dollar question that you and only you can answer. I hope you are. If you, in your heart of hearts, can give a big yes to this, it's the best present you could give your Uncle Sam and 179,999,999 other Americans, including yours truly, on his 184th birthday.

And if enough of you do answer yes, then I can go on singing "Happy birthday to us" for years, and years, and years to come.

END

HELP RINSE WASH 'N' WEARS WRINKLE-FREE

SMOOTH AND SOFT! NuSoft Fabric Softener rinses wash 'n' wears so smooth some need no ironing at all...all ironing is speeded! And your laundry's so fluffy-soft!

CONCENTRATED TO GO 4 TIMES AS FAR AS SOME DILUTED PRODUCTS!

One bottle capful (1 ounce) of NuSoft® softens a whole washload. Other brands take up to a full ½ cup—(4 ounces)!

NuSoft is concentrated by a special, scientific process. With some diluted products you pay more because you use more! Thrifty NuSoft costs about 3¢ a washload. You pay up to 6¢ a washload for diluted rinses.

SAVE WITH BLUE NuSOFT—IT'S CONCENTRATED!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

NOW IN NEW LARGE SIZE, TOO!
Softens 32 washloads—saves you more money than ever!

THE MISTRESS OF MELLYN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 68

master 'ull be reeeiving the guests at eight. That's how it always was. And don't 'ee forget—'tis but buffet supper at nine, so there's a long time to go afore you get more to eat. Are you sure you wouldn't like something more than that there piece of fuggan?"

I was sure I was going to find it diffieult to eat what she had brought, so I said, "This is quite enough, Daisy."

"Well, 'tis for you to say, Miss."

She stood at the door a moment, her head on one side, watching me. Was she regarding me with a new interest?

I pictured them in the servants' hall, Tapperty leading the conversation. Were they wondering what new relationship had begun—or was about to begin—between the master of the house and the governess?

I was at the ball in Phillida's green dress with the tight, low-eut bodiee and the billowing skirt. I had dressed my hair differently, piling it high on my head. It was necessary to do so in order to do justice to the comb. On my dress sparkled the diamond brooeh.

I was happy. I had waited until the ballroom was full before I went down. Then I could best mingle with the guests. I had been there only a few minutes when Peter was at my elbow.

"You look dazzling," he said.

"Thank you. I am glad to surprise you."

"I'm not in the least surprised. I always knew how you could look, given the chance."

"You always know how to pay the compliment."

"To you I always say what I mean. One thing I have not yet said to you, and that is 'A happy Christmas.'"

"Thank you. I wish you the same."

"Let us make it so for eaeh other. I have brought no gift for you."

"But why should you?"

"Because it is Christmas, and a pleasant custom for friends to exchange gifts."

"But not for ——"

"Please—please; no reminders of governessing tonight. One day I am going to give you Jacinth, you know. She is meant for you. I see Connan is about to open the ball. Will you partner me?"

"Thank you, yes."

"It's the traditional dance, you know."

"I don't know it."

"It's easy. You only have to follow me." He began humming the tune to me. "Haven't you seen it done before?"

"Yes, through the peep in the solarium at the last ball."

"Ah, that last ball! We danced together. But Connan eut in, didn't he?"

"It was somewhat uneonventional."

"Very, for our governess. I'm really rather surprised at her."

The music had begun and Connan was walking into the eenter of the hall, holding Celestine by the hand. To my horror I realized that Peter and I would have to join them and dance those first bars with them.

I tried to hold back, but Peter had me firmly by the hand.

Celestine was surprised to see me, but if Connan was he gave no sign. I imagined that Celestine reasoned: It is all very well to ask the governess, as it is Christmas, but should she immediately thrust herself into such a prominent position? However, I believed her to be of too sweet a nature to show her astonishment after that first start of surprise. She gave me a warm smile.

I said, "I shouldn't be here. I don't really know the dance. I didn't realize ——"

"Follow us," said Connan.

"We'll look after you," echoed Peter.

And in a few seconds the others were falling in behind us.

Round the hall we went to the tune of The Furry Dance.

"You're doing excellently," said Connan with a smile as our hands touched.

"You will soon be a Cornishwoman," added Celestine.

"And why not?" demanded Peter. "Are we not the salt of the earth?"

"I am not sure that Miss Leigh thinks so," replied Connan.

"I am becoming very interested in all the customs of the country," I added.

"And in the inhabitants, I hope," whispered Peter.

We danced on. It was simple enough to learn, and when it was over I knew all the movements.

As the last bars were played I heard someone say, "Who is the striking-looking young woman who danced with Peter Nansellock?"

I waited for the answer to be, "Oh, that's the governess." But it was different: "I've no idea. She certainly is . . . unusual."

I was exultant. I doubt that I had ever been so happy in my life.

I knew that in the time to come I should treasure every minute of that wonderful evening, for I was not only at the ball, I was a success at the ball.

I did not lack partners. Even when I was forced to admit that I was the governess, I continued to receive the homage due to an attraetive woman. What had happened to change me? I wondered. Why couldn't I have been like this at Aunt Adelaide's parties? But if I had, I should never have eome to Mount Mellyn.

Then I knew why I had not been like this. It was not only the green dress, the amber

FLOOD PREVENTED

By JOHN P. PAWLEY

Johnny's playing;
Oops . . . he fell. . . .
He doesn't shed a tear.
It's not so much
That Johnny's brave:
He doesn't know I'm here!

eomb and the diamond brooeh; I was in love, and love is the greatest beautifier of all. Never mind if I was ridiculously, hopelessly in love. I was like Cinderella at the ball, determined to enjoy myself until the stroke of twelve.

A strange thing happened while I was dancing. I was with Sir Thomas Treslyn, who turned out to be a courteous old gentleman, a little wheezy during the danee, so I suggested that he might prefer to sit out the rest of it. He was very grateful and I felt quite fond of him. I was ready to be fond of everyone on that night.

He said, "I'm getting a little too old for the dance, Miss—er ——"

"Leigh," I said. "Miss Leigh. I'm the governess here, Sir Thomas."

"Oh, indeed," he said. "I was going to say, Miss Leigh, it is extremely kind of you to think of my comfort when you must be longing to danee."

"I'm quite happy to sit for a while."

"I see that you are kind as well as very attractive."

I remembered Phillida's instructions and accepted the compliments nonchalantly as though I had been accustomed to them all my life.

He was relaxed and confidential. "It's my wife who likes to come to these affairs. She has so much vitality."

"Ah, yes," I said, "she is very beautiful."

I had noticed her, of course, the very moment I entered the ballroom. She was in pale mauve chiffon over an underskirt of green; she evidently had a passion for chiffon and such clinging materials, and it was understandable, considering her figure. She wore quantities of diamonds. The mauve toning down the green was exquisite and I wondered whether my own vivid emerald was not a little blatant compared with hers. She looked outstandingly beautiful, as she would in any assembly.

He nodded—a little sadly, I thought.

And as I sat talking, my eyes, wandering round the hall, went suddenly to the peep high in the wall, that star-shaped opening whieh merged so perfectly into the murals that none would have guessed it was there.

Someone was watehing the ball through the peep, but it was impossible to see who it was.

I thought, Of course it is Alvean. Did she not always watch the ball through the peep? Then I was suddenly startled, for as I was sitting there, I saw Alvean. I had forgotten that this was a speeial oeeasion—Christmas Day—and just as on such a day the governess might come to the ball, so might Alvean.

She was dressed in white muslin with a wide blue sash and I saw that she wore the silver whip pinned to the bodiee of her dress. All these things I noticed with half my attention. I looked swiftly up to the peep. The face, unrecognizable, indefinable, was still there.

Supper was served in the dining room and the puneh room. There was a buffet in both these rooms and guests helped themselves, for, according to custom, the servants on this day of days were having their own ball in their own hall.

I saw that these people who so rarely waited on themselves now found it quite good fun to do so. Piled on dishes were the results of all that kitchen activity: small pies of various kinds, called here pasties—not the enormous ones which were eaten frequently in the kitehen, but dainty ones; there were sliees of beef, and ehieken and fish of various deseriptions. There was a great bowl of hot punch; another of mulled wine; there were mead, whisky and sloe gin.

Peter Nansellock, with whom I had had the supper dance, led me into the punch room. Sir Thomas Treslyn was already there with Celestine, and Peter led me to the table at which they were sitting. "Leave it to me," he said. "I'll feed you all."

I said, "Allow me to help you."

"Nonsense," he replied, "you remain with Celeste. You're not the governess tonight, Miss Leigh; you're a lady like the rest of them. Don't forget it. Then no one else will."

But I was determined that I would not be waited on and insisted on going to the buffet with him.

"Pride," he murmured, slipping his hand through my arm. "Wasn't that the sin by which fell the angels?"

"It may have been ambition; I am not sure."

"Well, I'll warrant you're not without a dash of that either. Never mind. What will you eat? Perhaps it is as well you came. Our Cornish food often seems odd to you foreigners from the other side of the Tamar."

He began loading one of the trays whieh had been put there in readiness.

"Which sort of pie will you have? Giblet, squab, nattling or muggety? Ha, there's taddage too. I can reeommend the squab: layers of apple and baeon, onions and mutton and young pigeon. The most delicious Cornish fare."

"I'm ready to try it," I said.

"Miss Leigh," he went on, "Martha . . . has anyone ever told you that your eyes are like amber?"

"Yes," I answered.

"Has anyone ever told you you're beautiful?"

"No."

"Then that oversight should be and is rectified immediately."

I laughed and at that moment Connan came into the room with Lady Treslyn. She sat down with Celestine, and Connan came over to the buffet.

"I am enlightening Miss Leigh about our Cornish food. She doesn't know what a 'fair maid' is. Is that not odd, Con, seeing that she is one herself?"

Connan looked excited; his eyes, smiling into mine, were warm. He said, "Fair maid, Miss Leigh, is another name for pilchards served like this with oil and lemon." He took a fork and put some on two plates. "It is a corruption of the old Spanish fumado, and we always say here that it is food fit for a Spanish don."

"A relic, Miss Leigh," interrupted Peter, "of those days when the Spaniards raided our shores and took too great an interest in other kind of fair maid."

Alvean had eome in and was standing side me. I thought she looked tired.

"You should be in bed," I said.

"I'm hungry," she told me.

"After supper we'll go up."

She nodded and with sleepy pleasure piled food on a plate.

We sat round the table—Alvean, P Celestine, Sir Thomas, Connan and Treslyn.

It seemed like a dream that I shoul there. Aliee's brooch glittered on my d and I thought, Thus, two years ago, she have sat—as I am sitting now. Alvean, w not have been here then—she would been too young to have been allowe come—but apart from that and the fact t was in Alice's plaee, it must have been like other oeeasions. I wondered if any o others thought this.

I remembered the faee I had seen at peep, and what Alvean had said on the r of that other ball. I eould not remembe exact words, but I knew that it had been s thing about her mother's love of dancing how, if she came baek, she would come ball. Then Alvean had half hoped to see among the daneers. . . . What if she wat from another plaee? I thought of that gh solarium in moonlight and I said to my Whose face did I see at the peep?

Then I thought, Gilly! What if it were G It must have been Gilly. Who else could it been?

My attention was brought baek to group at the table when Connan said, "I you some more whisky, Tom." He rose went to the buffet. Lady Treslyn go quiekly and went to him. I found it difficu take my eyes from them. I thought how tinguished they looked—she in green-sh mauve draperies, the most beautiful wo at the ball, and he surely the most di guished of the men.

"I'll help you, Connan," she said a heard them laughing together.

"Look out," he said, "we're spilling it

They had their baeks to us, and as I wat I thought that with the slightest provocati could have burst into tears because n clearly saw the ridieulousness of my hop

She had slipped her arm through his as came back to the table. The intimate ge wounded me deeply. I suppose I had d too much of the mead—or metheglin, as ealled it. Mead. It was sueh a soft and g name. But the mead which was mad Mount Mellyn was very potent.

I said to myself eoldly, It is time you ret

As he gave the glass to Sir Thomas—emptied it with a speed whieh surprised n I noticed that there were smudges of sha under Alvean's eyes, and I said, "Alvean, look tired. You should be in bed."

"Poor child!" cried Celestine at onee. ", she only just recovering ——"

I rose. "I will take Alvean to bed now said. "Come along, Alvean."

She was half asleep already and made protest, but rose meekly to her feet.

"I will say good night to you all," I sai Peter rose. "We'll see you later," he sai

I did not answer. I was desperately tr not to look at Connan, for I felt he was aware of me; that he would never be a of anyone when Lady Treslyn was near.

"Au revoir," said Peter, and as the ot echoed the words absent-mindedly I went of the punch room, holding Alvean by hand.

I felt as Cinderella must have felt with striking of the midnight hour.

Alvean was asleep before I left her roo tried not to think of Connan and Lady Tre while I went to my room and lighted the dles on my dressing table. I looked attract there was no doubt of it. Then I said to self, Anyone looks attractive by candlelight

The diamonds winked back at me, a was immediately reminded of the face I seen at the peep.

On impulse I went down to the landing low my own. I could hear the shouts con

CONTINUED ON PAGE

A DRAMATIZED STORY THAT COULD HAPPEN TO YOU!

Do You Wonder What Makes You SO DARN TIRED?

Posed by professional model.

I used to feel weak and run-down from the moment I woke up in the morning to the time I tumbled into bed at night. Believe me, taking care of a home and family is a hard enough job even when you feel good. But trying to be a good mother and wife when you barely have the strength to move around would make any woman a wreck!

I found myself getting upset by almost everything. I became cross and irritable with the children. I'd start arguments with my husband over the smallest things. I finally decided to see our family doctor.

After examining me, the doctor explained that my tiredness and nervousness were caused by a lack of important vitamins and minerals in my diet. This deficiency, he explained, caused otherwise normally healthy men and women to feel run-down and irritable. To help correct my condition he recommended I add a good food supplement to my daily diet.

I sent away for a trial supply of Vitasafe High-Potency Capsules that I had seen advertised. In just a few weeks my energy came back. I felt like a new woman and was glad to continue with the Vitasafe Plan. If you feel tired, nervous and miserable, why not send for your trial supply by mailing the postcard today?

FREE 30 days supply High-Potency Capsules

LIPOTROPIC FACTORS, AMINO ACIDS, VITAMINS AND MINERALS

Safe, Nutritional Formula Containing 29 Proven Ingredients: Sodium Caseinate, Monopotassium Glutamate, Choline, Inositol, Rutin, Citrus Bioflavonoid, Liver, Lysine, 12 Vitamins (Including Blood-Building B12 and Folic Acid) Plus 9 Minerals

To prove to you the remarkable advantages of the Vitasafe Plan . . . we will send you, without charge, a 30-day free supply of high-potency VITASAFE C.F. CAPSULES so you can discover for yourself how much stronger, happier and peppier you may feel after a few days' trial! Just one of these capsules each day supplies your body with over twice the minimum adult daily requirements of Vitamins A, C, and D . . . five times the minimum adult daily requirement of Vitamin B-1 and the full concentration recommended by the Food and Nutrition Board of the National Research Council for the other four important vitamins! Each capsule contains the amazing Vitamin B-12 — one of the most remarkable nutrients science has yet discovered—a vitamin that actually helps strengthen your blood and nourish your body organs.

Sodium Caseinate, an important Amino Acid Complex containing 8 essential amino acids, is also included in Vitasafe Capsules. And to top off this exclusive formula, each capsule now brings you an important dosage of Citrus Bioflavonoid. This formula is so complete it is available nowhere else at this price!

WHY YOU MAY NEED THESE SAFE HIGH-POTENCY CAPSULES

As your own doctor will tell you, scientists have discovered that not only is a daily minimum of vitamins and minerals, in one form or another, absolutely indispensable for proper health . . . but some people actually need more than the average daily requirements established by the Food and Nutrition Board of the National Research Council. If you are a normally healthy person, but tire easily . . . if you work under pressure, subject to the stress of travel, worry and other strains, with resulting improper eating habits . . . then you may be one of the people who needs this extra supply of vitamins. In that case, VITASAFE C.F. CAPSULES may be "just what the doctor ordered" — because they contain the most frequently recommended food supplement formula for people in this category!

POTENCY AND PURITY GUARANTEED

There is no mystery to vitamin potency. As you probably know, the U.S. Government strictly controls each vitamin manufacturer and requires the exact quantity of each vitamin and mineral to be clearly stated on the label. This means that the purity of each ingredient, and the sanitary conditions of manufacture are carefully controlled for your protection! When you use VITASAFE C.F. CAPSULES you can be sure you're getting exactly what the label states . . . pure ingredients whose beneficial effects have been proven time and again!

HOW AMAZING PLAN SLASHES VITAMIN PRICES

With your free 30-day supply of Vitasafe High-Potency Capsules you will also receive complete details regarding the benefits of an amazing new Plan that provides you regularly with all the factory-fresh vitamins and minerals you will need. By participating in the Vitasafe Plan now you are never under any obligation! When you have received your first 30-day trial supply, simply take one VITASAFE Capsule every day to prove that this formula can help you as it is helping so many others. But you remain the sole judge. If you are not completely satisfied, and do not wish to receive any additional vitamins, simply let us know by writing us before the next monthly shipment — or you can use the handy instruction card we will provide — and no future shipments will be sent. Yes, you are under no purchase obligation ever; you may cancel future shipments at any time!

But if you are delighted — as so many people already are — you don't do a thing and you will continue to receive fresh, additional shipments regularly every month — for just as long as you wish, automatically and on time — at the low Plan rate of only $2.78 plus a few cents shipping for each full month supply. You take no risk whatsoever — you may drop out of this Plan any time you wish without spending an extra penny, by simply notifying us of your decision a few days before your next monthly shipment. Take advantage of our generous offer! Mail postcard NOW.

WOMEN RECEIVE IN EACH DAILY VITASAFE CAPSULE:

Choline Bitartrate	30 mg.	Vitamin B_2	2 mg.
Inositol	10 mg.	Vitamin B_6	0.5 mg.
Rutin	8 mg.	Vitamin B_{12}	3 mcg.
Sodium Caseinate (18 Amino Acids)	50 mg.	Niacinamide	25 mg.
Monopotassium Glutamate	20 mg.	Calcium Pantothenate	4 mg.
Lemon Bioflavonoid Complex	5 mg.	Vitamin E	3 I.U.
Liver	10 mg.	Folic Acid	0.3 mg.
l-Lysine Monohydrochloride	7 mg.	Calcium	50 mg.
Vitamin K	0.05 mg.	Phosphorus	39 mg.
Vitamin A	12,500 USP Units	Iron	30 mg.
Vitamin D	1,000 USP Units	Copper	0.45 mg.
Vitamin C	100 mg.	Manganese	0.5 mg.
Vitamin B_1	5 mg.	Potassium	2 mg.
		Zinc	0.5 mg.
		Magnesium	3 mg.
		Sulfur	22 mg.

We invite you to compare the richness of this formula with any other vitamin and mineral preparation

ALSO AVAILABLE, A VITASAFE PLAN WITH A SLIGHTLY DIFFERENT FORMULA FOR MEN. CHECK POSTCARD IF DESIRED.

®"VITASAFE" REG. T. M. ©1958 VITASAFE CORP.

A VITASAFE PLAN FOR MEN

Men may also suffer from lack of pep, energy and vitality due to nutritional deficiency. If there is such a man in your house, you will do him a favor by bringing this announcement to his attention. Just have him check the "Men's Plan" box in the postcard.

REPLY FORM MISSING?

If so, just write us a letter saying, "I accept your no-risk offer as advertised," and mail it with your name and address to: Vitasafe Corp., Dept.98-N, 23 W. 61st St., New York 23, N. Y. Be sure to indicate whether you want the formula for the men's plan or the women's plan, and your capsules will be shipped promptly.

Mail Postcard To VITASAFE CORPORATION, 23 West 61st Street, New York 23, N.Y.

IN CANADA: 394 Symington Avenue, Toronto 9, Ontario

Advertisement

DO YOU HAVE CINDERELLA HANDS?

Hard-working hands needn't look it!

Simple care can keep yours always at their party best

By Ruth Miller

In case you hadn't guessed . . . we women spend about 31 hours a week on housework and 14 hours on dishwashing, according to recent statistics. So it's no wonder some of us have Cinderella hands. Dreary and work-worn just when we'd like them to look pretty and pampered. The trick is to steal a few moments a week from household upkeep for a little personal upkeep!

Dry, brittle nails? Aside from soaps and household detergents, or a faulty diet, one problem may be the polish remover you use. Some removers contain harmful ingredients that dry out your nails. Cutex Oily Polish Remover is guaranteed to contain no acetone or other harsh ingredients that can cause splitting nails and dry, unattractive cuticle. Besides, it's so easy to take off polish with Cutex Oily Polish Remover. Moisten a cotton ball with the Remover and hold it against the nail until the polish is softened . . . then wipe it off.

Rough, ragged cuticle? Trim off any hangnails, but don't cut the cuticle with a scissors. There's always the chance a careless snip may cause an injury that can become infected. And the more you cut your cuticle, the faster it grows. Instead, keep your cuticle well-groomed with Cutex Oily Cuticle Remover.

Work carefully around the cuticle with a cotton-tipped Cutex Orangewood Stick moistened in the Cuticle Remover. The gentle Cutex formula will float away dead tissue and leave the cuticle soft and perfectly shaped.

Set aside a convenient time every week to give yourself a complete manicure. Then your hands will always be ready for company or a party . . . without last-minute touchups. And you'll feel so confident of their loveliness . . . always!

For answers to your other hand-care problems, write for our helpful little booklet, "Beauty Treatment For Your Hands." Send your name and address to Northam Warren, Dept. E, New York, New York.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 86

from the servants' hall. So they were still merrymaking down there. The door to Gilly's room was ajar, and I went in. There was enough moonlight for me to see that the child was in her bed, but sitting up, awake.

"Gilly," I said.

"Madam!" she cried, and her voice was joyful "I knew you'd come tonight."

"Gilly, you know who this is." What had made me say such a foolish thing?

She nodded.

"I'm going to light your candle," I said, and I did so.

Her eyes regarded my face with that blank blue stare, and came to rest on the brooch. I sat on the edge of the bed. I knew that when I had first come in she had thought I was someone else.

She was contented, though, which showed the confidence she was beginning to feel in me.

I touched the brooch and said, "Once it was Mrs. TreMellyn's."

She smiled and nodded.

I said, "You spoke when I came in. Why do you not speak to me now?"

She merely smiled.

"Gilly," I said, "were you at the peep in the solarium tonight? Were you watching the dancers?"

She nodded.

"Gilly, say 'Yes.'"

"Yes," said Gilly.

"You went up there all alone? You weren't afraid?"

She shook her head and smiled.

"You mean 'No,' don't you, Gilly? Say 'No.'"

"No."

"Why weren't you afraid?"

She opened her mouth and smiled. Then she said, "Not afraid because ——"

"Because?" I said eagerly.

"Because," she repeated.

"Gilly," I said, "were you alone up there?"

She smiled and I could get her to say no more.

After a while I kissed her and she returned my kiss. She was fond of me, I knew. I believed that in her mind she confused me with someone else, and I knew who that person was.

Back in my room, I did not want to take off my dress I felt that as long as I wore it I could still hope for what I knew to be impossible. So I sat by my window for an hour or so. It was a warm night and I was comfortable with my silk shawl about me.

I heard some of the guests coming out to their carriages. I heard the exchange of goodbys. And while I was there I heard Lady Treslyn's voice. Her voice was low and vibrant, but she spoke with such intensity that I caught every syllable and knew to whom she was speaking.

She said, "Connan, it can't be long now. It won't be long."

Next morning, when Kitty brought my hot water Daisy was with her. They wanted me to wake up quickly. They had exciting news; I saw that in their faces.

"Miss"—they were speaking together, both determined to be the one to impart the information—"last night—or rather this morning ——"

Then Kitty rushed on ahead of her sister: "Sir Thomas Treslyn was taken bad on the way home. He were dead when they got to Treslyn Hall."

I sat up in bed, looking from one excited face to the other.

One of the guests . . . dead! I was shocked. But this was no ordinary death. I realized, no less than Kitty and Daisy, what such news could mean to Mount Mellyn.

Sir Thomas Treslyn was buried on New Year's Day. During the preceding week gloom had settled on the house, and it was all the more noticeable because it followed on the heels of the Christmas festivities. All the decorations had been left about the house, and there was divided opinion as to which was the more unlucky—to remove them before Twelfth Night or to leave them up and thereby show a lack of respect

Connan was absent-minded. I saw very little of him, but when I did he seemed scarcely aware of my presence. I imagined he was considering all that this meant to him. If he and Lady Treslyn had been lovers, there was no obstacle now to their regularizing their union. I knew that this thought was in the minds of many, but no one spoke of it.

Mrs. Polgrey called me to her room and we had a cup of Earl Grey laced with a spoonful of the whisky I had given her.

"This is a shocking thing," she said. "Sir Thomas to die on Christmas Day as he did. Although 'tweren't Christmas Day but Boxing Day morning." she added in a slightly relieved tone, as though this made the situation a little less shocking. "And to think," she went on, "that ours was the last house he rested in, my food were the last that passed his lips! The funeral is a bit soon, do you not think, Miss?"

I began to count the days on my fingers. "Seven days," I said.

"They could have kept him longer, seeing it's winter."

"I suppose they feel that the sooner it's over, the sooner they'll recover from the shock."

She herself looked shocked indeed. I think she thought it was disrespectful or unlucky to suggest that anyone would want to recover quickly from grief.

"I don't know," she said. "You hear tales of people being buried alive. I remember years ago, when I was a child, there was a smallpox epidemic. People panicked and > Leave hate to those who are too weak to love.

>
> MICHEL DEL CASTILLO

buried quick. It was said that some was buried alive."

"There is surely no doubt that Sir Thomas is dead."

"Some seem dead and are not, after all. Still, seven days should be long enough to tell. You'll come to the funeral with me, Miss?"

"I?"

"But why not? I think we should show proper respect to the dead."

"I have no mourning clothes."

"My dear life, I'll find a bonnet for 'ee. I'll give 'ee a black band to sew on your cloak. Reckon that 'ud be all right if we was just at the grave."

So it was agreed that I should accompany Mrs. Polgrey to the churchyard.

I was present when Sir Thomas's body was lowered into the tomb. It was an impressive ceremony, for the funeral had been a magnificent one in accordance with the Treslyns' rank in the duchy. Crowds attended, but Mrs. Polgrey and I hovered only in the distance. I was glad of this; she deplored it.

It was enough for me to see the widow in flowing black draperies, yet looking as beautiful as she ever had. She moved with grace and she looked even more slender in black than in the brilliant colors I had seen her wear—intensely feminine and appealing.

Connan was there, and I thought how elegant and distinguished he looked. I tried to fathom the expression on his face. But he was determined to hide his feelings from the world; and I thought, in the circumstances, that was just as well.

I watched the hearse with the waving black plumes and I saw the coffin, carried by six pallbearers and covered with velvet palls of deep purple and black, taken into the church. I saw the banks of flowers and the mourners in their black, the only color being the white handkerchiefs which the women held to their eyes—and they had wide black borders.

A cold wind had swept the mists away and the winter sun shone brightly on the gilt of the coffin as it was lowered into the grave.

There was a deep silence in the churchyard, broken only by the sudden cry of gulls.

It was over and the mourners, Connan, Celestine and Peter among them, went back to their carriages, which wound their way to Treslyn Hall.

Mrs. Polgrey and I returned to Mount Mellyn, where she insisted on the usual cup of tea and its accompaniment.

We sat drinking, and her eyes glitt knew she was finding it difficult to restr tongue. But she said nothing of the eff death might have on us all at Mount M

Daisy and Kitty were less discreet.
they brought my water in the morning would linger. I was a little cunning, I ti longed to know what people were sayi did not want to ask, I managed to draw out without, I hoped, seeming to do so.
true they did not need a lot of encourage

"I saw Lady Treslyn yesterday," Dais me. "Her didn't look like a widow, in sp the weeds."

"Oh? In what way?"

"Don't 'ee ask me, Miss. She was quit and not smiling, but I could see someth her face—if you do get my meaning "

"I'm afraid I don't."

"Kit were with me. She said the same as though she were waiting and conten cause she wouldn't have to wait long. A though. Seems a long time to me."

"A year? What for?" I asked, altho knew very well what for.

Daisy looked at me and giggled. "'T do for them to be seeing too much of other for a bit, will it, Miss? After all dying here—almost on our doorstep. 'Tw seem as though they'd almost willed to it."

"Oh, Daisy, that's absurd. How could body?"

"Well, that's what you can't say til know, 'twould seem."

The conversation was getting danger dismissed her with, "I must hurry. I se rather late."

When she had gone, I thought, So th talk about them. They are saying he was to die. As long as that's all they say, that do much harm.

It was later that day, when I was in woods that I heard the sound of horses' h walking nearby and then I heard Lady Tr say, "Connan. Oh, Connan!"

They had met, then—and to meet as the house as this was surely foolish.

In the woods their voices carried. The hid me, but snatches of their conversa came to me.

"Linda! You shouldn't have come."

"I know—I know." Her voice fell a could not hear the rest.

"To send that message ——" That Connan I could hear him more clearly her, perhaps because I knew his voice so "Your messenger will have been seen by s of the servants. You know how they goss

"I know, but ——"

"When did this come?"

"This morning. I had to show it to you away."

"It's the first?"

"No, there was one two days ago. Th why I had to see you, Connan. No m what. I'm frightened."

"It's mischief," he said. "Ignore it."

"Read it," she cried. "Read it."

There was a short silence Then Con spoke. "I see. There's only one thing to done ——"

The horses had begun to move. In a seconds they might come past the spot whe was. I hurried away through the trees.

That day Connan left Mount Mellyn.

"Called away to Penzance," Mrs. Polg told me. "He said he was unsure how long would be away."

I wondered if his sudden departure had a thing to do with the disquieting news wh Lady Treslyn had brought that morning the woods.

Several days passed Alvean and I resun our lessons and Gilly, too, came to the sch room.

I would give Gilly some small task whi worked with Alvean, such as trying to m letters in a tray of sand, or on a slate, or cou ing beads on an abacus. She was contented do this and I believed that she was happy my company, that from me she drew a cert comfort which had its roots in security.

CONTINUED ON PAGE

NORTHAM WARREN, NEW YORK

ou'll be head-over-heels in love with the new fun ades by Cutex. Which to try first? You'll run out f fingers and toes before you decide! Because Cutex as lots of gay new polish colors you've never worn efore. And Summer is the time to try them. The me to experiment with mad, marvelous shades like Coral Sand" and "Capri Blue." The time to tip your es with Pearls and be a lovely sea siren. You're not the fashion swim until you try Cutex fun shades.

FUN SHADES
all the summery Pearl Polishes by CUTEX®

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 90

had trusted Alice and she was transferring that trust to me.

Alvean had rebelled at first, but I had pointed out the need to be kind to those less fortunate than ourselves, and at length she accepted Gilly's presence, although a little sullenly. But I had noticed that now and then she would glance at the child, and I was sure that, at least, she was interested in her.

Connan had been away a week and it was a cold February morning when Mrs. Polgrey came into the schoolroom. She said, "I have heard from the master. He wants you to take Miss Alvean down to Penzance at once. Here is a letter for you. No doubt he explains more fully in that."

She handed me the letter and I was afraid she would see that my hand shook a little as I opened it. I read:

My dear Miss Leigh: I shall be here for a few weeks and I am sure you will agree that it would be very desirable for Alvean to join me here. I do not think she should miss her lessons, so I am asking you to bring her and be prepared to stay for a week or so.

Perhaps you could be ready to leave tomorrow. Get Billy Trehay to drive you to the station for the 2:30 train.

CONNAN TREMELLYN.

My hair's gray— Now, I love it that way!

Wonderful things will happen the day you discover Come Alive Gray, Clairol's new miracle rinse. Like magic, you're beautifully gray! Takes just 2 to 5 minutes to rinse in glowing gray color that adds youthful radiance, banishes yellow, without purple or blue . . . and stays true till your next shampoo. Your hair is silky-soft, easy to manage, in wonderful condition! So rinse in new sparkle with Come Alive Gray®. You'll love it that way. At cosmetic counters and beauty salons.

Free offer! Send for new booklet—"10 Questions Most Asked By Women With Gray Hair." Write Dept. HJ-1, Clairol Incorporated, 666 Fifth Ave., N. Y. 19, N. Y.

Four Glamorous Shades—One Just For You!

White Sapphire®. . . adds a brilliant pearly glow to white and almost-white hair.

Silver Diamond®. . . polishes white and gray to gleaming silver.

Black Pearl®. . . adds sparkle as it evens tones of salt-and-pepper gray.

Midnight Opal®. . . adds lustre as it conceals gray with rich, smoky tones.

COME ALIVE GRAY

Made by CLAIROL, world leader in hair cosmetics

©1960 Clairol Incorporated, Stamford, Conn.

I knew that the color had rushed to my face. I hoped I had not betrayed the extreme joy which took possession of me.

I said, "Alvean, we are to join your father tomorrow."

Alvean leaped up and threw herself into my arms, a most unusual display, but it moved me deeply to realize how much she cared for him.

This helped me to regain my own composure. I said, "That is for tomorrow. Today we will continue with our lessons."

"But, Miss, there's our packing to do."

"We have this afternoon for that," I said primly. "Now, let us return to our work."

I turned to Mrs. Polgrey. "Yes," I said, "Mr. TreMellyn wishes me to take Alvean to him."

She nodded. I could see that she thought it very strange, and this was because he had never before shown such interest in the child.

"And you're leaving tomorrow?"

"Yes. Billy Trehay is to be given instructions to drive us to the station in time for the two-thirty train."

When she had gone I sat down in a daze. I could not concentrate any more than Alvean could. It was some time before I remembered Gilly. She was looking at me with that blank expression in her eyes which I had dreamed of banishing.

Gilly understood more than one realized. She knew that we were going away and that she would be left behind.

I could scarcely wait to begin my packing. Alvean and I had luncheon together in the schoolroom, but neither of us was interested in food, and immediately after the meal we went to our rooms to do the packing.

I had very little to pack. My gray and lavender dresses were clean, for which I was thankful, and I would wear my gray merino. It was not very becoming, but it would be too difficult to pack.

I took out the green silk dress which I had worn at the Christmas ball. Should I take it? Why not? I had rarely possessed anything so becoming, and there might be an occasion when I could wear it.

I took out my comb and shawl, stuck the comb in my hair and let the shawl fall negligently about my shoulders.

I thought of the Christmas ball—that moment when Peter had taken my hand and drawn me into the Furry Dance. I heard the tune in my head and began to dance, for the moment feeling I was in the ballroom and that it was Christmas Night again.

I had not heard Gilly come in, and I was startled to see her standing watching me. Really, the child did move too silently about the house.

I stopped dancing, flushing with embarrassment to have been caught in such silly behavior. Gilly was regarding me solemnly.

She looked at the bag on my bed and the folded clothes beside it, and immediately my pleasure left me, for I understood that Gilly was going to be very unhappy if we went away.

I stooped down and put my arms about her. "It'll only be for a little while, Gilly."

She screwed her eyes up tightly and would not look at me.

"Gilly," I said, "listen. We'll soon be back."

She shook her head and I saw tears squeeze themselves out of her eyes.

"Then," I went on, "we'll have our lessons. You shall draw me more letters in the sand, and soon you will be writing your name."

But I could see that she refused to be comforted.

She tore herself from me and ran over to the bed and began pulling the things out of my trunk.

"No, Gilly, no," I said. I lifted her up in my arms and went to a chair. I sat for a while rocking her. I went on: "I'm coming back, you know, Gilly. It will seem as though I've never been away."

She spoke then: "You won't come back. She—she ——"

"Yes, Gilly, yes?"

"She . . . went."

For the moment I forgot even the fact that I was going to Connan, because I was certain now that Gilly knew something, and what knew might throw some light on the myst of Alice.

"Gilly," I said, "did she say good-by to y before she went?"

Gilly shook her head vehemently, an thought she was going to burst into tears.

"Gilly," I pleaded, "try to talk to me. Try tell me. . . . Did you see her go?"

Gilly threw herself at me and buried face against my bodice. I held her tenderly a moment, then looked into her face; but eyes were tightly shut.

She ran back to the bed and again started pull the things out of my trunk.

"No," she cried, "no . . . no."

Swiftly I went to her. "Look, Gilly," I sa "I'm coming back. I'll only be away a sh time."

"She stayed away!"

We were back at that point where started. She lifted her little face to mine a all the blankness had gone from the eyes; th were tragic.

I saw in that moment how much my care her had meant, and that it was impossible make her understand that if I went away was not forever. Alice had been kind to l and Alice had gone. Her experiences h taught her that that was the way of life.

A few days—a week in the life of Gilly would be like a year to most of us. I knew th that I could not leave Gilly behind.

Then I asked myself what Connan wo say if I arrived with both children.

I believed that I could explain my reaso However, I was not going to leave Gilly b hind. I could let Mrs. Polgrey know that

> A woman might as well propose: her husband will claim she did.
>
> E. W. HOWE

master expected the two children. She wo be pleased; she trusted Gilly with me, and s had been the first to admit that the child h improved since I had tried to help her.

"Gilly," I said, "I'm going away for a f days. Alvean and you are coming with me." kissed her upturned face. And I repeated, b cause she looked so bewildered, "You a coming with me. You'll like that, wo you?"

It was still some seconds before she und stood, and then she shut her eyes tightly a lowered her head; I saw she smiled. Th moved me more than any words could ha done.

I felt I was ready to brave Connan's d pleasure to bring such happiness to this po child.

The next morning we set out early. I sat the carriage with a child on either side of n and Billy Trehay in TreMellyn livery s jauntily in the driver's seat talking to t horses.

It was a bright sunny morning and there w a slight frost in the air which sparkled on t grass, and there was a thin layer of ice on t ponds and streams.

We rattled along at a good speed over t rough roads. The children were in high sp its; Alvean chattered a good deal, and Gil sat contentedly. I noticed that she clutched n skirt with one hand, and the gesture filled with tenderness for her. I was deeply aware my responsibility toward this child.

We were met at Penzance by a carria and then began the journey to Penlandsto It was growing dark when we turned into drive and I saw a house loom up before u There was a man in the porch with a lante who called out, "They be here. Run and t master. He did say to let him know the minu they did come."

We were a little stiff and both children we half asleep. I helped them down, and as turned I saw Connan standing beside me. could not see him very clearly in the dim ligh but I did know that he was very pleased. H took my hand and pressed it warmly.

CONTINUED ON PAGE

Now! A better-fitting napkin you can wear and forget!

Garden, work and play with a new kind of freedom. At long last, here's a feminine napkin you can wear and forget!

Fems feminine napkins fit better and absorb better. Long enough to fit securely—yet there's not an ounce of extra bulk.

Now your napkin stays put even under stress, thanks to the extra length of the tab ends. What a wonderful feeling of security!

Forget about stains. Wear your nicest things, knowing there's a protective safety-cushion to prevent accidents, whether you're seated or moving about.

Forget about shifting and binding. Better-fitting Fems feminine napkins are made to adjust to your body without discomfort.

Forget about chafing. Touch the chafe-free covering to the inside of your wrist, where your skin is extra sensitive. No wonder Fems bring welcome relief from chafing.

Fems absorb quickly. That's another protection against chafing. And both the covering and inner materials are designed to keep surfaces comfortably dry, even during the heaviest flow.

TRY THE NEW FEMS BELT. Its long-wearing elastic won't curl or cut. The slip-proof nylon clasp won't dig or break. Napkins attach easily and firmly. Next time, wear Fems feminine napkins with a Fems belt—and learn how freedom feels!

FEMS IS A TRADEMARK OF KIMBERLY-CLARK CORP.

The first thing a lady puts on...Fragrance by Avon

"AVON CALLING" at your home with the newest, the best in cosmetics and fragrances.

AVON BEAUTY DUST . . . applied with a luxurious lamb's wool puff to envelop you in fragrance. In beautiful refillable containers designed to complement each fragrance: Persian Wood, Here's My Heart and other Avon favorites.

AVON COLOGNE MISTS . . . Sprayed on in a glorious selection of distinctive fragrances. The newest — and already beloved by millions — Topaze! In new dressing table bottles, Avon's Cologne Mists give lasting pleasure.

What a lovely way to start the day—with fascinating fragrance by Avon!

© AVON cosmetics
RADIO CITY, NEW YORK

AVON COSMETICS FOR ALL THE FAMILY ARE BROUGHT TO YOUR HOME BY YOUR AVON REPRESENTATIVE

TINUED FROM PAGE 92

hen he said an astonishing thing: "I've anxious. I visualized all sorts of mishaps. hed I'd come and brought you here myhought, He means Alvean, of course. He is really talking to me. But he was facing me, miling, and I felt I had never been quite ppy in the whole of my life.

egan: "The children ——" smiled down at Alvean.

ello, papa," she said. "It's lovely to be with you."

laid a hand on her shoulder, and she ed up at him almost pleadingly, as though were asking him to kiss her. That, it ed, was asking too much.

merely said, "I'm glad you've come, Al-. You'll have some fun here."

ien I brought Gilly forward.

What ——" he began.

Ve couldn't leave Gilly behind," I said. u know you gave me your permission to n her."

hesitated for a moment. Then he looked e and laughed. I knew in that moment that was so pleased to see me—me, not the rs—that he would not have cared whom ought to Penlandstow with me as long as I myself.

was no wonder that, as I walked into e's old home, I felt as though I were en- g an enchanted place.

uring the next two weeks it seemed as if I left behind me the cold world of reality stepped into one of my own making, and everything I desired was to be mine.

rom the moment I arrived at Penlandstow nor I was treated not as a governess but guest. In a few days I had lost my sensi- y on this point, and when I had cast that I was like the high-spirited girl who had yed life in the country vicarage with her er and Phillida.

was given a pleasant room next to Al- n's, and when I asked that Gilly should be ncar me this was done.

enlandstow was a house of great charm ch had been built in the Elizabethan era. as almost as large as Mount Mellyn and asy to lose oneself in.

My room was large and there were padded dow seats upholstered in red velvet, and k red curtains. My bed was a four-poster g with silk embroidered curtains. The car- was of the same deep red, and this would e given warmth to the room even if there not been a log fire burning in the open te.

My bag was brought up and one of the ids proceeded to unpack while I stood by fire, watching the blue flames dart among logs.

he maid curtsied when she had laid my ngs on the bed, and asked if she might put m away. This was not the manner in which treat a governess, I thought. Kind and ndly as Daisy and Kitty had been when ame to Mellyn, they had not been ready to it on me like this.

said I would put my things away myself would like hot water to wash.

"There be a little bathroom at the end of the ding, miss," I was told. "Shall I show it to and bring 'ee hot water up there?"

I was taken along to the room in which ere was a big bath; there was also a hip bath. "Miss Alice had the room done afore her rried and went away," I was told; and th a little shock I remembered that I was in ice's old home.

When I had washed and changed my dress—ut on the lavender cotton—I went along to Alvean. She had fallen asleep on her bed, I left her. Gilly was also asleep in her room. d when I returned to my own the maid who d shown me the bathroom came in and said t Mr. TreMellyn had asked that, when I s ready, I would join him in the library.

I said I was ready then, and she took me to n.

"It is indeed pleasant to see you here, Miss igh," he said.

"It will be very agreeable for you to have ur daughter here ——" I began.

He interrupted with a smile. "I said it was pleasant to see you here, Miss Leigh. I meant exactly that."

I flushed. "That is kind of you. I have brought the children's lesson books ——"

"Let us give them a little holiday, shall we? Lessons I suppose there must be, if you say so, but need they sit at their desks all the time?"

"I think their lessons might be curtailed on an occasion like this."

He came and stood close to me. "Miss Leigh," he said, "you are delightful."

I drew back startled, and he went on: "I'm glad you came so promptly."

"Those were your orders."

"I did not mean to order, Miss Leigh. Merely to request."

"But ——" I began; and I was apprehensive because he seemed different from the man I had known. He was almost like a stranger—a stranger who fascinated me no less than that other Connan TreMellyn, a stranger who frightened me a little, for I was unsure of myself, unsure of my own emotions.

"I was so glad to escape," he said. "I thought you would be too."

"Escape—from what?"

"From the gloom of death. I hate death. It depresses me."

"You mean Sir Thomas. But ——"

"Oh, I know. A neighbor merely. But still it did depress me. I wanted to get away. I am so glad you have joined me—with Alvean and the other child."

I said on impulse, "I hope you did not think it was presumptuous of me to bring Gilly-flower. She would have been heartbroken if I had not brought her."

Then he said a thing which set my senses swimming: "I can understand her being heartbroken if she had to part from you."

I said quickly, "I suppose the children should have a meal of some sort. They are exhausted and sleeping now. But I do feel they need some refreshment before they go to bed. It has been a tiring day for them."

He waved a hand. "Order what you wish for them, Miss Leigh. And when you have seen to them, you and I will dine together."

I said, "Alvean dines with you, does she not?"

"She will be too tired tonight. We will have it alone."

So I ordered what I wanted for the children, and I dined with Connan in the winter parlor. It was a strange and exhilarating experience to dine with that man in candlelight. I kept telling myself that it could not be real. If ever anything was the stuff that dreams are made on, this was.

He talked a great deal. He told me about the house, how it had been built in the shape of an E as a compliment to the queen who had been reigning when it was built. He drew the shape to show me. "Two three-sided courtyards," he said, "and a projecting center block. We are in the central block now. The main feature is the hall, the staircase and the gallery, and these smaller rooms such as the winter parlor which, I think you will agree, is ideally suited for a small company."

I said I thought it was a delightful house, and how fortunate he was to possess two such magnificent places.

"Stone walls do not bring satisfaction, Miss Leigh. It is the life one lives within those walls which is of the greatest importance."

"Yet," I retaliated, "it is some comfort to have charming surroundings in which to live one's life."

"I agree. And I cannot tell you how glad I am that you find my homes so charming."

When we had eaten he took me to the library and asked if I would play a game of chess with him. I said I would be delighted.

We sat there in that beautiful room with its carved ceiling and thick-piled carpet, lighted by lamps the bowls of which were made of artistically painted china of Oriental origin. I was happier than I had ever dreamed I could be.

He had set out the ivory pieces on the board, and we played in silence.

It was a deep, contented silence, or so it seemed to me. I knew I should never forget the flickering firelight, the ticking of the gilded clock which looked as though it might have belonged to Louis XIV, as I watched Connan's strong lean fingers on the ivory pieces.

Once, as I frowned in concentration, I was conscious of his eyes fixed on me and, lifting mine suddenly, I met his gaze. It was of amusement, and yet of speculation. In that moment I thought, He has asked me here for a purpose. What is it? I felt a shiver of alarm, but I was too happy to entertain such feelings.

I moved my piece and he said, "Ah!" And then: "Miss Leigh, oh, my dear Miss Leigh, you have, I think, walked straight into the trap I have set for you."

"Oh—no!" I cried.

He had moved a knight which immediately menaced my king. I had forgotten that knight.

"I believe it is ——" he said. "Oh, no, not entirely. Check, Miss Leigh. But not checkmate."

I saw that I had allowed my attention to wander from the game. I sought hurriedly to save myself, but I could not. With every move the inevitable end was more obvious.

I heard his voice, gentle, full of laughter. "Checkmate, Miss Leigh."

I sat for a few seconds staring at the board. He said, "I took an unfair advantage. You were tired after the journey."

"Oh, no," I said quickly. "I suspect you are a better player than I am."

"I suspect," he replied, "that we are very well matched."

I retired to my room soon after that game. I went to bed and tried to sleep, but I couldn't. I was too happy. I kept going over in my mind his reception of me, our meal together, his words: "We are very well matched."

I even forgot that the house in which I now lay had been Alice's home—a fact which at one time would have seemed of the utmost interest; I forgot everything but that Connan had sent for me and, now that I was here, seemed so delighted.

The next day was as pleasant and unpredictable as the first. I did a few lessons with the children in the morning, and in the afternoon Connan took us for a drive. How different it was, riding in his carriage, from jogging along behind Tapperty or Billy Trehay.

He drove us to the coast and we saw St. Michael's Mount rising out of the water.

"One day," he said, "when the spring comes, I'll take you out there and you can see St. Michael's chair."

"Can we sit in it, papa?" asked Alvean.

"You can if you are prepared to risk a fall. You'll find your feet dangling over a drop of seventy feet or so. Nevertheless, many of your sex think it worth while."

"But why, papa, why?" demanded Alvean, who was always delighted when she had his undivided attention.

"Because," he went on, "there is an old saying that if a woman can sit in St. Michael's chair before her husband, she will be the master of the house."

Alvean laughed with pleasure and Gilly, whom I had insisted on bringing with us, stood there smiling.

Connan looked at me. "And you, Miss Leigh," he said, "would you think it worth while to try?"

I hesitated for a second, and then met his gaze boldly. "No, Mr. TreMellyn, I don't think I should."

"Then you would not desire to be the master in the house?"

"I do not think that either a husband or his wife should be master in that sense. I think they should work together, and if one has an opinion which he or she feels to be the only right one, he or she should adhere to it."

I flushed a little. I imagined how Phillida would smile if she heard that.

"Miss Leigh," said Connan, "your wisdom puts our foolish folklore to shame."

We drove back in the winter sunshine and I was happy.

I had been at Penlandstow a week, and was wondering how much longer this idyllic interlude could last, when Connan spoke to me of what was in his mind.

The children were in bed and Connan asked if I would join him in a game of chess in the library.

There I found him, the pieces set out on the board. The curtains had been drawn and the fire burned cheerfully in the great fireplace. He rose as I entered and I quickly slipped into my place opposite him.

He smiled and I thought his eyes took in every detail of my appearance, in a manner which I might have found offensive in anyone else.

I was about to move king's pawn when he said, "Miss Leigh, I did not ask you down here to play. There is something I have to say to you."

"Yes, Mr. TreMellyn?"

"I feel I have known you a very long time. You have made such a difference to us both—Alvean and myself. If you went away, we should miss you very much. I am certain that we should both want to ensure that you do not leave us."

I tried to look at him and failed because I was afraid he would read the hopes and fears in my eyes.

"Miss Leigh," he went on, "will you stay with us . . . always?"

"I—I don't understand. I . . . can't believe ——"

"I am asking you to marry me."

"But—but that is impossible."

"Why so, Miss Leigh?"

"Because—because it is so incongruous."

"Do you find me incongruous . . . repulsive? Do please be frank."

"I . . . no, indeed not! But I am the governess here ——"

"Precisely. That is what alarms me. Governesses sometimes leave their employment. It would be intolerable for me if you went away."

I felt I was choking with my emotions. I could not believe this was really happening. I remained silent; I dared not try to speak.

"I see that you hesitate, Miss Leigh."

"I am so surprised."

"Should I have prepared you for the shock?" His lips twitched slightly at the corner. "I am sorry, Miss Leigh. I thought I had managed to convey to you something of my feelings."

I tried to picture it all in those few seconds—myself going back to Mount Mellyn as the wife of the master, slipping from the role of governess to that of mistress of the house. Of course I would do it and in a few months they would forget that I had once been the governess. Whatever else I lacked, I had my dignity—perhaps a little too much of it, according to Phillida. But I should have thought that a proposal would have been made in a different way. He did not take my hand; he did

THE ELEVEN-YEAR-OLD GIRLS

By VIRGINIA LINTON

On sneakered feet they run
Across the hills of summer—
Their hair half long,
In pony tails and cowlicks—
They—not quite grown, but glowing—
All song and whistle mixed.

They live contained among themselves;
Giggles roam their language,
And they love horses,
And necklaces with lockets,
To say nothing of
Soft meadows, small animals,
And the jacks and candy tangled
With the mirrors in their pockets.

Built-In Comfort

Dr. Scholl's
ARCH-LIFT SANDALS

$10.95 PAIR

Molded Sole • BUILT-UP ARCH • Cupped Heel

You'd never believe a sandal could feel so good! The exclusive built-up arch, molded sole and cupped heel support and cradle your every step . . . make walking a real pleasure . . . prevent that 'letdown' feeling of ordinary sandals. Ideal for home, street or recreation. Adjustable straps. Finest quality leather.

WOMEN'S: Tan, Red, White, Black
MEN'S: Tan, Brown, Black

CHILDREN'S: Tan, Red, White from $7.95

Also Women's 1-Inch Heel

At all Dr. Scholl Foot Comfort Shops, leading Shoe & Dept. Stores. If not available locally, write Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Dept. 61J, Chicago, Ill.

CONSTIPATION Make You Weak?

No need to let constipation "get you down." To get the kind of relief that doesn't cause weakness, be sure to get Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets. Doesn't cause cramps. Contains ingredients that act to soften waste, stimulate intestines without causing upsetting digestive distress.

In clinical study Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets rated 71% better, on the average, than other laxatives tested. These included candy and chewing gum laxatives, so-called "liver" pills, a well-known bulk laxative, milk of magnesia and ordinary mineral oil.

So why look further? Get relief without distressing weakness. Ask for Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets today!

Stops Bad Breath INTERNALLY!

You Simply Can't Offend

No other method dares make this claim!

For quick, safe, sure, 'round-the-clock freedom from odors of strong food, alcoholic beverages, smoking, etc., take wonder-working, pleasant-tasting "ENNDS" Tablets containing the miracle extract, Daratol®

"ENNDS" act internally where sprays, mouthwashes, toothpastes simply can't reach. Can't upset the stomach. Trial size at Drug counters only 54¢.

"ENNDS"®

not touch me; he merely sat at the table watching me in an almost cool and calculating manner.

He went on: "Think of how much good this could bring to us all, my dear Miss Leigh. I have been so impressed by the manner in which you have helped Alvean. The child needs a mother. You would supply that need—admirably."

"Should two people marry for the sake of a child, do you think?"

"I am a most selfish man. I never would." He leaned forward and his eyes were alight with something I did not understand. "I would marry for my own satisfaction."

"Then ——" I began.

"I confess I was not considering Alvean alone. We are three people who could profit from this marriage. Alvean needs you. And I—I need you. Do you need us? Perhaps you are more self-sufficient than we are, but what will you do if you do not marry? You will go from post to post, and that is not a very pleasant life. When one is young, handsome and full of spirit, it is tolerable; but sprightly governesses become aging governesses."

I said acidly, "Do you suggest that I should enter into this marriage as an insurance against old age?"

"I suggest only that you do what your desires dictate, my dear Miss Leigh."

There was a short silence during which I felt an absurd desire to burst into tears. This was something I had longed for, but a proposal of marriage should have been an impassioned declaration, and I could not rid myself of the suspicion that there was something other than Connan's love for me which had inspired it.

"You put it on such a practical basis," I stammered. "I had not thought of marriage in that way."

His eyebrows lifted and he laughed, looking suddenly very gay. "How glad I am. I thought of you always as a practical person, so I was trying to put it in the manner in which I felt it would appeal to you most."

"Are you seriously asking me to marry you?"

"I doubt if I have ever been so serious in my life. What is your answer? Please do not keep me in suspense any longer."

I said I must have time to consider this.

"That is fair enough. You will tell me tomorrow?"

"Yes," I said. "I will tell you tomorrow."

I rose and went to the door. He was there before me. He laid his fingers on the door handle and I waited for him to open it, but he did no such thing. He stood with his back to the door and caught me in his arms.

He kissed me as I had never been kissed, never dreamed of being kissed; so that I knew that there was a life of the emotions of which I was totally ignorant. He kissed my eyelids, my nose, my cheeks, my mouth and my throat until he was breathless, and I was too.

Then he laughed. "Wait until the morning!" he mocked. "Do I look the sort of man who would wait until the morning? Do you think I am the sort of man who would marry for the sake of his daughter? No, Miss Leigh"—he mocked again—"my dear, dear Miss Leigh . . . I want to marry you because I don't want you to run away from me, because, since you came, I have thought of little else but you, and I am going on thinking of you all my life."

"Is this true?" I whispered. "Can this be true?"

"Martha!" he said. "What a stern name for such an adorable creature!"

I said, "My sister calls me Marty. My father did too."

"Marty," he said. "That sounds helpless, clinging . . . feminine. . . . You can be a Marty sometimes. For me you will be all three. Marty, Martha and Miss Leigh, my very dear Miss Leigh. You see, you are all three, and my dearest Marty would always betray Miss Leigh. I knew from her that you were interested in me. Far more interested than Miss Leigh would think proper. How enchanting! I shall marry not one woman but three!"

"Have I been so blatant?"

"Tremendously so—adorably so."

I knew that it was foolish to pretend. I gave myself up to his embrace, and it was wonderful beyond my imaginings.

At length I said, "I have a terrible feeling that I shall wake up in my bed at Mount Mellyn and find I have dreamed all this."

"Do you know," he said seriously, "I feel exactly the same."

"But it is so different for you. You can do as you will—go where you will—dependent on no one."

"I am independent no longer," he told me. "I depend on Marty, Martha, my dear Miss Leigh."

He spoke so seriously that I could have wept with tenderness. This is love! I thought. The emotion which carries one to the very heights of human experience. Because it can carry one so high, one is in continual danger of falling; and one must never forget the higher the delight, the more tragic the fall.

But this was not the moment to think of tragedy. I loved, and miraculously I was loved. I had no doubt in that library of Penlandstow that I was loved. For love such as this, one would be prepared to risk everything.

He put his hands on my shoulders and looked long into my face. He said, "We'll be happy, my darling. We'll be happier than either you or I ever dreamed possible."

I knew that we should be. All that had gone before would give us a finer appreciation of this joy we could bring each other.

"We should be practical," he said. "We should make our plans. When shall we marry? I do not like delay. I am the most impatient man alive, where my own pleasures are concerned. We will go home tomorrow, and there we will announce our engagement. No, not tomorrow—the day after. I have one or two little commitments here tomorrow. And as soon as we are home we will give a ball to announce our engagement. I think that in a month after that we should be setting out on our honeymoon. I suggest Italy, unless you have any other ideas?"

I sat with my hands clasped. I must have looked like an ecstatic schoolgirl.

"I wonder what they will think at Mount Mellyn."

"Who, the servants? You may be sure they have a pretty shrewd idea of the way things are; servants have, you know. They pic every little clue. You shiver. Are you cold

"No, only excited. I still believe I'm goi wake up in a moment."

"And you like the idea of Italy?"

"I would like the idea of the North Po some company."

"By which, my darling, I hope you n mine."

"That was my intention."

"My dear Miss Leigh," he said, "how I your astringent moods. They are goin make conversation throughout our lives s vigorating."

I had an idea then that he was making parisons between Alice and myself, and I ered again as I had when he had made tha mark about the servants.

"You are a little worried about the re tion of the news," he went on. "The ants . . . the countryside. Who cares? Do Of course you do not. Miss Leigh has much good sense for that. I am longing t Peter Nansellock that you are to be my To tell the truth, I have been somewhat ous of that young man."

"There was no need to be."

"Still, I was anxious. I had visions o persuading you to go to Australia with h

"There was no need for the slightest ap hension."

"Are you quite sure? He is very hands I believe."

"Perhaps he is. I did not notice."

"I could have killed him when he hac effrontery to offer you Jacinth."

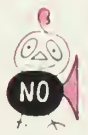
"I think he merely enjoys being outrag He probably knew I should not accept it."

"And I need not fear him?"

"You need never fear anyone," I told

Then once more I was in that embrace. I was oblivious of all but the fact that I discovered love and believed, as doub hosts of lovers have before, that there never love such as that between us two.

At length he said, "We'll go back the da ter tomorrow. We'll start making arrangem



CONTINUED ON PAG

By MUNRO LEAF

My! Oh, my! What a pest to have around a house. Just try living with a Me, Me Right Now for a while and it will drive you crazy. It does not care what anybody else wants to or has to do at any time. It just screams Me, me and Right now. This one hopping up and down and screeching at its mother is not only painfully impatient; it is downright selfish.

WERE YOU A ME-ME-RIGHT-NOW THIS MONTH?

Fragile...handle with Johnson's

You give your love in many ways...with cradling warmth
...unhurried care...and the gentleness of your touch.
You give it by surrounding every bath and change time with fragrance and softness...by cleansing your baby with pure, comforting oil
...by soothing your baby with the silkiest, softest powder.

You give it, always, in the happy moments of "Johnson's time."

Johnson & Johnson

Johnson & Johnson

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 96

immediately. In a month we'll be married. We'll put up the banns as soon as we return. We will have a ball to announce our engagement and invite all our neighbors to the wedding."

"I suppose it must be done in this way?"

"Tradition, my darling. It is one of the things we have to bow down to. You'll be magnificent, I know. You're not nervous?"

"Of your country neighbors, no."

"You and I will open the ball this time together, dearest Miss Leigh."

"Yes," I said; and I pictured myself in the green dress wearing the amber comb in my hair with the diamond horseshoe glittering on the green background. I had no qualms about taking my place in his circle.

Then he began to talk of Alice. "I have never told you," he said, "of my first marriage."

"No."

"It was not a happy one."

"I'm sorry."

"A marriage which was arranged. This time I shall marry my own choice. Only one who has suffered the first can realize the joy of the second. Dearest, I have not lived the life of a monk, I fear."

"I guessed it."

"I am a most sinful man, as you will discover."

"I am prepared for the worst."

"Alice—my wife—and I were most unsuited."

"Tell me about her."

"There is little to tell. She was a gentle creature, quiet, anxious to please. She seemed to have little spirit. I understood why. She was in love with someone else when she married me."

"The man she ran away with?" I asked.

He nodded. "Poor Alice! She chose not only the wrong husband but the wrong lover. There is little to choose between us—myself and Geoffrey Nansellock. We were of a kind. In the old days there was a tradition of the droit de seigneur in these parts. Geoffrey and I did our best to maintain that."

"You are telling me that you have enjoyed many love affairs."

"I am a dissolute, degenerate philanderer. I am going to say was. Because from this moment I am going to be faithful to one woman for the rest of my life. You do not look scornful or skeptical. Bless you for that. I mean it, dearest, I swear I mean it. It is because of those experiences of the past that I know the difference; this is love."

"Yes," I said slowly, "you and I will be faithful together because that is the only way we can prove to each other the depth and breadth of our love."

He took my hands and kissed them, and I had never known him so serious. "I love you," he said. "Remember that—always."

"I intend to."

"You may hear gossip."

"One does hear gossip," I admitted.

"You have heard of Alice and that Alvean is not my daughter? Oh, darling, someone told you and you do not want to betray the teller. Never mind. It is true. I could never love the child. In fact, I avoided the sight of her. She was an unpleasant reminder of much that I wished to forget. But when you came I felt differently. You made me see her as a lonely child, suffering from the sins of grown-up people. You see, you changed me, Marty dear. Your coming changed the whole household. That is what confirms me in my belief that with us it is going to be different from anything that has ever happened to me before."

"Connan, I want to make that child happy. I want to make her forget that there is a doubt as to her parentage. Let her be able to accept you as her father. It is what she needs."

"You will be a mother to her. Then I must be her father."

"We are going to be so happy, Connan."

"Can you see into the future?"

"I can see into ours, for our future is what we make it, and I intend that it shall be one of complete happiness."

"And what Miss Leigh decides shall be, will be. And you will promise me not to be hurt if you hear gossip about me?"

"You are thinking of Lady Treslyn, I know. She has been your mistress." The words seemed to come from my lips involuntarily. I was astonished that I could speak of such matters. Yet I had to know the truth, and so strong was my emotion that I seemed to have thrown all sense of propriety aside.

He nodded.

Then I said, "She will never be again. That is all over."

He kissed my hand. "Have I not sworn eternal fidelity?"

"But Connan," I said, "she is so beautiful and she will still be there."

"But I am in love," he answered, "for the first time in my life."

"And you were not in love with her?"

"Lust, passion," he answered, "they sometimes wear the guise of love; but when one meets true love one recognizes them for what they are. Dearest, let us start afresh from this day forth—you and I—for better, for worse ——"

I was in his arms again. "Connan," I said, "I am not dreaming, am I? Please say I am not dreaming."

It was late when I left him. I went to my room in a haze of happiness. I was afraid to sleep for fear I should wake up and find that it had all been a dream.

In the morning I went to Alvean's room and told her the news. For a few seconds a satisfied smile appeared at the corners of her mouth; then she assumed indifference, but it was too late. I knew that she was pleased.

"You'll stay with us all the time now, Miss," she said.

"Yes," I assured her.

"I wonder if I shall ever ride as well as you."

"Probably better. You'll be able to have more practice than I ever could."

Again that smile touched her lips. Then she was serious. "Miss," she said, "what shall I call you? You'll be my stepmother, won't you?"

"Yes, but you can call me what you like."

"Not Miss!"

"Well, hardly. I shan't be Miss any more."

"I expect I shall have to call you mamma." Her mouth hardened a little.

"If you do not like that, you could call me Martha in private. Or Marty. That's what my father and sister always called me."

"Marty," she repeated. "I like that. It sounds like a horse."

"What could be better praise!" I cried, and she regarded my amusement with continued seriousness.

I went to Gilly's room. "Gilly," I said, "I'm going to be Mrs. TreMellyn."

The blankness left the blue eyes and her smile was dazzling. Then she ran to me and buried her head in my bodice. I could feel her body shaking with laughter.

I could never be quite sure what was going on among all the shadowy vagueness of Gilly's mind, but I knew she was contented. She had bracketed me with Alice in her mind and I felt that she was less surprised than I or Alvean, or anyone else, would be. To Gilly it was the most natural thing in the world that I should take Alice's place. I believe that, from that moment, for Gilly I became Alice.

It was a merry journey home. We sang Cornish songs all the way to the station. I had never seen Connan so happy.

Alvean joined in the singing, so did Gilly; and it was astonishing to hear that child, who scarcely ever spoke, singing quietly as though to herself.

We sang "The Twelve Days of Christmas." Connan had a rich baritone voice which was very pleasant and I felt I had reached the very peak of happiness as he sang the first lines:

"The first day of Christmas my true love sent to me
A partridge in a pear tree."

We went through the song and I had difficulty in remembering all the gifts after the five gold rings; and we laughed hilariously while we argued as to how many maids there were amilking, and how many geese alaying were sent.

"But they were not very sensible things," said Alvean, "except of course the five gold rings. I think he was pretending he loved her more than he really did."

"But he was her true love," I protested.

"How could she be sure?" asked Alvean.

"Because he told her so," answered Connan.

"Then he ought to have given her something better than a partridge in a pear tree. I expect the partridge flew away and the pears were those hard ones which are used for stewing."

"You must not be hard on lovers," Connan cried. "All the world loves them, and you have to keep in step."

And so we laughed and bantered until we boarded the train.

Billy Trehay met us with the carriage and I was astonished when we reached the house, for I then realized that Connan must have sent a message to arrive before we did. He wanted me to be received with honors. Even so, I was unprepared for the reception which was waiting for us in the hall.

The servants were all there—the Polgrey and Tapperty families and others from the gardens and stables, and even the village boys and girls who came to help and whom I scarcely knew.

They were lined up ceremoniously, and Connan took my arm as we entered the hall.

"As you know," he said, "Miss Leigh has promised to marry me. In a few weeks' time she will be your mistress."

The men bowed and the women curtsied, but I was conscious, as I smiled and walked along the line with Connan, that there was a certain wariness in their eyes.

As I had guessed, they were not ready to accept me as mistress of the house . . . yet.

There was a big fire in my room and everything looked cozy and welcoming. Daisy brought my hot water. She was a little remote, I thought. She did not stop and chat as she had hitherto.

I thought, I will regain their confidence; but of course I had to remember that, as the future mistress of the house, I must not gossip as I once had.

I dined with Connan and Alvean and afterward I went up with Alvean; and when I had said good night to her I joined Connan in the library.

There were so many plans to make, and I gave myself up to the complete joy of contemplating the future.

He asked if I had written to my family, and I told him that I had not yet done so. I still could not quite believe this was really happening.

"Perhaps this token will help you to remember," he said. He took a jewel case from a drawer in the bureau and showed me a beautiful square-cut emerald set in diamonds.

"It's . . . quite beautiful, far too beau for me."

"Nothing is too beautiful for Martha Mellyn," he said, and he took my left h and put the ring on the third finger.

I held it out and stared at it. "I n thought to possess anything so lovely."

"It's the beginning of all the beau things I shall bring to you. It's the part in the pear tree, my darling."

Then he kissed my hand and I told m that, whenever I doubted the truth of all was happening to me, I could look at my erald and know I am not dreaming.

Next morning when I went down Con had gone out on business, and after I given Alvean and Gilly their lessons—f was eager that everything should go on as fore—I went to my room. I had not been t for more than a few minutes when there w discreet knock.

"Come in," I said; and Mrs. Polgrey tered. She looked a little furtive, and I k that something significant had happened.

"Miss Leigh," she said, "there will be th which we have to discuss. I was wonderin you would come to my room. I have the k on. Could you drink a cup of tea?"

I said I would like that. I was anxious there should be no difference in our relat ship, which, from my point of view, had alw been a very pleasant and dignified one.

In her room we drank tea. There was suggestion of whisky this time, and this cretly amused me, although I made no re ence to it. I should be the mistress of house, and it was very different for he know of the tea tippling than the mere erness.

She again congratulated me on my eng ment and told me how delighted she was. fact," she said, "the whole household is lighted." She asked then if I intended to m changes, and I answered that, while the ho hold was so efficiently run by herself, I sho make none at all.

This was a relief to her, I could see, and settled down to come to the point.

"While you've been away, Miss Le there's been a bit of excitement in these par

"Oh?" I said, feeling that we were now c ing to the reason for my visit.

"It's all along of the sudden death of Thomas Treslyn."

My heart had begun to leap in a disc certing manner. "But," I said, "he is bu now. We went to his funeral."

"Yes, yes. But that need not be the end, Leigh."

"I don't understand, Mrs. Polgrey."

"Well, there's been rumors—nasty mors—and letters have been sent."

"To—to whom?"

"To her, Miss Leigh—to the widow. An seems, to others—and as a result they're g to dig him up. There's going to be an ex ination."

"You mean . . . they suspect someone soned him?"

"Well, there's been these letters, you And him dying so sudden. What I don't is that he was here last. It's not the so thing one likes to have connected with house."

She was looking at me oddly. I thoug saw speculation in her eyes.

I saw again Connan and Lady Tresly the punch room together, their backs tow me—laughing together. Had Connan l me then? One would not have thought s thought of the words they had spoken in hearing when the party was over. "It will be long . . . now." She had said that—an him. And then there was the conversati had partly overheard in the woods.

What did this mean?

There was a question that hammered in brain. But I would not let my mind dwell o

I dared not. I could not bear to see all hopes of happiness shattered. I had to g believing, so I would not ask myself that q tion.

I looked expressionlessly into Mrs. grey's face.

"I thought you'd want to know," she

(To Be Concluded)

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE ISLAND

By SARA VAN ALSTYNE ALLEN

Before us the open sea widened.
The rocky islands
Rose from the waters,
Motionless, eternal.
There in the deep grass we stood.
Our hands brown with sun.
Holding the pink shells, the dark Cones we had gathered.
The wind we saw moving the Waters blew from a new star.
As we walked, as we spoke,
As the island grass
Bent with our coming.

Discover field-fresh flavor...

Sweet as sunlight, just tart enough to please – that's the special flavor of the great DEL MONTE Pineapple. It's pedigreed fruit, grown on our own plantations, harvested the sun-ripened moment it reaches perfection.

DEL MONTE Pineapple is quick-picked, quick-packed to bring you all the field-fresh flavor. When you want the best in pineapple, the best in food, choose DEL MONTE® – the brand that always puts flavor first.

JOURNAL ABOUT AFRICA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 39

saucers, trunks and suiteases neatly ranked in corners. In such rooms stands a high, wide ritual bed covered with pillows, laee, embroideries, unused exeept when the husband visits. Alone, the wife usually sleeps on a straw mat on the floor. The chief of the village of Dumbatta, near Kano, wearing violet and orange silk robes, reeeived us in his patterned stucco (adobe) house with many courtyards, served us bottled orange drink from the kerosene refrigerator standing in his living room with canvas garden furniture and rich Oriental ru showed us the quarters where his beautiful, smiling young wife, sister of the Emir of Kano, sits and embroiders and awaits her husband. Her walls were tapestried, with brilliant enamelware, broeades, hand embroidery, plates. In Moslem Nigeria life has a sleepy rhythm, women have little life outside their own quarters, there seems slight stirring for change.

To Nigeria's central plateau, missionaries rarely came in early days—neither Moslem from the north, nor Christian missionaries up the rivers from the sea. Pagan women here go almost naked, wear only clusters of green leaves (we were told the young women change their dress each afternoon); live apathetically in mud huts, eat, cook, sleep on the earth; and almost 50 per eent of the babies die of malnutrition, malaria, worms—diseases of dirt and ignoranee.

By ear, by plane, we traveled down through hot, dry, dusty Nigeria to the richer vegetation of the south and east. Missionaries in early days came up these rivers from the eoast, built schools and hospitals. Along the roads one sees little active girls and boys in school uniforms—often green for Methodists, white for Roman Catholic, bright deep blue fo terian. The men say laughingly, "Ou here are very independent. They eve cycles." Missionaries edueated the too, and they became teaehers and n traders, handling money. Here ar health committees, village improvem ties, new latrines, vegetation eut do houses to combat mosquitoes and Women's elubs here were sometimes women's hands. In adult literaey cla sees a nursing mother patiently learn lish from a child's primer. Here wor ticipate freely in the soeiety, work to r better one. Our journey down through seemed a map drawn by the JOURNA slogan: "Never Underestimate the Po Woman."

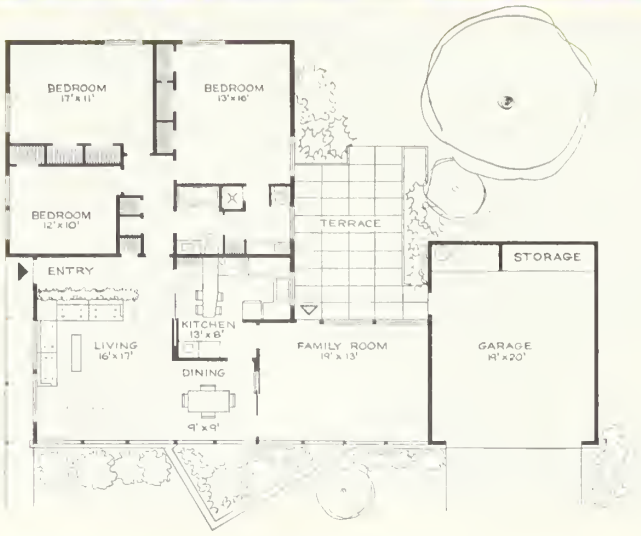
In most of middle Afriea it can be true that every educated person der early edueation from the missions. nurses, teachers, government offici have finished in England, in India United States, but they learned read writing in mission schools. In effect, th no others. Even though one sees gau finished churches here and there—t orate for their setting and foreign in p haps a pseudo-Gothic strueture again green, probably now never to be fir still one feels warmly and deeply th pennies given by thousands of Sunda children to missionaries were not wa Nigeria they tell us, "They are all now ment schools." But what this means is buildings are mission buildings, the t are mission traditions, the teachers sion-trained personnel, their salaries n by the government.

In a green late-afternoon light ou rover bumped over winding jungle p the village of Maku in East Nigeria, s emerged onto a cleared village square. its packed earth, backed by lush plant coconut, were 500 people. Women sit gether, children in their own age grou together; near us were about 50 little boys of from two to eight, smiling an like massed black cherubs. Our U group is welcomed by the handsome t chief, in red Moslem hat, loose madra sers, gray eotton eloak of Arab type braided. He is an eleeted chief over people. His welcome speech in Ibo, tra by the schoolmaster, is eharming. "Yo in our faees, you will see we are your f We welcome you with our hearts. V grateful for the interest whieh brings visit us in our remote village back in the We are given kola nuts and palm wine.

Brilliantly dressed in matching b bras and wrapped skirts of vivid blue, and purple print, wearing small gay t 50 young women sit opposite us. In the c space are musieians. A woman beats a jar with a leather flap, another strikes a or a long hornlike gong. One man plays melodie wooden flute. The woman danees a few steps, summons the oth young mother takes her baby from her hands it to an older woman, rises; other The danee starts slowly, with a rum step, in a eonga circle, woman leader in ealling the steps. Gradually the pace qui the whole body is used, steps ehange ra It is intense, vivid rhythm, wholly fascin One wants to join, hates to have it Dances, we learn, are intricate, varied, on ritual—eaeh eelebrates some special joy of harvest, a marriage, mournin death. In the quiet period after harves ones are studied, take as much as two ye perfeet.

Next we have a speech (again translate a woman member of the village health mittee. She tells us, "Our village has done Our village must have —— We hope fo village ——" It is a speech which one have heard at any women's-club meeti Middletown, U.S.A.!

Our host announees that the lady vi will go with ladies of the health committ inspeet the new sanitary measures "whil men stay to drink palm wine and watc



CONTINUED ON PAG

HOUSE WITH PRIVACY FROM THE STREET

RODNEY MCCAY MORGAN

Long low roof, high windows give feeling of cozy airiness.

Enclosed garden blocks view of busy street, can be as big or as small as desired.

BY JOHN BRENNEMAN
ARCHITECTURAL EDITOR

More homes like this one gain privaey by being constructed with an interesting wall eutting off the street view. In the tradition of the Freneh entry garden, this is, in part, a reaction against the front-faeing picture windows of reeent years.

Kitehen and family room open to a eentral terraee. The piereed front wall surrounds an intimate little garden, large as the individual owner desires it. A eomfortable air of serenity and retreat pervades this home.

The house is well organized with quiet baek bedrooms and easy eireulation to any room through eorridors. The kitchen is the key to the plan, eentrally loeated elose to the dining room, family room and terrace. The breakfast bar doubles as eounter when extra work spaee is needed. Laundry equipment is out of the way but still elose. Plumbing facilities are economieally grouped without compromising the effieient, spaeesaving plan.

Continuous high windows under the broad overhanging roof give the house a feeling of airy eoolness and luxury beyond its modest size.

Plans are available.

ARCHITECT:	WILLIAM NORMAN FLOYD
AREA:	1650 SQUARE FEET
COST:	$21,000 TO $24,000, PLUS LAND

Only 1 refrigerator-freezer —the new No-Frost RCA WHIRLPOOL gives so many modern automatic features and saves money because it's Gas!

VES TIME! EXCLUSIVE ICEMAGIC® replaces every e you use, automatically! NO TRAYS to empty or fill— n water is added automatically. A steady supply of drops into the handy server. All you do is use it! ly an RCA WHIRLPOOL refrigerator has ICE-AGIC, the ice-maker proved by years of consumer use!

W! NO FROST—EVEN IN THE FREEZER! There's no st to de-frost in this zero-degree freezer. Yet you can eze foods right at home—hold over 92 lbs. of frozen ods. The right temperature is sealed in by Million-agnet* doors on both freezer and refrigerator, with cial magnets in door gaskets. Yet they open or ut easily, instantly, at your touch.

VES TIME! EXCLUSIVE JET-COLD SHELF chills a new ay, with new speed! Constant tiny jets of arctic air side the shelf are the secret—let this special shelf chill od up to 3 times faster than an ordinary refrigerator shelf! uick and safe for desserts, salads, any food or liquid. t-Cold shelf is another exclusive you can find only an RCA WHIRLPOOL refrigerator!

VES FOOD! EXCLUSIVE NEW JET-COLD MEAT CHEST ts you store meat with confidence! Holds tempera-re at the best meat-keeping level—in the right atmos-here to keep meats fresh and tempting for days. US every other food-keeping convenience, from a readable-butter keeper to twin crispers that hold a hole bushel of vegetables!

All new, all over! New space-saving lines—it fits flush to walls and cabinets on all sides. New easy-open door. New design has more room inside. And no coils stick out in back to spoil the lines—this handsome RCA WHIRLPOOL looks built-in, even when it isn't—and builds-in beautifully, too. Choose yours in pink, yellow or white.

ONLY ONE NO-FROST REFRIGERATOR-FREEZER WITH A 10 YEAR GUARANTEE!

Saves you money, too! You get every advantage: built-in look . . . color choice . . . all those wonderful new food-keeping features . . . PLUS the fabulous refrigerating system designed around a simple, silent flame, with no moving parts to wear out or break down. You get a 10 year guarantee on the sealed refrigerating system—twice as long as usual! Gas saves you money on fuel bills, too. So choose Gas. There simply isn't a better buy than a modern, automatic, Gas refrigerator-freezer like this! AMERICAN GAS ASSOCIATION

RCA Whirlpool GAS APPLIANCES

Use of trademarks RCA and RCA by Whirlpool Corporation, St. Joseph, Michigan, manufacturers of RCA WHIRLPOOL appliances, authorized by Radio Corporation of America.

*Trademark

ONLY GAS does so much more... for so much less!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 100

dancing." This little joke, though in English, is quickly understood and brings much laughter.

The "village sanitation" consists of covered latrines, some mosquito control. The mud huts with thatched roofs are clean, have windows, and most beds are platforms off the ground.

Our gifts for that day are two live chickens, a basket of eggs, a basket of tomatoes.

Singing and dancing are a part of women's-club life throughout Africa. Co-operative work projects are undertaken, singing. Clubs have songs and dances to welcome visitors. In many groups, a drum is brought and dancing begins almost spontaneously. The most dignified chief's wife suddenly rises and is soon moving her ample hips in a swift controlled sidewise movement that many Arthur Murray teachers might envy. Dancing brings joy to the face of the dancer the watchers. In some regions, when a woman gets up to dance she picks up a shawl nearby—or a sweater, a tablecloth—and ties it around her hips to accentuate that part of the body so important in her dancing.

Some missionaries have frowned on dancing and tried to tame it down to a sort of march formation. Even under mission eyes, once the dance is begun, movements gradually become gayer and less inhibited.

In one village a group of women of all ages, many grandmotherly, dressed alike in dark red with a black stripe, dark red turbans, rose to dance. Their dance was vigorous and primitive. We were told they were a church group—Anglican.

In another village, women wore the Ibibo costume—a wrapped skirt, a square-necked top, high-waisted, with a full peplum (babies can be nursed either by pulling down the neck or lifting up from the waist). The material was a rich purple—self-striped. With it were worn brilliant gauzy turbans of sharp green, intense sea blue, hot pink. Each woman carried either a fan or a gauzy handkerchief to accentuate the movements of her arms, sang as she danced.

Children in Africa: The gay little naked boys are so good, so quiet, so attentive; tiny short-shirted girls smilingly responsive, but serene. One wonders if it is true, as some psychologists say, that the comfort an infant feels from being always with his mother, strapped to her back, riding on her hip, in her arms, nursing on demand, gives security and serenity for later life. Slightly older walking children, too, seem always close to the mother, touching her, holding her dress. When strangers come, they lean against their mother, watch calmly. One rarely sees clamoring for attention, giggles, interruptions, quarreling.

The remarkable S.U.M. (Sudan United Mission) at Jos prepares us for what we will find at Lambaréné. A native hospital is like a native village; sick people will not or cannot come without their families. At S.U.M. hospital families live, sick and well together, in one room in long barrackslike shelters made of earthen bricks. In early days, in an effort to improve conditions and avoid cooking on the floor with all its smoke, fireplaces were built. But primitive Africans will not use them. One sees three or four fires built on the earth floor, a cooking pot on each, air heavy and thick with smoke, the fireplaces cold and empty. "They are used to living in this smoke, sleeping in it, curled up together, and don't feel comfortable otherwise." These are the primitive quarters.

Near them, another long strip of rooms has been built, but this has a roofed area outside, one kitchen opposite each family room. These are for more advanced families. "How do you know which quarters to assign to which?" we asked. "If they come in naked, we let them cook and live in one room. If they wear clothes, they are given separate kitchens. They want to cook in another room so they won't spoil their clothes! Naked people have no clothes to worry about."

These are Biron people, pagan, primitive. On the low wall of the crowded porch sits a young woman, bare to the waist, with breasts elongated as two stocking caps, holding a baby, listless, apathetic, resigned as the mother. The nurse looks at its lower lid. "Hemoglobin is practically nonexistent. Probably malnutrition and malaria." The girl has had three children before, all are dead. Mothers feed their children by putting pap in their palms, holding baby's face in it, give water the same way. Many smother and die.

Doctor Schweitzer's hospital at Lambaréné, like most native hospitals, is sprawling, untidy, for here Africans live as they would in their own villages, cooking, eating, sleeping in one room, whole families in one bed. Tribal habits, taboos and moral codes are kept; by coming to Lambaréné Africans do not suddenly become clean, honest by European standards, sanitary. But the hospital operating room, we are told by a visiting American doctor, is as aseptic, as efficient as at any excellent American hospital.

Africans, sick and well, workers and lepers and orphans, are treated with a gentle friendliness. Animals—chimpanzees, antelopes, cats, a dog with a bandaged paw, goats, birds—live on paths and porches, under desks, fed and petted and respected, for they share in life.

Reverence for life is expressed in daily ways: in a warm courtesy to staff members; hospitality to invited guests—an often grave courtesy on Doctor Schweitzer's part, for he is an old man, his heavy head set solidly on strong shoulders, his eyes under heavy brows searching and commanding. He seems lost often in his own musing, then smiles sometimes with a piercing sweetness and simplicity as he speaks to a visitor. Lambaréné is his plan made real. All the saints must have been strong, determined, sure. His philosophy, his thought and his writing have made Lambaréné a symbol of self-denying service, person-to-person—of love and concern for individual life. Lambaréné is a lantern which from its dark shore sends far a gentle searching beam.

Considerate regard for others is show plain, excellent food: home-grown fru citrus, papaya and apples; garden vegeta well cooked; spaghetti; homemade bread; simply set, well-served table where conv tion flourishes. Hospitality is evidenced ir host's courtly, old-fashioned attentivenes his guests, seated opposite him across a row table, his words translated quickly easily by one of two devoted nurse assistan Mlle. Ali and Mlle. Mathilde. (He speak German.) The spirit of Lambaréné is de felt in the spare but moving religious ser each evening. Doctor Schweitzer announc hymn, rises, walks heavily around the l table to the old piano and plays the tune. T he reads a short passage—from Matthew, evenings we were there—his words of in pretation attentively followed. Another by and Doctor Schweitzer says good night, g to his endless correspondence, his nurse sistants with him. Tea is served, staff guests review the evening services (which e has often followed in his own Testamen his own tongue), seek for its deepest mean share thoughts and experiences, relax.

Life is simple at Lambaréné. There are ke sene lamps and lanterns. Electricity is sa for the operating room, where it is preci Rooms have iron cots, a table, two cha basin and pitcher, pegs for clothes—are wh clean and airy. There is no plumbing.

It is a working life. At midnight a lanter knock next door, voices summon the nu midwife. One hears screaming from the bu ing for "disturbed" patients. Dawn brings emergency call for the Dutch woman surg near us—and animal sounds from the jur forest surrounding us.

Life at Lambaréné expresses in every w we are here to work, in that simplest, ess tial, meaningful work, serving and help others with our own hands, lonely in t foreign, needy land; individual to individu with respect and love and a reaching out the human spirit.

When we leave Lambaréné we are patted the cheek by Doctor Schweitzer, invited iuests who come with knowledge of chweitzer's books, respect for his ligious philosophy, at his invitation, of curiosity only or a desire to take are welcome. "You have opened s to us. We feel we know you," says ember. "You must come back."

go to the boat, that narrow precari-den shell whose boatmen, chanting roke, will carry us and our baggage
s down the wide, swift, muddy River to the airport; as last warm, od-bys are said, a small white cot-
, initialed A.S., is put in my hand.
nch for you, you might need it—with ou can never tell." That night, late y, we reach the only really uncomhotel of our journey, dingy, run-Supper cannot be served in the Gratefully we retire to our beds with chweitzer's hearty thick cheese and dwiches on good bread, his sweet Hospitality, courtesy, thoughtful-love follow us.

ganda woman lives in Buganda, in and speaks Luganda. She dresses in bisuti, half dress, half sari, in vivid owered violets, reds or intense blues, contrasting brocaded sash, low on a Mrs. Gould chats with trained fe and student about to depart for natal visit. Bicycles and maternity UNICEF.

. Under this are two or three cotton s, tied over and folded at the top so are accentuated by four to ten layers wrapping. In Buganda women have knelt to their men, kept their heads es low when speaking to them. Eduvas not for them—they kept house, he family food in gardens. Men had crops, such as coffee or bananas.
ndled all money, and took new wives
Now, leading men in Uganda want wives, who can help them live by n standards. The bride price is higher educated girl. Now men encourage r their wives, sometimes attend the themselves.
raining class we heard:
re the virtues of a good wife and oils the drinking water.

aches her children to come and greet ors politely.
od neighbor" (in English).
akes things in the home to save her band's money.
eds her family the right foods, for bet-nutrition.
as a latrine and a bathroom (an out-cubicle with earth floor where water oured over the body).
he with several wives a happy home?
f these women come from plural

"—Why?
d, scold all the time."
t agree on work."
vants tea—who will get it?"
w a "dance of the second wife" at this e comes prancing in, head high, triumpantomimes with joy, "My cup, my y stool, my husband." First wife, sulkone side, can bear it no longer and nto the ring, pushes her aside—"My y pot, my husband."

We are guests at a luncheon prepared by one of the Y.W.C.A.-sponsored local clubs. The chief of the village greets us, a tall, courtly man, with excellent manners, wearing European dress, speaking fair English, who has been in the U.S.A., with his handsome wife, our hostess. The schoolteacher, the minister, the storekeeper and the landowner who has given land for the women's clubhouse welcome us. Food is set out for us on a buffet table in a charming open pavilion of bamboo-like material, built in honor of the kabaka's last visit. (He is the hereditary ruler of Buganda.) We eat boiled plantain, boiled yams with groundnut (peanut) gravy, stewed chicken, a delicious fruit compote of banana, papaw, orange. The men sit with us, on chairs, eat what we eat with knives, forks and spoons; women club members sit nearby, on straw mats, on the earth, with their children. They eat boiled mashed plantain with their fingers, dipping it in groundnut gravy. Water is brought in pitchers, poured over our hands after the meal. After lunch we at last shake hands with the women club members. The men attend the club meeting which includes speeches, messages from America, singing and dancing. After the women have danced, they kneel to the men (swiftly, like a curtsy) and to us.

We become accustomed to the brilliant colors women wear on the west coast, and in Uganda and Tanganyika—their gay and laughing look; we admire their proud posture even as they carry on their heads baskets of bananas, jars of palm wine, fodder for cattle, loads of firewood, calabashes of milk, beds, live chickens in pens, as well as water jars, daily, morning and evening, often for miles (often accompanied by children carrying their own precious water in a pitcher, a saucepan). When we get to beautiful Kenya, we are distressed by the Kikuyu women. They bend over, carrying on their backs loads held by bands around their foreheads, dress in earth brown, rarely look up or smile. Kenya when we were there was tense, fearful of renewed Mau-Mau terror. White Highlanders kept guns beside them, told us never to be on the roads after 5 P.M. If we saw a crowd ahead, we were told we must turn and go back, if possible to the nearest police post. Our host, on a magnificent 46,000-acre cattle farm facing Mt. Kenya, opposite the Aberdare Mountains, has imported a delicious Baltimore cuisine into this distant place. We sit down at nine to dinner: guinea fowl cooked with wine, tiny Southern hot biscuits, a frozen cream dessert—and hear drums and native singing down by the river. As long as his Kikuyu herdsmen and servants keep their wives with them on the farm, he feels, the situation is not too dangerous. When the wives are sent back to the reservation, he will know trouble is coming. "The Mau-Mau know what is going on in every house," we were told by people who lived there through the previous emergency. "They know everyone who has a gun and just where it is." After dinner as we had coffee on the veranda, watching Mt. Kenya silhouetted sharply by an occasional lightning flash, we heard a lion roaring not far from the house. In the morning we were told he had killed two heifers in the night.

Many English in Kenya feel that they must give over the reins of government slowly, fear leaders like Tom Mboya, whom they consider almost a gangster, fear ruthless tribal warfare if British troops go. Some of their feelings are shared by the Masai, a handsome tribe traditionally warriors, now herdsmen. These people are tall and slender with fine features. The men rub ocher in their hair, dress in rust-red and rust-pink cotton belted togas, wear long earrings in pendant earlobes, neck and ankle beads, carry spears. The women are pretty and shy, wear the same rusty sari or shawl-like dress, huge stiff collars of beads, pull shawls over their faces if anyone brings out a camera. They live in Masai, an enormous reserve partly in Kenya and partly in beautiful Tanganyika where they herd their cattle, rarely go to school, mix little, are considered a backward tribe. There is a bitter joke among moderates in Kenya about their more conservative countrymen: "The Masai, too, are in favor of progress, but they want it to come slowly."

What French's does to hamburger...

...should happen on your grill!

Nothing's more delicious than hamburgers sizzled over charcoal—and topped with this wonderfully different golden sauce! You'll love it because it's rich with the 7-spice goodness of French's Mustard. French's spicy golden touch blends and betters the taste of this recipe and most any food. Try it—and for your next barbecue, serve this golden barbecue sauce. Easy to make . . . delicious with French's Mustard.

Enjoy it! on Food and in Food

Golden Barbecue Sauce

4 tablespoons butter or margarine
¼ cup chopped green pepper
¼ cup French's minced onion or ½ cup chopped fresh onion
½ cup French's Mustard
2 tbsp. light brown sugar
1 cup bouillon
Dash cayenne, ½ tsp. salt and ¼ tsp. pepper

Melt butter, add green pepper, onion and cook over low heat until lightly browned. Blend in French's Mustard, sugar. Add bouillon, seasonings. Stir. Cook 10 minutes. (Makes 1½ cups sauce, enough for 8-12 hamburgers.) Spoon over hamburgers on grill.

7 lively spices in every jar—

that's the secret of French's Golden Touch!

"The shine is the sign it's really clean!"

says PRUDENCE POTTS, the Pan Inspector

Only

Brillo Soap Pads

contain special soap with Jeweler's Polish to get pans shining clean!

Firmer, sturdier pads

A Brillo Soap Pad just has to clean lots more pots. It's the only pad that's tightly knit with firm "hemmed" edges to hold together longer.

Richer, livelier lather

Foams up faster—each pad is packed with soap clear through. Brillo with its exclusive polishing soap cleans faster, shines brighter.

Thriftier, more pads

5, 12, 20 pad boxes! Only Brillo gives you so many pads, such long-lasting pads, plus special soap with Jeweler's Polish.

Nothing shines aluminum like BRILLO

Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y.; Toronto, Canada

There are 55 separate women's clubs on the lower slopes of Mt. Kilimanjaro. These are Chaga people, mostly Christian, coffee-rich. One ascends through rich luxuriant coffee and banana plantations, small holdings, African-owned. Mt. Kilimanjaro, a white-iced loaf cake, is mostly cloud-veiled—as are the Pare hills opposite. Small paths lead back to individual houses, and as the Landrover laboringly ascends the rough and winding path, boys and girls, bright khaki-clad little creatures, peer, waving shyly, from green leaves at every path opening—like a Rousseau jungle painting.

The women's club we visited is on a beautiful grassy slope looking down, down—looking up to the "companion" (the lower peak of Kilimanjaro), Mawenzi. The village is Marangu. Three young teachers from a nearby training center supported by the Tanganyika government, with UNICEF aid, are giving a course in nutrition and child health. Village women pay a shilling each for two weeks of lectures and demonstrations, often walk miles to the meetings. The teacher and her two assistants (trainees) are charmingly dressed in European style, one in printed cotton with wide lilac cummerbund; another in coral cotton skirt and matching sweater, white blouse, red shoes. Copying pictures in magazines, cutting their own patterns, they made their dresses themselves at the training center. Some of the village women wear European dress, about half have shoes. Next year, we think, many will have dresses like the teachers'. The young leader demonstrates her lesson about good nutrition by sticking cutouts on a flannel board—carrots, tomatoes, eggs, peanuts. As she talks, villagers gather on the bank behind us. Twenty attentive little boys sit quietly, clad in khaki shirts and shorts; a dozen little girls in khaki jumpers (there is a Lutheran mission school here); men and women from the village group themselves on the grass, all listening closely. The women's club is educating the whole village!

"Your JOURNAL is a friend" one hears, unexpectedly, so many places in Africa. Soon it becomes no longer surprising to find intelligent, attractive long-time JOURNAL readers in African towns: Mrs. Sanderson, gentle missionary in Kano, who with her husband is translating the Bible into Hausa (they have completed the New Testament in ten years, and a Hausa friend whom they asked to read certain chapters to check idiomatic errors said, "But this is a book that speaks to the heart"). At Doctor Schweitzer's hospital a gay young maternity nurse, Miss Olive, from Johannesburg, devoted to her babies, tries to keep twins as long as she can—"Twins are considered unlucky. If they go back to the village—well, one just disappears." She says, "I love the JOURNAL—but it costs a dollar in Johannesburg." The 32-year-old clear-featured Dutch woman surgeon who has been at Lambaréné five years, does most major surgery: "My mother has had your magazine for years. I know it well." A doctor from California, doing a six-month heart study among natives for Paul Dudley White: "A fine journal—your medical articles are excellent." Scotch dining-room steward at the Vi Falls Hotel: "I send it to my sister in land—but I read it first."

Charming Mrs. Peggy Rahb in Living Africa-born, influential in the education visory commission for the province: " articles on education are so valuable." I awayo, the pretty young wife of the I U.A.T. representative (a new, well-run E airline in central Africa): "It's such a th meet you. I'm a JOURNAL fan. Often we h meet dull people—oh, important, but I've been longing for one of your F Treasure boxes. But of course I couldn't here in Africa." She might have come one of Wilhela Cushman's fashion slim and tall in a pink-and-orange p cotton, coral-pink shoes and bag. "My band's family have always read your zine. They were in Indonesia; when the to leave there, they took the JOURNAL in land, and now in Canada. He taught read it." These are just a few. "Your sto ordinary family life make us feel we what America is really like—not the wa newspapers show it," we hear in many

It is deeply moving to your editors to that the JOURNAL is well known, well and deeply influential in that faraway nent. Now, when our American way of criticized as materialistic or warmonger so many places, we are grateful to our America Lives" families who, opening doors to our reporters and photogra have helped us build a great series shows American home life realisticall with depth: revealing an America lovi children, pinching pennies to educate concerned with ethical and religious often unreported in the daily press. W thankful for our readers' letters which their thoughts. We are grateful to Am clubwomen, who, by giving us an insigh community activities, reveal what un devotion American men and women pour into programs for the young, th the sick, the disabled, the disadvan Distinguished men and women in publi beginning with Chief Justice Earl Warre most recently Governor Rockefeller, generously given their time to our Jou Forums. Through these discussions, m of people have heard the best thinking times on current problems, educational, and international.

The LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, your e felt again with deep appreciation o African safari, is a great force for expr the best in American life—and by expr it, recognizing this best, and strengthen As our readers with us re-evaluate Am aspirations, we believe these basic idea refreshed, refined and made clearer t selves and to those in other lands.

We returned, happy with our read Africa, thankful to our readers at hom help us build our round-the-world mag A word in Swahili, Mzouri—pronounce souri—means splendid, fine, O.K., won We think you, our readers, are Mzouri

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

Modern woman: One who drives a short distance to a drugstore to buy reducing pills.

Dropping a line to children away at school and to fish in the water often nets about the same response.

He's the kind of person who is always having to take a remedial course in the School of Experience.

A tranquilizer from the Bible: "For I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content."

Unlike the woman who always washe the cup, saucer, spoon after a late cup tea or coffee—because she wants to go t bed with the house in "dying order"— another woman vows that her house bedtime will be left in "living order."

An old dog wearing a fine new colla and an elderly woman wearing a corsag are each, in spite of age and figure, im portant to someone.

Some women mistakenly believe tha the secret of youth is found in keepin age a secret.

OKING OVER E PRESIDENT'S OULDER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 58

so much that it was said he was being ust to see that no handouts were being way. This started the Truman Admin- n off with a sense of human under- g and appreciation which never waned he eight years to follow.

President did not bring a valet, nor did ruman, Miss Margaret or Mrs. Tru- nother, Mrs. Wallace, bring any per- aids. Vietta Garr, the family cook in ndence, came along. She would some- ook special dishes which the family en- especially Miss Margaret—and more ttend the three ladies in personal-maid Mrs. Truman, as First Lady, never did a personal maid during her eight years White House and she had only one sec- or personal matters—Miss Odum, who ad luncheon with the family.

Helm, who had been Mrs. Wilson's ecretary and also Mrs. Roosevelt's, re- with the Trumans. Mrs. Helm and dum would more or less officiate at buring for the First Lady, especially here were from 75 to 200 people. Mrs. ould pour a cup of tea, keeping up a sation with a guest who was dead set on nged conversation, give her the tea and t rid of her and continue the same run- nversation with the next guest faster nyone I have ever seen—without spilling of tea on the tray.

the ladies would feel so pleased. I have hem say, "Oh, I had such a lovely con- on with Mrs. Helm while she was pour- tea. You know, she is the social secre- That is the art of pouring, without the realizing that you do not want them to the line. Miss Odum, at the other end able pouring coffee, was a very likable and she learned to pour coffee equally without being detained by some long- conversationalist.

Trumans were the most punctual peo- he White House during my years there. ast was served at eight o'clock, lunch- one and dinner at seven. When you announce dinner you did not have to nd wait for someone to recognize you you could say, "Dinner is served."

old place quieted down so much you 't believe it was the same place. The of mourning was on, so we didn't have ficial entertaining and we had a chance up the family. The help found the nt, Miss Margaret and Mrs. Wallace size up, but Mrs. Truman, with her d personality, had most of the help at atchful of her. It was agreed that this ady would not stand for fakers, shirk- flatterers, and the only way you could er approval would be by doing your the best of your ability. This done, you not want a more understanding person k for.

Trumans did not care for elaborate Neither did the Roosevelts; but, un- e Roosevelts, the Trumans demanded cooked food, for Mrs. Truman is a very ook and she knew and appreciated good g.

d noticed when we served hot rolls that Truman would look at the rolls, break pen and then put it aside. At first I t that perhaps the rolls were not hot. next time I took special care to see that eally were hot. But again she did the hing.

said to one of the men, "I am sure I why Mrs. Truman doesn't eat the rolls. ants rolls fresh from the oven, not d-over bakers' rolls."

l, when I went into the housekeeper's next morning to talk over menus with d the cook, I sensed that they were wait- r me. Right off they told me that my were letting the rolls get cold before g them. They wanted to get a small heat- it just to keep the rolls from getting cold. The cook said the bread was always hot when she sent it up and she was not going to be blamed for our carelessness.

I turned to Mrs. Nesbitt and asked, "Do you mean to say that Mrs. Truman has been asking for hot rolls all this time? Well, no wonder she has not been eating the bread. In fact, no one has. Hot bread doesn't mean warmed-over bakery bread. If you people have forgotten how to bake rolls and bread, then you had better learn. The First Lady wants hot bread from the oven, not warmed-over bakery rolls."

From then on the kitchen posed a problem, for they had been too long on one routine and were not very willing to change. Mrs. Nesbitt had much the same attitude. She was talking to me one day about what Mrs. Truman wanted and said, "I just told her that you don't do things that way. I said Mrs. Roosevelt never did things that way."

"What did she say?" I asked.

She replied, "Nothing. She just looked at me. You know I have been told that I must see to it that she keeps things going around here."

"Well," I said, "I hope you know what you are doing. Mrs. Truman must be a very patient woman, for I am sure that, being a woman, you know what it means to have your way of keeping house compared with some other woman's way."

I never really knew what happened and I never asked anyone about it, but it was not very long after our conversation that Mrs. Nesbitt retired.

The small dining room was used by the Trumans, as by the Roosevelts, for all informal affairs. Breakfast and lunch usually were served on the roof in the sun parlor which was very cheerful and sunny with a view which was not so gloomy as that of either dining room. In fact, there really isn't any view from the dining rooms.

For breakfast the President usually had oatmeal with brown sugar. He always ate wholewheat toast with his oatmeal and drank about half a cup of coffee. Most likely he would take a piece of ice from his glass of water and drop it into the coffee to cool it.

We had to learn to make coffee for the Trumans. The coffee was brewed in the pantry and, although I never drank coffee myself, each morning I would supervise the brewing of the coffee, trying to find a recipe that would satisfy the Truman taste. I had noticed that Mrs. Truman always took some coffee in the spoon and looked at it before drinking it. I would hover near to view the color of the coffee in the silver spoon when she complained and when she said the coffee was fine. Once I found the color in the spoon that pleased her, we made it that way consistently. In fact, we were so successful that I was sent on a tour of the mess on the presidential yacht to instruct them in the brewing of coffee to please the Truman taste.

Shortly after the family moved into the White House the President's brother, Mr. Vivian Truman, came to visit. The first time he appeared in the dining room the President, before he took his seat, said, "Fields, this is my brother, Mr. Vivian Truman."

This was something new for a President to acquaint a member of his family with servants. We were soon to meet all the Wallaces and Trumans in this manner. The President and Mrs. Truman knew each servant by name and at any time a new man was taken into the dining room I would go along and say to the President and Mrs. Truman, "This is —— We are trying him out as a butler."

The President, if seated, would rise and shake hands and say, "Now don't be disturbed by me. You just do what Fields tells you and I know we will be glad to have you aboard." This would at once relieve the tension that faces any waiter or butler who had never been in the presence of the President before. I have seen experienced men who would be so nervous on first going into the White House dining room that you would almost expect them to run up the wall if the President was to say something to them.

The President's mother and sister paid a visit shortly after Mr. Vivian. I don't think the country will forget Mother Truman's statement when she told the press, "I cannot really be glad that my son is President because I am sorry that President Roosevelt is dead." These may not be the exact words, but it went something like that. And when she arrived by plane with the President and saw the crowds and the press snapping pictures she said, "Fiddlesticks. If you had told me all this would happen, I would have stayed at home."

For her age, she was most charming and refreshing. She would not have anything to do with the Lincoln Room and they could not get her to sleep in the big bed in the Rose Room with the canopy over it. She preferred the small Rose Room with the small, single bed. She had something friendly to say to anyone she came in contact with.

To me the funniest thing she said was one night at dinner with Mr. Joseph Davies, the former ambassador to Russia. During the conversation between the President and the former ambassador a name was mentioned which attracted Mother Truman's interest. She remarked, "Isn't he a Yankee?"

Miss Mary Jane Truman, the President's sister, said, "Now, mother ——"

"Well, isn't he?" she insisted.

The President spoke up and said, "Yes, mother, but you know there are good Yankees as well as bad and good Rebels."

ONLY

Fleischmann's Margarine

brings your family the goodness of

100% Corn Oil*

By the Makers of Fleischmann's Yeast

100% GOLDEN CORN OIL* BRINGS THESE IMPORTANT BENEFITS TO FLEISCHMANN'S MARGARINE

High nutrition and energy values . . . Light, delicate flavor . . . Extra-smooth spreadability!

*At last, nutrition experts have scientifically perfected a margarine made from 100% golden corn oil. It's new Fleischmann's Margarine . . . partially hydrogenated to give it a flavor so delicious you can hardly believe it. And Fleischmann's Margarine has a finer texture, too, for extra-smooth spreadability.

Yes, Fleischmann's flavor is more delicate than the taste of ordinary margarines made from a mixture of vegetable oils. It has a golden taste just like the high-price spread. Try Fleischmann's Margarine.

Fleischmann's CORN OIL MARGARINE

Mother Truman retorted, "Well, if there are any good Yankees I haven't seen one yet."

Mr. Davies smiled and the conversation was changed. But that was the way she saw it and she did not mince words. I think that the President must have inherited his open, sincere frankness from his mother. Mother Truman and Mother Wallace were as different as night and day, but they were both fine people.

The first of June Mrs. Truman, Miss Margaret and Mrs. Wallace went home to Independence for the summer. The President was alone for breakfast, lunch and dinner. Seldom did he have a guest, and never did the help have it so easy. We were all working an eight-hour day now. When Mrs. Truman was away I always talked to the President about the menus and asked if he expected guests. One morning, after I had shown him the menu, the President asked me about the help getting their annual leave. He said, "Fields, you must see to it that no one loses any time, because it belongs to them." I promised that no one in my outfit would lose time. To think that, with all his new duties as President, he had thoughts for these people when many supervisors act as if they are doing you a favor to grant you your annual leave!

With the European theater of the war closed, General Eisenhower and his staff were invited to a dinner at the White House. We had 126 including the general and the President. Among the staff were two colored master sergeants. We set up a bar for the first time in the East Room and had a cocktail hour before dinner. Dinner was informal with the President and the general seated at the round mahogany table in the center of the State Dining Room with twelve other soldiers. Around the center table were smaller ones and the overflow were seated in the Red Parlor.

When General Eisenhower came in I recalled how, not too many years ago, he was a major. I heard many conversations by General Marshall praising "this fellow Eisenhower"—the term he used in talking to President Roosevelt. There is no doubt in my mind that General Marshall really sold the President on Major Eisenhower. He was always praising him. Later on I was to hear many conversations about "this fellow Eisenhower."

In July, 1945, the President went to Potsdam for a meeting with Churchill and Stalin and I remembered a remark President Roosevelt had made in the late summer of 1944 during the campaign. He said that if the war was over before the election, he and Churchill both were likely to be defeated because the people, being tired of war, would most likely want to change their leaders. While he was in Potsdam, this prediction came true in Churchill's case, and the meeting recessed until the new Prime Minister, Clement Attlee, could join them.

Prime Minister Attlee was with us a few months later, in November. It seemed strange to call anyone other than Churchill "Mr. Prime Minister," and Attlee somehow just did not strike the gong like Churchill.

When the ladies returned from Missouri that fall they brought some sorghum molasses. Miss Margaret, especially, was very fond of corn bread and sorghum. Out in Indiana when sugar cane was cut and carried to the mill, I can still smell the cooking of the syrup into molasses and see a lazy old mule moving just fast enough for the mill to grind the cane into the syrup that was cooking.

Miss Margaret said to me one day as she was leaving the table where they had been talking about molasses and corn bread, "Fields, that is real good eating."

And I agreed with her for, as a kid, we always had a big barrel of molasses sent from the mill. As the winter wore on, the molasses got thicker and thicker, but it never did turn into sugar. That is what makes an expert molasses maker—the art of cooking the syrup so that it would not turn into sugar. With hot biscuits, corn bread or pancakes and butter and a plate of good sorghum molasses, no eating could be better.

The President attended his first Armistice Day services as President on Sunday, November 11, 1945. The Trumans always followed their family tradition of having Sunday dinner at midday and this day we had some of Miss Margaret's favorite dishes, including chocolate ice cream. The President spoke about especially privileged people and said, "Fields, I don't want you boys spoiling my girl." He delighted in teasing Miss Margaret and the First Lady and when he did they could always give him a good going over.

On one occasion when he had had a good going over by them, as he left the dining room he said, "Fields, what do you think of that?"

I said, "Mr. President, I am afraid you have the same problem at home that I have."

He said, "What is that?"

"Sir," I said, "a wife and daughter. You cannot win unless you can sow a seed of doubt as to which one is boss."

He laughed and said, "That question was settled years ago."

The President was big enough to boss the country, but to the President Mrs. Truman was the "boss." I have never heard her try to tell him what was good for the country, but one time I did hear her warning him for his own good about a Cabinet officer. I do not recall the exact reasons for her so forewarning him, but it was about Secretary Wallace.

The President replied, "Oh, Henry is all right."

President Truman had so many ways that were cordial and genuine, but only a fool would fail to appreciate this cordial inti by being disrespectful.

During the Roosevelt Administrati messenger by the name of John Pye us prepare lunches for some of the White H secretaries, and during the Truman Adm tration in the basement under the Presi office he really set up a kitchen and d room for such people as Mr. Charles J Mr. Short, Mr. Hassett, Mr. Matt Conn General Graham, General Vaughan and Clifford. Sometimes Pye would have son the Cabinet officers as guests, and even President himself whenever he could ma to get him.

Kitchen for two—who entertain for many—is capsule-sized but popular with the crowd. Small gas range with full oven, arm-reach refrigerator, dishwasher, too, are lined up. Letter-file trays under window sill hold linens and tools.

n Mrs. Truman was away sometimes ident would have Mr. Connelly eall me what did I think of the President eat-'ye's dining room. Usually I would say the doctor was nearby, perhaps it oe all right. Otherwise I would advise sident to come to lunch at the White where he would be safe and not eat
g that John Pye cooked.
rally the President would wait until ve was within hearing distanee and then ny advice. John was one of those char-who get upset. He would say, "Indeed, esident, there is nothing wrong with od! Fields doesn't know what he is talking about. I swear by the Almighty that you are safe here, sir."

Pye was happiest when he could get the President downstairs in the office of his dining room. Sometimes he would invite Miss Margaret and Miss Odum to luncheon and I would blast him to high heaven for trying to take my customers away. The President got fun out of this feud between John Pye and me. Pye and I were the best of friends and we, too, enjoyed the feud.

I shall always remember the first Truman Christmas in 1945. About a week before, the President said one morning when he was alone at breakfast, "Fields, I should like to request a favor. I want you to find a needy colored family and see to it that they have a real happy Christmas dinner. I have already asked Dressler"—the agent in eharge of the Seeret Service detail to the President—"to find a needy white family."

The President went on to say that he did not want it known. He took out his purse and gave me some money, saying, "This is to buy each child in the family a present. If this isn't enough, let me know."

I had never had such a detail and deeided to call on the Southeast Settlement House, in South Washington. I went that afternoon and talked to the lady in eharge. She wanted information about me, why I came and my object and name. This I wasn't prepared for. I felt that if I gave my name, she might reason who was the donor of the money. All that day I had been humming tunes from Tales of Hoffmann by Offenbach, so when she asked my name, "Offenbaeh" came into my head. I ehanged this and said instead, "Colonel Offendorf."

She seemed a little startled, but "Colonel Offendorf" it was. The social worker gave me the name of a family—a mother with nine ehildren, the eldest a girl of thirteen. The husband had been found murdered three months before. He had no family, nor did the mother. The Settlement had just learned about this family and was happy to have me help them.

I said I would like to go and meet the mother and see the situation. What I saw was beyond my imagination. Within sight of the Capitol, this was poverty of the worst sort, and the mother little realized that she could get help from any souree. I do not believe she eould read and it was the thirteen-year-old girl who had taken it on herself to appeal to the Settlement House.

When I looked around, the very first thing I discovered was that there was no eooking stove. The woman was cooking on a potbellied heating stove with a pot of beans eooking in clear water. I thought to myself that I was glad I had taken the time to investigate. What a eruel joke it would have been to send this family a thirty-pound turkey with no plaee to cook it.

So when I reported to the President my findings I said that there was no telling, perhaps the white family might be in the same position. So I would have both turkeys stuffed and cooked in the White House kitehen. From then on eaeh Thanksgiving and Christmas the ehief of Secret Serviee detail and I selected families in need for these gifts from the President. Thc deliveries were always made in private cars and this is the first time I have told this story.

Christmas in the White House during the Roosevelt and Truman administrations was always a friendly, family oecasion. Christmas with the Hoovers had been a time of cordial but reserved master-to-servantlike greetings. President and Mrs. Hoover would eome into the East Room and say "Merry Christmas" to all the household staff gathered around the big tree in that room. Gifts would be passed out—an autographed picture and an envelope with a crisp new $5 bill for servants of the lower braeket, and larger amounts for those of the higher brackets. Then President and Mrs. Hoover would bow and leave and there would be no handshaking.

During the Roosevelt Administration all the servants and their entire families would gather downstairs in the corridor and, just as for formal receptions, they would proeeed to the East Room to be introdueed by an aide to the President, the First Lady and other members of the family.

A list of the children under sixteen in eaeh family had been made months before and each child reeeived a gift as well as the opportunity to shake hands with the President and First Lady—a memorable thing for any ehild.

The Trumans eontinued this policy and I understand that the Eisenhowers still carry on this familylike gathering for the offiee workers and servants. It is true that the Trumans eelebrated Christmas in thc White House only twiee because Mrs. Truman, Miss Margaret and Mrs. Truman's mother, Mrs. Wallaee, always left for Missouri a few days before Christmas. But the President always remained for the White House Christmas party.

The times when the Trumans were at the White House for Christmas Mrs. Truman seheduled the family dinner at 2 P.M. and all the help was released to spend the rest of thc day with their own families. Sandwiches and the makings had been prepared and the Trumans enjoyed getting things for themselves. I am sure they felt more at home than if they had had servants fussing around them, and the White House help eertainly did appreciate thc opportunity of spending a part of Christmas Day at home with their families. At least yours truly did, and I know many others did likewise.

"They Said it Couldn't be Done"

ABBOT MILLS

en Stewart

What do you do when you need a dishwasher—and the kitchen is about 6½′ x 8½′? In their small New York rtment, Helen Markel Stewart and her newsberman husband Jack shoehorned practically rything you might find in a bigger room. hers with closet-sized kitchens can take hope. : stack a full-sized 7½-cubic-foot built-in rigerator atop a dishwasher; there's room for ay rack too. Tip: use a small but complete ge with full oven. Tip: in a narrow space, e deeper appliances on one wall, and build llow 18″ cupboards on the other—otherse oven and refrigerator doors couldn't open. From the small kitchen, the Stewarts enter- small parties of eight handsomely. "Even enormous quarters I'd want small dinners, conversation is more stimulating." Dinner at a living-room table. Guests help themves at a buffet where casseroles and wonful tossed salads are stand-bys. In a small er off the kitchen there's a snack shelf for eakfasts, also a place to set out dessert and ffee. In the little kitchen, once head-shaking ends applaud its charm and workability. That ıyl floor looks like marble. Helen's herbs ow on the window sill. The pale yellow walls e as cheering as spring sunlight. "I couldn't ve written a better ending," says Helen. Husnd Jack likes the way the plot turned out too.

y MARGARET DAVIDSON Homemaking Editor

Shelf in hall for tray breakfasts is restful with lacy-pattern wallpaper, soft blues and purples, garnet-red lamp.

Cabinets and counters are just 18″ deep but give a length of work space. Doors, plastic above, wood below, all slide to save bumping. Cleaning equipment is tidy at right.

STUART

The Roosevelts always had Christmas at the White House with all the children and most of the grandchildren there. They always braved the hazards of fire by having a Christmas tree lighted with candles in the East Hall. The family tradition included reading of Charles Dickens' Christmas Carol by the President. The gathering of the family with the President and Mrs. Roosevelt, the President's mother, the children and grandchildren made a comely family group of four generations.

There were many other traditions in this family which showed such zest for enjoying themselves with life's activities. The holidays were for fun, and, as a real family, they had fun.

The Christmas dinner was at eight o'clock and usually there was a movie after dinner, then refreshments. We could all join in and watch the movies, but it was not like being in your own humble abode with your own family.

President Truman usually had Cabinet luncheons whenever the Cabinet met. In the Hoover and Roosevelt administrations you never really got acquainted with the Cabinet members, though you served them very often—except for some few friendly men like Secretary Stettinius and Secretary Hull. These gentlemen would always speak, no matter where they saw you.

Secretary Stettinius met me in the corridor one night at a party. With him was Mrs. Stettinius and Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Rockefeller. He stopped and said to his guests, "I want you to meet a good friend of mine." From then on Mr. Rockefeller, a most friendly gentleman, always spoke to me and would chat. I saw him often during the Roosevelt Administration. One night during the Truman Administration, after I had not seen him for some time, he was a dinner guest and he left the line entering the dining room to shake my hand.

In the Truman Administration, because of the friendliness of the President, the Cabinet officers followed the cue. One time when I was sending my wife to Boston to the Lahey Clinic we had to wheel her to the train in a chair. I helped her get a bed, and a nurse who was a devoted friend was to meet her in Boston. After getting my wife fixed up for the trip I was leaving her bedroom when I almost bumped into Secretary Snyder and Secretary Forrestal and their wives.

Secretary Snyder said, "Well, look who is here. Fields, what are you doing?"

I explained my mission and both ladies said, "If you like we will be glad to look in on your wife during the trip." These are the acts of kindness that fill you with faith that God watches and does touch the hearts of people in high and low places.

The year 1947 brought many people into my life who were moved to help my wife and me out of our worst difficulties during the eleven years of her ill health. We had friends in Wellesley, Massachusetts, and without their looking out for her while I was working in Washington, I am sure my wife would not have survived to be blessed to see and our two granddaughters, now eleven an the children of our daughter, Virginia son-in-law, Stanley Yancey.

In July, with my wife's condition still cal, my mother passed away in Indiana I received the information at five o'clock morning and around seven called the W House to say that I would go to Indian that day. Around nine o'clock a White H usher phoned and said that the Presiden arranged a flight and that a White Hous would pick me up and take me to A Field.

I arrived in Indianapolis at five in the noon. The next day flowers arrived fro White House. In about ten minutes a r paper called and wanted to know how Mrs. Fields know President Truman and they come and get a picture? I told them nitely no.

The Indianapolis papers had the info tion of the wreath from the President on front pages. Mother was being waked a house. My brother George and I were in out for dinner that night and when w turned home we were startled, for we had a yard full of people. Of course mother ha ways been a ward and precinct pol worker and at the time of her death she l political job at the statehouse.

Politically mother and father separated ing the election of 1936. Dad was the G ward leader and mother was the Demo women's leader, and mother always licke in the elections. They had a truce at hom politics was permitted there. But once left the house, no holds were barred an community enjoyed their rivalry. Of c with mother being with the winners, she Greatest thing that ever happened to DETERGENT HANDS!

NEW Cuticura Medicated Cream

works faster to relieve all kinds of skin irritations

Tests prove it! New snowy white Cuticura Medicated Cream gives you up to 5 times the antibiotic-antiseptic effectiveness of other leading creams and lotions . . . and 5-way healing action.

Triple antibacterial action helps heal faster, prevent infection. Cooling action stops itching, burning instantly. Moisturizing action restores moisture, softens dry, rough skin. Healing action helps speed growth of smooth, healthy new skin. Protective action helps prevent future irritation.

Hospital tested . . . clinically approved . . . for burns, sunburn, cuts, abrasions. Greaseless. Stainless. Now at your druggists.

Enjoy new complexion softness, clarity, glow with "Action-Activated" Cuticura Soap. As fragrant, superemollient Cuticura Soap deep-cleanses, it softens dry skin...controls oily skin...brightens dull skin...helps clear up blemishes...and helps keep smooth skin from having problems. For beautiful skin all your life, use regularly twice daily.

Cuticura World's best known name in skin care.

ROMANTIC DRESS

Other views, sizes and prices of Vogue Patterns on pages 62 and 63.

Vogue Design No. 5052. Two-piec dress 10–16 (31–36). $1.00. Versio shown requires 3¼ yards of 45″ fabri without nap for blouse and 4 yards o 45″ fabric for skirt, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 1499. One-piece dress, stole and petticoat; 10–18 (31–38). $2.50. Version shown requires 3⅝ yards of 45″ fabric without nap for dress, ⅝ yard of 35″ lace for bodice insert and 1½ yards of 2″ fringe, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 1002. One-piece dress, stole and slip; 10–16 (31–36). $2.00. Version shown requires 1¼ yards of 35″ lace for bodice, 2¼ yards of 35″ lace for skirt and 3½ yards of 50″ fabric without nap for midriff and stole, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 1488. One-piece dress and stole; 10–16 (31–36). $2.50. Version shown requires 5½ yards of 39″ fabric without nap for dress and 1⅛ yards of 50″ fabric with nap for belt and bow, size 14.

ple to deliver a few favors to the com-
.
te September I went to Wellesley and t my wife back to Washington. She was s, but she wanted to come home. She ardly sit up and every effort was filled ain. Edna has remarkable courage and
e. Through all the years of her illness er felt sorry for herself. Her unflagging ination gave me hope when the doculd hardly give me any. Today, after years, she still has this same determina-stmas of 1947 found Mrs. Truman's

's, Frank, George and Fred, and their t the White House, and also Mr. Fred's n, David and Marian. Miss Mary Truhe President's sister, was among those
. Even at Christmas the Trumans' en-ng was never as hilarious as the Roo-
, because of the lack of children and hildren. For Christmas dinner we had he family of twelve, whereas the Roo-would have had that many grand-n alone.
her was in the small dining room at and Miss Margaret snapped pictures of nily group and the butlers. We all got s of the party and I am mighty proud
e. It was one of the few times that Presiruman ever carved at the table.
dinner at 2 P.M., Mrs. Truman had o have the third-floor kitchen supplied he makings of sandwiches for supper so e help could take the rest of the day off.
the Trumans were in the White House

he chains of habit are generally o small to be felt until they are o strong to be broken.

SAMUEL JOHNSON

ird-floor kitchen was always supplied he makings of sandwiches for late for Miss Margaret and her two chums, ingo and Miss Snyder. In the big White kitchen we kept the refrigerators because, somehow or other, the spirits amed at night were usually hungry and
. It could not have been the servants, st of them went home nights, so that esides the family, the police detail and Service detail. At least the spirits did ve the ability to go through locked doors nlock them, and with both security de-watch the locked doors we could al-ind things safe.
year 1948 brought us into another presicampaign. There were some rumblings he President went before Congress and ted his ten-point civil-rights program.
July, after Alabama and Mississippi l out of the convention because of the ghts plank, President Truman made his ance speech. Mrs. Truman and Miss ret went to Philadelphia to be with him.
next morning, after a short night's I went to work. There wasn't any inforn about breakfast. I knew that the train
t leave Philadelphia until nearly 4 A.M. was sure that Mrs. Truman, Miss Mar-nd Mrs. Wallace would not have break-8 A.M. But, despite his retiring late, I t too sure about the President. When I d that he did not get to bed until his arising time, 6 A.M., I told the boys in ntry and kitchen that I would take a down to the second floor about 9 o'clock
e if the President was stirring.
bout 9:15 I saw a light in the study. As l the door open to peep inside the Presilaughed and said, "Good morning,
"
d, "Good morning, Mr. President. We t hear from you and I was nosing around if you were up."
s," he replied. "I am the only one up.
omenfolks will be calling you later, and an send me a tray up here when it is
"
d, "Sir, you had a rough night." s, I did," he replied, "but, Fields, I am to win this thing if there is a God in
."

I replied, "Yes, sir. With God's help you will win."

The next day the President called an extra session of Congress and during the campaign he went out and met the people to tell them why he had to call the members back. All of us who knew him felt that the more people he met with his off-the-cuff, friendly talks, the more they would believe in his sincerity. So the President went on what they called "whistle stops."

In the early part of August it was found that the second-floor Lincoln bedroom that Miss Margaret used as her sitting room was sinking down to the small dining room. Mr. Winslow, the White House architect and engineer, started investigating and it was thought that steel rods fastened to the beams from the reinforced steel-and-concrete third floor would sort of hold the floor in suspension.

The President said at a press conference that he was sitting at his desk in the study when the butler brought his tray and he felt the whole floor sway as if floating in space. So he called the White House architect and it was found that the second floor was falling down. Well, my old friend, John Pye, had a field day. He called me and said that it was in all the newspapers that I was so big, with my flat feet, that the White House was falling down under my weight.

Before the campaign was over the East Room ceiling started to come down and there was left only one thing to do—tear the old place down and rebuild. It cost over $5,000,000. The campaign had to be fought by the President as the Berlin crisis grew worse, plus the house falling down on him.

During the height of the campaign there was a meeting and dinner of former Democratic national chairmen with the President. They were Flynn, Walker, Barkley and one other man I have forgotten besides the current chairman, McGrath of Rhode Island. Mr. Flynn had just published a book and the conversation turned to certain references to F.D.R. Well, when Messrs. Flynn, Barkley and Walker finished expressing some of their opinions about F.D.R., they certainly left me with a funny feeling and a new appraisal of this great man. But then I reasoned that, like all men, he was human and should be expected to be subject to some of the faults of men, such as egotism, vindictiveness, hallucinations of grandeur and deceit.

I also felt that these men were wrong to say such things about their leader of the past. However, perhaps their opinions, expressed in confidence, did not mean that they thought any less of him but that they appreciated the moments when he overcame these weaknesses. To deny that he had any of these faults would have made him a saint. And no man can be a political leader and President and at the same time be a saint too.

Well, as the election day drew nearer, it was conceded by most political writers and pollsters that Governor Dewey would be our next President. The only encouragement came from Mr. Biffle, the secretary of the Senate, who had disguised himself as a chicken peddler and gone over the countryside with his polling system. He declared that Truman would be elected.

I had a feeling that perhaps the good Lord was not on the President's side this time, though my wife kept saying that, despite the papers, he was going to win. On the day of the election it was the only topic talked about at the White House. I do not recall when there was ever as much excitement and open discussion as went on around the place during this election. Many were making bets pro and con.

That night I started to keep tally as the news came over the radio. At first the commentators would say that President Truman was showing a slight lead, but it was the industrial centers which had machine voting and the count was bound to be overcome when the upstate votes were in. Well, the reports got so exciting that it appeared there was going to be an upset. I have forgotten when I went to bed—if I did—content to know that the President had been re-elected.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 111

Kraft DeLuxe Slices
give you extra goodness

Sure you can buy cheaper cheese slices than Kraft's. But not with the extra rich cheese flavor that comes from the truly fine natural cheeses Kraft uses.

And Kraft's are big, full-ounce slices that pack important protein power into every sandwich you make. What's more, only Kraft can use the exclusive method that makes these slices taste so extra good and separate so beautifully. That's why they're called Kraft DeLuxe Slices.

KRAFT AMERICAN
OLD ENGLISH Brand
SWISS • BRICK
Pasteurized
Process
Cheese

Cook with Snider's, the chili pepper catsup –it makes the flavor difference in these hamburgers

SNIDERBURGERS

Hamburgers made with Snider's Chili Pepper Catsup have a fun-loving flavor that is truly unusual. That's the Snider zing—which comes from a whisper of the high-spirited chili pepper. Snider's brightens every dish you pour it on, too.

1 pound ground beef
½ teasp. salt
1 tablesp. grated onion
¾ cup Snider's Chili Pepper Catsup
2 tablesp. water

Lightly mix beef, salt, onion and ¼ cup catsup; form into 4 patties. Brown on both sides in skillet; drain off excess fat. Combine remaining ½ cup catsup with water; pour over patties, cover and simmer 10 minutes. Turn patties over after 5 minutes and spoon sauce over meat. Serve on toast, or between toasted hamburger bun halves. Makes 4 servings.

Snider Foods, Inc., Fullerton, Calif.

ED FROM PAGE 109

was a big victory parade to the White hen the family returned from Inde-
. Where just four years before Presinan rode in a similar parade as Vice -elect, now he was the President and
-elect both. With him was Vice Presi-Barkley. It was a modest but very nily and we all were happy for them.
th the White House falling down,
d to be made to vacate. There was loving to several other places before ion was made to move to the Blair
e had to start packing china, silver, d other equipment for storage and to he Blair house. Most of the White ings which we took were put in the se. A door was cut through on the r, the two kitchens had connecting d on the top floor you could go from e to the other. We used the Lee house luncheons and dinners. The Blair om was smaller and the family used m.

Geaney, the housekeeper for the Gist emained when the house was turned he State Department. She was very f some rare old pieces of silver and re also choice pieces of Spode, Min-esden, Wedgwood and Sandwich
e old house was filled with historical , including some letters from Presi-coln to the first Mr. Gist Blair, who son of Montgomery Blair, who was er of the Lincoln Cabinet. The quarre we butlers changed our clothes the slave quarters where the servants ked in at night. The bars were still on lows.

gh the Blair house was a very old and e place, we just would not have room y big entertaining there. The dining the Lee side could seat only about 22
By combining the two sitting rooms, accommodate about 100 people for a e had a lot of small teas. The inaugu-heon, reception and dinners had to be ewhere.

ception was at the Mellon art gallery.
supplied the service for the guests served the President's table. The Wal-Truman families were house guests cept for a few personal friends, these ilies occupied our time. I took my sec-n, John Ficklin, to the art gallery to e President's table and left Charles the first man, in charge to prepare the hat night. My wife and I received an n to attend the Inaugural Ball. Of e were not able to attend, but we have d this invitation for our great-grand-
.

Geaney, who had always been in f the Blair house, was finding it diffiget along with the ushers who really the White House. I never found out story, but by April of 1949 she moved e Blair house. The head cook, Eliza-d her assistant also left. This, too, I ew the reasons for.

n the afternoon of April 27 Mr. Crim, f usher, called me to his office and said sident and Mrs. Truman wanted me to l charge and especially to organize the
and plan all the menus,
the kitchen personnel was organized,
to work out a system to keep track of ought and used. No real records had pt of cost, the amount of food used amount remaining. Each month there-rs. Truman could go over the records
w the actual cost of running the house-

g the Roosevelt Administration cerople would call and say, "I have to
e. Can you send me a tray?" Or "I am wo or three people in for lunch." Who uestion their authority? Yet these bills e paid by the President, and not out of e fund. I have heard President Rooseon a number of occasions, "I am not have these folks eating on me." Ex-official functions, the President has to each guest invited to dine with him. Of he Trumans were never the type to go bring back guests the way the Roosevelts did—especially Mrs. Roosevelt and the children.

Preparing menus for the Trumans was not too easy. Not that they were difficult to please or fussy, but Mrs. Truman was on a salt-free diet, the President required a low-calorie and high-protein diet, and Mrs. Wallace needed all the calories she could get. Miss Margaret was away most of the time, working at her career of singing and the stage. Only when she was home could we go overboard. The family meals were simple three-course affairs except for Sundays or when guests had been invited.

Miss Margaret had a dinner dance and buffet supper in May, 1949, my first of such affairs after taking over full command. Of course we had had teas—many of them—prior to this. At one of these teas Mrs. Roosevelt and Grandma Moses were present. It was the first time Mrs. Roosevelt had been to see us since 1945 and we all were very glad to see her. Grandma Moses asked the President to play the piano for her and seemed so proud when he did. I must say Grandma Moses was without a doubt the darling of that party.

On October 11 we had a state visit from His Excellency Jawaharlal Nehru, the Prime Minister of India. His sister, Mme. Pandit, was the ambassadress from India. She was one of the most attractive women in the diplomatic world. Prime Minister Nehru had a noble-looking face with wise, mystic eyes. Perhaps his native dress added to that mystic look. He also had a most vibrant, musical voice. On first seeing him, you might expect him to be warm and friendly, but you never found that to be so. Mme. Pandit, however, was a friendly person.

Sunday, June 25, 1950, was to me like most of my weekends when the wife was away. Since her last operation she had usually left for Boston and the Lahey Clinic in early April. I really dreaded weekends, especially when the President and the family were away. This was one of Washington's hot June Sundays. I skipped church and did not even bother to shave. Around 4 P.M. my phone started to ring. I lifted the receiver to find that Mr. Claunch, the White House usher, was on the other end.

He said, "Fields, the President is flying back from Independence. He has invited the chiefs of staff, the Secretary of State and some others for dinner tonight. He is due at eight-thirty and the guests have been invited for eight o'clock. You are to have cocktails and hors d'oeuvres for them while they are waiting. When he comes they will go right in to dinner."

While he was talking I was planning what to have for dinner and also how many of the help I could round up, for we had let them all off for the weekend. I asked Mr. Claunch to see what he could do in helping me locate a crew through police calls and radio. I was able to locate two cooks and in the cab on my way to the White House I made up a menu.

I gave the menu to the cooks and started to prepare the hors d'oeuvres and set the table. At eight o'clock it appeared as if I might have to serve the dinner myself. Cocktails were being served when three of the butlers arrived. They finished readying the table while I served the cocktails.

There was conversation about the Korean situation and Secretary Johnson asked Secretary Acheson, "How did the President take it when you told him?" The Secretary replied, "He did not hesitate a second. He was positive and all action."

General Omar Bradley and Admiral Sawyer were in a huddle. There was much talk of terrain and air support.

The President arrived at 8:30 and I said. "Good evening, sir. We are ready."

This is how the Korean war started with me.

On Monday we had a Cabinet luncheon and General Bradley brought maps along and the progress of the "police action," as it was called then, was explained to the Cabinet.

On All Saints' Day, November 1, 1950, at about 2 P.M. I was in the kitchen going over the menus for the next day when suddenly Miss Walker, the assistant housekeeper, rushed in hysterically saying, "They are shooting at each other in the street and White House policeman Downs is in the office bleeding."

I rushed into the office, wondering what the police were doing shooting at one another. I found Officer Downs lying on a couch with wounds in his chest, neck and abdomen. I moved him to a supine position on the floor and asked the chef, Medina, to bring me towels. I had to cut the blood-soaked tie off his neck and attempted to apply pressure bandages to stop the bleeding. I asked the mess attendant from the Navy to get an ambulance. I don't know where Smith and Medina went, but it seemed like ages that I was there alone, trying to aid the wounded officer. He was constantly trying to get up and I was almost forced to hold him down, for he was losing so much blood.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 113

NEXT MONTH

Summer is a salad basket

Nothing cools down a simmering day so satisfyingly as salad. Start your collection now with Salad Niçoise (a French classic), Potato Salad Caruso (there's bacon in it), Shrimp and Artichokes Vinaigrette, Spanish Lobster Salad, Salad Valencienne, Chef's Salad (ah, madame—but with a difference!), or how about a molded honeydew-melon aspic? This summertime, your livin' will be easy.

The young American's world of fashion

Four pages of smart, beauty-making, up-to-the-minute fashions, photographed on actual college girls, career girls, secretaries and housewives for whom they were designed. Here you are, bright young things of America. These are the clothes for the life you lead so well.

Half a woman is better than one when that one weighs 320 pounds

This is the true story of Shirley Hambriek, housewife and mother, who reduced from 320 pounds to 160 and found her new life far outweighing the old in terms of happiness and health. How did Shirley do it? Here are data sheets on the diet she followed, complete with photographs of the happily shrinking woman. By Dawn Crowell Norman.

What do these women have in common?

Money. Lots and lots of money. One is a queen and one an ex-queen. Two are of the nobility. One was a beauty-contest winner and another a chorus girl. Their possessions are extraordinary: one owns a herd of wild boars and forty diamond tiaras; one keeps the skull of an ancient enemy; another enshrines Gandhi's sandals in her prayer room. Horses are the passion of a Frenchwoman, while an American tried to buy the Brooklyn Dodgers. Find out who they are and which country is the home of their acknowledged champion in "The Richest Woman in the World." By Margaret Parton and Peter Briggs.

Wait till you try Joanne Woodward's recipes!

Her chicken-and-ham casserole, for instance, is wonderfully easy, but guests always seem impressed. Joanne's hollandaise sauce profited from that embarrassing time when she smothered friends with an experimental recipe for asparagus pie. She makes a grapefruit cake that is very much like the Brown Derby's famous, deep-secret one. Anyway, Paul thinks so! You'll enjoy visiting the Newman kitchen in "I Love Learning to Cook."

Also, Stuart Cloete's new tale of courage and a girl, "Throw Your Heart Over"; a dip into the social swim with Pat Boone; "Tell Me, Doctor" (on correcting male sterility); "What Makes Her Look So Pretty?"; a last chance to look over Alonzo Fields' shoulder at the passing parade of Presidents; Doctor Spock on what a doctor looks for when he gives your child a checkup; stories; poems; everything

IN THE AUGUST JOURNAL

NEW BETTY CROCKER COUNTRY KITCHEN CAKE MIX

"Make somebody  happy in your house with one of our new Country Kitchen Cakes. They taste as rich—and keep as fresh—as homemade butter cake. Homemade wholesome, too. Chocolate Cream Cake recipe on the Devils Food package."

the red spoon Betty Crocker tells you it's Betty Crocker good and General Mills guarantees it!

ED FROM PAGE 111

another messenger, heard I was h the wounded officer and came to en the ambulance arrived, but the l an attendant were busy picking up who had been wounded. Later I hat this man was dead.
t time a police wagon had pulled up
e officers, and we carried Officer the patrol wagon. After they drove hospital I learned what had caused xcitement. Two Puerto Ricans had attempt on the President's life by through the front door of the Blair White House policemen Birrell and were wounded and White House n Coffelt had been slain.
eath of White House policeman was almost unbelievable, for I had king to him just about twenty min-ore he went on duty.
well that the Puerto Ricans did not plans for their attempt on the Presi-e for, if they had, they might have at ered the house, which would have very nasty situation. The post where ouse policeman Coffelt was slain left side of the house unprotected. Of he President was on the Blair side, he second floor you could easily go
Lee house into the Blair house.
President was upstairs taking a nap
e commotion started and, without bee of his own danger, was watching the om the front windows. Of course it is a President to believe that anyone ant to harm him, but as soon as he is he becomes the target of well-wishers, ers, know-allers, faultfinders and
ts. I understand that this feeling that would want to harm him had placed ds at a handicap. The house is right on et and anyone could walk right up to t steps or side entrances without being ted unless he started up the steps.
that time on no sidewalk traffic was ed on that side of the street and bullet-ass was installed in the windows.
uneral service for White House po-Coffelt was attended by the President, uman, Miss Margaret and the Cabicers. I was asked to represent the old help with Mitchell, who was in of the presidential train when he went and at other times was on the mestaff.
I been caught unprepared and was
d of the hat I was wearing. The weather y cold and I had to walk across the reach the car assigned for the service.
ise I would not have needed a hat, but cold so easily without one. Mitchell eady in the car and looked so well
d.
ere sitting together and the car was for someone else. When the other perived, it turned out to be Ambassador an. When I saw his hat I felt relieved, ought, "If Mr. Harriman with all his can wear a hat like that, what have I hamed of?"

December of 1950 and early January, its of conversations I heard from the members, the world was again faced re of a third world war. The President y angry with Prime Minister Attlee. I nderstood the full details but I knew ough the general public thought all was e President and members of the Cabinet ving moments of anxiety.
nuary we started a series of teas for s in the hospitals and in and around gton. We would have two and some-ree a week, and served cider, cola, tea, nd real homemade doughnuts, sandcandies and nuts. The President would attend these affairs. Many a Wac, r G.I. would be amazed to turn around d themselves face to face with the nt, saying, "Hello there, how are you?
y treating you right?" He would enter t an aide's announcing him. President n seemed to get a great kick out of ing with these service people.
ard a sailor telling a friend how he around and there he was, facing the President. He said, "Gee, fellows, I almost lost my voice. Wait till I tell them at home about this. I was kidding and telling them what I was going to say to Harry and they bet me I wouldn't even see him. I know they aren't going to believe this. How can I make them believe me?"

On June 17 Mr. Crim requested me to have a complete setup for a formal tea but no tea for a group of six or eight newspaperwomen. He said, "Mr. West will usher them in and you are to be nearby in case any questions are asked about the china and so forth."

At 10:30 Mr. West ushered the ladies in and they started plying him with questions. I was standing in the background and he called the ladies' attention to me and the questions came my way. I explained about the different chinas, silverwares and linens and was questioned about the gold flatware service used at state dinners.

I explained the history of the service. Then they asked how many complete settings we could provide for. This was my chance, so I told them the story; how we had to wash tablespoons and dessert spoons used for soup and then rush back for another course, that we had no fish forks and knives and no salad forks.

When we had the King and Queen of England in 1939 I had mentioned all this to President Roosevelt, but he said buying gold tableware would be criticized by the politicians. I felt that these ladies might tell the public about this and appeal to the pride of the people of the richest country, as the White House was their house for entertaining the prominent people of the world.

We did finally complete the gold service and, besides that, bought some very much needed china which is called the Truman china. It is Lenox, as are the two other American-made sets of china in the house, the Wilson and F.D.R. china. The Wilson and F.D.R. chinas are blue and gold on a bone-white background. The Truman china is green and gold against the bone-white background. The coat of arms on the Truman china has the eagle looking toward the talon holding the olive branch of peace. The Wilson and F.D.R. chinas show the eagle looking toward the talon holding the arrows which are symbolic of war. This change was also made by President Truman on the presidential flags and seals.

The crowning and most important social event of 1951 was the visit of Princess Elizabeth of England and the Duke of Edinburgh. The royal party arrived at the Blair house late in the afternoon of October 31. They were scheduled to go to a press reception at 5:15, so we did not have a state tea. We had small tea trays for the princess and the duke in their bedrooms and set up tea in the Lee sitting room for the aide, secretary and lady in waiting. But her Royal Highness and the duke, instead of having tea in their rooms, joined the others in the sitting room. Dinner was at 8 P.M. for 22 guests; 100 more had been invited to the reception after dinner.

The princess, a very charming, angelic-appearing young woman, was small. Her profile showed her mother's graciousness, while, facing you, she had the eyes and noble expression of her father, King George. The duke, a tall, handsome, blond man with an irrepressible personality, seemed always to be keeping himself in the background—never appearing other than a devoted subject and escort, not as a husband. He walked into the room a pace or two behind the princess. From all appearances, the duke was well equipped to be a consort and companion to the queen and share her glory.

Mrs. Truman selected the following menu for dinner that night:

BLUE POINTS ON HALF SHELL
COCKTAIL SAUCE, LEMON WEDGES CRACKERS

SHERRY
CLEAR SOUP WITH MARROW BALLS
CELERY HEARTS ASSORTED OLIVES
MELBA TOAST

WHITE WINE
LOBSTER THERMIDOR
PARSLEYED SLICED TOMATOES AND CUCUMBERS
WHOLE-WHEAT-BREAD SANDWICHES

RED WINE
ROAST FILLET BEEF
WINE ESSENCE
WATERMELON PICKLES
BROILED MUSHROOMS
FRENCH FRIED POTATO BALLS
ASPARAGUS HOLLANDAISE

CHAMPAGNE
GREEN SALAD WITH ARTICHOKE HEARTS
BAKED OLD MISSOURI HAM
HERB FRENCH DRESSING
CORN STICKS

VANILLA-ICE-CREAM MELON MOLDS
BRANDIED MACAROONS
ANGEL-FOOD CAKE

Next morning at 8 o'clock Princess Elizabeth had a cup of coffee and glass of orange juice. Breakfast was served to the royal party in the Lee sitting room at 9 o'clock. It consisted of melon, orange juice, scrambled eggs, bacon and sausages, toast, hot biscuits and marmalade and tea. The princess had cream in her tea. Besides her Royal Highness and the duke, the royal party included Mrs. Andrew Elphinstone, lady in waiting, and Lieut. Michael Parker, the duke's aide.

I went up to check the service and to announce breakfast. Princess Elizabeth and the others were ready, except for the duke. I seated her Royal Highness and the others and they had nearly finished their melon when in rushed the duke, saying, "I'm afraid I am a little late."

He was in his shirt sleeves with his collar open and he grabbed a seat before anyone could seat him. The princess did not stop eating her melon, although the others stood while the duke was taking a seat. Seeing the duke there in his shirt sleeves with his collar open gave me the feeling that this was the behavior of a commoner and not what you would expect from royalty. And I admired his audacity, for I know what a blasting I would have got if I had been visiting with my wife and had come out in my shirt sleeves, or even at home when we had guests. It was pleasing to find the duke to be a human being who, no doubt, felt more comfortable in his shirt sleeves when at least one meal could be homelike.

After breakfast the next day we said good-by to H.R.H. Princess Elizabeth, the duke and their royal party. This charming young woman soon was destined to be the ruler of the great British Empire. On this visit we found that the duke's valet and the princess' maid were real nice people without any of the ways that had made problems with the royal servants of the princess' parents, King George and Queen Elizabeth, in 1939. I still regret that I was not able to complete the cycle with Princess Elizabeth after she was crowned queen as I had with Princess Juliana of Holland after she became Queen Juliana.

January of 1952 found us again entertaining Prime Minister Churchill. I have already described this visit. We learned that, although failing, the old lion was still able to roar.

TO BE CONCLUDED

A LIFE MAY BE SAVED

"GUY IS DROWNED!" His brother was terrified, and so was his mother as she rushed across the yard to the pool, pulled out her three-year-old and found he had already stopped breathing. But, putting her mouth to the child's, she managed to start his breathing again. That was in California. In Michigan a young woman saved a dinner companion who had a heart attack—again, by using artificial respiration. A girl of ten (St. Paul, Minnesota) revived her two-year-old sister, unconscious after a convulsion. "I read in the newspaper how one kid saved another's life by breathing in his mouth," she explained.

Every time an article on mouth-to-mouth respiration is published, the American Red Cross receives accounts of lives saved because readers have used its newly approved method of restoring breathing.

The technique is very simple:

If there is foreign matter visible in the mouth, wipe it out quickly with the fingers or with a cloth wrapped around the fingers. Then:

1. Tilt the head back so the chin is pointing upward. Pull or push the jaw into a jutting-out position. These maneuvers should relieve obstruction of the airway by moving the base of the tongue away from the back of the throat.

2. Open your mouth wide and place it tightly over the victim's mouth. At the same time, pinch the victim's nostrils shut or close the nostrils with your cheek, or close the victim's mouth and place your mouth over the nose. Blow into the victim's mouth or nose. (Air may be blown through the victim's teeth, even though they may be clenched.)

3. Remove your mouth, turn your head to the side, and listen for the return rush of air that indicates air exchange. Repeat the blowing effort, occasionally checking on air exchange until the victim begins to breathe for himself.

If the victim is a child, you will place your mouth over both his nose and mouth, and take relatively shallow breaths appropriate to his size—about 20 a minute. (The rate for adults: 12 breaths a minute.)

If your blowing efforts fail to get air exchange, the airway may be obstructed. Recheck head and jaw position. In the case of a child, upend him by the ankles and administer two or three sharp slaps between the shoulder blades. An adult, too heavy to lift, may be turned on his side so that blows on the back can dislodge obstructing matter.

Rescuers who do not wish to come in contact with the victim may hold a cloth over his mouth or nose, and breathe through that. Or they may use a manual method of artificial respiration—the Nielsen back-pressure/arm-lift or the Silvester chest-pressure/arm-lift method. Red Cross courses still include these, since rescuers confronting cases of electric shock, drug poisoning or carbon monoxide poisoning, in which recovery is slow, sometimes find it less exhausting to use more than one method.

PARACELSUS—Stormy Petrel of Medicine—reproduced here is one of a series of original oil paintings commissioned by Parke-Davis

Great Moments in Medicine

In the Renaissance laboratories of Swiss-born Paracelsus (1493-1541) were produced many things: chemicals, complex medicines, serious medical writings, mysticism, and abusive attacks upon medical colleagues, religionists, and politicians. A controversial figure, he was forced to move frequently and travel widely. His contributions, however, were important. He helped guide medical men away from the mistakes of Galen and Avicenna; directed their thoughts toward rational research; and advocated the use of pure chemicals in medical practice.

Though crude when measured by our modern standards, Paracelsus' efforts pointed the way toward today's highly advanced and diversifi development of pure drug products for medicinal use.

For nearly ten decades, Parke-Davis has diligently sought to discover n and better medicines, both in nature and in the creation of new compoun in its research laboratories. This patient, costly, and time-consuming r search has led to some of the finest therapeutic agents available to mode medicine. Through its development, testing, manufacturing, and distrib tion facilities, Parke-Davis has made these life-giving, life-saving medicin available for physicians to prescribe throughout the world.

COPYRIGHT 1958-1960—PARKE, DAVIS & COMPANY, DETROIT 32, MICHIG

PARKE-DAVIS . . . Pioneers in better medicines

That Old-Time Religion

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN

The evening service of Camp Meeting is well under way, but the cooling breeze is late tonight, and here and there along the slatted wood benches women are stirring the Georgia heat with cardboard fans ♦ Hymns have been sung and prayers said; now four men in shirt sleeves are moving up the straw-covered aisles to collect the offering ♦ Overhead, moths and beetles bang against the lights; a baby stirs in his mother's lap and cries ♦ Down by Dykes Creek a tree toad croaks, breaking into the shrill whir of cicadas ♦♦♦ The minister rises, looks out over the congregation ♦ "Now I know that I don't need to introduce the Kerce sisters, who will provide our special music. You all know Ann and Judye and Ludye. They have been singing here since they were just little children, and had to stand on an orange crate! But let us give special thanks tonight that such fine girls have seen fit to dedicate their great talent to the Lord's service."

Meet Nolon Kerce and his three daughters.

There is a ripple of appreciation as three pretty girls in full-skirted pastel dresses leave the choir and move together. Ann stands serenely, flanked by the twins—tall dreamy Ludye, and piquant Judye. As the pianist plays the opening bars of a familiar hymn, the young voices float out over a silent congregation.

"Give of your best to the Master,
Give of the strength of your youth . . ."

As the girls sing, there are many who watch them with pride and affection: aunts and uncles, cousins, friends. But proudest of all is the stocky, middle-aged man sitting off to himself on a back bench. He is Nolon Kerce, the girls' father; and his pride is not so much for their considerable talent in music, their fresh prettiness, their popularity among young people and old. Nolon is proud, mostly, that the girls are good girls; and that now, with Ludye happily married and Ann through college and Judye working at the radio station, he can sit back and relax and think, "I did the best I could, and that's all any man can do."

Religion is more than a Sunday ritual to the people who live in the rolling green countryside north of Rome, Georgia; and Methodist Camp Meeting (traditionally held between lyin'-by time and fodder-pullin' time) is the highlight of the year for many families who look forward to "tenting" on the pleasant grounds, attending services morning, noon and night, visiting with kin they don't see from one August to the next. Most of the twenty-seven families who hold cabins, or "tents," at Morrison Camp Ground have been coming for more years than they care to count; Nolon Kerce can remember driving up the oak-shaded road in a wagon pulled by a mule, mattresses piled up high, and a couple of cows trailing behind. He remembers, too, the watermelons and milk jugs cooling in Dykes Creek, the couples courting on the rocks above the spring, the thatch-roofed arbor where preachers threatened hellfire and damnation while the congregation shouted back "Yes, Jesus" and "Amen."

Things are a little different now. People might be embarrassed if someone shouted the way Nolon's own mother used to; preachers don't expect to convert the whole camp meeting with one dramatic sermon. Families no longer cook and pack enough food to last a week; most of the cabins today have stoves, iceboxes and electric lights, and the nearest grocery store is only a few minutes away by automobile.

But, after all, there haven't been many changes in the ninety-two years since the first Methodist meeting was held at Morrison Camp Ground. The old hymns ring out with the old fervor: "Leaning on the Everlasting Arms"; "Dwelling in Beulah Land"; "Blessed Assurance." The men still gather after the CONTINUED ON PAGE 118

PHOTOGRAPHS BY CARROLL SEGHERS II

"Mother was an all-around person; everybody liked her!" Ludye, Ann and Judye take after their mother in versatility, popularity.

n: "We always went to church—bet we haven't missed five times!"

Camp days are filled with fun: melon cuts, cookouts, ball games.

Ann: "We had everything we wanted."

lon: "My father inherited the land from his father; I help him farm a little."

HOW THE KERCES SPEND THEIR MONEY

Income: Mr. Kerce makes $400 a month from Pepperell, plus some earnings (highly irregular) from outside plumbing work. Farm produces food but no income.

Monthly expenses:

Food (raises vegetables, fruit, chickens, beef, and milks own cow)	$23.00
Clothing	40.00
Property tax	2.10
Fuel, light	16.00
Telephone	6.00
Insurance ($500 each on girls paid up)	4.00
Medical and dental	12.00
Recreation	10.00
Church	35.00
Car insurance and expenses	41.25
Other transportation	4.10
Dry cleaning, shoe repair	6.00
Children's school expenses	103.00
Newspapers	3.10
Cigarettes for Mr. Kerce	2.00
Vacation fund (camp-meeting expenses, including cook)	5.00
Savings fund (buys a bond every three weeks)	25.00
Income taxes, Social Security	30.00
Other ($500 a year for father's expenses and support)	43.00
Total	$410.55

Nolon is a strict father, but a fair one.

olon: "I've got confidence in my girls. They're smart; they make up their own minds."

Since childhood the girls have juggled housework, churchwork, school, social life.

ddye was the first bride married in the new Methodist church her father helped build.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 116

evening service to debate Brother Brackman's sermon; the women sit and talk about their children or swap recipes; the little boys run barefooted down to the creek to catch frogs; and the teenaged girls stroll arm in arm and whisper about their beaux. There are watermelon cuts and ice-cream-freezing parties and family picnics. The preachers still go from tent to tent for their meals: hearty breakfasts of country-smoked ham, eggs, grits, biscuits, jelly and coffee; barbecued-chicken suppers with side dishes of field peas, okra, corn, rice and gravy, greens, corn bread and sweet-potato pie. At night there is the comfortable sound of rain on a tin roof; in the morning, the sharp smell of wood smoke. Best of all, there is the special simplicity of living and warmth of fellowship that made Ann Kerce say, "If you're ever out here tenting one year, it just about kills you not to come back."

One of the first memories Judye Kerce has of camp meeting is standing with her sisters outside a neighbor's tent, singing "Happy Birthday to You," and holding out some tea towels her mother had embroidered. The neighbor, Mrs. Ransom, remembers it too:

"Those twins could carry a tune before they could talk! And they always had nice manners. Dorma taught them that—she was the kindest woman I ever knew, she never forgot anyone's birthday. I still have those tea towels in a drawer; it makes me cry to think of it."

In those days, the Kerce sisters were happy, carefree youngsters who took for granted their happiness and their right to be carefree. They lived modestly but comfortably in the small white fieldstone-and-frame house their father had built, played with their dogs and cats, watched their father milk the cows, visited their cousins. On Sundays the whole family went to the Mizpah Methodist Church; their mother played the organ and the girls soon joined the choir. At Thanksgiving, Christmas and the Fourth of July, they visited their Grandmother Barton in a pocket of the mountains near Everitt Springs; and every summer there was a Barton family reunion, with nearly a hundred of their mother's relatives coming from all over Floyd County.

Later on, there was school. Judye and Ludye dressed alike, and this caused a few tears, since Judye had had whooping cough and pneumonia as an infant and was never as tall as her twin; sometimes they couldn't find dresses alike in different sizes, and often they couldn't agree on color. People said Judye had the Kerce temper and Ludye her mother's happy, easygoing nature. But Judye had her mother's quick energy: nobody could get as much done as Dorma Kerce. "If you started out to haul as much flour as Dorma used up making cakes for her friends, you'd fill up a couple of pickup trucks!" Everlastingly busy with her own gardening, housekeeping and canning, Dorma somehow found time to visit the sick and the poor, devote many hours a week to church work, do "nice things" for her sisters and brothers. At camp meeting, her excess of vitality often sent her out to play softball with the men. No wonder, then, that when Ann wanted to "help" her mother cook dinner or clear the table, Dorma usually found it easier and faster to do the work herself!

Ann was twelve and the twins ten the fall their mother got sick and had to go to the hospital. Judye and Ludye went to visit Uncle Wint and Aunt Frances Barton in Rome; Ann stayed with Uncle Bill and Aunt Willene Willis. Ann enjoyed the novelty of playing with her older cousins Spencer and David, and Susie Barton started dressing like Judye and Ludye and became almost a third twin. The girls were busy at school, occupied with piano lessons, choir, making new friends—it was hard to believe that anything very terrible could happen to them.

But something terrible did happen. In February, their mother died.

"If it hadn't been for those girls, I wouldn't say where I might be today. When Dorma went away, I didn't much care what happened to me. But then I thought, 'I've got a job to do. I've got to raise those girls.' That's all that kept me going."

Nolon Kerce never really looked at another woman after he saw dark-haired Dorma Barton, the attractive and vivacious young woman who had come to teach in the two-room schoolhouse on Wayside Road where Nolon, and Nolon's father before him, had learned to read and write. That Dorma was better educated than he didn't matter; Nolon was young and confident and had behind him good German-American ancestors and a 240-acre farm he'd someday inherit. Courting Dorma that winter of 1934 was even more fun because Nolon's best friend, Tobe Wiseman, was equally determined to marry Dorma's best friend, Annie Laura. Both courtships were successful: Nolon and Dorma were married in March, in good time to attend their friends' wedding in June.

At first Nolon and Dorma lived with his parents. But Dorma wanted a home of her own, so Nolon began to build it—just down the hill on Wayside Road. Since Nolon was working as a plumber at the Pepperell plant in nearby Lindale, he could spend only early-morning and late-evening hours working on the house. Dorma became impatient. One day she persuaded her father-in-law to help her move all their clothes and furniture down the hill. When Nolon got home, he said, "The house isn't finished yet!" "It's finished enough for me," said Dorma with spirit.

Nolon learned to count on that spirit, those deep reserves of strength that kept his wife even-tempered and optimistic through the years of childbearing, hard work, lean living. It was partly because of Dorma's proved vitality that Nolon didn't worry too much when the cow knocked her off the orange stool; didn't begin to guess what long anguish would follow. But as he recalls it, the story has a sad inevitability.

"Dorma always milked at night and I in the morning. There was a little orange stool we sat on, and something, maybe a cat, startled the cow one night so that she knocked Dorma right off the stool. She didn't seem hurt, but there was a black bruise on her hip that didn't go away, and finally I said she'd better go to the doctor.

"When the doctor sent for me I knew there was something bad wrong with Dorma. He told me, 'Leukemia.' I said, 'Doc, can there anything be done?' and he said, 'Mighty little.' Well, I'd rather he'd just knocked me in the head than tell me that. He said she had maybe a year and a half. Dorma thought she had a cancer, but I told her no, she'd be all right.

"Well, she lost a lot of flesh but she wouldn't give up, and that year I reckon she got more done than she ever had—canning and gardening and church work and being with the girls. One thing she kept saying she wanted was a new automobile. So I sold off some timber and bought one and Dorma drove it for six months—I never have been sorry about that.

"Then camp meeting came around; it was rainy and cold. She went through that very well. But one evening she was sitting on the bench outside the tent, smiling but so weak she couldn't keep her lids open. I said, 'Mamma, I believe you're sick.' That night she woke me up and said part of her face was numb.

"From September on she was in and out of the hospital, she had nineteen blood transfusions in all. I remember very well she was there at Thanksgiving time, because we usually have a nice family feast at her mother's then; we men all go hunting. This Thanksgiving was cold; I had to keep my overcoat on in the hospital, and call for more blankets for Dorma. At Christmastime she seemed better and we were all together again, but on Christmas Day her fever went to a hundred and six and we had to take her back to the hospital.

"She went away on Sunday afternoon at three, February eleventh. The girls were at their Aunt Frances' house, and I got her to tell them. I couldn't have done it."

"When Dorma died," a relative remembers, "Nolon said, 'The only thing I ask is to be able to keep these girls together and raise them myself.' We wanted to help. We could have done more for them, but Nolon wouldn't let us; he didn't want to be indebted to anyone."

Nolon, an only child himself, was understandably reluctant to call on his wife's large family for financial or moral support. After the funeral, he took his bewildered daughters away from their solicitous aunts in Rome, back to the small country house where spring was just beginning to freshen the fruit trees. He hired a housekeeper, worked harder than ever on the farm, at his work at the Pepperell p at outside plumbing jobs. But Dorma's illness had been expensive and Nolon $1500; he had to ask a brother-in-law loan. "I won't ever forget what he did," Nolon. "He just put $500 into my hand didn't ask for a cent of interest. He tol he'd give me $1000 if I needed it. A finer never lived."

Others proved kind. The aunts bro cakes and covered dishes, or dresses fo little girls. The Reverend J. W. Eberhart, minister of the Mizpah Methodist Church fered spiritual help. Friends gave advice services. When August came, and N doubted if he'd be able to leave farm and for the ten days of camp meeting, rel from both sides of the family were eag stay with the girls in the Kerce tent.

By the time school started in the fall, Nolon and his children had had enough o aged housekeeper. ("What good does do?" asked Judye scornfully. "She doe even wash the dishes!") One night Nolon down at the kitchen table and drew up elaborate chart, apportioning all househ duties among his three daughters. Ann, Ju and Ludye looked it over carefully, nod obediently, and then revised it from star finish. When they were through, they ha simple but effective system that was to rem basically the same for ten years:

Monday: ANN: plan and cook breakfast an supper, pack lunches
JUDYE: make beds, wash dishes
LUDYE: straighten house, dry dishes, feed chickens

Tuesday: JUDYE: plan and cook breakfast and supper, pack lunches . . .

The division of chores remained the sa from day to day; the girls rotated. At first, the heavy house cleaning, washing and ir ing were done on weekends; later, as the g became more skillful, they could get some the difficult work done during the week, in der to be free on Saturdays to ride into to with their father, to visit their cousins or e to do a little shopping. For already they w buying their own clothes.

"Daddy never told us what to buy," A remembers. "Even if we bought somethi tacky, he always noticed it was new and told we looked nice. Pretty soon we learned it w better not to buy so much, and to get bet things. And Aunt Florence, who works in dress shop, gave us a lot of advice."

Learning to cook was a question of sink swim. "We had to learn how, so we did eventually," says Ludye, laughing. Ann s recalls with sheer horror the time she disco ered that dried beans swell when they a boiled. And Judye's first piecrust was n nearly so light and crisp as those she's famo for today. But their father was never hard please, and by the time they were eleven a thirteen, the Kerce sisters had adopted the mother's custom of baking birthday cakes f friends.

Those first two years, Nolon was workin especially hard, trying to get out of debt. Whe he came home he was tired, and occasional he would fuss. "I told them to see who cou do the most, but sometimes it seemed like the tried to see who could do the least," he say now. Once when he caught Judye out feedin the chickens in her good school clothes, h whipped her. On Sundays he tried to make u for his strictness by cooking breakfast for h daughters, taking them to Sunday school an church, driving them to visit relatives in th afternoon. But often he found himself havin to work on Sunday.

Judye, Ludye and Ann would be astonishe today to hear how their father worried abou their considerable responsibilities. "Most o the time we went just about everywhere w wanted," Ann says, looking back. "If w wanted to go to a basketball game or a clu meeting, we'd just hurry home and do th chores so we could go with an easy con science." Ludye agrees: "Daddy'd alway make us get our work done first, but we' finish fast and go on, and he didn't mind. H was very good to us, as long as we didn't tal sharp, or lie." And Judye, though she admit

"Oh, boy, back to fudge sundaes!"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 12

Fancy Frank Fry

Choose your favorite fillings— for a delicious change!

ad wants cheese strips—Johnny votes for sweet ckle relish—

The whole family has fun choosing favorite lings for these Fancy Franks. The combination flavors is really delicious!

That's because Hunt's Tomato Sauce blends em together so nicely. Mingles with the meat rices and the different filling flavors—to make spicy tomato gravy that turns frankfurters into n exciting new dish!

Rich tomato, red-ripe tomato, tomato through nd through—that's Hunt's Tomato Sauce. Try its ettle-simmered goodness in your own meatloaf, hamburgers, stew, casseroles, soup and leftovers. Enjoy Quick Stunts with Hunt's at your house!

1 lb. frankfurters (10 to 12)

Assorted fillings: Strips of cheese or dill pickle, sweet pickle relish, finely chopped onion, crushed pineapple

½ lb. bacon (10 to 12 strips)

2 8-oz. cans Hunt's Tomato Sauce

2 teasps. sugar ¼ teasp. dry mustard

Slit the franks lengthwise but don't cut completely through. Fill with fillings. Wrap a strip of bacon tightly around each frank, covering slit well. Pin bacon ends to frank with short pieces of toothpick. Place in cold skillet. Fry over medium heat, turning often, until bacon is crisp and lightly browned. Pour off excess fat. Add Hunt's Tomato Sauce, sugar and mustard. Blend well. Simmer 10 to 15 minutes. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Hunt-for the best

HELPFUL RECIPES on every can. Also, write for FREE Recipe Booklet, "Easy One-Dish Meals." Hunt Foods, Dept. K-7, P.O. Box 251, Fullerton, California. In Canada: Hunt Foods, Tilbury, Ontario.

Only Royal brings you
Ripe, Juicy Blackberry Flavor

Get New Royal Blackberry...Try It And See Tastes Like Fresh Fruit*
And Has Vitamin-C

Royal

Thousands of tiny flavor bursts give you more fresh fruit-like flavor than ever before

Now . . . a new kind of gelatin! A gelatin that has captured the fresh juicy taste of tree-ripened fruit and sealed it in thousands of tiny flavor bursts. Add hot water and Royal's flavor bursts explode in a swirl of delicious fruit-like flavors.

Royal brings you ten delightful flavors—Strawberry, Raspberry, Cherry, Orange, Lemon, Lime, including these four distinctively different flavors:

BLACKBERRY WATERMELON
PINEAPPLE PEACH

For Exciting Flavors Switch to Royal

Natural fresh-fruit flavor enhanced with artificial flavor.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF STANDARD BRANDS INC.

NUED FROM PAGE 118

any of her schoolmates had fewer than she, never felt set apart from the "If I had someplace special to go, I'd n or Ludye to feed the chickens or e dishes for me. Usually they'd argue, metimes we'd even hit a lick or two, but end up co-operating. Another time, I'd same for them. Co-operation was what our system work."

such inexperienced girls could "take so quickly surprised many of their rela- I thought it was a mistake when Nolon housekeeper go," one aunt said. "I ex- Ann to be calling me up every day to w to cook something—and sometimes I, but not often." Another was shocked Nolon hand Ann a $20 bill with no in- ons as to how to spend it. "It didn't right—he ought to have told her how to spend for a school dress, how much es, how much for a sweater. But he let ure that out for herself. Ann made some ys; all the girls did. But you never heard complain about it later." Not long after a's death, a friend from out of town "Who's looking after Dorma's girls?" as astonished by the answer: "Nobody. ake care of themselves, and keep house ir father."

haps the only unsurprised observer was himself. "If children know how to do, lon't mind doing," he maintained. One on he remembers vividly. There was a at Morrison Camp Ground; the Kerces, he other families, had brought a big er of food. When Nolon stopped the car, tle girls jumped out and ran eagerly for- —but not, he noted with pride, to join ther children playing tag or pitching hoes. Instead, they took their places g the women who were setting out fried n, potato salad and lemon pies.

he girls took their responsibilities seri- , so did their father. Two years after a's death, Nolon had paid off the last s debts—but at the cost of many extra of work, many sacrificed plans. He had to improve the house before his daugh- reached adolescence. But it was a long before he was able to drill a $750 well ipe water into the house; for years every et of water had to be drawn by hand from old-fashioned stone well, and carried ing to the stove or washtub. With many s relatives and neighbors acquiring such eniences as freezers, automatic washing hines and television sets, Nolon couldn't wondering if his daughters felt envious. at every family conference they sturdily ed him up: for a long time, paying off s was more important than an indoor room, piano lessons remained more desir- than rugs to replace the linoleum on the g-room floor.

olon felt his limitations most severely n the girls entered high school. He had al- regretted his own lack of education; n he finished grammar school, there was country high school and no practical sportation to the nearest school in Rome. vas determined that his daughters should and respect learning as he did. It was tbreaking not to be able to help them with hematics and English literature, as he v Dorma could have done; he spent many rs praying that his girls would study hard without his assistance.

e needn't have worried. All three girls le excellent grades at Johnson High, and e graduated with top honors. And between r chores at home and their studies, they dwiched in an unusual number of extra- ricular activities: Ann was president of the ure Homemakers of America, and Judye ceeded her two years later; Ludye was sident and Judye vice president of the as, an honor-grade society; all three were ve in the Tri-Hi-Y and "J" clubs. They ved on the basketball and softball teams, e cheerleaders during football season. y sang in the high-school sextet and glee and the church choir—Judye eventually ame church organist. Once a week Nolon ve them into Rome for piano lessons, and heir free time they worked out close harmony for popular songs which they sang with equal enjoyment and success at casual social gatherings and more formal events such as the Kiwanis Talent Revue.

The Kerce girls had fun too. Attractive, vivacious and well dressed (they soon learned to sew, and made most of their own clothes), they were popular and began dating early. Nolon discouraged dates on school nights, and the girls themselves admitted it didn't make sense to stay up late, then wake up at six the next morning to sleepwalk through chores and go to school with homework unprepared. But on weekends there were church hay rides, basketball games, movies in Rome, bowling or roller skating. All three entertained their beaux together at home or drove to Troy's for a barbecued-beef sandwich and a soft drink. Nolon liked to see his daughters dress up for parties, and sometimes he teased them. Neither Ann nor Ludye seemed to mind, but quick-tempered Judye simply stopped dating a boy if the kidding got too hard to take.

Nolon trusted his daughters with boys precisely as he had trusted them earlier with $20 bills. He laid down three rules, which he assumed would cover all contingencies, and expected his girls to follow them. The rules were: You're not to run out into the road when some boy honks his horn, and stand there talking to him with your foot on the running board; you're not to go out with a boy who's got liquor on his breath; you're not to associate with a man that's a whole lot older than you, or has been married. And he added, "Be nice to everybody, and speak to them no matter what they are, but when you socialize with them be sure they're good people."

Evidently the Kerce girls needed no more specific rules. They have never been tempted to smoke, drink or walk a primrose path; most of the young men they know are faithful churchgoers like themselves, and juvenile delinquency is a phrase they recognize mainly from newspaper reports. The worst trouble Ann can remember happened one night when, after a basketball game, she went on to Troy's for a sandwich and cold drink without telling her father she'd be home late. When she got home, he was waiting up for her. Although he didn't scold her, she knew he had been worrying; ordinarily, he would have been asleep.

"I've got confidence in my girls," Nolon says. "After you raise them, you've done your best and there's nothing you can do but trust them to keep doing right."

Perhaps the only time Nolon was disappointed in his girls was when the twins decided against college. Although it meant more expense, he had been very pleased at Ann's decision, two years earlier, to enter La Grange College as a music-education major. Even if she hadn't won a $400 scholarship, which brought her expenses down to about $1100, he would have found some way to send her; and somehow he would have contrived to put the twins through college too.

But Judye and Ludye, at eighteen, were not so enthusiastic about college as Ann had been. Only three of their classmates planned to go away to school, and, like most of their friends, the twins found life in Floyd County quite interesting enough. Ludye especially; a tall blond boy named Wendell Fincher was courting her seriously. And Judye didn't want to be separated from her twin.

When they told their father they wanted to enroll in a business school in Rome, Nolon just nodded. Even more than he believes in higher education, he believes in freedom of choice. "I'd have given anything if they'd gone on with their music," he told a friend, "but they've got to make up their own minds. They've got to lead their own lives."

During the next year, while Ann finished her busy junior year at La Grange and the twins learned typing, shorthand and accounting at the Carroll Lynn School, Nolon's own life continued in its pattern. Every morning he was up before five o'clock, to milk the cows and feed the chickens and hogs. Then he climbed into the dusty blue pickup truck and drove ten miles to the Pepperell plant, where he worked steadily all day—for, with the twins in business school and Ann in college, he was putting out $103 a month in school fees, which cut sharply into his $400 monthly salary. Usually he was home by 4:30, but the extra plumbing jobs he counted on for additional income sometimes kept him out until dark. Then there were the evening chores: milking and feeding and perhaps a little gardening. And every night after supper Nolon climbed up the hill behind his house to the brown slant-roofed cabin where his father sat waiting in a rocking chair on the wide front porch. There in the evening cool, they would sit and talk about farming, possum hunting, and Nolon's daughters. Finally Nolon would say good night, go back down the hill and to bed.

Ann didn't get home many weekends that winter; she was directing a church choir in La Grange, and had to be there Sunday mornings. Also, she was president of the Christodelphians, a religious club; a member of the Music Education National Conference and the Student Christian Association; student conductor of the glee club and a member of the sextet which toured South Georgia and gave frequent performances at the college. With all these activities—plus maintaining her B average and losing ten pounds by cutting out bread and desserts—she was a busy girl. But she did find time to write to her father and sisters, and was not very surprised to open a letter one day and read that Ludye was engaged to Wendell.

The only surprising thing, in fact, was that Ludye and Wendell hadn't married sooner. They had gone steady all through high school, but years before that Ludye had been very much aware of the good-looking boy just one grade ahead of her. (Wendell, unflatteringly, didn't notice Ludye until the ninth grade.) Now, with Wendell through school and working as a carpenter's apprentice at the O'Neill Manufacturing Company in Rome, and Ludye due to finish school in April, there seemed no reason to wait. Nolon protested a little: Ludye was still pretty young; they ought to wait another year. But he liked Wendell, and offered no serious objections when the wedding was set for July fifth.

Ludye's wedding was very much a family affair. Cousin Avanel, whose daughter was to be flower girl, baked the three-tiered cake for the reception. Aunt Em and Aunt Frances made the blue organdy-over-taffeta bridesmaids' dresses for Judye, Ann, Cousin Susie and the two close friends who served as candlelighters. Cousin Mildred from Rome decorated the church with magnolia leaves and white gladioli, and Cousin Virginia from Atlanta made the punch. It seemed that every relative in Georgia wanted to be sure that Ludye—who after all had no mother to help her plan her wedding—did not lack for advice and support.

The afternoon of July fifth was ferociously hot. In fact, while Ludye was walking down the aisle to exchange solemn vows with Wendell, she made another private vow: to cut her hair short like Judye's. But the 250 friends and relatives that crowded the pews thought Ludye looked cool enough in her gleaming white satin gown, and agreed later that it was especially appropriate that the first bride to be married in their lovely, brand-new church should be so young and so pretty.

Ludye's marriage was the first real break in the Kerce family circle since her mother's death nine years before. And although Wendell didn't take her very far away—no farther than a small white cottage only a few steps from home, rented from her grandfather—Nolon knows that this change is the first of many. Ann finished college this June, and in the fall will be working away from home as a public-school music teacher. Judye, who has been working for over a year as secretary to the general manager of radio station WROM, sometimes gets a little restless, and thinks about looking for a job in another, larger town. But she's going steady now, and some people think she'll be the next Kerce girl to marry.

Now that his girls are self-supporting, Nolon isn't having to work so hard, or worry so much. He can look forward to quitting his job at Pepperell eventually, settling down to steady farming, with a few plumbing jobs on the side. Maybe he'll convert some more land into permanent pasture, and buy more cattle. And spend a lot more time hunting squirrel and possum in the woods behind the house. . . .

But that's in the future. Right now, this camp meeting of 1960 may be the last time Nolon will have all three girls with him, and so he takes particular pleasure in seeing them stand up before the congregation, singing in such close and familiar harmony:

"Give of your best to the Master,
Give of the strength of your youth,
Throw your soul's fresh glowing ardor
Into the battle for truth!"

After the evening service, a few cars pull away from the campgrounds and head toward Rome; but most of the people stroll on back to their cabins, to cut a watermelon or finish up the angel-food cake, or just to talk awhile before bedtime. Outside the Kerce tent a rather large group gathers; one by one they drag up deck chairs to form an irregular circle on the wet grass. Nolon lights a cigarette and looks about him, at all the faces, clear in the moonlight. Judye and Ann with their young men, Charles and Norman; Ludye and her Wendell. Cousin Virginia and her son, Gil, visiting from Atlanta, as they do every year at camp-meeting time; Aunt Florence and Aunt Willene from Rome. Dorma's brother Wint, of course, with his family—the Bartons' tent is right next to the Kerces'. And tonight Willene's son Spencer is here, too, with a pretty girl friend.

At first the talk is mostly about the sermon (how young Julian Brackman, the new minister of the Mizpah Methodist Church, is turning out to be a fine forceful preacher; and why shouldn't he, when he comes from a preaching family?) and about the girls' singing ("Did you all get a minute to practice?" Aunt Frances asks. "Susie tells me you didn't even know you were going to sing till suppertime!") but after a while Spencer's stylishly dressed date leans forward to ask Judye a question.

"Don't you all get tired of staying out here ten whole days? If I had to, I'd just sit around and eat and get fat. Back in Rome, I just rush-rush-rush all the time! Don't you even have a radio?"

Judye, usually so quick of tongue, thinks for a long moment before she answers. "It's hard to explain," she says finally, "but no, we don't get tired of camp meeting. It's something we've been doing together a long time, and it gets to be part of you. If I ever get married and move away, I'll just have to bring my family back every year for camp meeting." Then she grins. "Well, if we moved to California, I guess I wouldn't—but I'd want to."

Nolon settles back in his chair and smiles in the dark. For nine years he has lived for his three daughters, and right now he thinks they've turned out pretty well. END

NEXT MONTH

Cooking for a harvest crew is a big job; yet Faye Wisdom manages it in a trailer kitchen—and she serves the hot, appetizing meals in the harvest fields, sometimes 25 miles from the trailer.

Commercial harvesting starts in Texas in early May and ends the summer in Northern Montana. Faye also looks after three active children; does all the laundry, marketing, cleaning, and so on, that she'd normally do at home in Texas; in emergencies she even helps in the harvest. And she "loves every minute of it."

THE HARVESTERS

By NELLE KEYS BELL

HOW AMERICA LIVES
In the August JOURNAL

YOU KNOW HOW WOMEN ARE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 40

(b) well, (c) in the same outfit, and (d) why they had not heard from him.

"Yes," Zimmie said to Neal on the telephone, "I'm married. Ada, the one that used to send all the packages. . . . No, no kids."

Zimmie wanted to see Neal. And he'd sure like to see Neal's wife. "Remember, cap, how we sweated out that first kid of yours? . . . He's fourteen now? Gee, whadda yuh know!"

But Neal told Zimmie he was tied up on business. He had sat for a while after Zimmie hung up, staring into space, remembering Zimmie and the rest of the fellows, and the day the word came of Dick's birth. Remembering the letters from Janice, and the picture of her he had carried with him . . . and wondering why he had put Zimmie off. He was not too busy, and he would like to talk over old times with Zimmie. He could have called Janice and said he was bringing Zimmie out for dinner and the evening. But for some reason he had invented the excuse.

Zimmie would be back again in two months. "How about then?" he had asked. And Neal said, "Fine, we'll figure on it." And the phone rang again and it was Humphrey asking him to take the case and he said he would. He had gone on sitting there, thinking about the war—the fellows in the company, the fighting, himself the captain, his uniform—and for a while he felt like the captain again: firm and straight and forceful. It was a good feeling.

But it had not lasted. He thought, Not thirteen years yet, and how different everything is.

He was nearing home now and the evening traffic had thinned out. Yes, he thought, if Zimmie hadn't called, I wouldn't have said yes to Humphrey. And I wouldn't have ordered the suit. He frowned. Just what the connection was, he didn't quite know.

He drove into his driveway, walked into the house. "Hello, kids," he said.

"Hi." Rod, the youngest, didn't look up from the model airplane he was repairing.

Treena, twelve, was at the phone—as usual. She looked her father squarely in the face and said into the telephone, "Yes, but Dotty, if she asked you ——"

Dick said, "Hello, dad," tonelessly and turned another page of the picture magazine.

Jingo, on the floor beside Dick, opened one eye, and went back to dozing.

Neal walked into the kitchen. Janice gave him a quick glance and said, "Oh, you're home." She turned to the oven. "Better get washed. Gene and Lois are coming for dinner."

He stood for a moment, looking at Janice—her small trim figure in the straight skirt and white blouse, her quick efficient movements. She closed the oven door, moved to the cupboard and took down the cocktail shaker, stooped for the gin and vermouth from the cupboard under the counter.

He looked at her hair—dark hair caught back into a simple knot at the neck. He had once told her he liked her hair that way. He didn't know now whether he liked it or not.

And suddenly there came, creeping over him, a strange feeling—a strangely warm and uncomfortable feeling he could not name.

He turned and walked slowly toward the bedroom. It was characteristic of Neal Buckley to move slowly; and to speak slowly. And always Neal spoke quietly. Even in the Army he had never found it necessary to raise his voice. He had been a competent officer with firm authority which the men respected. It might take him a while to make a decision, because to him it was important to consider every angle; but once his decision was made and the order issued, he expected—and he got—obedience. He took no credit for this: it was a matter of his rank as captain and commander of his company; the authority was in the office. In turn, he had brought the same attitude into his family life. But somehow it didn't work here as it had in the Army.

Moved by some unaccountable, unaccustomed heavy mood that was like stubbornness, Neal pulled off his necktie and dropped it on his coat; he rolled his shirt into a ball and watched it fall to the floor. He had never done this before; hanging his clothes away was as natural to him as combing his hair. He could not have said why he did it now.

In the bathroom off this room he shared with Janice he began to wash. He heard Janice call the children to get ready for dinner. He wished he had been late getting home. He could have walked in, found them all at the table, slapped Gene on the back and sat down.

Gene was his best friend; they had gone to the same schools, they had met girls, gone through O.C.S. at the same time, discussed their business, played golf and drunk together. They still got together every week or so. The girls liked each other.

His mind slowed, stopped. The girls like each other. . . . Do they? They used to. Janice used to like Lois; but does she any more? . . . Does Janice like anyone any more?

The thought made him uncomfortable and he shoved it back down where it had come from and began to wash his face thoroughly.

He put on a sports shirt and his old slacks and sat down on the edge of the bed to change his oxfords for a pair of loafers. He set his stockinged feet on the carpeted floor, and looked at the other twin bed across the narrow aisleway. Janice's bed. He could stretch out his leg, and his foot would touch her bed. Just a narrow strip of space between the t beds—a narrow untraversed strip. How ti could build invisible walls. He had forgott her bed was so close, so accessible.

Accessible?

He pulled on the loafers, went to the wai robe for the familiar worn sports jacket wore around home, and started out to t living room.

Treena was standing before the hall mirr her face twisted with effort as she tried to wo the zipper of her dress. Neal said, "Maybe can help," and moved toward her.

Treena gave him a quick glance—as a seni girl might glance at an impertinent soph more—and without replying jerked past hi and flounced to the kitchen. "Mother," heard her say plaintively, "my zipper's stuck

Neal thought about Zimmie again. He ne not bring him to the house. And no need make an excuse; they could just go somepla in town, have a few drinks and dinner.

"Smoky," Gene called Neal. It was the o Army nickname, given to him at O.C.S. whe one of their fellow officer-candidates had sa of Neal that he never blew up, "never flared u flamed, but if you look close, you can see th smoke coming out of his ears."

Janice had a large beef roast, and she stoo at her end of the table honing the carvin knife as the rest of them took their seats.

"In my house," Gene was saying, his voic booming in that boisterous way he had whe he was being funny, "in my house, I mix th

America lives in the heart of every man everywhere who wishes to find a region where he will be free to work out his destiny as he chooses.
WOODROW WILSON

drinks. I carve the roast. Just what do you d around here, Smoky old boy?"

Neal met Gene's eyes, the gibing questio registering slowly. Janice laughed—that quic gay laugh of hers—and replied, "Neal? Oh, h cut the lawn once. Of course the mower' never been the same since."

Lois spoke up quickly, asking Rod abou Cub Scouts. But not before Neal had caugh the quick movement that terminated almos as soon as it began: Gene's starting to speak his jump and wince, the look he cast towar Lois. Lois had, apparently, kicked him unde the table.

The dinner was excellent, and Janice ha made her lemon-chiffon pie for dessert. Bu Neal had trouble eating; he had to choke hi food down. He couldn't have said what wa the matter; but there was the moment when h looked down at the edge of his coat sleeve faded and worn through to the threads, an he was filled with a slow unreasoning anger

The bridge game for later in the evening after the children were in bed, was taken fo granted. The four had played together fo years. But tonight Neal didn't feel like playing

Any time before this—even yesterday or last week—he would, despite his disinclination, have set up the table and sat down with the others and played as always. But tonight, when Janice went to the desk to get the cards, he said as casually as if it were customary, "Hey, Gene, I don't feel like playing. How about taking that bourbon old man Coates gave me and going downstairs?"

Gene grinned. "O.K., boy, leave us do it."

Neal was already on his feet, headed for the kitchen, when Janice said tartly, "You don't know where it is."

"I'll find it," Neal said, without altering course or pace, "if I have to tear the kitchen apart." He heard Gene behind him give one quick guffaw.

He found the bottle at once, in the low cupboard from which he had seen Janice take the gin and vermouth. As he straightened up, Gene was there, clapping him on the back and chuckling. "Like old times, eh, Smoky?"

Lois and Janice were at the kitchen door. Lois said, "I suppose we're not invited?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 124

Woman's 'Difficult Days' and Her Perspiration Problems

Doctors tell why her underarm perspiration problems increase during monthly cycle. What can be done about it?

Valda Sherman

Science has now discovered that a thing called "emotional perspiration" is closely linked to a woman's "difficult days." So much so that during this monthly cycle her underarm perspiration problems are not only greater but more embarrassing.

You see, "emotional perspiration" is caused by special glands. They're bigger and more powerful. And when they're stimulated they literally pour out perspiration. It is this kind of perspiration that causes the most offensive odor.

New Scientific Discovery

Science has found that a woman needs a special deodorant to counteract this "emotional perspiration" and stop offensive stains and odor. And now it's here . . . a deodorant with an exclusive ingredient specifically formulated to maintain effectiveness even at those times of tense emotion . . . during "difficult days" when she is more likely to offend.

It's wonderful new ARRID CREAM Deodorant, now fortified with amazing Perstop,* the most remarkable antiperspirant ever developed! So effective, yet so gentle.

Used daily, ARRID with Perstop* penetrates deep into the pores and stops "emotional perspiration" stains and odor . . . stops it as no roll-on, spray or stick could ever do!

You rub ARRID CREAM in . . . you rub perspiration out. Rub ARRID CREAM in . . . rub odor out.

Twice as effective as roll-ons

Doctors have proved ARRID is more effective than any cream, twice as effective as any roll-on or spray tested. And yet ARRID CREAM Deodorant is so gentle, antiseptic, non-irritating . . . completely safe for normal underarm skin.

So . . . to be sure you are free of the embarrassment of "emotional perspiration," use this special kind of cream deodorant. ARRID with Perstop* stops perspiration stains . . . stops odor too, not only during the "difficult days" but every day.

Remember, nothing protects you like a cream, and no cream protects you like ARRID. So don't be half safe. Be completely safe. Use ARRID CREAM Deodorant with Perstop* to be sure. Buy a jar at any drug or cosmetic counter. Only 49¢ plus tax.

*Carter Products trademark for sulfonated hydrocarbon surfactants.

NFORMED CITIZENS ARE THE GUARDIAN AND SPIRIT OF DEMOCRACY"

—President Dwight D. Eisenhower

more than a century, our magazines have spoken on domestic and international matters—sometimes n a highly individualistic view; often with broad on. It is inevitable that none of us will always agree , or like, all that magazines have to say. But over years, magazines have provided new ideas, brought n insight into old problems, shed light on new ones, and have served to inspire and advance our understanding and knowledge on many subjects—from the arts to finance, from government to science, from the individual to the world scene. Our magazines are a leading force for moral and cultural growth in our country, and one of our surest guarantees of an informed public."

☆ THIS MESSAGE IS PRESENTED BY ☆

Ladies' Home JOURNAL

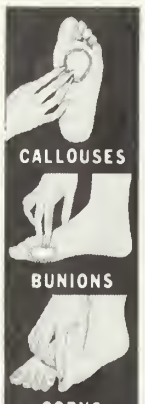
ON BEHALF OF MAGAZINES... ☆

A LEADING FORCE FOR MORAL ☆

AND CULTURAL GROWTH ☆

Super-Fast Relief!

Corns



Callouses, Sore Toes, Bunions, Tender Spots

NOT JUST A PLAIN PAD but a scientifically designed, finely tailored, medically approved application. Thin, soft, soothing, cushioning, protective. Water-repellent — stays on in both.

Pain, Discomfort Gone Forgotten In A Jiffy!

Multiple-acting Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads do more for you by far than any other method. Zino-pads end pain of corns, callouses, bunions, sore toes in a jiffy . . . stop corns, callouses before they can develop . . . remove corns, callouses one of the quickest ways known to medical science when used with the separate Medications included. Get this wonderful relief today. Costs no more.

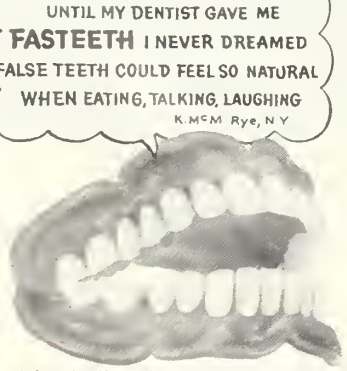
Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

Shrinks Hemorrhoids Now Way Without Surgery

STOPS ITCH—RELIEVES PAIN

For the first time science has found a new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids and to relieve pain – without surgery.

In case after case, while gently relieving pain, actual reduction (shrinkage) took place.



Most amazing of all – results were so thorough that sufferers made astonishing statements like "Piles have ceased to be a problem!"

The secret is a new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®) – discovery of a world-famous research institute.

This substance is now available in suppository or ointment form under the name Preparation H®. Ask for it at all drug counters – money back guarantee.

UNTIL MY DENTIST GAVE ME FASTEETH I NEVER DREAMED FALSE TEETH COULD FEEL SO NATURAL WHEN EATING, TALKING, LAUGHING

K.McM Rye, N.Y

When false teeth get on your nerves many dentists give special FASTEETH powder. It helps hold teeth in place – helps keep them from slipping or dropping down when you talk—makes you feel more secure. FASTEETH cushions tender gums so you can bite harder and eat easier, faster with greater comfort. FASTEETH helps you laugh and speak more clearly without embarrassment. FASTEETH is alkaline (non-acid). Checks "plate odor" (denture breath). At drug counters everywhere.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 122

"No dames," Gene told her, and Neal caught the wink he sent her.

In the big basement that was someday to be a recreation room, they sat in the discarded but still comfortable lounge chairs. There were packing boxes at the far end where the storage closet would be, and the children's playthings—bats and rackets, skates, games—set against the wall. Neal and Gene talked of Fort Benning and the fellows they had known there, the places they had gone on leave, girls they had dated. One hour passed, two hours; Gene's voice became a little louder, he laughed more readily. Neal felt pleasantly relaxed, and the past was curiously vivid.

He stopped listening to Gene. He was remembering Janice as she had been that last year at Benning. Janice was capable and a good cook even then, and they had entertained a lot in their apartment on the post—there were always some of the fellows around—and Neal recalled how often he had sat looking on, smiling in his pride of her. She was twenty then, and pretty, a slight and active girl, her alert mind interested in everything; a little serious at times, but with sprightly gaiety and freshness. With sweetness.

That was fifteen years ago. People change in fifteen years. But Janice had changed so much. It had come about so gradually that he was not aware it was taking place. Until now. And now it was hard to think of her as being the same girl she had been that year at Benning.

They heard Janice and Lois coming down the stairs. Lois perched on the arm of Gene's chair and ran her fingers through his hair. "Enough of reminiscing tonight. It's after eleven and morning comes early."

Lois was a tall girl who could be impressive when she dressed for it, though usually she was as casual in her dress as in her manner. But she had the gift of warm friendliness, and a dry sense of humor which Neal liked.

He looked from her to Janice. Janice's mouth was set tight, and her eyes were turned disapprovingly away from them. Earlier this evening he had wondered if Janice liked anyone any more. Now he wondered if anyone liked Janice any more.

She doesn't realize, he thought, what she has done to herself, that it is uncomfortable and embarrassing to be around her; no one likes the sharp tongue, the constant needling gibes. Even Lois —— Come to think of it, she no longer sees Lois except when Gene and I are along. Someone ought to tell her. Not me. I couldn't. Nothing I would say would carry any weight with her anyway.

Lois was tugging at Gene, trying to get him up. She was laughing. "You delinquents had your gang meeting," she said, pretending to scold. "Now it's over. Come on." Gene resisted her like a recalcitrant small boy. There were affection and humor and warmth in their expressions and their every movement. How long since Janice and I have teased and pretended and laughed together? And why—why has everything changed between us?

Janice loved me once, Neal told himself. But now she despises me.

It was painful, admitting to himself a word as strong as "despise." Whether she knows it or not, she despises me. It shows in everything she says and does. It was not his imagination—of that Neal was sure. Gene and Lois saw it, too; that explained the kick Lois had given Gene under the table.

The resentment that had assailed Neal earlier, when he did not know it was resentment, now became a feeling as plain as hunger.

Gene was on his feet and they were saying good-by. But Neal kept looking at Janice and it was like not being able to focus his eyes; he could not see her as someone he had known well, his wife. She is someone else, someone I don't know . . . someone I don't even like.

Neal lay in his bed awake. Janice had taken to undressing in the bathroom. He could hear her moving around in there now, and the click as she switched off the light. She opened the door quietly and came padding to her bed. She would not say good night, he knew that. She would get into her bed quickly, turn on her side, away from him, and lie still. The reason, he thought grimly, is plain enough: she wouldn't want me to imagine any encouragement. I ought to say to her, he told himself—and in his mind he could hear the words, surly and sarcastic, as one would speak only to someone he didn't like—"Don't worry, I won't bother you." She ought to know me well enough to know I would have no taste for foreing myself on a woman, that I wouldn't even have an urge for a woman who doesn't want me.

It had been wonderful once, their having each other. But now —— It wasn't hard to imagine how she felt now; a woman with a man she ridiculed and ignored and despised—she would not want him making love to her.

Continence, he thought, is something you live with. You don't get used to it, you don't resign yourself to it, you just endure it when you must. For a while he had believed firmly that it was only a temporary phase, that sometime—any time—things would right themselves and he and Janice would take up again the relationship that had once been theirs. But tonight he knew for the first time that it was no passing phase, and that not only did he no longer expect things to resume their former status—he no longer wanted her. He might want a woman, but it would not be Janice.

It was a wrenching thought, and unpleasant to entertain. He pushed his mind back to the question he had asked himself earlier. How had the change in Janice come about? When did it start?

The first he could remember was her impatience. He had excused it, telling himself that she was quick and he was slow, and it was understandable that that would be irritating to her. Then she began to make little cutting remarks—so subtle that one could not be certain there was intent to be derogatory. Later, the remarks were less subtle, but he had let them pass rather than start an argument that would be uncomfortable and that he wouldn't be likely to win anyway. When, as recently, she began to speak plainly, the process of devaluation unmistakable, he might often feel a bristling impulse to retort—but by the time he thought up a retort, it was too late to say it. The quick sharp tongue had become a habit with her now. There was still some of the old gaiety, but it was a sham gaiety, laid like camouflage over the barbs.

And it didn't matter to Janice who was there—the children, their friends. Before the children there were countless small things she had repeated until they beat on his brain like a television commercial: "Never mind asking your father, he wouldn't know"; or, "Oh, that's dad for you." All with that overlay of lighthearted amusement which, even while it made them sound offhand and trivial, actually made them the more poisonous.

Before their friends —— Well, like the crack about the lawn mower before Gene and Lois tonight. Harmless enough of itself, but it was that manner of hers, drawing outsiders into a kind of intimate confidence where they could laugh with her at Poor Old Neal, so helpless, so inept, so—yes, stupid.

I'm not stupid. I may be slow, and I've never claimed to be clever with my hands, but I'm damned if she's going to make me out stupid!

He sat on the edge of his bed, the ment beating at him like a prize f gloves, pounding, pounding the sides head. She treats me like—his min searching for the word—like a nothi acts as if I'm nothing.

He sprang up. He didn't stop for slippers; he strode to the front of the turned on the light in the living room, its length and back again. She's worke so gradually and so thoroughly, she's alm me believing I am nothing!

He looked at himself in the mirror. H was flushed, his hair awry. I was son once. I was Neal Buckley. Captain Neal ley. And I still am. I may have changed outside, but not inside. Inside I'm still m

He began stalking again. The children the time they don't even know I exist. W they ever ask my opinion, or my advice never my permission, never my help wit thing. I ought to walk out on them, he tol self in an indulgence of bitterness; they find out soon enough who supported the bought this house, who provided their with a ear. Where do they think the comes from that buys them all the thin have, pays for all the things they do? A Lord knows they have just about every they do just about anything they ask to were so useless and stupid as they se think, just where would they be?

Bitterness and this sort of self-just indignation were so foreign to Neal, a potent, that he felt sick. It isn't the chil fault, he told himself; they just follow mother's lead. It's all Janice ——

He heard a sound and paused. Had noticed he was gone from his bed? If s would be out. She would say with that sharpness, "What in the world are you up? Don't you know what time it is?" then she'd see his bare feet and she'd s if her patience were worn thin, "You co least have put on your slippers."

I'll say, he told himself belligerently, I "Go back to bed. I'll come when I'm r And I like my feet bare!" But would he? he have the guts? Or would habit seiz throat and choke off the words?

He could not deny it: he had changed absorbed the slow poison, and it has eaten any self-confidence I ever had. Almost any respect.

It was a bitter admission. He could co nance what Janice had done to herself; to acknowledge that she had changed hi that was hard. That's why, he told hims backed down when it came to trial cases. And that was why I couldn't face Zimm couldn't let Zimmie see what I have becom

And it was all Janice's doing.

What had happened to open his eyes was not sure, but it was plain enough to now. And he had two very simple and damental choices: he could let matters go on enduring the status quo—as the lin least resistance; or he could do someth about it.

He turned out the light and went carel along the hall and to bed. Janice was asleep. He lay on his back, hands folded his chest, closed his eyes and clamped his shut. I'll do something about it, he told hims

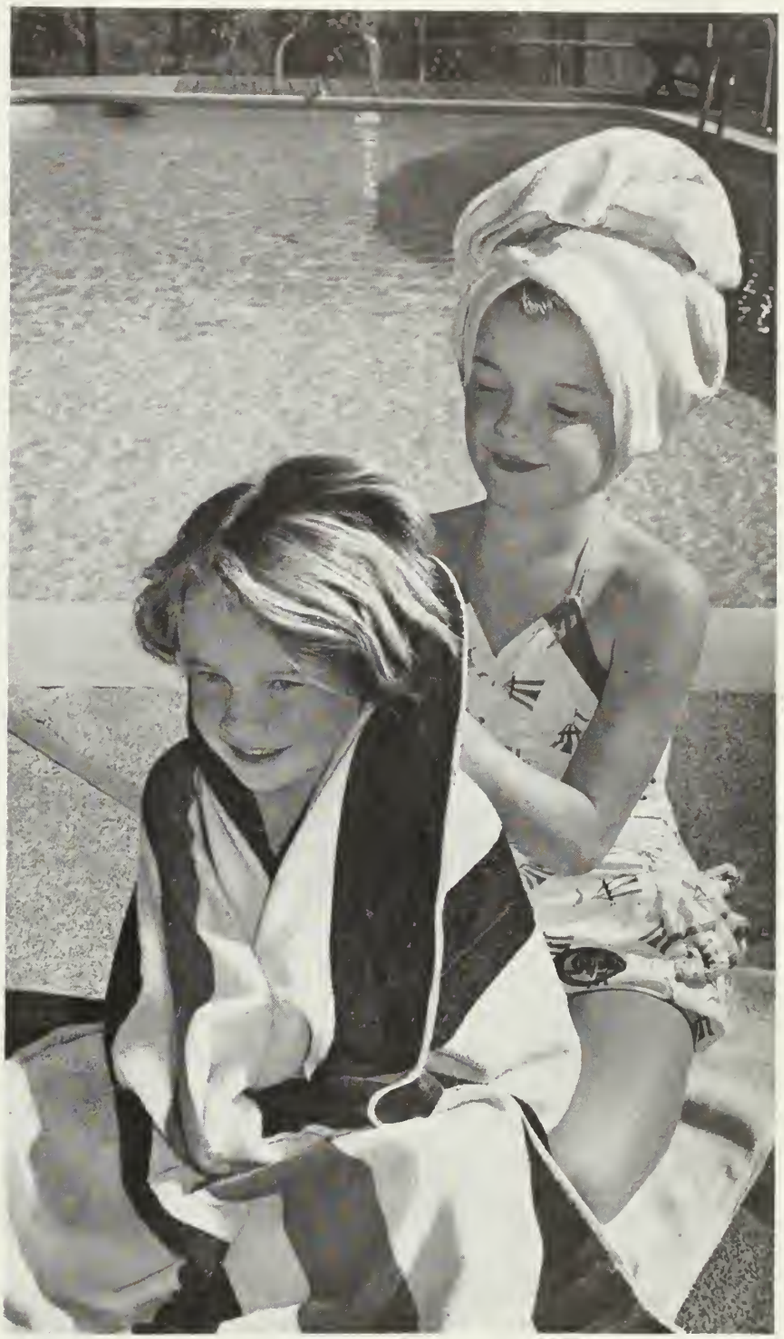
It was noon and he was still at the co law library, his notebook well packed v information he would use in working out Humphrey brief. But his mind kept going b to personal matters.

There were so many things he had ignor or had not let himself recall. And the more recalled, the more resentment he felt. Thi like last Christmas: It was the biggest Chr mas they had ever had, with an English rac bicycle for Dick and the fancy skating rig Treena. Neal had seen an electric-motor remote-control airplane set; it cost fifty d lars, but he had bought it with excitement a pleasure and brought it home for Rod. O Janice didn't like it; she thought he had p too much for it; she took it back and bou something else. Janice had seen a fur jac she liked and he told her to get it as Christmas gift from him. He had also bou

CONTINUED ON PAGE

NEXT MONTH

Helen was a sensation. Everyone marveled at the crippled kid who jumped her horse like a champion. Was it the devil who kept her from falling, kept her clinging to the roan's mane while her useless legs dangled free?



THROW YOUR HEART OVER

By STUART CLOETE

Novella complete in the August JOURNAL

Ground-in grime... or simply soiled...

ou need CLOROX to get out dirt that suds leave in!

't blame your detergent when washes go gray. Grayness is caused kind of dirt that's actually suds-proof! Tiny, oily soil particles simply themselves in too tightly for suds to budge. To be sure of getting clothes-dulling dirt out—and keeping it out—you need Clorox bleach.

ox cleans in a way suds can't. Even the best detergents can't en this locked-in dirt. Clorox can. Its special dirt-dissolving action ally melts suds-proof dirt away.

s plus Clorox . . . that's the best rule for the cleanest washes you get:

ox actually dissolves suds-proof dirt that makes clothes gray!

©1960, The Clorox Company

CLOGGED TOILETS
cleared in a jiffy!

'TOILAFLEX'
Toilet ALL-ANGLE Plunger

Ordinary plungers don't seat properly, forcing air and water to splash back. Thus you have a mess and you lose the very pressure needed to clear the clogging mass.

With "Toilaflex", designed for toilets, no air or water can escape. The patented, tapered tail forms an air-tight fit: the full pressure plows through the obstruction and swishes it down. Can't miss!

$2.65 fully guaranteed

AT MOST HARDWARE STORES
Higher in Canada

20 Second Way To A
SWEETER BREATH CLEANER MOUTH

It's really true... now you can have a clean, refreshed mouth and throat—a sweeter breath—in just 20 seconds with Astring-o-sol Mouth Wash. Yes, even after heavy smoking or indulging in foods or beverages with lingering odors.

Developed by a practicing dentist, Astring-o-sol is far superior to any toothpaste in sweetening breath. For Astring-o-sol also helps remove odor-carrying mucous from mouth and throat. So get Astring-o-sol, the concentrated mouth wash, at any drug or toiletry counter.

FREE! For free sample, write your name and address on a postcard and mail to: Astring-o-sol, 944 Prospect Street, Trenton 8, N. J.

Astring-o-sol
MOUTH WASH

DISCOURAGE THUMB SUCKING
NAIL BITING

THUM
TRADE MARK

Just Paint on Fingertips
60c at your drug store

MORE INCOME!

OF COURSE! Write to the address below and we'll send you details about a money-making offer. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
370 Independence Square Philadelphia 5, Pa.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 124

a pair of rhinestone earrings to put under the tree for her. And then Christmas morning there had been the box for him from Janice—a pair of striped cotton pajamas, which she had probably bought in an August sale. They were still in his drawer, he had never worn them.

He was ashamed to keep thinking of things like that, adding them up—like a vindictive woman piling up grievances and complaints. Each one so petty of itself, so inconsequential. Yet it was the pile-up of hundreds of them, all cut to the same pattern, making him out ineffectual and awkward and stupid. Stupid; that riled him. But he'd better stop thinking about it; he had work to do. He gathered up his notes and began, despite himself, to think of Janice again.

Neal had a sudden vision of himself as he must look to their friends—a meek, pitiable creature with a carping wife who ran everything, who ridiculed him, belittled him. The image was intolerable.

No man, no husband need go on taking what he had been taking—suffering indignity at her hands. He would put an end to it. Right now. He made a move to rise. He would go home, he would tell her ——

He sat back abruptly. The very thought of Janice and him staring at each other, speaking harshly, bitterly, stopped him. He had never been able to stomach conflict, dissension. He could see her face as she would look at him, her features pinched, her eyes hostile. It would be the same as always, that look on her face. He couldn't do it. The anger he felt with himself was almost unbearable.

Neal let himself into his private office.

Miss Thomas had heard him come in and she tapped on the door and entered. "Here are some messages, Mr. Buckley."

He did not look higher than the slips of paper in her hands. He could not look into her face, meet her eyes. He had the feeling he could not look anyone in the face.

He glanced over the messages. Nothing here that could not be put off.

"And Mrs. Buckley called," Miss Thomas said. "She wanted me to remind you that this is Rodney's swimming-lesson day, and you are to pick him up at five-fifteen."

He felt a bristling reaction in his skin—and the idea came ready-packaged. "Please call Mrs. Buckley," he said, speaking absently, as if his mind were primarily occupied elsewhere, "and tell her I'll be out of town for several days. And that I won't be able to pick Rodney up."

"But, Mr. Buckley ——" she began.

"I have to do some work on the Humphrey case," he said. He rose and walked out and down the stairs.

He smiled briefly in wry satisfaction at the message to Janice. She would have to go for Rod herself. It might give her a jolt to find that old Neal wasn't obeying orders.

The brown suit was ready and he put it on. "No, don't send it," he said of his old gray one. "I'll pick it up sometime."

He went across the street to the men's clothing store. At the moment his only thought was to get a new tie, something special in brown. But there in the next showcase were cream-colored silk pajamas with fine black cording around the collar. Maybe that was what sparked him on the buying spree. He bought those, and a handsome dressing gown—black with small red figures—and a pair of red kid slippers. Slacks, and a pale tan sport coat so soft and light it was a marvel it could keep its shape. A sport shirt and two white shirts, shorts and undershirts, handkerchiefs, a pair of Scotch-grain shoes.

He selected a suitcase with a hanger compartment, and the clerk packed his purchases in it. He walked to the garage, put the suitcase in the car and started off.

He had no idea, as he drove out of town, where he would go, but he was turned in the direction of the Whitehurst, and he continued the hundred and twenty miles of level highway and six miles of mountain road to its door.

The Whitehurst was a luxury hotel; he and Janice had spent a weekend here once but they considered it beyond their price range for casual holidays. On the lower slope of the mountain, the massive white hotel was set picturesquely among pine forests, a huge swimming pool behind it, and an excellent nine-hole golf course at one side.

Neal had a late dinner with a cocktail before and a liqueur after; retired to his room, showered and fell asleep. In the morning he ate a breakfast of steak and hot rolls and fresh strawberries. At the golf shop he rented a set of clubs and bought a pair of sport shoes with cleated rubber soles and a beauty of a mid-iron. He joined two young fellows from Philadelphia to play twice around the course, and a third time around with a Mr. Bannister who with his wife had spent the winter at the Whitehurst. He met the Bannisters later for dinner, and had a lively game of bridge afterward with them and a hard-drinking geologist from Tulsa.

At midnight he sat in his room, relaxed and comfortable. He wore the cream-silk pajamas, the black-and-red robe belted snugly about him. The room was spacious and elegant. The hotel noises had settled down, and a whole day of mountain air and sunshine and exercise was enough to make a man sleepy.

But he was not ready to sleep.

With some purpose of which he was not wholly aware, he walked to the desk, sat down and drew toward him a large sheet of paper with the hotel letterhead, took the pen from the holder and wrote.

Dear Janice:

He paused. He was not sure what he was going to say to her. But he put pen to paper again.

My purpose in coming down here was to settle my plans for the future. Those plans necessarily involve you.

First I might tell you that I purchased some new clothes; you will be seeing the bills when they come in, anyway. I am enjoying the silk pajamas and the bathrobe. You will no doubt think the suit and the sport coat extravagant, but I like them. I feel like myself in them—and I have not felt like myself for a long time.

Which brings me directly to the point of this letter: I intend to go on feeling like myself, and acting like myself. It will require some drastic changes in the domestic scene.

Assuming that you would not give up the children, and considering the fact that I would not leave without them, the simple solution of a separation is not possible at this time. I must therefore base my plans on our continuing to live together in the same house.

The first requirement in the revised setup is that you shall alter certain attitudes and habits which I find objectionable. I am not telling you what you should think or how you should feel, I tell you merely the actions I will no longe up with.

We can start with this tendency of you snipe at me; the oblique remarks you sc quently make that paint me a man of no c quence, helpless and unhandy and stupid.

Neal stopped writing with a jerk of his It was cowardly, he supposed, to write a instead of confronting her and saying wh had to say. He paused. But in this instanc assured himself, it was the intelligent t to do. Give her a letter, something to he her hand, to read over when she began t lieve he might mean it. She would hav hear him out, with no chance for rebutta

He resumed writing:

My objection to this habit of yours is not because of the discomfort it causes me and yo but because it means a real loss to me—th spect and affection of the children, for one t And possibly the respect of more people th realize. I can't blame the children for the way feel toward me. I don't like it, but how can help it, with your example always before t Look how you are with Dick and his geom when he wants help, do you ever say, "Get father to help you"? No, you stop what yo doing and go to work on the problem as i were the only one in the family who can t You seem to have forgotten that you wer great shakes at math in school, and that I got below an A in it.

Well, this summer, as soon as school is c am taking the children with me on a can trip and you are not going. Perhaps away you I can win a little respect and honest l from them. Before it is too late.

Then there is this, and this is perhaps the of the matter: I am not cut out to be a celi You have made it quite clear that you hav wish for the marital relation. It has not entirely out of consideration for you that I acceded and left you alone; neither is it tim on my part. It is, simply, that I am not a ha loaf man. I have wanted you. I have wanted we had in the beginning. There was a time have you forgotten?—when you wanted m much as I wanted you. But your attitude brought that to an end. Until now I find in self no desire to revive it.

I have never been unfaithful to you; I hope realize that. But things are different now: longer feel any loyalty to you; nor do I thin I used to, that you would be hurt. Except, haps, that your vanity might be piqued.

Neal set down his pen suddenly and st at the sheet on the desk. I sound as if I setting myself up for the life of an anc bumblebee, flitting from flower to flower. had been relaxed when he started, he w now. He felt tense and driven, anxious t it down and done with. Get it all down there would be nothing further to say.

Any infidelity I may commit will be beca have found a woman I admire and respect love, as well as want; and who accepts m what I am. Whether such a liaison would eventually to my wanting my freedom so I m marry again, I do not know. If such should b case, I'll let you know.

I didn't intend, in writing this letter, to s bitter, and perhaps I do. I am not bitter. I been sore, good and sore—at you for what have been doing, and at myself for taking should not have taken it; but you had me disadvantage. I loved you. I wanted to be siderate and protective and forbearing. Th over now. I think of you as you looked the night when Gene and Lois were over, and I not believe there was ever any love betwee

You are a devoted mother; but I have wondering if you are as good a mother as think you are. You would say you love the dren. But I am asking you, Janice, do you any love in you any more? Have you look yourself in the mirror lately? Have you seen has happened to your face? Can you see pinched look about your nostrils, and the you hold your mouth in a thin tight line?. I at a picture of yourself when you were a when I first knew you, and see if there is any left now of the freshness, of the pretty soft m you had in those days.

Those eyes of yours that could sparkle be alive and laughing—look at them now. used to be fun, you had a sense of humor haven't any more. What you have now is v acid, bitter wit. It's your feeling for me tha brought the change about, I know that.

I do not say I have been blameless in th should have had the guts to keep the situa from reaching its present state. Or, I might

CONTINUED ON PAGE

OTHER VIEWS

SIZES AND PRICE OF VOGUE

PATTERN ON PAGE 82

Vogue Design No. 5044

"Easy to Make" one-piece dress: 10-18 (31-38). 75c. Version shown requires 2⅞ yards of 35" fabric without nap, size 14.

Look! Real cream deodorant your fingers need never touch!

New glide-on applicator! Just twist the bottom . . . cream comes out the top!

Now you can have the all-day protection only a real cream deodorant can give plus glide-on convenience—both in new Desert Dri. It glides on and rubs in right from its own exclusive applicator. Not just a rolled-on surface coating, it penetrates for positive all-day protection. Checks perspiration, stops odor, won't damage clothes. 3 months' supply—1.00 plus tax.

New Desert Dri®—real cream deodorant—anti-perspirant by Shulton

ulton, Inc., 1960

11 tempting flavors

Borden's Cheese Spreads in New Hostess Jars

From Borden's—and only from Borden's, come these delicious cheese spreads in serve-easy hostess jars.

Borden's tempting, velvety spreads make a meal out of sandwiches...a cheese festival out of snack-time. Pack 'em in your picnic basket for easy, out-of-doors eating.

You'll like the new, 5-oz. hostess jars. Wider opening makes serving so much easier. Caps twist on and off at a touch. 11 tempting flavors for you to choose from. They're featured at your grocer's now.

VERA-SHARP
CHEESE 'N BACON
PINEAPPLE PIMENTO
GARLIC RELISH
E-Z CHEEZ
BLUE LIMBURGER
SMOKEY
OLIVE-PIMENTO

© THE BORDEN CO.

BORDEN'S FINE CHEESES VERY BIG ON FLAVOR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 126

I should have had the perception—for it crept up on me too gradually, I couldn't see it happening. Have you seen it? Have you known what you were doing?

Now for my plans:

I shall move my bed to the basement. I'll make that into the recreation room we've talked about. But it will be my recreation room. I'll have a bathroom put in, and take the TV down, and if the children want to see a program, they can come down there.

As long as you are keeping the house and cooking the meals, I'll let you know whether or not I'll be home for dinner, but aside from that, my life is to be my own. You are not to ask me—or if you do, I have no intention of telling you—where I am going, what I am doing, and how late I'll be home.

I shall make you an adequate allowance for the household and for routine expenses for the children, and you can open a checking account. I am discontinuing the joint account.

If you wish to continue, for the sake of appearances, and for the children, our going out together occasionally or having friends in, that's all right with me. But you are not to make engagements that include me without consulting me.

When we do have company in, I shall mix the drinks and carve the roasts.

And there will be no more sniping. One crack from you—wherever we are—and I walk out. And I shall be the one to judge what is a crack and what isn't.

I don't expect you to like my program; you've had me for too long under your thumb, jumping to the crack of your whip. You can leave if you like, but remember that if you do go, you will have to leave the children with me.

I'll be back in town Monday morning, but will go directly to the office. I'll telephone you if I am not coming for dinner. Otherwise I'll be seeing you around six. Or you telephone me if you would rather I didn't come home for dinner.

I must add that I do not want to discuss this matter with you. If you have anything to say, put it in writing. But no apologies or remorse or promises. I ask no more than that you go along with the plans herein set forth.

Your husband,
NEAL

Send it airmail special delivery and she would have it tomorrow; that would give her Saturday and Sunday and through the day Monday. Maybe with that much time she would take it all in. He had one bad moment standing before the letter drop. Just what had he written? Could he live up to it? He dropped the letter into the slot.

Driving home on Monday evening, Neal was feeling a little cocky Janice had, at least, not called him at the office. He had given a good deal of thought to what her reaction to his letter might be, and he believed now he was prepared for any eventuality. She might pounce upon him the moment she saw him: "How dare you write me such a letter? Who do you think you are?" In which case he would remain imperturbable, and make it quite clear that he was not retreating an inch. . . . Or she might go about looking injured and waiting for him to say he was sorry. He would, of course, say nothing of the kind. . . . If she were stickily, sarcastically sweet, he would term that sniping, and walk out. . . . She might be all set for argument; he would just remind her of what he had written: "Put it in writing." That would really get her, because the things Janice said couldn't be written—not the way she meant them! . . . She might meet him sobbing, begging forgiveness. . . .

He pulled into the driveway and got out of the car. He was reaching for his suitcase and assorted parcels when Dick stepped out on the porch for the evening paper. "Hi, Dick. Give me a hand with these, will you?"

"Why, hello, dad." He halted halfway down the steps. "Wow! Where'd you get the suit?"

"Like it?" He dismissed it with a grin and a shrug. "A little number I picked up one day when I was feeling good."

Dick caught at the lapel and rubbed the fabric. "It's keen. You look swell."

They went into the house, Dick carrying the new bag. "Hey, everybody, here's dad."

Treena and Rod converged on him. "Gee, daddy!" Treena said. "I didn't know you were coming tonight."

Rod said, "What did you bring me?"

"Hello, kids." Neal kissed his daughte ran his hand down his son's face, flat the nose. The concerted attention was ing and he thought with gratification, H Already things are different around here.

But then doubt assailed him. Or is because of the presents they expect?

"Dick, open my suitcase, will you?"

He had spent time selecting their gift Dick he had a zippered leather noteboo Treena—because he had heard her an friend Dotty say they "loved goopy jewel he had bought a wide bracelet bedecke dangling gewgaws. For Rod—well, wh another model plane? You'd think th ate them the way he never seemed to enough.

Neal watched the children open their ages—and then he took a small box fro corner of his case. It was another bracele this one a dainty circlet of linked rhinesto to go with the earrings he had given Jan Christmas. He had debated bringing her thing, but the bracelet had caught his eye he told himself that since he always took a gift for her, the children would wonder missed this time. He had assured himself he could decide when he got home wh to give it to her or not.

He braced himself and started for kitchen. Janice stood at the counter d beets. "Hello, Janice."

"Hello," she replied indifferently. "D will be ready in ten minutes."

Neal was stunned. She acted as if no had happened. "I—I brought you someth He set the small box on the counter.

"Oh," she said, "thank you"—with a p touch of surprise—as she might thar stranger who offered her his seat in a bus made no move toward the package.

Neal picked up his suitcase and went to bedroom. Could it be—could it possibly be she had not received the letter?

He washed and put on the new slacks the tan silk sports shirt; and when he came the family was gathered at the table.

Janice apparently didn't notice his clot And there were chops for dinner and she served the plates in the kitchen. He would have to wait for some indication ——

Over dessert Neal spoke up. "Did y mother tell you that as soon as school is I'm taking you kids on a camping trip?"

While the children were saying variou "Gee whiz" . . . "You are?" . . . "Where going?" Neal waited for some sort of react from Janice. She went on eating and did look up. But then, she might not have he what he said.

"Someplace where there's a lake and g fishing," Neal answered the children. "I can help me decide. Treena, you'll have to the cooking. You'd better get up on that."

Alarmed, Treena's eyes flew to Jan "Aren't you going, mother?"

"Not this time," Janice said casually.

So she knew! So she had got the letter! was confused.

Rod asked with exaggerated dismay, "Y mean we gotta eat Treena's cooking?" clutched his stomach, wagged back and fo in his chair, fell over against Dick a moaned, "Ughhh, I'm poisoned."

"Mother!" Treena protested. "Make R quit."

Janice picked up some dishes and start for the kitchen. She might as well have s the words: It's up to you, Neal. You make R quit.

"Rod, stop teasing your sister," Neal sa

Amiably, Rod straightened in his cha reached for another cooky.

From the kitchen Janice called, "Treer bring out the dishes, will you please."

Neal left the table. Apparently, he thoug slowly, she is going along with it. The shift l him slightly dazed. It was like getting all rea to shove against a heavy door, and having give easily at the first slight touch.

In the bedroom he dismantled his bed, a then called Dick to help him carry it to t basement. As they passed through the kitch with the first load Rod was showing Janice h new plane. He gaped at the bed. "What y doing with that?"

ick replied with brotherly contempt, oving it to the basement, dummy. What you think we were doing with it—breakit up for kindling?"

What you taking it down there for?"

Neal, grasping for an explanation, said, our mother says my snoring keeps her ake."

od turned round questioning eyes upon mother. "It does?"

Not that I've ever noticed," Janice said. o she wasn't going to help. Neal gave a rt laugh. "I was just being polite. It's your ther's snoring that keeps me awake."

anice flung about, denying with a vehnence that struck Neal as funny, "I don't re!"

You do too!" Dick told her gleefully. "I rd you—the other night, when dad was ay."

She sniffed and turned back to her dishes. Well, they had got over that fence all right. Dick helped him set up the bed, but Neal de it himself. He brought down the clothing would need tomorrow, and his shaving ngs. From the office earlier today he had de arrangements for the carpenters and mbers to get started on Wednesday; and he d bought a cardboard wardrobe to serve til the closet was ready. He had also selected ide low chest of drawers and a flat-top desk walnut. They would be delivered tomorrow, d tomorrow evening he would bring the t of his things down from upstairs.

Before he left in the morning he told Janice out the furniture coming. She nodded but d nothing. At least, he told himself as he ve away, she didn't say it was a lot of lishness.

That evening the new furniture was there, d Neal, in what seemed an endless number trips upstairs and down again, brought all clothes down—all except the old sport coat ich he left hanging by itself at what had en his end of the wardrobe.

It fretted him not to have a clue as to how had taken his letter. It was hard to believe had merely accepted it and all its provins without protest. Maybe she thought it s a good idea; maybe she liked things better is way herself. Or maybe she thought it was otion he would get over. Well, if she thought at, she had another think coming!

On Friday evening, as they finished dessert, nice rose from the table. "Treena, you'll ve to do the dishes. I'm going out."

Neal looked up, surprised. He opened his outh to ask where she was going. But he ught her eye. "Out," she repeated firmly, d turned to Treena.

It was almost as if there had been a flicker—st a flicker—of laughter in her eyes.

Treena was complaining. "But mother-r! ve got that paper to write."

"I'll help you," Neal said. "I'll dry—that is, your mother will let me."

"Why not?" Janice retorted quickly.

"I break dishes."

Janice gave a quick offhand "Ha! What's a sh?" and left them.

Neal stared after her, trying to determine hat lay behind her manner, analyzing the xpression on her face. It wasn't ridicule—not uite. It wasn't defiance. Was she rubbing it ? He couldn't come to any reasonable xplanation.

After the dishes were done, Neal sat in the ving room, the lamp lighted beside his chair nd the news weekly open in his hands. The hildren had turned on the TV. "Is your homework done?" he demanded. Oh, yes, they assured him.

He found himself gazing at the three children. He had known that Dick was as tall as imself, but he noticed now that most of he boy's height was in his legs. Those long kinny legs with jeans fitting like blue-denim kin. Did they actually make jeans that narow? Did they expect kids to have legs that ong and thin? And how Dick got those big eet down through the narrow denim pipes lefied imagination.

Treena had been a plain child, but now as e looked at her intent profile he could see that he might turn out to be quite an attractive irl. Lose a little more of the childish pudginess, let the contours of her face firm up, and she could be really lovely.

Rod sat motionless; but even so, you could almost see the spring tightly wound just inside his skin, a spring that might at any moment fly loose. You had to be startleproof if you were to keep your wits around that boy.

When the children had gone to their rooms, Neal started downstairs, Jingo at his heels. The rascal might as well sleep down there, Neal decided, and turned back to get the bedding from the box on the porch. Jingo, understanding, followed happily down the stairs.

Neal got into bed and turned out the light. He heard Janice come in later and go to her room. But he still couldn't go to sleep. What was Janice up to, anyway? Why didn't she say something, give some sign?

Neal had been uneasy about the first date with Gene and Lois after the Whitehurst trip. If Gene were to notice anything different, there was no telling what he would say. But the evening they went to Gene's everything went off particularly well. Neal found himself wondering if he could have imagined the dwindling friendship between Lois and Janice. He even wondered if he had imagined Gene's digs and prodding.

When Neal and Janice returned home and had gone off their separate ways without speaking to each other, he was a little sour.

HEIGHT 5′ 7″—WEIGHT 141

By SHELDA VAN FLEET

I'm not overweight
I'm glad to report.
According to charts,
I'm just 3 inches short.

She can put on a darned good show for somebody else, he thought. But then, that was what he had asked for, wasn't it? That was all he had asked for. He had, really, no reason to criticize Janice. And that, he told himself testily, could be damned frustrating!

Finishing the basement and decorating it was more than Neal had bargained for. The bathroom had been easy. It cost a lot, but he was pleased with it: gray and burgundy, and man-sized, with a shower big enough to stretch your arms. But when it came to selecting colors for the big room, the flooring and the curtains and the wallpaper above the paneling, he was lost.

In the wallpaper place an arty woman clerk who doubled as decorator offered to help him, and came out to see the room on a Saturday afternoon. Janice was somewhere in the house, but they did not see her. The woman looked everything over appraisingly and said yes, she knew exactly what he should have; she would send out samples on Monday.

The samples were there Monday evening when he came home. He held the paper to the wall, put the square of embossed linoleum on the floor; he held the swatch of cloth to the window. He didn't know. He couldn't visualize how it would be.

When the decorator woman called him the following day at the office, he told her he was considering and would let her know tomorrow. He would have liked to ask Janice's opinion, but she had never mentioned the room or the work being done. So far as he knew, she had never so much as looked at the bathroom.

Janice went out after dinner to some program-committee meeting for the P.T.A. He went downstairs to look at the samples again.

On his bed was another square of linoleum, a swatch of cloth, a paint sample and a roll of wallpaper. There was a note—on a sheet from the pad Janice kept in the kitchen:

Try these. And get rid of that female. She'll have your room looking like a cocktail lounge.

Janice! He felt laughter stir in him. And the samples were good. He could see the room as it would look.

Attached to each sample were notations of the make and number and the store where each could be bought.

On the kitchen pad he wrote:

Thanks. Ordering tomorrow.

He had trouble about the one big special chair he wanted. He sat in a dozen or more to find the most comfortable, and decided finally on a deep leather one. But whether to buy the green or the red or the brown —— He wrote another note on the kitchen pad:

Subject: Chair
Bowland at Carter's knows the kind.
Color?

He stuck a ten-dollar bill in the pad, and his P.S. said:

I pay for expert advice.

She chose the red. He liked it. It gave a warm, comfortable tone to the room.

When the room was finished at last he said at the table, "Well, let's initiate the new room."

One of their favorite TV shows would be on in a few minutes, and he had brought home a supply of soft drinks and candy.

The children rose, enthusiastic and chattering, to follow him. He turned to Janice, who remained seated at the table, pouring another cup of coffee, "Don't you want to see it?"

"I've seen it."

"Well?"

"Very nice."

Neal had not been too sure of what Lois and Gene might make of his having moved to the basement, but they got over that hump all right too. Janice, asking Gene and Lois over for dinner on a Saturday night, suggested they come early, in the afternoon if possible. They came shortly after three, and it was Rod who insisted they go downstairs at once to see the new room. Lois stopped at the bottom of the stairs. "Oh, and isn't it attractive!" she exclaimed. And Gene walked around looking at everything, saying, "Boy, this is great. Brother!"

If they noticed that the bed was one of the twin set from the bedroom, they made no mention of it. Gene threw himself full length upon it. "Ah-h-h," he said, "this is the life." He doubled the pillow behind his head, put his arms up, crossed his ankles. "Turn on the television and bring me a beer and I'm set for the rest of the day."

After dinner, with the children in the basement watching television, the bridge game got off to an early start. When, toward the end of the evening, Neal was dummy, he sat back and looked at the other three. Everything seemed so open and easy and lively and friendly. Don't Gene and Lois notice that all the circuits are open—except between Janice and me?

The days continued to go by. It had been more than a month since he returned from the Whitehurst, and Neal still could not figure Janice. She wasn't angry—of that he was reasonably sure. And he could not detect that she was aggrieved or resentful. She referred the children to him: to Dick about his geometry, "Go ask your father, he's better at this than I am"; to Rod when he wanted her to hold his plane while he glued on a piece that had broken off, "Oh, get your father to do that, I don't know anything about it"; and when Treena asked if she could go with the older boys and girls on a skating party, "What do you think, Neal?" She didn't sound sarcastic; she spoke casually, as if she had always spoken that way.

She never talked with him. Sometimes he would try—because it was a strain to be around her and have nothing at all to say. "How's P.T.A. these days?" "Just fine." Or he would start about the children: "Don't you think it's about time to see about having Rod's teeth straightened?" "We have an appointment for next week." He asked her about getting the gun the boys were talking about: "What do you think?" he said. "Oh, heavens,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 131

"How I use Murine to soothe my eyes and so relax tension"

MRS. DALE CARNEGIE

President of Dale Carnegie & Associates (New York), Inc.

"Lecture trips can be exhausting. That's why I carry Murine with me wherever I go. A few drops of Murine soothe my eyes, and I seem to feel more relaxed, more at ease." Take a tip from Mrs. Carnegie. Keep Murine handy—at home and when you travel. Use it as often as you need to soothe your eyes and so relax tension.

Murine is also available in the familiar glass bottle with separate eye dropper.

MURINE for your eyes*

THE MURINE CO., INC., CHICAGO, U.S.A.
*TRADEMARKS REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Hunt...for the best

NUED FROM PAGE 129

ln't know. You decide." He would be-feel like a fool and he'd quit trying to onversation.
vas scrupulous about calling him before ng invitations or asking anyone in.
mes, annoyed, he was tempted to tell t to make the plans herself. But of he couldn't, not after what he had her.
once did he catch her up. They were cards with Floyd and Effie Landers, yd, who had dropped by his office one as kidding him about Miss Thomas.
anced up just in time to see Janice start something, and he knew instantly that d be something smart and cutting. But e darted him one quick stricken look sed her mouth without speaking. She iet through the rest of the hand.
e knew he meant it, what he had writ-out walking out. But did she comply save embarrassment, because others ere?
hen there was the time he came into the carrying his overcoat and his briefcase, o boxes of eggs which one of his clients ought him, and the top box slid off and mess on the floor. Janice turned around oked down at it, and Neal could feel his rickle, expecting her old exasperated for heaven's sake!" But she said only, we'll get up the worst with paper tow-
She swiftly began mopping up, saying, family must have the dropsy today. I my willow plate, and Treena dropped a of shampoo on the bathroom floor."
she mean it the way it sounded? or had d to bite back the accustomed sharp-Was this part of a great big act?
ormented himself wondering what went hat head of hers. She was like mist, like ke mercury—there was nothing to get
f. Was she just playing along, thinking something she could wait out, that he get over it and things would go back to y they used to be? He couldn't tell.
rprised Neal that the children seemed us of any difference in the tone of They never seemed to question Neal's become more than a silent partner;
beyed his orders or argued against them e had been in the custom of playing the father.
had begun noticing many things about ildren: their clothes and their manners, hen their hands needed another go at
g. He analyzed their school grades, the s in which they were particularly good, ing a guess as to their particular talents tentialities. Dick was steady and equally n most of his studies, with no indication where his interest might lie. Rod's reigzagged from Failing to Excellent withy regularity. His science teacher thought ght prove to be a genius in research; or ld be one of those brilliant comets in the oom, if law should interest him. Treena in English, and Neal read her childish s, impressed by the imagination of which parently stodgy nature had given no tion.

l had all the small planes of his collection nded on threads taped to the ceiling of om. It was like walking into a plague of ze grasshoppers to go into that room, ere was always the uncomfortable possi-that one would fall on your head. Neal ed a carpenter to put a latticework on iling, and now the planes were securely the hazards minimized. Neal hadn't n there were as many boys in the neigh-od as Rod brought in to show off his al won the Humphrey case; won it in a

He was so abstracted all through it that med foolishly easy. He told Janice he on it, and she said, "That's nice."
y couldn't she say something?
en the Brookers gave a whingding at the
and they were all dressed to go, Treena
"Golly, what pretty parents I got." Janice ok pretty in the bright blue taffeta with hinestone earrings and bracelet. She d young, too, slender and supple. He n't help thinking that to anyone else they would look like any nice married couple. No one would suspect how it really was. Like a dead phone connection between them. All the time.

Did Janice like it that way? Was she perfectly satisfied with a marriage that was a hoax? All right, all right, he told himself, you've got things just the way you laid it out, now are you going to start complaining? No, it wasn't that. Neal liked things the way they were—his having given the orders and their being carried out. But this was not the Army, this was a marriage; you certainly had reason to want to know what went on in the other's mind.

Neal came into the living room, waiting for dinner. He said to Treena, "You'd better go out and help your mother." And to Rod, "Put that plane away and go in and get washed." Janice had come in at that moment, and as she crossed the living room she went by his chair. He could barely hear the words she spoke: "Oh, stop throwing your weight around." He stared after her; he could see only the plane of her cheek, but he was sure she was smiling! How do you figure a woman like that?

The children were all going out after dinner, and Neal decided it was as good a time as any to have it out with her. He went into the living room and sat down to wait for her to come in.

She had had far more than enough time to do the dishes; what was she doing out there? He walked out. "What are you doing?"

She looked up guilelessly from the mixing bowls and utensils she was washing at the sink. "Making cookies," she said, as if surprised by his question.

"Don't you think it's time we discussed some things, you and I?"

She half turned toward him, her hands resting on the edge of the sink, and said with a faint seasoning of humor, "When I have something to discuss with you, I'll put it in writing."

It made him mad. Throwing up to him what he had said in that letter. He was trying to

DECORATING on a Shoestring

Guest bedroom is pretty and practical as they come. welcomes your weekenders with its cheerful air and comforting accessories.

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND Interior Decoration Editor

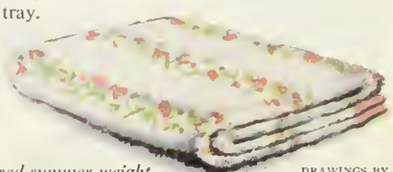
HAROLD FOWLER

A charming little bedroom with gay and inexpensive ideas for summer visitors.



This little bedroom would delight any guest with its crisp cottons and inviting colors. An extra bedroom can be easily and economically rejuvenated by paint and inexpensive furnishings. Here, unpainted furniture was given a coat of white, dressed up with tiny free-hand flowers. Pretty fringed cafés, $3.49 a pair, perk up the windows, and matching fringe was sewed to the pillow slips. Striped or flowered sheets make wonderful bedspreads, are easy to wash. Elasticized bands on bed ruffles and vanity skirt stretch to fit varying sizes and shapes. Cotton rug from five-and-ten cost $3.98. Besides fripperies sketched, other comforts for guests are: lots of hangers, a well-lighted mirror, good reading material, flowers, cigarettes and ash tray.

$4.98 metal magazine rack holds books, radio, clock or whatever.

$2.98 spice shelf holds sun lotion, insect repellent, toilet water, and so on.

Flowered summer-weight blanket looks charming, comes in handy on a cool night, $5.95

$1.00 makes sachets (lavender or pine) of flowered ticking to put in every drawer.

DRAWINGS BY ENID FURLONGER

Best For Freezing—Storing Leftovers

REPUBLIC'S FREEZETTES® Food Containers

They keep freezer foods perfect, cut food bills by preserving leftovers. Covers fit snug, no leakage, or spoilage. Double-thick containers won't warp. Reusable, unbreakable. In 6 sizes, 12 oz. to Gallon, at department, hardware stores. Get your supply now! Be sure they're Republic's FREEZETTES.

10 Freezer Bags FREE of extra cost In each 6-Pack of Pint, 1½ Pint, Quart FREEZETTES

WRITE FOR FREE CATALOG

REPUBLIC'S © 1960 Polly Flex® HOUSEWARES Chicago 31, Ill.

Earn EXTRA MONEY with Peerless DELUXE CHRISTMAS CARDS

Sell friends, customers fine quality Personal Christmas Cards--a wide range of design and price for the most discriminating buyers. Also outstanding selection of Popular Priced Personal Christmas Cards, Holiday Gift Wrappings and fine Personal Stationery. Earn extra money for yourself or your organization.

Write Today --for Samples on Approval with Complete Details

PEERLESS GREETINGS
316 N. Michigan Ave., Dept. F Chicago 1, Ill.

As bone is to china VIRGIN is to olive oil

2 oz. to 1 gal.

First press only of the choicest olives. That's POMPEIAN Virgin Olive Oil. The natural flavor of the fruit—for far tastier salads, meat, fish, fowl. Specify Pompeian!

MORE PEOPLE USE refreshing, calorie-free

Sugarine® LIQUID SWEETENER

SWEETER THAN SUGAR YET NO FOOD VALUE

Recommended by doctors for diabetics, overweights and lo-calorie diets. Use for beverages, desserts, cooking. Pure. Harmless.

USE-TESTED McCall's

GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 oz.— 75c

AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

think how to say he would rescind that condition, that ——

She had stepped back from the sink, her hands still on the edge of it, her body bowed over, her head dropped between her taut arms. Her body was shaking. She was laughing.

He stood in stunned immobility and looked at her. Her small slender figure, the tight navy-blue skirt and blue apron, the pink sweater jacket. The strangest feeling crept over him: as if it were yesterday, he could feel her in his arms, the slight body quaking with laughter ——

"Janice," he said.

And then he didn't know whether she was laughing or crying. There was something queer about the way her body quivered. And she made no sound.

"Janice."

Her head was still dropped between her arms. She shook it fiercely. "Go away," she said, her voice uneven, but the firmness of her tone unmistakable. "Go away."

He still didn't know whether she was laughing or crying. He went down to his room, turned on the TV and watched a show that was insufferably silly.

In the morning at breakfast Janice was the same as always. Always, that is, since he wrote that letter. Cool and impersonal and conscientiously the homemaker and mother.

He got into his car to drive away, anger swelling and pushing inside of him, flushing his skin with heat. He almost wished things were as they used to be. At least then he knew where he stood.

Maybe, he thought, maybe I ought to give up and get out. I could take an apartment in town, have the children visit me there. We could do things together on weekends and vacations ——

But no need to make that decision yet. Saturday they would be leaving on their camping trip. They would be gone only nine days; they had to be back the Sunday of next week because the children's classes started the following Monday—diving lessons for Rod, dancing for Treena, and he had told Dick he could take the beginners' class at the rifle range. He could see how things went and make his decision after that.

An automobile showroom was open, and he went in and traded his car on a station wagon. He had not meant to buy a new one, but somehow it was the thought of Janice that made him do it. I'll show her, he thought. Though just what the newness of the car would show her, he wasn't sure.

The children were impressed and excited with the car. Janice made no comment.

On Friday immediately after dinner he began loading the car for the trip. The children had packed their suitcases, and he started with those. Whether Janice had helped them or not, he did not know; she didn't offer him any help and he didn't ask her for any. There was so much: tent, air mattresses, sleeping bags, bedding, cooking and eating utensils, fishing equipment, the portable icebox, camp chairs—there seemed no end. Despite the additional space in the station wagon, he found he would have to organize the loading more carefully. He took it all out and started over. It was after midnight when he got to bed.

He had told the children they would get started as early as they wanted to, but he was not prepared for the three of them appearing beside his bed before five in the morning, dressed and eager to be off. Janice had breakfast for them, and the children accompanied him to the market. He had made a partial list, but the children kept adding items and they came out with enough food for a regiment.

The icebox leaked, and they went by Gene and Lois' to borrow theirs. Lois brought out the list she used for their camping trips so he could check for missing items. He had completely forgotten soaps and toilet tissue and dog food and towels. They went back to the market and then home for the towels. Janice kissed the children good-by, told them to have a good time. None of them seemed to notice that she did not kiss him good-by or wish him a good time.

It was almost dark when they reached the camp, and they were fortunate enough to get a site at the edge of the lake. They would unload only what they needed tonight, Neal decreed, and they could set up camp more completely in the morning; but either they needed a thing or they needed something that was under it, and soon the car had been emptied and there was everything spread out on the dusty ground around the brick fireplace.

The boys built a fire and Neal set up the pup tent and made Treena's bed in the station wagon. He set the two boys blowing up the mattresses. He let the children choose their food; they started with wienies to roast, and went like starving savages through pickles and potato chips and marshmallows. Well, give them enough milk, he thought, and it ought to make up for any dietary deficiency in the menu.

It had been a long day, and Neal would have liked to lounge by the fire to relax, but tiredness only keyed the children tighter, and such a lot of nickering and scuffling and screeching he had never suffered through. He got them into their sleeping bags at last and went gratefully to his own.

But the morning was bright and beautiful, the cool air off the lake stimulating; the coffee and bacon and eggs had all the marvelous tang they're supposed to have when cooked over a wood fire in the wilds. Everyone was happy and congenial and full of plans for the day, and Neal wouldn't have traded the whole setup for anything he could name.

While the children explored the camp, Neal began to get things into some sort of order. He had not realized how much there was to this business of camping out. Before, Janice had collected the supplies and he did little more than load them in the car as she gave them to him. At the campsite, his chores consisted of unloading the car, putting up the tent, filling the mattresses—and after that he was free to fish or walk or sit relaxed in one of the canvas chairs until she called him to a meal. Just putting the things where you could find them was, he discovered, a real feat of organization. He didn't do too badly, but he spent a lot of time at it.

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL RECIPE TREASURE BOX

A washable pink flowered metal file box . . . with 12 handy index dividers . . . 50 all-time-favorite Journal recipes . . . and space for adding 300 more! Just the right size for recipes you clip too.

$1.35* Postpaid

MORE TREASURES:
You can get a packet of 50 additional recipes for your box for an additional 50c—all of them budget favorites in the Journal kitchens.*

Send check or money order to:

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL RECIPES
Dept. 7, Independence Square
Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania

Offer good in U.S.A. only
Pennsylvania residents add 1% Pennsylvania sales tax*

After lunch they rented a boat for the v and Neal taught the children something a rowing and keeping the boat balanced. H the boys fished in the afternoon, while T went back to the station wagon to do u hair. She was unhappy with Neal for fo ting a mirror; she had only the rear-view ror of the car, and that—according to l was simply maddening!

Dinner was a great success; potatoes wra in foil and buried under the bed of coals baked to fluffy perfection, chicken broile turn over the coals, sliced tomatoes and tage cheese, and canned peaches for de

They washed the dishes and put the t away, and sat around the fire afterward ing companionably. How unguarded and the children were in their conversation, thought. This was certainly the way to acquainted with them. . . . And it wouldn like this if Janice were here.

Wednesday night, when the children asleep, Neal sat contentedly fatigued b the fire, and congratulated himself. He not been too sure he could cope with all of the children at once, but here the week half over and everything was going better he had expected. He wasn't as unhandy had thought he might be; at least he was l ing. And the children turned to him for e thing. There had been minor accidents none that could not be repaired. It was mostly, of course, the way he dashed off out looking where he was going: he had sc both shins and cut one knee; and, wa barefoot, he would, if there was a pie broken glass around, step on it. He had sat on a board with a nail in it, and Nea laid him out on the front seat of the poured antiseptic into the wound and tered on a bandage. Treena had fallen skinned her elbow; Dick had cut his f while cleaning a fish. But nothing seriou one cried.

Jingo, who had been a dignified old from the time they got him, now—at the a four—was having a belated puppyhood, bling and seampering and chasing and b ing. He scared up birds to chase, bark porcupines in the pine trees, nosed ar rocks from under which chipmunks sque teasingly at him.

This evening when the boys came up swimming and stood side by side tow themselves, Neal had looked at the two of and been surprised at how much they lo like brothers despite the foot of differen their height, and Rod's having a wide, s face while Dick's face was long and ser

My sons, he said to himself now—not a but rolling the words on his tongue al same. It was a new sensation for him, th compassing feeling of possessiveness. H expected the trip to be a rewarding one, b best he had underestimated its possibiliti was a rich and fulfilling experience. My boys, my girl, he mused, the paternal in full-blown.

A slight hardness gathered at the ed his thought. Janice. I'll bet, he told hi she thinks I'm having a tough time. I'll b thought I couldn't do it. Well, considering little practice I've had, I'm doing darned And I've found out a lot I ought to have k before. I'll never give up the children, I that now. Never.

Then on Friday, things began to get o hand. First it was Jingo, coming yipping from one of his forays, swinging his hea culiarly. He was right up to them before could see that his muzzle was covered porcupine quills, sticking out like mini arrows. Through his lips, piercing his two of them through his tongue. Nea pliers from the car and while Dick held th on his lap, and Rod and Treena stood by ing in agony and close to tears, Neal p them out.

Next it was the three children in the They had gone out alone, promising to within sight. Neal glanced up just in tim see Rod jump up, grinning, yell, "Watch and with a wild lurch capsize the boat. sprang for the lake.

He met the three children a few yards the boat, swimming for shore. They we

t. He turned and swam back with them. as not only the fright they had given him, it had struck him what it would be if any- g happened to any of the children while he them. Janice would never let him live it n.

e waited until they were all on the bank, e of them the worse for the experience, and he went for Rod. "What a darned-fool . Didn't you know ——"

od shrugged. "It's O.K. Everybody's safe."

No thanks to you."

Heck, they can swim."

They could have got struck on the head, cked out."

I'd have saved them."

leal grabbed his shoulder and propelled roughly toward the car. "Don't you ever nything like that again, do you hear me?"

O.K., O.K."

leal stared at the boy's ingenuous counte- ce. He was not being impudent or inso- ; he just didn't think it was serious. How you impress it on a kid like this that it is ous? Should he beat him? Take a strap to ? Make him stay the rest of the day in the ? Neal was, he realized, trembling notice- . Rod said, "Gee, dad, I didn't know you'd all shook up like that."

And don't use that word shook up!"

But you are. You're shaking all over."

leal let him go without saying more.

fter lunch the people camping two sites y shot a rattlesnake near their tent. Treena, ified, rushed to the station wagon, closed doors and for the rest of the afternoon sed to come out.

leal and the boys left her there while they t on a hike to see the falls. On the way k, Rod turned up missing, and they had n looking for him and calling when they rd a faint "Hi-i-i," and looked up. There he top of the high dirt cliff, concave from sion, the top curved over like the thin crest wave about to break, was the silhouette of ead, black against the bright sky. "Hi, !" It was Rod, of course.

Neal had a vision of the thin crust of dirt aking through and the figure of a child ning hurtling through the air onto the pile ocks below. He shouted wildly, "Rod! Go k, go back." Rod craned his neck—it ked as long as a gosling's neck—and ught his arm around, elbow crooked and ers spread behind his ear, as if to say, Eh? at did you say? Oh, the little —— Neal nped his lips over the word.

He must not yell again; another slight move- nt was all that was needed to throw the nce. He waved with restrained frenzy for boy to back off. And then, somehow, the d moved back, like a turtle's head drawing its shell, and disappeared. Thank God.

He and Dick walked up the trail to meet . Neal was unnerved. He ought to do nething in the way of discipline or punish- nt. But what? It wasn't as if the boy was bedient; if you told him not to do some- ng, he didn't do it—he just thought of nething else. There ought to be some way get to him. He would have to talk with ice.

omething roused Neal shortly before day- it. It was Treena. Even in the dim light he ld see that her face was twisted with fear.

'hat is it?" he asked in a whisper.

'Oh, daddy ——" Her voice broke.

He could see that she was bent over, her ns folded tightly across her stomach. "I've such awful cramps."

Cramps. He felt the perspiration forming on forehead. Did she know what she was say- ? Did it mean what he thought it meant? , good heavens, has Janice told her? If she n't—and if ——

He got out of the sleeping bag, put his arm oss her shoulder. "You go back to bed, eena. Stay quiet and I'll make you some hot colate. Would you like that?"

'I guess so, daddy"—wanly.

He helped her into the station wagon and lay down obediently, pathetically. "I'll ry," he told her, and went at once to start fire going. He had time to put on some thes while the fire was starting. What should do? Take her home? Call Janice? Janice ght to have realized that something like this might happen; she could have given him some idea of what to do.

He was stirring the cocoa over the fire when the boys appeared from the tent wearing their swimming trunks. They waved at him, arms swinging like the wigwag at a railroad crossing, and ran down and jumped headlong into the lake. He felt a shiver go through him at the thought of that icy plunge. They came up immediately, splashing and beating the water with their arms, shouting at each other. It wouldn't be fair to them to leave this morning; they had planned on packing back to the high mountain lake for the day.

Treena had been crying. He leaned over the front seat. "Here's your cocoa, honey."

He stroked her forehead, pushing the hair back. What if it was what he thought and she was afraid? Didn't she know anything? What could he tell her?

She had begun to cry again. "I wish mamma was here," she said plaintively. "Why didn't she come, daddy?"

He had no answer for that. He said to Treena, "Would you like to go home?"

"Oh, yes, I would, daddy."

He got out of the car and called Rod and Dick to him. They stared at him, first in surprise, and then in disappointment. Neal added reasonably, "We were going to leave tomorrow anyway. This way, you'll have all day Sunday to get ready for your Monday classes." Blank stares while they thought it over, and finally the voices saying together with the same amiable acceptance, "O.K."

It didn't take long to break camp. Dick took the boat back, and by the time he returned everything was packed and they piled into the car ready to take off.

For a while Treena played the invalid role to the full, sitting quietly, wan and woebegone; but she came out of it before they had gone far, and she and Rod began raising their usual Cain. Neal was relieved that the crisis—if crisis it was—was not so pressing. He eased up on the accelerator; he was in no hurry to get home, to get back into that stiff, indeterminate, unsettling atmosphere.

He saw, as they drove into the driveway, that Janice's car was not there. Before he could turn off the ignition, the children and Jingo were out and racing to the front door. Treena looked at him, her face comical with perplexity and dismay. "The door's locked!"

He unlocked the door and the children ran through the house calling their mother. Neal went straight to the kitchen and on her pad he found a note:

Foods in refrigerator and freezer.
Directions attached.

In the refrigerator was a baked ham under a plastic cover, a chicken casserole with the notation, "Put in oven for one hour, 350°," a molded fruit salad and individual dishes of pudding. He had opened the freezer and was looking at the assortment of pies, cakes, rolls, casserole dishes, meats and prepared fruits that filled it when the children burst in, demanding, "Where is she? Where did she go?"

"I don't know anything more than you do," Neal said.

Dick found mail in the box. Neal looked at the number of letters, studied postmarks. She had been gone more than one day.

Listlessly the children got their suitcases and took them to their rooms.

Neal telephoned Gene and Lois. "Janice is off somewhere," he said carelessly. "She didn't say where, or when she was coming back, but there's lots of food; why don't you come over?"

If they knew anything of Janice's whereabouts, they gave no indication. By the time Neal and the children had showered and changed into fresh clothes, Gene and Lois were there. Lois put the chicken Tetrazzini in the oven and they all went downstairs, where, over soft drinks, the children told—with gratifying enthusiasm—about the trip.

The telling didn't take long, and then the children were dragging Gene upstairs to play quoits, and Lois said to Neal, "Sounds as if you did all right."

"I seemed to get by."

"Did you enjoy it yourself?"

"Yes, I did."

Deviled Tomatoes... new picnic idea with
Underwood Deviled Ham

Try these easy-to-make Deviled Tomatoes . . .

4 medium tomatoes
1 - 4½ oz. can Underwood Deviled Ham
¼ cup chopped green pepper
¼ cup chopped celery

Halve tomatoes, scoop out pulp. Blend Underwood Deviled Ham with green pepper and celery. Refill tomato halves, and put back together.

Picnic time tip: keep your pantry stocked with Underwood Deviled Ham. It takes up so little space, makes so many delicious picnic treats.

THIS "HANDY HAM" DOES MOST ANYTHING HAM CAN DO . . . AND JUST AS DELICIOUSLY, TOO!

Made from whole hams finely ground and deftly seasoned for a wonderful can't-be-copied flavor.

FOR OTHER SNACK RECIPES WRITE: ANNE UNDERWOOD, DEPT L70, RED DEVIL LANE, WATERTOWN 72, MASS.

"Good."

There was a pause, and then Neal asked, "Did you see Janice while I was away?"

"No, we didn't. We called her once, but she had something planned."

"Lois," he began, and hesitated, not sure he ought to go on. "Has—has Janice said anything to you . . . about us?"

She looked at him thoughtfully, making sure they were thinking about the same thing. "Yes."

"What—what did she say?"

"She came over when she got your letter."

"Oh? So you know about that."

"I didn't read it, but she told us about it."

He waited, but apparently Lois was not going to volunteer information. It was seeping into his mind that all the time he had been wondering if Gene and Lois noticed any change, they had known all about it. "And"—he cleared his throat—"what did you think?"

"I thought," she said flatly, "that it was about time you did something."

"Janice didn't tell me she had talked with you. In fact, she's never said anything, about any of it."

"We talked half the night. Gene, of course, had a heyday. He's been spoiling for a chance to say something to Janice for a long time, and he took advantage of the opportunity."

"What did he say?"

"Oh"—she shrugged and pursed her lips—"he said she was a harpy and a shrew, that she was too efficient and smart and bossy, and I don't know what-all."

Good old Gene.

Lois was going on: "Of course I don't agree with him."

That caught him by surprise. "You don't?"

"No. He lays all the blame on Janice, as if she had started the whole thing. But the way I see it, you're the one who's been at fault."

"I?"

"Yes, you."

Neal gaped at her.

She said, with that dry comic inflection of hers, "Oh, come now, don't tell me you thought it was all Janice's fault."

"What did I do?" he asked ingenuously.

"Do I have to draw you a picture?"

"Yes. Draw me a picture."

"Well"—she held out her glass—"pour a little more of that insipid soda pop over this ice and sit down and I'll tell you."

He sat down facing her.

"Before anything else, Neal," she said, "you know we love you and Janice better than anyone we know. It has hurt us to see what was happening to you. But you don't just barge in and tell someone what you think of them—not unless they ask you."

"Well, I'm asking you."

"And I am happy to tell you. Honestly, there have been times I've wanted to take a poke at you."

"But what have I done?"

"That's just it, you've done nothing. Nothing but sit back and feel sorry for yourself."

"Sorry for myself," he repeated with an immediate impulse to protest, to deny.

"Yes, sorry for yourself," Lois was saying. "You'd withdraw into a little pocket, lick your wounds in silence. Oh, I tell you, if there's anything I abominate, it's a man who lets himself turn into a limp, long-suffering ——" She hesitated for a word.

Neal said, "Worm?"

She gave a short laugh. "You said it, not I. Neal, you don't know what it does to a woman, to be married to a man like that. Janice didn't know what she was doing, it was instinctive with her. It probably started innocently enough—she had a house to run, three kids, and well, you are slow. She'd speak impatiently. And what do you do? You're hurt, you're sorry, you retreat, you quit trying. Pretty soon you're leaving everything to her, you don't do your share, you lose all initiative. You don't take any interest in your kids ——"

That nicked him. "Wait a minute! That's not so."

"Oh, yes, it is. To you, they're your three offspring, a sort of coagulated mass. You haven't seen them as individuals. You haven't even known as much about them as I have. I'll admit that lately it's been somewhat different, but ——"

"I see what you mean," he conceded slowly.

"Janice didn't want to be nasty. What she was doing, even though she didn't realize it, was trying to goad you—into doing something, being something. Any woman would do the same."

"You?"

"Sure. Only I'd be a lot worse than Janice. Oh, I know, you think I'm easygoing, good-natured, all that stuff. Maybe I am. But I wouldn't be if I were married to a man who would sit back and let me turn into a termagant." Her voice dropped. "Whatever a termagant is."

They sat in silence for a moment. This was all unexpected and shocking to Neal, but he was following her, every word clicking into place like the balls in a game of Chinese checkers.

"Janice hasn't liked it," Lois resumed with feeling. "She's never said so, but I know. Neal, you have to understand how a woman is. To have a man accept insult and injury—patiently, supinely, morosely—it does something to a woman. It draws out the worst in her. She may hate it in herself, but she can't help it. It's like poison in her blood."

Poison, he thought. Slow insidious poison.

"I don't know what's the matter with men," Lois said. "It's so simple. A woman wants a man to be a man, and it's in her nature to despise the man who isn't. Especially when he's her husband."

She wagged her glass, watching the ice cubes shift. "You aren't the only one," she said. "I see it all the time. These men, the poor deluded creatures, thinking that other people feel sorry for them for having such a wife and consider them noble for sticking with a marriage like that. I want to poke them and say, 'Wake up, brother. We may thoroughly dislike a woman constantly depreciating her husband, but it's the man we despise—for letting her get away with it.'"

Neal frowned, thinking hard. "For 'letting.'"

"I don't know what finally waked you up," she said.

I know, he thought. Zimmie. He said, "I reached the place I was ashamed to have people see what I had become."

"It took you long enough to get there," she said bluntly, but there was the overtone of affection to lighten it.

They sat for a while without speaking, Neal staring at the floor. Was it true, what Lois said, that he was basically responsible, that he had let it happen? And one way was as bad as the other: to be too weak, too timid to face up to a problem; or to go on accepting it in an indulgence of self-pity.

He had always hated self-pity in others. Could he be guilty of it himself? Had he taken some perverted satisfaction in being patient, and supine, and long-suffering? He recalled words—words from his own thinking: a pitiable creature . . . enduring . . . suffering at her hands. So he had been sorry for himself. He had let it go on. The thought was repugnant.

They heard the children race across the floor above them, and looked up to see Rod and Treena come clattering down the stairs. Rod had a letter in his hand. "It's from mother," Treena cried.

"Special delivery," Rod said importantly and handed it to Neal.

"Come on, kids," Lois said. "Let's go up and set the table." She herded them before her.

Neal looked at the envelope. Hotel stationery. The Whitehurst. And, in ink, Room 1109.

He didn't open it for a minute. Janice. At the Whitehurst. What would she have written?

Dear Neal: The business that brought me here was the writing of this letter. But first let me tell you (you'll be seeing the bill when it comes in anyway) that I bought myself some new clothes. A pink robe (negligee, no less) and satin slippers with marabou. (I've always wanted slippers trimmed in marabou.) I don't look like myself, and I don't feel like myself. But I feel wonderful.

Well, to get down to facts. The crux of the matter is: I am not cut out to be a widow.

But that presents problems. Shall I get myself a new husband, or keep the one I've got? But what's the use of keeping the one I've got if I'm going to be a widow anyway?

I have been thinking about the kind of husband I would like. He would be fine and strong and head of the house. But thoughtful and gentle and kind too. He would be the sort who would keep me sweet. Not sticky-sweet, but considerate and soft-tongued.

Of course, just how he would do that I don't know. I have thought of all the possibilities—snipe back at me, knock out a few teeth, fall on his knees and beg me to be different—and none of those would work. Nothing, I guess, but his saying that he had had enough, and was through. That would scare me. That would put sc scare into me that I'd have to behave myself.

That's what my last husband did. . . .

Oh, Neal, I don't want to be silly. I'm not funny. I learned that.

I want to cry and say it's all been simply a I want to say that I'll try with my whole hea be good. I want you to want me again.

I didn't believe your letter at first, and I a Gene. (If you think you were hard on me, should have heard Gene!) And then I looked mirror. It was all quite a blow.

Gene said I had my tongue whittled to a s point and it wouldn't go back into shape b self, I'd have to work at it, and that it w take time—and practice. For a while I wasn' sure I could do it. That's why I couldn't tell any of this before. I didn't want to make promises; I had to try for a while, to make I could do it.

I don't know how it all began, and I would have believed how far things had gone if I ha been scared into watching everything I said. thought. It's been rough to admit to myself shrewish I've been.

But you helped a lot. Because suddenly were once again the man I'd married. (I thought for a while I must have married uniform, because when you left that off, seemed to leave off, too, the qualities I had le and admired. It has been wonderful to learn t were you.)

Oh, Neal, I think it was terrible of you to things go so long and be so awful. Don't think that underneath I was hating myse hating myself first, and hating you for letting be the kind of person I would hate?

Anyway, when you made me behave myse found I began loving you again.

Complicated, isn't it?

But now I say with all my heart that I would give two snaps of my finger for any man I've looked at but the one I was lucky enough to (though how I did it, I don't know) fifteen ye ago.

Do you think I can get him back? I'll ne give up trying.

I love you,
JANIC

I want you too.

Neal knocked on the door of Room 11 "Come in."

He opened the door. Janice, in pink neg gee, her hair down her back, was retreati to the dressing room. She turned in the do way and stared in astonishment. "Neal!"

"Who did you expect?"

"The waiter," she said vaguely, and ma a gesture toward the supper cart. "I had dinn here. I thought you might be telephoning."

"Why telephone? I'd rather come."

"But—but how did you get here so soon only mailed the letter a ——"

"I flew. I thought we'd wasted enough time

He moved toward her, smiling. She lift her hands and he took them in his. "You lo pretty in pink," he said. "And about twen years old."

Her eyes flew to his. "Oh, Neal, I have much to say to you!" There was a hint roguery in the smile that came over her fac "Shall I put it in writing?"

"No." He pulled her to him unceremoniously. "Don't even put it in words. I got t message." He kissed her, with ardor, a pr longed and meaningful kiss.

She returned his kiss—and then she laughe She dropped her head, forehead pressing h shoulder, and said, "Oh, Neal!"

He looked down at her, puzzled, his mou beginning to smile, but his eyes earnest. "Wh are you laughing at?"

"At you," she said, her voice muffled an halting. "Whoever said . . . you were slow?

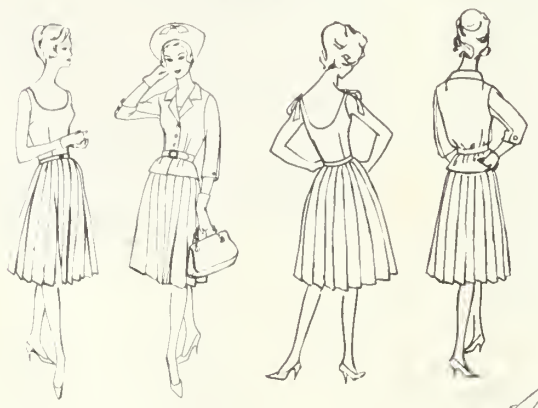
He gripped her tight against him. It w just as he had remembered it, the slender bod quaking with laughter. Oh, thank God, wasn't too late.

Sergeant Zimmerman had had dinner an spent the evening at his captain's home. No it was ten o'clock and he was on his feet, say ing he must leave. "It's sure been swell, cap't And a real pleasure to meet you, ma'am—lik I knew it'd be."

"Must you go so soon?" Janice asked

"Sure do, ma'am. Got to drive all night a it is. Told my wife I'd be home Friday morn ing, and I'd better be or she will give me hell.

Neal laughed. "You, Zimmie?"

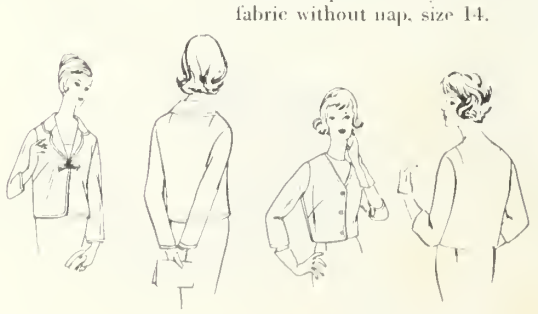


"Oh, sure, cap'n. You know how wome are."

EN

---

a good black dress...



Other views, sizes and prices of Vogue Patterns on page 66

Vogue Design No. 4131. One-piece dress and jacket; 10–18 (31–38). $1.50. Version shown requires 5⅛ yards of 45″ fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 9977. Blouse; 10–18 (31 38). 75c. Version shown requires 1½ yards of 45″ fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 9962. Jackets; 10 18 (31 38). 75c. Organdy jacket requires 3¼ yards of 45″ fabric without nap and 4½ yards of 1″ braid binding, size 14. Wool jacket requires 1¼ yards of 54″ fabric without nap, size 14. 4 yards of ½″ braid trim have been added.

Let your skin "breathe" with new sheer Mum®

It's the only leading deodorant that stops odor without "stopping up" pores

You know your skin must "breathe" in its own special way. This means it must let natural vapors and fluids pass out. All other leading deodorants interfere with the natural "breathing out" process. New Mum works in a different way.

Unlike other leading deodorants—cream or spray, ball-types or pads—new Mum does not interfere with the natural function of the skin. New sheer Mum keeps your underarms wonderfully sweet and odor-free without "smothering" your pores. It gives you more natural protection.

New! More natural protection . . . Nature never intended the pores of the skin to be "stopped up." Yet all other leading deodorants "smother" the normal "breathing out" action of the pores (Illustration A). But new sheer Mum stops odor without "stopping up" pores (Illustration B).

feel free as air, clean as air...when you use softer, fluffier Mum. This eer cream deodorant lets your skin "breathe," as nature intended. And new s so gentle! It contains no aluminum salts, no harsh chemicals. Yet new Mum is so effective! It works surely, lastingly...with wonderful hexaphene . . . to destroy the active cause of odor.

Works while you're on the go! You've enough on your mind—without deodorant worries! You need never worry about deodorant failure—when you use new sheer Mum. It keeps on working all through your active day. No worries about harmful irritation, either! New Mum is so safe for normal skin, even a teenager can use it daily.

So much softer, fluffier, whiter, new sheer Mum is a pleasure to use. It vanishes the moment you smooth it on. So airy-light, so silky-smooth, you know it won't harm delicate fabrics—even cashmere or chiffon.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

A LEGACY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 43

enough to climb, yet young enough not to be fun-spoiling adults, struggled at dawn with breakfasts that could scarcely be swallowed, and then trundled the thirty miles to the bottom of the Divide in an old truck with a stake body.

The memories of that ride are as vivid as any other part of the day. Sometimes, even now, some shape or smell will assault me, and I will feel again how the air touched the cheek insistently, how the meadow larks talked to one another, or smell again the sharp stink of a porcupine dead in the road—as though things seen from the corner of the eye could register only long after the sight.

At last the truck would stop. There was the mountain, enormous against the stainless sky.

Uncle Duncan and John Charette, his old, bent-legged Indian foreman, who ran the ranch together now that grandfather was too old, got out of the truck, leaving Dougal, the oldest cousin, to drive the miles around over the highway pass to pick us up on the other side. Poor Dougal, we thought. He was already too old to climb; he was past the magic age.

The red-winged blackbirds swayed on the cattails in the meadow where we stood shivering for a moment, eager to get up the first bare brown shoulder to the sunshine. But stand we must, to get our minds tight around the occasion, and our fingers tight around the tribute stones.

Uncle Dunc and John Charette walked alone to give us the intoxication of freedom. Some of the cousins raced along in a core, shouting, pointing out a memoried bush or odd-shaped hump of ground, slumping to the ground in a communal rest period. Some walked apart with a favorite, trying to share through one another's eyes.

Or one could walk alone, and I suppose it is the alone times I remember best. Then in the silence, with the sounds of the others lost, each discovery meant more: the smell of a juniper berry crushed in a hot hand; the diabolical face of a little green snake and the feel of his oiled-silk body between the fingers; the glint of fools' gold in a piece of quartz; the way the valley below flattened and shrank as the sun climbed.

Being alone gave a clarity to things seen and felt—as if the mere presence of others bent and refracted an image before it got through to me.

Once, and only once, do I remember trying to force someone else to see what I saw. We sat on a rock together; I pointed down and my mouth ran over with words as I tried to say what I saw in the great valley below: how wind and water had split the mountains into rocks, rocks into dirt, dirt into canyon, canyon into valley—how precisely the folds of each fitted into another, until the whole world turned startlingly simple, to be comprehended like a globe which is held in the hand, and marveled at.

But it did not work; she only stare and went on contemplating with her inward sight. No matter. We were enc together, the same sweat poured dow face, the blood made the same seashor in every ear.

Regardless of how scattered we climl drew together at the rockfall, about l up. It barred our way, a great river of black rocks pouring down the mount While the others watched tensed fr sides, one by one we crept across, Unel first, John Charette last; and with ea sage at least one rock would dislodge hurtling down with fearful sound. I r ber, remember the delicious fear—a touch of John Charette's hand with la caked in the sweat of his palm, the roc ing and lurching under my feet; in a m they would avalanche and we would c down the black river, drowned in the th ing, surging rock; but when I looked would be smiling at me, grass grew un again; the mountain had accepted us f more climb.

What we called our "canyon" was a shallow draw carved from the side mountain by a fierce little white-water There we rested in the sun-spun shade o and leaned back against the spindly trunks. I would drink the icy water an at my startled teeth, wash my face and draw like curing leather.

See there; when I peer through a cre the wall of time, I can see some of the Camilla, dirty cheeks flaming like paintbrush, sleeps for an exhausted ha with her head in Janet's lap; David, v ways climbed in a dogged fury an waited, foot tapping, for the rest to ca sits throwing impatient twigs into the Peg leans back with a lovely peace on h It is the Fourth of July, and raptur through every artery.

The canyon shot up the side of the tain at an abrupt angle, getting shall and steeper. We climbed bent over, pushing on knees, scrabbling for hanc The aspen leaves were smaller at this they were dime-sized or less, new- leaves barely uncrinkled from the bud.

The weeks fell back. We moved u from summer to spring, and winter b just above on the peaks.

Always, just when, sweat-sticky anc ing, I swore I could not summon up a step, we came out onto Heidi's m bristling with flowers so thick under was painful to step. Violets, shooting lady's-slippers, Clarkia—and here and great tufty pasqueflower, blue as a eye—stood out from the thousands o no-name flowers. Wild iris, pale and grew in the bowl end of the meadow there was a wild wet odor of shrunken banks, honeycombed with age.

On the higher slope, the sun sparkled grass dew and the little brown pills c manure, and bitterroots were sudden the earth. The meadow was overhun rock-banded cliffs foaming with rry blossom; the little trees stood the rock growing out of noth ng, a ike the snail fossils embedded in the ces.

Ts gave onto the top, which was not ll, but a big bare brown saddle be-o peaks. The saddle lifted gently at , gathering itself, rushed high to the ere the waters divided, the Contiivide.
of air flowed down from the peaks, hat flowed into the open mouth like m a pitcher. This air smelled different, igh and thin and unused; it poked ers down the necks of damp shirts our sweaty hair. The sunshine, liquid ny, gave little heat; the saddle backed against the winter that waited omin the peaks for earth to get over its it of spring and summer.
e to rest now. Spent, windbroke, we the cairn. Finally, finally we were ere on the lee side of a great square-der where a spring sprang, pushing ter out of a small bowl with a mumnd, thin, metallic-tasting water that and west in two streams. Triumph-we straddled the country, drinking h the Atlantic and the Pacific, watchwk slide down the air of two sides of ent!
tion grew into such a mountain in-that I could scarcely find enough me around it. I was centered; I was land and light and flower; I contained the nited States.
e solemnly without words, and when orange was sucked dry it was time for mony.

One by one we scrambled up the boulder to lay on the cairn the stones we each had carried to this place, for this moment.

I don't know what the others did. I always felt they had beautiful rituals involving the history of our country or prayers for its future, while I had nothing, not even a word. For when I looked out over that immensity spread before me, the beauty of it stopped the breath in my throat and left me with nothing to give but the stone in my hand.

I faced the east, moved by the sharp carved shapes of range after range in pale subtle colors with here and there a sliver of water glinting, giving back the light. I faced the west, where the rain made the tree forests cover the mountains like an olive-drab blanket over an unmade bed, until the far-off ranges marched blue to the Pacific.

But I didn't look down into the valley just below, where Dougal would be just now driving a black beetle along penciled roads through ruled squares of wheat, alfalfa and dry fallow—the end of the journey, coming for us.

I put my stone on the cairn, saddened by the thought, and held my hand against it for a moment. Warm from my hand, the stone was still part of me; it would stay here, looking up through the night to where Orion's belt hung low enough to catch at, huddled under the snows and winds of the fierce winter. Long after I died, my stones would be here, keeping tryst for me on the Fourth of July, in our country's peace or peril.

I cannot climb again; I am past the magic age. But my son is six this year; he brings me stones to help him choose from, and each time I hold one in my hand I am back on the mountain, climbing, exhilaration mounting.

WITNESSED
MIRACLE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 28

they want the knowledge to help their . Through vivid demonstrations, subtle ressures, gentle persuasion by example, are constantly given good reasons to e their living patterns. Explanations en in the simplest and most graphic ossible for body cleanliness, balanced proved methods of planting and tend-crops, and child care. Husbands, too, ited to come to meetings, so that they convinced the new knowledge is a good and not an evil influence for their
.
ing these groups, stopping for a reg drink or a meal with them, brought yo, in Nigeria, where a trim, one-story ucation without morals is a ast on the loose.

g with open-sided construction houses
ult Education Women's Training Cen-omen selected by heir own villages or a year's training. They are taught to ving machines and the simple laundry ent which turned out the dainty, folded on napkins and linen for our luncheon, ed and served by the students. Their ex-f nutritious foods, children's clothing, naking equipment would have done to a college class in home economics.
s are so arranged that the women are t off from their homes during this trainriod, but may go back and forth during rly planting season and harvesting pe-
To this village leadership center fifteen are attached.
Etinan, near the historic Calabar coast,
w one of these "laboratory" clubs,
d in a substantial building constructed women themselves on land donated by cal chief, who came to welcome us with dignity and charm. As usual, there was a et" welcome, not the noisy salvos from guns, but one of drums, songs and dancing. Again an impressive exhibit of children's clothes, practical and attractive mats woven from grass for floor or table, sweeping and scrubbing brushes from the stiffer reeds, and the chance to taste attractive and appetizing local foods. We even acquired a few Ifek words as we listened to a class learning to read and write while improving their homemaking skills.

"When we find women who show the desire and ability to read and write, we offer them intensive teaching, on condition they do their best to hand on their knowledge to other club members," Horace Mason, a pioneer community-development officer, explained to us when we visited groups in Tanganyika. "This is an area where the malaria-bearing mosquito is a constant problem, and one of the first sewing lessons is the making of mosquito nets."

Still another pattern of "advancement for women" is under way at the Catholic mission of Kisoma, on the slopes of Kilimanjaro with its snow-covered sugar loaf above the clouds. Several hundred white-garbed women waving flowery branches, members of three different clubs, greeted us with charming little speeches, English translations of which were presented to us. Father Joseph and Sister Cecilia, local young people who have received their technical and religious training in Rome and the United States, explained that some of the club members come "two hours by feet even in lion country" to attend classes. "They are eager to make any sacrifice to learn how to improve the health and living conditions of their families," Father Joseph said.

Africa is indeed a continent filled with change and promise. In the words of Y. A. Lule, Uganda's own Minister for Social Development, "If you are to raise the standard of living, the standard of the home is basic. No matter how well I do my job in the ministry, my wife is carrying on a far more important task in the rearing of our children. The future depends on helping women to make this a good society. Never underestimate the women of Africa."

Our thanks and admiration too—for Mr. Maurice Pate, Executive Director of UNICEF and his staff at United Nations; Mr. Paul Gordon in Nigeria; Mr. Perry O. Hanson in East Africa; Mr. A. G. Berouti in the French Congo; government officials in Nigeria, Uganda, Kenya, and Tanganyika; Miss Sue Stille of the YWCA; the Countess of Limerick, Vice-Chairman of the British Red Cross; and for all the acts of kindness and hospitality which made it possible for us to witness international good will at work.

SCHOOLS AND CAMPS

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 380 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Girls' Schools

Ready School for girls, grades 4–12. Accredited preparation for college. Chapel, music, art, sports, typing in daily schedule. Student clubs for extra-curricular activities. Home life and good study habits emphasized. 20-acre suburban campus; city advantages. Est. 1887. Competitive scholarships. Catalog. Evangeline Lewis, Hdm., 5126 Bollimore Nolionol Pike, Boltimore 29, Md.

Kemper Hall Gives girls mental, spiritual, social and physical training for gracious, successful living. College preparation; Jr. High. Fine Arts including Ceramics. Small classes. Riding, Swimming, Hockey, etc. Wooded Lake campus. 90th Yr. Under direction of Sisters of St. Mary (Episcopal). Write: Box J, Kenosha, Wis.

Coeducational School

Judson School In Arizona. A coed ranch school. Grades 1 to 12. College Preparatory. Accredited. Beautiful location in Paradise Valley near Phoenix. Healthful, warm climate. Small classes. Riding & polo included in tuition. Tennis, swimming, pack trips, fishing, rodeos, riflery, roping, music. 32nd year. Catalog. Dovid J. Wick, Headmaster, Scottsdale, Arizona

Medical Technology

College of Medical Technology
Medical Technician Training. Also X-Ray. Graduates in demand, excellent pay. Free nation-wide placement. Nationally approved school. Dorms. Athletics. Coed. Courses 3 to 15 months. Write for Catalog giving year of high school graduation. 1900-L Lo Solle Avenue, Minneopolis 3, Minn.

Fine & Applied Arts

Ray-Vogue Schools
Commercial Art, Photography, Interior Decoration, Dress Design, Fashion Merchandising with Modeling, Fashion Illustration. Coed. Attractive residence for out of town girls. Enter September 7. Write Registrar, Rm. 706. Specify course. Roy-Vogue Schools, 750 N. Michigon Ave., Chicogo 11

Home Study Schools

WHY DON'T YOU WRITE?

EARN EXTRA MONEY IN SPARETIME writing short stories, articles on homemaking, fashions, hobbies, travel, local, club and church activities. You learn by writing at home under the guidance of professional writer-editors by the fascinating N.I.A. New York Copy Desk Method.
FREE "Writing Aptitude Test" tells whether you have qualities to become a successful writer. Write for it NOW without cost or obligation. 35th Yr. Licensed by N.Y. State.

NIA NEWSPAPER INSTITUTE OF AMERICA
Suite 5750-L, One Park Avenue, N. Y. 16, N.Y.

American School High School at Home. Many Finish in 2 Years. Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H.S. text supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H.S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
American School, Dept. HB3, Drexel at 58th, Chicogo 37

Hotel Training

Hotels Call for Trained Women

"Now Hostess of a leading hotel thanks to Lewis." —J. E. Kuechle.

"Thanks to Lewis, I am Manager of a fine Hotel." —Dorothy Hesse.

You can qualify at home or through resident classes in Washington for a well-paid position in the hotel, motel and hospitality field. Thousands of Lewis graduates, both young and mature, "making good" everywhere. Get into this fast-growing field offering sound, substantial opportunities, fine living, luxurious surroundings. Previous experience proved unnecessary. Registration in Lewis Nationwide Placement Service FREE. Send today for FREE Book.

Accredited by NHSC.

Course Approved for All Veteran Training

44th SUCCESSFUL YEAR

LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL
Room FL-546, Washington 7, D.C.

ARE you looking for the right school? Each one of the listings on this page is packed with important, interesting information to help you select the right school. Read the advertisements carefully, then write for complete information and catalogs from those that interest you.

Boys' Schools

Missouri Military Academy And Separate Junior School, 71st yr. Grades 5–12. Fully accredited. Sr. ROTC. Friendly, inspiring teachers. Essentially college prep. Small classes. Strong guidance program. All sports. 30 acre lake. 5 athletic fields. 226-acre campus. Catalog
Col. C.R. Stribling, 170 Main St., Mexico, Mo.

St. John's Military Academy Where boys become self-confident men. Accredited college preparation under the famous St. John's System. Grades 7–12. Inspired teaching. Small classes, individual attention. Reading Clinic. ROTC. Fireproof dorms. All sports. Summer Camp. 76th year. Catalog. Dir. of Admissions, Box 370, Delafield, Wis.

Western Military Academy
Develops a desire to succeed. Emphasis on self-confidence, self-direction, how-to-study. Small classes, guidance. Grades 7–12. Career analysis. Jr.-Sr. R.O.T.C. All athletics: riding, pool. 82nd yr. Near St. Louis. Catalog:
Col. Ralph B. Jackson, Supt., Box L-7, Alton, Illinois

Northwestern Military & Naval Academy College prep. Est. 1888. Accredited. 75 mi. north of Chicago. Average class 10. Fireproof buildings. New 3-court gym. 85 acres on lake. Sr. ROTC Basic. All sports; sailing. Summer Camp. Write for catalogs. 87 So. Lake Shore Rd., Lake Geneva, Wis.

Wentworth Military Academy
Thousands of business and professional leaders started here. 4-yr. High School: separate 2-yr College. Accred. Sr. ROTC. CAA flying. Modern bldgs., country club. Sports for all; pool. Summer school; also younger boys' camp. 81st yr. Catalog.
Col. J. M. Sellers, 1870 Washington Place, Lexington, Mo.

The Miller School of Albemarle
Military. Grades 5–12. College preparatory plus industrial arts, iron & wood working, auto mechanics, machine shop & electricity. Endowed. Inclusive rate $1200. Sports. Near Charlottesville. 82nd year. Also Camp Wahoo. Catalog.
Col. W. Hugh Flannagan, Dept. L, Miller School P. O., Va.

Augusta Military Academy
"The Friendly School." Distinguished ROTC school in Shenandoah Valley. Jr. & Sr. Divisions. Boys 8–20. Accredited; graduates in leading colleges. All sports—pool, gym. 1400 acres. Family owned since 1742. Rate $1275. Catalog. Gen. Charles S. Roller, Box J, Ft. Defiance, Va.

Junior Military Academy
Boys 4–14. Semi-military. Kindergarten–8th grade. Family life and affectionate care. Food from our own farm. 12 months' enrollment includes 8 weeks at Camp Whooppee. Enter any time. Moderate rate. 41st year. Catalog.
Maj. Roy DeBerry, Box L, Bloomington Springs, Tenn.

Miami Military Academy NDCC Honor School. Develops leadership and character. Fully accredited. College preparatory. Grades 5–12. Small classes. Boys learn to study. Sports, sailing; pool. 30 acres on Biscayne Bay. Moderate fee. 35th year. Also Summer School and Camp. Catalog.
Col. F. R. Williams, 10603 Biscayne Blvd., Miami 38G, Fla.

Fork Union Military Academy
Our One Subject Plan in Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration. Accredited. ROTC highest rating. Modern bldgs. 2 gyms, 2 indoor pools. Separate Jr. School, grades 5–8. 62nd year. Catalog. Dr. J. C. Wicker, Box 867, Fork Union, Va.

Admiral Farragut Academy
Fully accredited college preparatory. Toms River, New Jersey; St. Petersburg, Florida. Naval training. Separate Junior Schools. Testing, guidance for college and career. Sports, boats; hands. Summer camp and school. Catalog.
Adm. Farragut Academy, Box AB, Toms River, New Jersey

Manlius
Founded 1869. For boys. Accredited. Grades 7–12. Complete college preparation. ROTC. Highest U.S. Army rating for over 55 Years. 126-acre campus. Developmental reading. Individual attention. Sports. Band. Summer session. Catalog.
Robert A. Weekes, The Manlius School, Manlius, N.Y.

Business & Secretarial

SHORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS

Famous SPEEDWRITING shorthand. 120 words per minute. No symbols; no machines. Uses ABC's. Learn at home or through classroom instruction. Lowest cost. Over 500,000 graduates. Typing available. 37th Year. Write for FREE booklet.

Speedwriting®
Dept. 9907
55 W. 42 St., N. Y. 36

Katharine Gibbs Secretarial. Outstanding training. Three practical courses; One-Year Secretarial, Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years). Special Course for College Women. Residences. Personal placement service. For catalog write: Admissions Dean, Boston 16, 21 Marlborough St.; New York 17, 230 Park Ave.; Montclair, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.; Providence 6, 155 Angell St.

Spencerian College Coeducational. Est. 1863. Small classes. Work-study plan. College life; social, athletic activities. In residential area. Earn B.B.A. degree in 2 yrs., 8 mos. in Accounting, General Business, Sales Management, A.A. in executive, medical, legal, secretarial; court reporting. G.I. approved. Catalog. Registrar J, Milwaukee 10, Wisconsin

"We're home, Mother, safe and sound"

You know how parents worry when you're traveling. It's so easy to set their minds at ease. Pick up the phone when the trip's over and tell them everything's o.k. They'll feel better when you do.

LONG DISTANCE RATES ARE LOW

For example:

FOR ONLY 75¢ YOU CAN CALL BETWEEN

Washington, D.C. and Cleveland
Atlanta and Mobile
New York and Norfolk
Chicago and Des Moines
Phoenix and San Diego

Station-to-Station for the first three minutes, after 6 p.m. and on Sunday. Add the 10% federal excise tax.

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

Call by number. It's twice as fast.

Summer Fashion Ideas for Gay Table Settings

List of do-it-yourself projects f summer table settings:

Yard-goods departments and fabric outlet stores have pretty pri polka-dot cottons that can be used for tablecloths or place mats, striped for runners. A few yards for only a few dollars will do the trick.

You might find an old wooden table in the kitchen, the attic or a loca shop. Bleach it, sand and wax or lacquer, or give it a coat of paint. Chairs sprayed—each in a different color (30 minutes each chair; lacquer, $2.60 fo

Make a search for flower containers in your kitchen or cellar—a cass teapot, old butter tubs, a pewter pitcher, a little brass bucket, a soup t things you hadn't thought of that are most original.

Flowers in season June and July (at your corner florist): daisies, corn asters, zinnias, marigolds—50 cents to $2.00 or $3.00 a bunch. In your own petunias are among the best, longest-lasting picking flowers. For Fourth try red geraniums, white petunias, blue cornflowers.

Blue-Pitcher Setting

Milk-glass plates: 15-piece set complete including plates		$3.99
Linen napkins	each	.98
Tablecloth made of printed cotton	a yard	1.25
China swans	each	2.00
Salt ladles	each	1.00
Blue antique opaline glass pitcher	about	26.50
*Matching glasses	about	4.75
Italian china figurine vases	each	7.50
4-piece place setting of pearl-handled sterling silver approximately		24.75

*There are similar copies of the opaline pitcher and the glasses, the pitcher $5.00–7.00, glasses around $1.50.

Pink-Finger-Bowl Setting

Pink-glass finger bowls	each	$5.00
Goblets, milk-white lined with green	each	2.25
Pink demitasse cup and saucer		1.75
Gold-gilt fork and spoon with porcelain handles	each	1.50
Old lattice plates, similar copies for around	each	2.00–3.00
Tablecloth and six napkins		35.00
Centerpiece—antique opaline; similar copies for around		5.00–7.00

Kitchen-Casserole Setting

Red enamel kitchen casserole		$13.95
Napkins	each	.69
China plates	each	1.25
Cup and saucer		1.75
Roman-striped glass finger bowls	each	4.98
Matching goblets	each	7.98
Dessert fork and spoon	each	1.50

Summer Buffet

Yellow plastic flatware service for six		$9.50
Individual straw trays	each	4.00
Yellow enameled flower basket		5.75
Lemonade glasses: set of 8		5.00
Lemon paper plates: package of 14		2.00
Lime paper plates: package of 14		2.00
Lime paper napkins: package of 25		1.00
Butterfly napkins: one package		.35
Enamel coasters	each	2.00
Flowered oval pottery platter		12.50
Flowered bowl		10.00
Flowered cup and saucer		3.75
Salad servers, teakwood and porcelain		17.50

Marble-Top Table

Italian glass dish	eac
Italian glass bowl	eac
Napkins	eac
Silver-plated spoon and fork	eac
Shell place mat	eac
Antique cup and saucer
Vase—antique opaline; similar copies for about	5.
Antique candlesticks (or silver-plated copies approximately)	3.0

Meissen Setting

Contemporary copies of old Meissen
Plates approximately	$1.
Cup and saucer approximate
Butter plates approximately Coffee or cocoa pot
Casserole centerpiece
Frosted footed glass
Silver salt and pepper (antique) similar copies: plated silver	pai
Plaid Belgian-linen tablecloth
Linen napkin
6 piece sterling-silver place setting

Fish Setting

Chinese fish plates	eac
Straw place mats	eac
Napkins	eac
Glass mugs	eac
Menu card	aroun
Candleholders	eac
English stainless-steel pistol-handled knife and fork

Marigold Table

Orange silk runner
Striped cotton runner
Gold-tipped, porcelain-handled knife and fork
Napkins	eacl
Italian flower plates	eacl
Salad plates	eacl
Cups and saucers	eacl
Ruby glasses	eacl
Pottery bowl, glazed with gold
Salt dishes and spoons, gold processed	eacl
Salad servers " "	a pai
Coffee spoons " "	eacl
Flower basket

Printed in

JOURNAL

The Magazine Women Believe In

8 1968
BURL
SLIC

orld's
st Women

160 POUNDS

Woodward to Cook

RED A NAL"– a Mother
er Mistakes

LOUISIANA
TIONS

YOUNG FASHION NEWS

For college girls... career girls... secretaries... and housewives and campus fashions are

N'T GET AHEAD TODAY UNLESS YOU READ

A refreshing, new kind of floor, this Tessera Vinyl Corlon. Have you seen it yet? Wr free sample: Armstrong, 6008 King Street, Lancaster, Pa. In Canada, Dept. 80-A, 1
Montreal, P. Q. ■ Tessera Corlon is one of the famous Armstrong VINYL FI

Style 86530. You can use Tessera in any room—upstairs, ground level, downstairs.

1860-1960 Beginning our second

Let your skin "breathe" with new sheer Mum®

It's the only leading deodorant that stops odor without "stopping up" pores

You know your skin must "breathe" in its own special way. This means it must let natural vapors and fluids pass out. All other leading deodorants interfere with the natural "breathing out" process. New Mum works in a different way.

Unlike other leading deodorants—cream or spray, ball-types or pads—new Mum does not interfere with the natural function of the skin. New sheer Mum keeps your underarms wonderfully sweet and odor-free without "smothering" your pores. It gives you more natural protection.

New! More natural protection . . . Nature never intended the pores of the skin to be "stopped up." Yet all other leading deodorants "smother" the normal "breathing out" action of the pores (Illustration A). But new sheer Mum stops odor without "stopping up" pores (Illustration B).

ll feel free as air, clean as air... when you use softer, fluffier Mum. This heer cream deodorant lets your skin "breathe," as nature intended. And new is so gentle! It contains no aluminum salts, no harsh chemicals. Yet new Mum is so effective! It works surely, lastingly... with wonderful hexaophene... to destroy the active cause of odor.

----Special Introductory Offer----

0 8-PIECE MANICURE SET WITH NUINE LEATHER CASE ONLY $1.00 and an empty carton from MUM® or IPANA®

NEW MUM ipana

Stellar Manicure Set
P. O. Box 26-A
Mt. Vernon 10, New York

Gentlemen. Please send me ___ 8-piece manicure set(s). I enclose $1.00 and one carton from either Mum deodorant or Ipana Tooth Paste for each set ordered.

Check color: ☐ Red ☐ Pink ☐ Blue

AME_____

TREET_____

TY_____ ZONE_____ STATE_____

(Offer expires December 31, 1960.) L-80

So much softer, fluffier, whiter, new sheer Mum is a pleasure to use. It vanishes the moment you smooth it on. So airy-light, so silky-smooth, you know it won't harm delicate fabrics—even cashmere or chiffon.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

August news! these sparkling-fresh towels, now $1

...more exciting values at every price!

SAVE ON CANNON—most wanted towels of

Plenty of towel for the money, and so many styles! New fashions, traditional favorites, in lots of Cannon Carefree Colors. Stripes, checks, big bath sizes, usually 1.39. Now $1

See the difference, feel the difference, enjoy the difference for years. Soft, fluffy Cannons can really take it! The lovely solids and bright new design above, in big bath sizes, usually 1.39. Now $1 All prices shown are approximate

EVERY CANNON TOWEL STAYS SOFT AND THIRSTY, WEARS FOR YEARS.
CANNON'S BEAUTI-FLUFF PROCESS MAKES ALL THE DIFFERENCE.

Cannon Mills, Inc., 70 Worth St., New York 13, N. Y. • Towels • Sheets • Bedspreads • Draperies • Stockings • Terry Cloth

CANNON

Ladies' Home JOURNAL

VOL. LXXVII NO. 8

August, 1960

Journalities

Stuart Cloete

ll-known writer and world
er, STUART CLOETE, who wrote
Your Heart Over (page 40), des his self-sketch: ". . . and as e my mind turns back the e of my life to Paris, where I I to walk; to London, where I d to love. I see my life as a lustrated by the great events in see it punctuated by the fine s I have ridden, the dogs I have I see friends, both men and n, and I walk in my mind
g the flowers of a walled garden ring where it will end. For that I purpose of life, to live fully so eath when it comes is a friend."

Kurt Vonnegut, Jr.

does it take to make a short-writer? KURT VONNEGUT, Jr.
Walk to Forever, page 12), an Indianapolis reporter. He d biochemistry at Cornell, me-cal engineering at Carnegie Tech anthropology at the University of go. During World War II he n infantryman and a prisoner of n Germany. But he has a simpler nation. "You write with feel-about something you know."

Lilly Gordon Einstein

LILLY GORDON EINSTEIN (The ding, page 66): "The love of s was always in the Brooklyn e of my childhood. We never much money, but there were s everywhere, and somehow we ys had the money to attend
s. My father, Harry Gordon, was nderful actor. For me, extend-my love for the spoken word to written was as effortless as lovanother child. My husband and e on a volcano in Long Island
I the roaring eruptions of three ng sons, Peter, Steven and Neil."

NOVELLA COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE

THROW YOUR HEART OVER	Stuart Cloete	40

STORIES

LONG WALK TO FOREVER	Kurt Vonnegut, Jr.	42
THE PLAYBOY AND THE PLUMBER	John Latham Toohey	56
THE WEDDING	Lilly Gordon Einstein	66
THE MISTRESS OF MELLYN (Conclusion)	Victoria Holt	70

SPECIAL FEATURES

WHERE IS MY PRESIDENT?	Dorothy Thompson	11
TELL ME, DOCTOR	Goodrich C. Schauffler, M.D.	18
THE SOCIAL SWIM	Pat Boone	24
WHAT YOUR DOCTOR LOOKS FOR WHEN HE EXAMINES YOUR CHILD	Benjamin Spock, M.D.	32
YOU CAN'T GET AHEAD TODAY UNLESS YOU READ	George Gallup	44
I REARED A CRIMINAL		51
THE RICHEST WOMEN IN THE WORLD	Peter Briggs and Margaret Parton	54
LOOKING OVER THE PRESIDENT'S SHOULDER (Conclusion)	Alonzo Fields	68
THE DEVIL IS ALWAYS WITH US	Amyas Ames	85
MY CHILD HAS A TEACHER	Neal Gilkyson Stuart	96
HOW AMERICA LIVES: Rich in Living Is Their Harvest	Nelle Keys Bell	121
WHAT IS LOVE?	Anna Trego Hunter	143

GENERAL FEATURES

LETTERS OUR READERS WRITE US		5
MAKING MARRIAGE WORK	Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D.	34
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE	Harlan Miller	36
FIFTY YEARS AGO · JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN		39
THIS IS A WHY? WHINY	Munro Leaf	114
ASK ANY WOMAN	Marcelene Cox	130

FASHION AND BEAUTY

"I WEIGHED 320 POUNDS, THEN LOST 160"	Dawn Crowell Norman	58
YOUNG WOMAN'S WORLD OF FASHION . . .	Wilhela Cushman	60
THE LONG AND THE SHORT OF A COAT DESIGN	Nora O'Leary	64
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!	Bet Hart	111

FOOD

I LOVE LEARNING TO COOK	Joanne Woodward, as told to Jean Anderson	72
SALADS		74
THE WELL-FED BRIDEGROOM	Margaret Williams	105
LOW-COST WHITE HOUSE RECIPES	Alonzo Fields	132

ARCHITECTURE AND INTERIOR DECORATION

LOUISIANA PLANTATIONS	Richard Pratt	45
SHELF COLLECTIONS	Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland	52
SUMMER FLOWERS FROM A SMALL GARDEN	Janet Cottier	99
EXCITING AND PRACTICAL	John Brenneman	136

POEMS

OLD RECIPE BOOKS	Margaret Grahame Collins	16
THOUGHTS FOR A NAP	Kate Barnes	97
RITUAL	Elizabeth Graham	100
THE KING	Arnold Weinstein	108
A PROMISE FOR CYNTHIA, ON HER SEVENTH BIRTHDAY	Jean Todd Freeman	113
THE GOSSIPS	Mary Peters	116

COVER PHOTOGRAPH BY ROGER PRIGENT

NGE OF ADDRESS. At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. is is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, adelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent. • Ladies' Home Journal, © 1960 Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Thursday of month eding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Second-class postage paid at Philadelphia, Pa., and at additional mailing offices. ed as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada. The names of characters in all es are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence. Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice. Unconditional ronty. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed. Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Direc- of Research; Edward C. Van Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; E. Huber Ulrich, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Ford F. Robinson, Sr. Vice Pres. and oger, Business Department; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Maurice S. Gould, Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, Holiday and The American Home.

Your all day

veil of fragrance

scents, smooths, clings more lovingly, more lastingly than costly cologne

No cologne prolongs and protects your daintiness like Cashmere Bouquet Talc. Never evaporates. Never dries your skin. Leaves you silken-smooth, flower-fresh all over. Make Cashmere Bouquet ...pure, imported Italian Talc... your all day Veil of Fragrance.

Cashmere Bouquet Talc

the fragrance men love

Why settle for automatic defrosting?

FRIGIDAIRE GUARANTEES FOODKEEPING WITHOUT FROST

in the only Refrigerators proved FROST-PROOF in over 200,000 homes!

Not just automatic defrosting! No frost at all! None in the freezer section. None in the refrigerator. Frost is stopped before it starts.

No messy defrosting! No pans to empty! No freezer walls to scrape. No frozen-together packages. No prying-out of ice trays. No frosted-in ice cubes.

No danger of defrost thawing! Foods stay frozen hard always.

Roll-to-You Shelves! Whisper-quiet. All aluminum. Removable. They bring you all-usable storage space.

New "Flowing Cold" Meat Tender. Keeps most fresh meats up to 7 days.

New Magnetic Door Seal. Gives a better, tighter seal all around on both doors.

Choose from 4 beautiful new 1960 models. Most in 5 Colors or White.

BUY ON PROOF!

Proof from over 200,000 homes!

There is only one genuine FROST-PROOF Refrigerator-Freezer that has been proved in over 200,000 homes. It is made only by Frigidaire. Why risk a substitute, when you can buy proved Foodkeeping without Frost —guaranteed by Frigidaire!

*The exclusive FROST-PROOF system will prevent build-up of frost inside the Frigidaire FROST-PROOF Refrigerator-Freezer. Without any cost to owner or user, at any time within one year from date of delivery, Frigidaire will make all necessary adjustments to the FROST-PROOF Refrigerator-Freezer to prevent accumulation of frost.

Feel like a Queen with Foodkeeping without Frost... guaranteed.*

First and only from Frigidaire. Thrill to the new 1960 beauty of the Sculptured Sheer Look! It's for your kitchen! Model FPI-13T-60 shown above in Sunny Yellow.

FRIGIDAIRE

Product of General Motors

ADVANCED APPLIANCES DESIGNED WITH YOU IN MIND

You'll find Frigidaire factory-trained service men everywhere

LETTERS our readers write us

GAN

ON EVERYBODY ELSE

Editors: Life around here would ale of a lot more livable if Everylse and All the Other Kids, to- with their equally unattractive s, would go jump in the lake. I'd elp them on their way, but I don't here to find them. All I do is hear hem—loud and everlastingly.

he Other Kids' parents give them money they want and don't care ey fritter it away. They always let tay up to watch the late movie, on the nights when they are letem stay up to talk for hours on phone, or eat, or fight.

the Only Mother who doesn't thought to the happiness of her daughter. (I don't let her bleach r, go steady, leave her clothes on r or paint a new face over her old ly husband is no great prize civeryone Else's Father gives his n electric trains, charge accounts, cooters, car keys, the shirt off his d no trouble.

dy Else gets up early on Sunday g. (There is never anyone at the lock Mass but the nuns and my n. For years it has been like that.) Else has to stay home week cut the grass, buy lunches out of puny allowance, have table manear hand-me-downs, mind his own s or button his lip. My children Only Ones in our neighborhood n't have a new formal, space suit, f hamsters, any fun, or "a life of n."

ybody Else wears old overripe s everywhere, is going to have a minute he is sixteen, eats nothdesserts, may call his brother or slob" or "jerk" whenever he feels which is most of the time), enters se by the basement windows, and re clothes than the biggest dent store.

ally, I wouldn't be Everybody Mother for all the crown jewels. does all my children say, she goes eeling bubble gum off floors and re, prepares quantities of sticky tions (to be consumed in the liv- m), and watches her television ns on the old small-screen set n the basement. She also takes ildren's word for everything, her her hands, a back seat—and ilizers.

is an affable big jerk (slob) who n loud-play records, waiting an r the telephone, and walking to s so sonny may drive the car to school. One of these days, if he doesn't stop going headfirst down the basement stairway on abandoned roller skates, he'll break his neck.

All the Other Kids and Everybody Else are what our children believe in after they have outgrown Santa Claus. And some people keep right on believing in them, even after they're grown up. Then they're called "the Joneses."

Sincerely,

East Detroit — Jo Martin Wagner

NEW YORK

STORY ON PAGE 66

My dear Miss Einselen: In answer to your throat-grasping offer of $1,000 for my "The Wedding"—I accept, with humble thanks . . .

. . . for the wonderful people who people Independence Square; their advice, criticism, their million little kindnesses . . .

. . . for Lee Cullen of the Journal who kept me advised on the fate of "The Wedding" . . . and for that most wondrous of all telegrams telling me I had sold my first story . . .

. . . for Anne Einselen, and her gentle editor's pencil and warm welcome letter to the Promised Land of the Ladies' Home Journal . . .

. . . for my proud, proud husband and three young sons who understood my need . . .

. . . for all my dreams . . . alive and boldly winking . . .

THANK YOU ALL.

Lilly Gordon Einstein

Levittown, Long Island

CALIFORNIA

ARE WE WASTING TEACHERS?

Dear Editors: My wife was 38 when our family moved to Denver a few years ago. She had an M.A. from a respectable university and fifteen years of teaching experience.

Not until she started job hunting did she discover what we now call the Age Bar. Since 1922, the public schools of Denver have had a policy barring appointment of teachers older than 35. Despite her training and experience, Jane was ineligible for a teaching job.

Is the age bar in Denver unique? The answer I found: not at all. According to the most recent NEA survey, a great many school systems, especially in larger cities, set maximum hiring ages in the thirties and up to the late forties. (The average age limit is 45.)

Two main reasons are given for the policy. Many administrators like to "break

"The shine is the sign it's really clean!"

says PRUDENCE POTTS, the Pan Inspector

Only

Brillo Soap Pads

contain special soap with Jeweler's Polish to get pans shining clean!

Firmer, sturdier pads

A Brillo Soap Pad just has to clean lots more pots. It's the only pad that's tightly knit with firm "hemmed" edges to hold together longer.

Richer, livelier lather

Foams up faster—each pad is packed with soap clear through. Brillo with its exclusive polishing soap cleans faster, shines brighter.

Thriftier, more pads

5, 12, 20 pad boxes! Only Brillo gives you so many pads, such long-lasting pads, plus special soap with Jeweler's Polish.

Nothing shines aluminum like BRILLO

Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y.; Toronto, Canada

HIKER'S HERO: BETWEEN CRUSTY RDLLS, UNDERWDDD DEVILED HAM, MAYDNNAISE, DNIDN AND TDMATO. "TOTE" SANDWICH: FRANK ROLLS FILLED WITH UNDERWDDD DEVILED HAM, MAYDNNAISE, STRIPS OF PICKLE AND CHEESE. PARTY HAMBOATS: UNDERWDDD DEVILED HAM, MAYONNAISE, CHOPPED SWEET PICKLE IN SCOOPED DUT ROLL. CHEESE SLICE SAIL.

Variety adds new life to sandwiches. Underwood Deviled Ham blends so deviliciously in an endless variety of sandwich ideas. When you start getting ideas . . . be sure your pantry is well-stocked with Underwood Deviled Ham!

P.S. The handy ham made from fine whole hams.

FOR OTHER SNACK RECIPES WRITE. ANNE UNDERWDDD, DEPT. LSO, RED DEVIL LANE, WATERTDWN 72, MASS.

'em in young" before the teachers become set in their ways; and school boards think that hiring younger teachers keeps pension costs down. Actually, of course, most men and women who have reached the ripe old age of 45 (or 50, for that matter) are likely to be better teachers, less prone to absenteeism, more stable than youngsters fresh from college. In addition, when a state has a modernized pension program, a teacher who is older when she starts to work pays more.

"Professional nonsense," is what Sidney M. Bliss called the maximum-age policy in an educational-journal article. "We lay on the shelf a teacher who is 45 or older. . . . But we can't train young teachers fast enough to fill our needs."

I make no pleas here for hiring of teachers tottering on the brink of senility. Nobody would argue with the school's right to demand that its teachers meet requirements of mental and physical good health. But to cut teachers off from their profession because they have given up tenure in moving from one city to another (or have stopped teaching temporarily) is myopic and wasteful.

Sincerely,

El Sobrante — BURT PETERSON

PENNSYLVANIA

NO LONGER A MAN'S WORLD?

Dear Sirs or Shes: I am a rebellious male, who is disturbed about the present status of the male population throughout the world.

As tradition had it, the male was the accepted head of the household. In present times, if a man stated that he was "the brains" in his family, one would suspect him of having committed some sort of a treason. Even advertisements are directed toward the woman's "buying power"; and instead of being household heads, men have become pack animals who devote their entire lives to the comfort of their mates. Sincerely,

Lincoln University — STANLEY JONES

KANSAS

WHERE THE HEART IS

Dear Editors: A young mother shook her child, saying threateningly, "Do you want to go home?"

The way she said "home" sounded like prison. And of course he wanted to go home; the basketball game was not of interest to a two-year-old.

Let's watch our remarks and keep "home" a good word—a fine, warm, loving place to be. Upon its success depend the successes of community, state, nation, even the world! Sincerely,

Fairview — MRS. VICTOR B. CARTER

NEW YORK CITY

CHILD OF A MOVIE STAR

Dear Sirs: I've just read "Should Movie Stars Be Parents?" (June Journal) and feel a necessity to throw a loving bouquet to my own parents, Eddie and Ida Cantor.

It's indeed difficult to be the off-spring of a famous person, but the emotional stability of a child need not be impaired. While there is the discomfort of being scrutinized constantly by those who are curious about anyone in the public eye, a boundless security can be had at

No matter how often our parents be away, there was always an abun of letters and phone calls, and the hands," as Mr. Hyams put it, in a governess so dear to us that she one of my closest friends.

Although I'm sure we had our of emotional problems (I, too, left at eighteen, but for love of New Y not out of distaste for my parent believe we had the same struggles children reaching maturity. Two were divorced, but two are happily ried, and I'll be surprised if any end up in jail!

The family closeness we've had childhood hasn't changed in the

and I think it's because our parents cared. Sure, our father has a huge business ego; sure, he loved to talk by the hour. But he also talked po books, world events, philosophy

any father interested in developin children; and mother, gentle and nine, showed the contrast betwee sexes to such advantage that we k

was fun to be a girl!

Is it any wonder, then, that whe

dear sister Margie lost her battle cancer last summer, her only wis

that we keep letting our parents

how much she loved them? Sinc

JANET (CANTOR)

CONNECTICUT

O.K., O.K., ELEVEN
GLAMOROUS BACHELORS

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: Fie on July list of glamorous bachelors!

could you overlook handsome, h young King Simeon of Bulgaria?

Simeon

twenty-two, unmarried, wealthy (thr

his grandfather, the former King

aly), speaks six languages fluently attended school in Pennsylvania loves to dance and he likes Ame girls tremendously. He lives in Ma

He may never regain his throne, b certainly belongs on your list!

An Outraged Bulgarian Ro

New Haven

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

ULTERIOR DECORATING?

Dear Journal: I always go qu

through the pages of elaborate h planning ideas, as they just don't a to the realities of my present life.

sonally, I think a ladies' magazine sh stick to the feminine parts of the h and help us all plan sexy bedrooms

Candidly y

(though please withhold my na

Washington — MRS.

HONEST-TO-GOODNESS Mashed Potatoes!

It takes Pillsbury's f-l-a-k-e-s to do 'em like this!

Honest-to-goodness! All the fluff . and flavor of home mashed!

Yes, we took a while. We waited to bring you the f-l-a-k-e-s that we know will keep the honest-to-goodness fresh potato taste.

No "substitute", these! Just a grand new way to mash potatoes! Firm, fresh, perfect, they're delivered to you in the form of little flakes, that's all. Turn them like magic into fluffy mashed potatoes, your honest-to-goodness own!

Try these potatoes from Pillsbury, too!

Hash Browns. Steak house style. Ready to simmer, then fry.

Scalloped. No peeling, no slicing. Sauce mix, too!

HONEST-TO-GOODNESS potatoes from PILLSBURY

Try all 3!

FROM THE KRAFT KITCHENS COMES A TERRIFIC NEW IDEA!

"Philly"

Philadelphia Brand Cream Cheese gives them ice-creamy smoothness. And this cream cheese, guaranteed fresh by Kraft, also supplies the cooking "magic" that does away with whipping, fuss and bother

You've never in your life made frozen desserts that fix so easy . . . taste so good . . . and look so stunning.

Fresh, delicate Philadelphia Brand Cream Cheese is the surprise ingredient. It's what eliminates the old whip-and-stir work of frozen dessert recipes you've had before. And it's what puts the lovely fresh, ice-creamy goodness into "Philly" frozen desserts.

One easy "Philly" recipe is the basis for a whole array of dessert dazzlers. Get the 8-ounce package marked Philadelphia Brand Cream Cheese and start out today on a long line of hit desserts.

frozen desserts

Absolutely delicious and truly easy!

FAIR WARNING!

To make these frozen desserts you need the fresh, rich creaminess of Philadelphia Brand, America's top-quality cream cheese, guaranteed fresh by Kraft. Look for the name Philadelphia Brand on the package!

EASY BASIC RECIPE FOR "PHILLY" frozen desserts

In one bowl:

1. Mix an 8-ounce package of the one and only Philadelphia Brand Cream Cheese until it's light and fluffy.
2. Blend in 1 c. light corn syrup.
3. Stir in 1 c. milk.
4. Add 1 tsp. vanilla.
5. Freeze in ice tray until firm. Recipe makes full 1½ pints.

"Philly" Hawaiian Freeze

1. Substitute 1 jar Kraft Pineapple Topping for corn syrup in "Philly" Frozen Dessert recipe. Freeze. Serve with additional Kraft Pineapple Topping if desired. Garnish with mint.

"Philly" Strawberry Pie

2. Add 1 pint fresh or one 10-oz. pkg. frozen strawberries, sliced, to "Philly" Frozen Dessert and freeze. Spoon into a 9-inch meringue shell.

"Philly" Apricot Delight

3. Reserve 6 apricot halves from a No. 2½ can of peeled apricots. Drain and puree remaining apricots. Add puree to "Philly" Frozen Dessert. Pour into a 9-inch spring pan lined with split ladyfingers. Freeze. Garnish with Kraft Whipped Topping and 6 apricot halves.

"Philly" Choca-Banana Pie

4. Scoop "Philly" Frozen Dessert into a baked 9-inch pastry shell. Add banana slices and sprinkle with shaved milk chocolate.

"Philly" Raspberry Jewel Cake

5. Combine 1 cup fine graham cracker crumbs and 2 tablespoons melted Parkay Margarine. Press onto the bottom of a 9-inch spring pan. Prepare a double recipe of "Philly" Frozen Dessert. Pour over crust and freeze. Top with Kraft Pure Red Raspberry Preserves.

"Philly" Parfait

6. Spoon alternate layers of "Philly" Frozen Dessert and Kraft Chocolate Caramel Sauce into each parfait glass. Top with fluffy Kraft Whipped Topping and a maraschino cherry.

Quick Stunts with Hunt's TOMATO SAUCE

Minute-Steak Stew

Old-fashioned flavor in 15 minutes —a real recipe find!

Once in a blue moon you run across a recipe like this. Makes a simply delicious stew — quick and easy as snapping your fingers!

Wonderfully adaptable, too! Use canned or leftover vegetables. And make any amount you like. The only "musts" are the minute steaks and Hunt's Tomato Sauce. The meat to brown, and start a gravy. Hunt's to blend in so deliciously.

The kettle-simmered flavor of Hunt's Tomato Sauce is so handy for so many of your everyday dishes! Its deep, rich, true tomato flavor is seasoned and spiced just right. Try it for meatloaf, hamburgers, pot roast, casseroles and soup — wherever, whenever you want extra flavor. And do try this new stew!

4 cube or minute steaks, about ¾ lb. total
2 tablesp. flour ½ teasp. salt ⅛ teasp. pepper
⅛ teasp. paprika 2 tablesp. butter
1 tablesp. finely chopped onion
1 cup mixed peas and carrots (cooked or canned) ½ cup vegetable liquid
6-8 small potatoes, cooked or canned
1 8-oz. can Hunt's Tomato Sauce

Cut the steaks into 1-inch strips. Season flour with salt, pepper and paprika. Roll the steak strips in flour mixture. Heat butter in skillet until bubbling. Add meat. Brown well on both sides. Stir in remaining ingredients. Cover skillet; simmer 10 minutes. Makes 3 to 4 servings.

Hunt...for the best

HELPFUL RECIPES—on every can. Also, write for FREE Recipe Booklet, "Easy One-Dish Meals." Hunt Foods, Dept. K-8, P.O. Box 251, Fullerton, Calif. In Canada: Hunt Foods, Tilbury, Ont.

America's Favorite Tomato Sauce—by far!

DIES' HOME JOURNAL
JCE GOULD
ATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
TORS

The swift peril of "Equestrian Acrobats" is caught by Jon Corbino, contemporary painter and an academician of the National Academy of Design, New York.

WHERE IS MY PRESIDENT?

BY DOROTHY THOMPSON

We have but two choices for President and Vice President before us. Many, with unshakable party affiliations, will vote for whomever their party has nominated. Some, with the gambling instinct to pick the winner, will study the polls, the "inside" reports of expert journalists, whether of the press or of other means of communication, and be thereby influenced or swung over.

Others will vote as the organizations, economic, racial or religious, each devoted to the promotion of its real, imagined or calculated self-interest, advise. Some will vote according to superficial impressions of "personality" as the candidates make their appearances "live" and on television. Some will even vote on actuarial computations of a candidate's span of life.

Most of us will be seeking a "strong" President. People always do in a time of great crisis—and we are in such a time and will continue to be. The President of the United States is not, as is his counterpart in all European republics, a sort of surrogate constitutional monarch, who reigns but does not govern. His constitutional powers and obligations are greater than those of the president of any other republic—or, indeed, than those of the head of any state in the world—and only a great man can anywhere near adequately fulfill them.

As I watch the course of the campaign it will be with an eye looking for every symptom of greatness, underneath the hoopla that accompanies political campaigns.

The practical differences between the parties are marginal. The real differences are within the parties, not between them. I know that the leaders of no organization speak for their members. Every man and woman enters the voting booth alone—the very essence of political freedom and natural democracy.

What shall I be looking for?

I shall be looking for a man of intellect and heart.

By the former, I mean one who does not follow impulses but applies reason to every problem. Reason is detached from such emotions as fear, anger, vainglory, pride, prestige. Intelligence is the capacity for penetration, to get to the heart of matters, to distinguish between the trivial and ephemeral and the permanent and enduring, and to discern the relation between consequences and causes.

The intelligent mind is not that of the "expert," who, all too often, possesses knowledge without judgment and whose knowledge is concentrated in a very limited field. A great President must be able to use experts and also able to discard them. He should always be chary of statistics, recognizing that they are only a partial guide, and that in human matters, which are the very stuff of politics, people are not computable ciphers.

A great President must be a man with a deep sense of tradition. I am not greatly concerned that he should also be a man who accepts the reality of change. That we must all do anyhow. But I hope he will not be a man who accepts change as a good in itself or who holds, if even subconsciously, the fatalistic doctrine that the human will is helpless in the face of technological developments even to the point of

CONTINUED ON PAGE 16

Executive Editor: Mary Bass

Associate Editors: Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Glenn Matthew White, Donald Stuart, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland, Geraldine Rhoads, Nancy Crawford Wood, William McCleery, John H. Brenneman, Jean Todd Freeman, Nelle Keys Bell, Betty Coe Spicer, Neal Gilkyson Stuart, Stanley Freeman, Hal T. Williams

Contributing Editors: Richard Pratt, Laura Lou Brookman, Hugh MacNair Kahler, Bernardine Kielty, Margaret Hickey, Gladys Denny Shultz, Barbara Benson, Elizabeth McFarland

Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Eileen Sharpe, Virginia Price, Joyce Posson, Elizabeth Hart, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, Liane Waite, Abbot Mills, Conrad Brown, Anne Fuller

Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Dorothy Markinko, Jean Anderson, Grant Harris, Jean McClory, Ann Blackmar, Lee Stowell Cullen, Elaine Ward-Hanna, Mary Lee Jones, Carole O'Brien

Editorial Assistants: Hazel Owen, Helen Olchvary, Sally Platt, Mary Jane Engel, Janet M. Boe, Kathleen McDonald, Judith Harkison, Dorothy Shuler, Eileen Tolchin, Natalie Schram

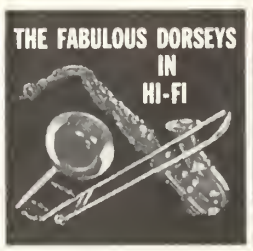
THE WORLD'S LARGEST RECORD CLUB CELEBRATES ITS 5th ANNIVERSARY

with the greatest offer in its history

33. "Superb . . . The Philadelphia Orchestra is the most sensuous of ensembles" — N. Y. Times

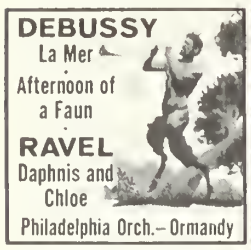
53. "Hamp" plays 12 solos—all pure gold. My Funny Valentine, Smoke Gets in Your Eyes, etc.

45. Ten lilting waltzes: Tales from the Vienna Woods, Blue Danube, Emperor Waltz, etc.



59. A brilliant musical picture as majestic and colorful as the natural wonder that inspired it!

8. Also: The Boy Next Door, Intermezzo, Love, Wait 'till You See Her, Autumn in New York, etc.

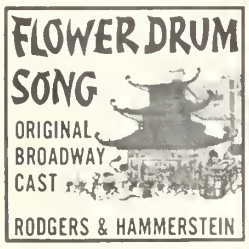


24. Walter displays a "depth of understanding, sure-handed musicianship"—N. Y. Herald-Trib.

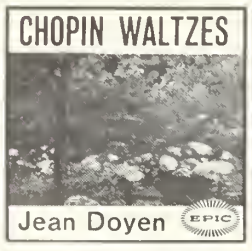
64. Wagon Wheels, Yesterdays, It Started All Over Again, Rain, Peace Pipe, plus 7 others

23. The complete score of the biggest musical of them all. "... practically flawless"—New Yorker

6. "Sheer magnificence of tone"—Hi-Fi Review. "Virtuoso brilliance" — Boston Sunday Globe



17. Begin the Beguine, In the Still of the Night, So in Love, Don't Fence Me In, True Love, 7 others



54. "Playing full of lovely and brilliant detail . . . like shimmering silk"—High Fidelity

16. A hi-fi fiesta! Mexican Hat Dance, Granada, La Cucaracha, La Paloma, El Rancho Grande, 9 more

43. The complete score of this Broadway musical. "A hit . . . another R&H winner!"—Newsweek

12. "Fine musical playing which stresses the poetic qualities"—American Record Guide

60. Freddie Freeloader, So What, Blue in Green, etc. "Extreme beauty and sensitivity"—Down Beat

47. "The most virtuosic performance and the best sound in the world" — Dallas Morning News

29. Authentic renditions of 12 familiar folk tunes. "Superb . . . sheer beauty"—High Fidelity

37. Also: That's All Over, One More Ride, I'd Rather Die Young, I Still Miss Someone, etc.

63. "Brilliant recording . . . Szell interprets the symphony wonderfully"—Rev. of Recorded Music

25. One of the great all-time collectors' items. Muskrat Ramble, Heebie Jeebies, plus 10 others

5. Also: Stairway to the Sea; Let It Rain; Flame of Love; You Are Beautiful; Teacher, Teacher; etc.

4. A superb new recording by Leonard Bernstein of these two ever-popular Gershwin scores

3. Also: Whatever Will Be Will Be, Everybody Loves a Lover, Love Me or Leave Me, etc.

20. Also: The Four Lads — Happy Anniversary; Johnny Mathis—The Best of Everything; etc.

2. The complete score. "Best musical I've seen in years!"—Walter Kerr, N. Y. Herald-Tribune

22. Also: 148th Psalm; Holy, Holy, Holy; etc. "An extraordinary chorus" — New York Times

Records for every musical taste!

CLASSICAL POPULAR DANCE MUSIC
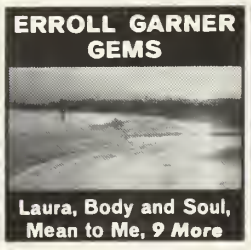
JAZZ
BROADWAY HITS

56. "Music of singular breadth, scored in a rich and rewarding manner"—Philadelphia Inquirer

35. The entire delightful score of "the finest musical comedy since My Fair Lady"—Variety

21. Also: Beyond the Blue Horizon, I Found a Million Dollar Baby, All the Things You Are, etc.

30. Solitude, Where or When, Tenderly, Dancing In the Dark, Autumn Leaves, plus 4 others



34. Also: You Belong to Me, Jambalaya, Keep It a Secret, Hawaiian War Chant, Stardust, etc.

9. Clair de Lune, The Fire Dance, Golliwog's Cake Walk, Maid with Flaxen Hair, 9 others

57. Complete score of Rodgers & Hammerstein's fabulous hit, featuring Nelson Eddy as Curly

14. Also: I Cover the Waterfront, The Way You Look Tonight, Penthouse Serenade, Indiana, etc.

19. "Persuasive, sensuous performance . . . immensely attractive orchestral color" — Listen

USE THIS HANDY POSTAGE-FREE CARD TO RECEIVE YOUR 5 RECORDS FOR $1.97

© Columbia Records Sales Corp., 1960 ® "Columbia." ℗, "Epic," ℗ Marcas Reg. 223

Special ANNIVERSARY offer

ANY 5

...e $3.98 and $4.98 records

...OR ...NLY $1.97

...NOW! This Extraordinary ... May Never Be Repeated!

...N, DETACH AND MAIL THIS ...AGE-FREE CARD TODAY

SEND NO MONEY — MAIL CARD TO RECEIVE 5 RECORDS

COLUMBIA RECORD CLUB, Dept. 223-6
Terre Haute, Indiana

I accept your special 5th Anniversary Offer and have circled below the numbers of the five records I wish to receive for $1.97, plus small mailing and handling charge. Enroll me in the following Division of the Club:

(check one box only)

☐ Classical ☐ Listening and Dancing ☐ Jazz
☐ Broadway, Movies, Television & Musical Comedies

I agree to purchase five selections from the more than 200 records to be offered during the coming 12 months, at regular list price plus small mailing and handling charge. Thereafter, if I decide to continue my membership, I am to receive a Columbia or Epic Bonus record of my choice FREE for every two additional selections I accept.

Name.....
(Please Print)

Address.....

City.....ZONE....

State.....

CIRCLE 5 NUMBERS BELOW:

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13
14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26
27	28	29	30	31	32	33	34	35	36	37	38	39
40	41	42	43	44	45	46	47	48	49	50	51	52
53	54	55	56	57	58	59	60	61	62	63	64

CANADA: Prices slightly higher 1111 Leslie St., Don Mills, Ont.
If you want this membership credited to an established Columbia or Epic record dealer, authorized to accept subscriptions, fill in below:

Dealer's Name.....

Dealer's Address..... 223
55-F

If you join the Club now and agree to purchase as few as 5 selections from the more than 200 to be offered in the coming 12 months

...a convenient method of acquiring, systematically and with expert guidance, ...record library of the music you enjoy most — at truly tremendous savings!

...CELEBRATE ITS 5th ANNIVERSARY the Columbia ...cord Club now makes the most extraordinary offer ...its history. As a new member of the Club, you ...y have ANY 5 of the high-fidelity 12" long-playing ...ords shown on these two pages — up to a $24.90 ...ail value — ALL 5 for only $1.97.

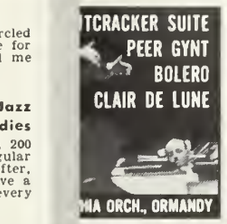
...And what a tremendous selection you have to ...ose from — 64 records in all, from every field ...music. Whether you prefer classical or popular ...sic, Broadway hit shows or jazz — you're sure to ...d five records to suit your musical taste.

...RECEIVE YOUR 5 RECORDS FOR ONLY $1.97 — ...ply fill in, detach and mail the handy postage-...e card provided. Be sure to indicate which one ...the Club's four musical Divisions you wish to join: ...ssical; Listening and Dancing; Broadway, Movies, ...evision and Musical Comedies; Jazz.

...W THE CLUB OPERATES: Each month the Club's ...ff of music experts selects outstanding record-...s for all four Divisions. These selections are fully ...cribed in the Club's entertaining and informative ...sic Magazine, which you receive free each month.

You may accept the monthly selection for your Division . . . take any of the wide variety of other records offered in all Divisions . . . or take NO record in any particular month.

Your only obligation as a member is to purchase five selections from the more than 200 Columbia and Epic records to be offered in the coming 12 months. Thereafter, you have no further obligation to buy any additional records . . . and you may discontinue your membership at any time.



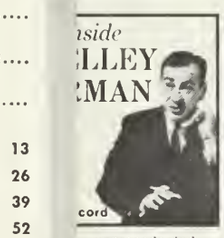
FREE BONUS RECORDS GIVEN REGULARLY. If you wish to continue as a member after purchasing five records, you will receive a Columbia or Epic Bonus record of your choice free for every two selections you buy — a 50% dividend.

The records you want are mailed and billed to you at the regular list price, generally $3.98 (Classical $4.98), plus a small mailing and handling charge.

THIS SPECIAL 5th ANNIVERSARY OFFER may never be repeated! So act now — fill in, detach and mail the handy postage-free card today!

More than 1,000,000 families now enjoy the music program of

COLUMBIA RECORD CLUB TERRE HAUTE, INDIANA



...beauty of tone ...not to be equaled ...other orchestra" ...Herald-Tribune

18. Also: Billy the Kid, Utah Carol, A Hundred and Sixty Acres, Running Gun, Strawberry Roan, etc.

7. Twelve of Gershwin's greatest hits: But Not for Me, Man I Love, Fascinatin' Rhythm, etc.

...unprecedented ...eller. "Hilarious ...y priceless com-... A. Examiner

27. Bess, You Is My Woman Now; It Ain't Necessarily So; 17 more. "Superb"—Life

28. "Istomin has what it takes for Tchaikovsky in flashing abundance" —Philadelphia Inquirer

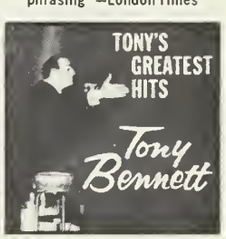
1. Fifteen familiar tunes: On Top of Old Smoky, Skip to My Lou, Blue Tail Fly, Red River Valley, etc.

36. "Sonic blockbuster" —Hi-Fi Review. "Led with fire and dash"—St. Louis Globe Democrat

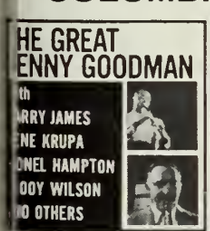
11. Also: Rica Pulpa, Donkey Serenade, Black Beauty, etc. "Unbelievably subtle"—Down Beat

41. Things Ain't What They Used to Be, Jump for Joy, C Jam Blues, Perdido, Flamingo, etc.

52. A lusty rendering of 13 Western favorites: Red River Valley, Home on the Range, Cool Water, etc.



42. "Sparkling fingerwork, wonderfully evocative tone coloring and phrasing"—London Times

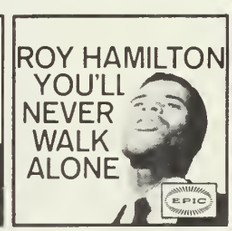


10. The complete score: The Rain in Spain, You Did It, I Could Have Danced All Night, etc.

15. Also includes: In the Steppes of Central Asia, Polovstian Dances, and A Night on Bald Mountain

49. Cold, Cold Heart; Because of You; Sing You Sinners; Stranger in Paradise; plus 8 more

48. 11 Goodman classics: One O'Clock Jump; King Porter's Stomp; Avalon; Sing, Sing, Sing; etc.



51. ". . . the sound and the playing of the complete score are brilliant" —Washington Post

40. Also: Thinking of You, Black Coffee, Just Friends, Street of Dreams, I Cried for You, etc.

61. "Beautifully played and recorded . . . ought to win a large audience"— High Fidelity

32. Ebb Tide, I Believe, Unchained Melody, If I Loved You, Beware, Forgive This Fool, 6 more

62. I'll Be Seeing You, No Greater Love, Sweet and Lovely, 9 more. "First rate"—Billboard

39. Also: Christmas Concerto by Corelli; Scherzo by Mendelssohn. "Luxurious playing"—Hi-Fi Rev.

50. Complete score of this delightful operetta: Drinking Song; Deep in My Heart, Dear; etc.

26. Also: Lucky Old Sun; Granada; Rose, Rose, I Love You; That's My Desire; I Believe; etc.

38. Just One of Those Things, Stardust, Man I Love, Brazil, April Showers, Blue Room, etc.

46. No, Not Much; Istanbul; Standing on the Corner; Moments to Remember; plus 8 others

31. "Intriguing repertoire . . . a fine display of virtuosity"—Christian Science Monitor

55. When the Saints Go Marching In, Didn't It Rain, Walk Over God's Heaven, Jesus, 8 others

58. Also: High School Cadets, Crusader March, Gladiator March, Hands Across the Sea, etc.

I ENJOY BEING A GIRL

I like scarves and flowers, perfume and jewelry, lipstick and rustly petticoats—I enjoy being a girl.

I like being neat and sweet—all white glove-y. In fact, there were only a few times when I didn't feel immaculate—and every girl knows when those times are.

Now that's all been cured—by Tampax.

It was such a relief to get rid of that cumbersome belt-pin-pad harness. Tiny Tampax® can't be felt or seen when it's in place. There's just not the slightest chance of embarrassment—not even from odor.

I'm just sure that the internal way, the Tampax way, is the nicer way. And most of my friends feel just as I do about it.

You'll enjoy being a girl every minute when you switch to Tampax.

* * *

Tampax is available wherever such products are sold in your choice of Regular, Super, Junior absorbencies. Save on the economy-size 40's. Look for Tampax Vendor throughout the United States. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

Invented by a doctor—
now used by millions of women

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

becoming itself an automaton. Tradition is pre-eminent. Without it a man and a people are without guideposts or foundations. The history of every great nation and civilization reveals inescapably that when a people has gradually or as a result of disasters and radical overturns abandoned its traditions, it is open to every wind that blows, given over to cultisms of all kinds, religious, political and social, and finds itself defenseless even against numerically and technically weaker enemies. Nothing is more essential to survival than a deep, inherent continuity.

Tradition is compounded of many elements: the memory of great past exploits and of dreams and adventures fulfilled; of a certain recurrent "archetype" of man, unique to itself. Every great people and culture have a creative and constantly re-creative myth. Tradition is also compounded of mores and patterns of life that have grown out of responses to various challenges, often peculiar to certain regions, and that cannot be eliminated by fiat (from however high a source), but that must be allowed a natural growth lest a whole Pandora's box of furies be released.

A man of strong intelligence possesses foresight—the indispensable quality of a great statesman. This is no clairvoyant or supersensory gift, but is the offspring of thinking and reason. If he considers initiating a policy or changing an existing one, he must carefully deliberate the alternative possible or likely consequences and prepare himself and his staff for the measures to take in case one or another consequence develops. This is especially essential in our relations with foreign nations, friendly and unfriendly.

As a very simple example, what immediately struck the eye when the unarmed intelligence plane, U-2, made a forced landing in Russia was that various "spokesmen" in various departments of Government immediately made statements that were obviously improvised, and that were contradictory. That is inexcusable. Every state engaged in espionage (and all are) seeks to plant its spies in the networks of its opponents, and time and again has succeeded. In this dirty business many things can happen, but for none of them need one be unprepared. Needed is foresight. If, as we were subsequently told, such flights have been "routine" and scores or hundreds of them have been made either without detection by or with the toleration of the Russians, there was always the possibility that such luck might not last.

For a great statesman nothing can be "routine." Every action must be taken in view of all the circumstances at the time. Assuming (however pessimistically) that the West wanted to bring some "relaxation of tensions" out of the Summit Conference, any actions that could be adjudged as provocative (if detected) should have been suspended considerably in advance of it. For every action, by whomever taken, is a political act. A President who is, among many other things, commander in chief of the armed forces cannot, if we are to be well and wisely governed, allow the Pentagon and the CIA to behave as though they were sovereign states.

Our President should be a man of character—of moral strength, backbone, deeply charitable but without sentimentality, which is not real but imagined feeling. He must have high ideals, but their exercise must be tempered by realism. He must never initiate policies that would require means for their execution that, if challenged, he is unwilling to use.

Eight years ago the Republicans attacked the Truman Administration for its policy of "containment," promising to "roll back" Soviet forces out of Eastern Europe. They promised, in short, to reverse a situation that was established, first by the way the military campaign was conducted in Europe and second by the "summits" at Tehran, Yalta and Potsdam, none of which could be undone except by almost certain war between the great powers. To promise to do this peaceably—by no other means than propaganda—was frivolous and untruthful.

A man of high intelligence and character reaches decisions deliberately, but when he makes a decision he sticks to it. A yes is a yes and a no is a no. The backing and filling over the President's projected visit to Tokyo last June was lamentable. Indecision and weakness in a President reflect indecision and weakness in a nation, and a nation that can have its policies made by howling mobs, domestic or foreign, will have them so made.

A great President is a great administrator, not only of people but of things, including the people's money. Public spending will go on, undiminished. The days of "sound" money passed when this country, during the first term of F.D.R., went off gold, and subsequent full or high production and employment were maintained by continual infusions from the Federal treasury and those of the states and municipalities. But it is the people's money just the same, and they must have a confidence that it is expended economically—that they get the most possible for it.

In observing, over a long period, the spending of other people's money, I have been convinced that extravagance is the rule rather than the exception, and the tendency of all bureaucracies is to expand ad infinitum.

The tendency now is to believe that all that is needed to remedy the nation's shortcomings in any field of public activity is to appropriate more money. This is an obvious error. One does not advance education by spending more money on superduper installations, huge gymnasiums, high-school smoking rooms, and handsome libraries—with almost no books. And no matter how much one spends for defense, it will be adequate only if its services are integrated and the morale of officers and men superior to that of any possible enemy.

A great President will be a man of deep inner spiritual resources. He will know that no man, however brilliant, intellectual and endowed with reason, can lead a people through a great time of troubles unless he is sustained by a higher power than himself. He must be religious in the profound meaning of recogn the sacramental nature of all life. This is matter of churchgoing, especially in days, when "popular" preachers give their pulpits to secular lectures on c events gilded with a few pious platitude do nothing whatever to awaken in the so their flock the Pentecostal experience saves, renews and changes human lives.

All the Presidents of my lifetime ha tended church (when they were in Was ton), including several who never, or sel before they assumed the office, did so. At ing "worship" has become a formal "m

Lincoln, I have read, did not do so never has a President had a deeper s mental sense of life and realization of an living God. Perhaps he could not bear he ministers pray for a Northern victory—h felt to the fullest the appalling tragedy Civil War, who recognized that neithe had a monopoly of righteousness, who k in his very soul, the triviality of victo such; who foresaw with terrible agon horrors of the reconstruction era that and evil minds were already plotting. He much time in spiritual meditation and prayer. He said, "I have often gone t knees in the certain conviction that I ha where else to go." The certain convictio

A great President must be a man of mous industry. But if he has the qualit mind and soul which I have described, h have this quality too. God gives to thos are seeking His guidance and performin will the strength of ten, and great men s die before the "mission" is accompl Lincoln died an "untimely" death by a nation, but if he had had to fight th righteous bigots and self-seeking jacka the Reconstruction, whose power ther overwhelming, he might never, as h on his very bier, have somewhat regene the spirit of "malice toward none and c for all."

Today as one reads the somber words Gettysburg address and the Second Inau carved in stone on the walls of the Li Memorial in Washington, the stones selves seem to speak, and one knows words will outlive the stones, that they a mortal, as the Book that most influ Lincoln's whole life is immortal.

A great President, like a great pain great poet, speaks to the mind, but ascendently above this he speaks to the s of men and of nations—speaking and for all time. In the leaders of great state only their words but every action speaks the soul is not to be gainsaid by argu arising from the strifes and clashes of int and opinions, or by appeals to transient larity and the transient will of the mas expressed by those who are adept in cr and manipulating them. These are the e enemies of man as man, of any demo worthy of the name, and of all freedom masses are depersonalized, desouled, therefore dehumanized.

There is a soul in every people, and in more than in this one. But in the last g tion it has been stifled by the method jargons of the sociologists, by the "eco determinists," who are by no means co to Marxists; by those psychiatrists wh know everything about the illnesses of th (the psyche) except how to cure them; b hired sellers of ideas and expert manipu of public opinion, and so on ad infinitu the longing for regeneration, the recog of deeper insights, the search after faith firmed by reason and experience is discer in every group of our society.

Where is this "great President"?

No man is born great. No man is b man. Those who become great, ho mentally and spiritually superior they m do so by the continual exercise of their m and spiritual powers with the aid of p greater than they. But if waves of the w regeneration come from the silent prayer wills of even a relatively small minority people, the waves will reach him, sustain and help him to be more than he dream could be. This is something this write never argue. Beyond argument is the testi of experience.

OLD RECIPE BOOKS

By MARGARET GRAHAME COLLINS

Old recipe books with copperplate writing Bring back pictures of times gone by:
Log-cabin kitchens, oak fires glowing,
And Strawberry Dumpling, Green-Tomato Pie.

Evolved by women far from their homelands,
Newly settled by a wilderness lake,
The recipes tell of imaginative cooking—
Rose-Hip Jelly and Johnny Cake.

Nostalgic, and trying to duplicate,
Using ingredients that happened to be handy,
The cook gave her children the tastes of her childhood
With Mock-Cherry Tart and Vinegar Candy.

"Add marigold petals for special flavor
To steamed suet pudding," says a faded line.
Inspiring contentment and necessary courage
Were Succotash Chowder and Dandelion Wine.

Scaasi's dreams begin with a maidenform girdle

the dream of a dress:

a far and fabulous cry from the "lavender-and-old" look in lace. (Ladylike-but-not-too is Scaasi's partyline for after five.) Here-and-now news: the bodice-beautiful, broadening into funnel-shape sleeves; the narrowed skirt, all curves and contour and fastidious fit. (The fit? A simple matter of Scaasi skill plus the shape-making girdle beneath.)

the dream of a girdle:

the lightweight wonder that launches a thousand fashion looks this year: new Maidenform Fris-Kee,* a canny contrivance of curve-hugging elastic with up-and-down stretch. Up front, a tummy-taming panel to flatten and flatter — firmly but gently. Girdle or pantie. Regular, long and extra-long. White, black and four heavenly colors. From 5.95.

Here's new relief from miseries of HAY FEVER

AND OTHER POLLEN ALLERGIES

Revolutionary 3-layer tablet acts directly on CRITICAL AREAS of POLLEN IRRITATION

Working through the bloodstream, DRISTAN: 1. DECONGESTS swollen nasal passages. Unblocks congestion deep in the nose-sinus area where sprays and mists may not reach. 2. RELIEVES watery, itchy eyes...cheeks sniffles, sneezing...restores free breathing. 3. PROTECTS against further pollen irritation. This season, you don't have to suffer the maddening miseries of hay fever and other pollen allergies. DRISTAN Decongestant Tablets ... remarkable medical achievement ... bring quick, long-lasting relief. Working through the bloodstream, DRISTAN's decongestant and anti-allergic actions reach all delicate pollen-irritated membranes. Shrink swollen tissues ... drain clogged passages. Breathing becomes free, deep and natural. Moreover, DRISTAN sets up a special protective barrier to curb further pollen irritation. This is DRISTAN's kind of relief ... swift, prolonged, effective. Millions already depend on DRISTAN for relief of hay fever miseries. Why don't you? This season, be ready for the pollen invasion. Get DRISTAN Decongestant Tablets. And ... important ... accept no substitutes!

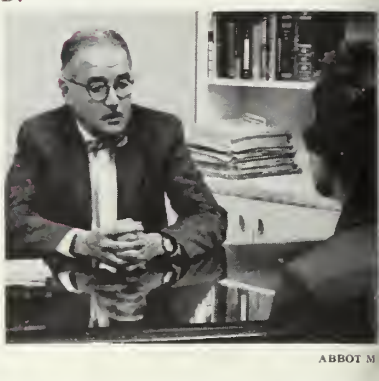
THIS EXCLUSIVE DRISTAN TABLET FORMULA CANNOT BE DUPLICATED!

DRISTAN is the exclusive 3-layer tablet discovery which for the first time makes it possible to unite certain medically-proven ingredients into one fast-acting uncoated tablet. Accept no substitute.

BEFORE: With hay fever and other pollen irritations, sensitive nose and head membranes become irritated. Tissues swell, passages clog, breathing becomes difficult.

AFTER: Swollen membranes decongested, drained by DRISTAN. Swelling is reduced, free breathing restored. And a protective barrier guards against further pollen irritation.

There's Nothing Like



DRISTAN® Decongestant Tablets

There are many questions which wom would like to ask a trusted physician, b there is not always the opportunity. this series, Tell Me, Doctor, Doc Schauffler discusses some of the proble which have been sent to him by reade The situations are all real, but all names which are used are fictitio

TELL ME DOCTOR

By GOODRICH C. SCHAUFFLER, M.D.

"I knew before I married him that my husband had had a sterilizing operation. But now we both want babies. Can anything be done?"

ABBOT M

"Mrs. Frost, I can't find a single reason why you should become pregnant," the doctor said. His examination completed, he and h patient were back in the consulting room. "There are some subtle a rather complicated tests we might do if your husband proves to be fu fertile. You appear so normal in every way, however, that he should examined before we go further with you. He would have to go to his ow physician, of course. I presume he would be willing?"

Mrs. Frost's eyes were downcast. "You have already told me wha needed to know, Doctor," she said a little wearily. "I thought there mig be something wrong with me that could be corrected. Since you say the isn't, that settles it." She gathered up her gloves and pocketbook.

"But it's very possible that your husband ——" The doctor's prote died away at the expression on Mrs. Frost's face.

"I couldn't even mention the matter to him! Oh, it isn't what you thinking," she added quickly. "It isn't that he doesn't want children, that he isn't the tenderest, most considerate husband imaginable." S hesitated, then went on: "You see, Mark had a sterilizing operation so years ago. There was a reason to think it might not have been effecti But if I'm all right, the fact that I haven't become pregnant after thi years of marriage would be pretty conclusive, wouldn't it?"

The doctor looked at this young, attractive woman with concern. "M Frost, I'm afraid I haven't helped you any, and I'd like to. Your failu to become pregnant may be conclusive, or it may not be. What you ha said has aroused my curiosity. Why did your husband submit to sterili tion in the first place? When did you learn that he had had this operation

"Oh, he told me all about it before we were married. But the rest is rather long story. There is no reason why I should burden you with since it is strictly my husband—or my husband's condition, rather—th is the trouble."

"You might be surprised, Mrs. Frost, at the number of times I a consulted 'strictly about husbands'! Husbands play quite a part, y know, in both obstetrics and gynecology."

Mrs. Frost hesitated again, then said impulsively, "It all seems such tragic waste!" She laid down her gloves and settled back in her chair.

"I am Mark's second wife, Doctor, but he has been my ideal for ju about as long as I can remember. He married my cousin, you see. He ten years older than I am, and was a kind of big brother to me all throu my teens—I hadn't any of my own.

"Marianne, my cousin, was distractingly beautiful, and one of the charming, erratic people who never do anything according to the rules. the beginning, she wanted lots and lots of children. They had a gorgeo little boy, but something seemed to be wrong. Marianne's labor was lo and hard. Then she had several

CONTINUED ON PAGE

Look! Real cream deodorant your fingers need never touch!

New glide-on applicator! Just twist the bottom ... cream comes out the top!

Now you can have the all-day protection only a real cream deodorant can give plus glide-on convenience—both in new Desert Dri. It glides on and rubs in right from its own exclusive applicator. Not just a rolled-on surface coating, it penetrates for positive all-day protection. Checks perspiration, stops odor, won't damage clothes. 3 months' supply—1.00 plus tax.

New Desert Dri®—real cream deodorant—anti-perspirant by Shulton

Shulton, Inc., 1960

Spanish Orchid – newest color excitement in sheets and blankets styled to go-together! Specially priced, you can afford them in stripes, pastels, and this gay floral – Bridal Rose.

New Egyptian Yellow – why not brighten your guest room with its cheer? Matching L. Pepperell Peeress blanket is of Acrilan with rich-looking binding of lush, nylon velv Exciting color combinations go to your head in Lady Pepperell's new "Go-together" sheets and blankets!

Japanese Pink – see how feminine these co-ordinates look in this delicious shade! And for a change of pace, what fun to mix them with other pretty Pepperell pastels.

Empire Blue – so very French, adds a touch of elegance to your decor. Rememb too, Pepperell's heavenly soft white percales and fine muslins are now sales-priced, t

Now on sale at BIG, BIG AUGUST SAVINGS

Lady Pepperell Go together Sheets and Blankets

ine stores like these sell all r most of the Lady Pepperell Fashions illustrated.

ALASKA
nchorage ..... Northern Commercial Co.
airbanks ..... Northern Commercial Co.

ALABAMA
lexander City ..... D. Cohen & Sons thens ..... Sharp & Killen Dept. Store uburn ..... Parkers
pelika ..... Hagedorn's

ARIZONA
logales ..... Bracker's Dept. Store
ucson ..... Levy's

ARKANSAS
atesville ..... Barnett Brothers Merc. Co. l Dorado ..... Sterling Dept. Store
arrison ..... Walters Dry Goods Co.
ittle Rock ..... Sterling Dept. Store
exarkana ..... Dillard's Dept. Store

CALIFORNIA
ell ..... People's Dept. Store
resno ..... Gottschalk's ardena ..... Gardena Department Store
ardena ..... Nahas Dept. Store
awthorne ..... Thrifty Dept. Store os Angeles ..... A. B. Payne Co.
akland ..... Breuner's ichmond ..... Breuner's iverside ..... Rouse's acramento ..... Breuner's an Diego ..... Muehling's Dept. Store an Francisco ..... City of Paris tockton ..... Breuner's allejo ..... Breuner's ucaipa ..... Country Dept. Store

COLORADO
olorado Springs ..... Hibbard & Co.
enver ..... *Howell's Dept. Stores
ulesburg ..... Sullivan Dept. Store

FLORIDA
rcadia ..... Schlossbergs radenton ..... Beall's, Inc.
ocoa ..... Kae's of Cocoa elray Beach ..... Minor's Dept. Store ort Lauderdale ..... Sultan & Sons ort Pierce ..... Rubin Bros. Inc.
ollywood ..... Sultan & Sons
eesburg ..... Ezells Department Store
ive Oak ..... Seward Fleet Dept. Store
iami ..... Jackson's/Byrons
cala ..... Frank Bennett's House Beautiful ensacola ..... Pensacola Rug & Shade Co.
lant City ..... Black's Department Store, Inc.
t. Petersburg ..... Sierkese Department Store
est Palm Beach ..... The Pioneer Company

GEORGIA
lma ..... Elkins Dept. Store
thens ..... Davison-Paxon Co.
tlanta ..... *Davison-Paxon Co.
ugusta ..... Davison-Paxon Co.
olumbus ..... Davison-Paxon Co.
ordele ..... Roobin's itzgerald ..... Halperin's a Grange ..... Mansour's indale ..... Knight's, Inc.
acon ..... Davison-Paxon Co.
arietta ..... Saul's Dept. Store
onroe ..... Aycock's Department Store
ome ..... The Fahy Store
ome ..... Miller's aldosta ..... The Famous Store

IDAHO
oise ..... Falk's Idaho Dept. Store and in 15 Idaho Dept. Stores throughout the state.

KENTUCKY
owling Green ... Pushkin's Department Store
ouisville ..... Berlin's Dept. Store
ouisville ..... *Kaufmans

LOUISIANA
aton Rouge ..... D. H. Holmes ew Orleans ..... D. H. Holmes

MISSISSIPPI
leveland ..... Sterling Dept. Store
cComb ..... Denman-Alford

NEW MEXICO
arlsbad ..... Carlsbad Hardware Co.

NORTH CAROLINA
hiteville ..... Leder Bros. Inc.

OKLAHOMA
klahoma City ..... Harbour-Longmire, Inc.

OREGON
he Dalles ..... Williams I. D.
ugene ..... The I. D. of Eugene, Inc.
lamath Falls ..... Your Store
a Grande ..... Falk's Idaho Dept. Store

TENNESSEE
aryville ..... Proffitt's, Inc.
emphis ..... The John Gerber Co.
ak Ridge ..... Loveman's

TEXAS
rownsville ..... Aziz Bros.
larksville ..... The Hub
allas ..... Titche-Goettinger agle Lake ..... J. B. Smith
l Paso ..... American Furniture
alena Park ..... J. B. Smith
eorgetown ..... Gold's Dept. Store acksonville ..... *3 Beall Brothers 3 ew Braunfels ..... Jacob Schmidt & Sons an Antonio ..... Pullen's Department Store
renton ..... T. W. Ayers & Son

UTAH
alt Lake City ..... Auerbach's

VIRGINIA
harlottesville ..... C. H. Williams, Inc.

WEST VIRGINIA
larksburg ..... O. J. Morrison's Store Co.
ullens ..... Mullens Dollar Store rinceton ..... Santon's illiamson ..... Cantees Dept. Store

WYOMING
asper ..... Kassis Dept. Store
heridan ..... Stevens Fryberger & Co.

*Available at Branch Stores.

PEPPERELL FABRICS ®

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 18

miscarriages. Mark got very worried—I was around a good deal, although I didn't understand everything that was going on—and I know her doctor urged her to give up trying to have children, at least until her health had improved. But Marianne insisted. One more child was born. Marianne had a ghastly time, and the baby died

"Then Marianne switched around entirely. She was so afraid of pregnancy that she kept begging Mark to submit to the operation, until he did. It was just a few months afterward that his whole world was blown to bits. Marianne had their boy out in the car. What happened no one knows, but the car was found wrapped around a tree. Both Marianne and Mark Junior had been killed instantly." Mrs. Frost's eyes filled with tears.

"And Mark had deprived himself of the power to have any more children!" the doctor exclaimed sympathetically.

"I don't believe he thought about that, at the time. He had no idea then of ever marrying again. After the accident, when Mark was going around looking as if an atom bomb had hit him, I felt he needed me, and I did everything I could to help him. After a while we found we were in love, and that's when he told me about the operation. He thought it wasn't right to deprive a woman as young as I was of the possibility of motherhood. I had to convince him that if I didn't marry him I would never marry anyone, that children weren't that important to me."

"Yet you came to me to find out whether there was something wrong with you that prevented your becoming pregnant," the doctor pointed out gently. "You found out that babies were more important than you had realized?"

"There was that. But it's more that I would like to give Mark babies if I can. If you could only see him with other people's children! I guess I never really believed that Mark's operation had been successful."

"You mentioned there was some reason to think that. What was the reason?"

Mrs. Frost answered, in a very low voice, "After Marianne's death, it was discovered that she was two months pregnant."

"Had conception taken place before or after Mark's operation?"

"After, Doctor. That was the whole point. A month or six weeks after Mark had had his operation."

"Did Mark talk about this to the doctor who had operated on him?"

"No. Mark's own doctor had refused to perform the operation. Mark had had to go to a surgeon in another city. The whole thing was so distressing to him that he never went back. Besides, Mark couldn't have placed any shadow on Marianne's good name. He wouldn't have told me, except that I'm in the family, and knew besides that Marianne couldn't have been unfaithful."

"Do you happen to know what kind of operation Mark had?"

"I believe it was called vas ligation; does that sound right?"

"Yes, that is the sterilizing operation performed most commonly on the male. It consists of cutting the vas deferens. There are two of them, you know—little tubes from the testicles to the seminal vesicles. Usually about half an inch of the vas is cut out, then the ends are tied off and isolated from each other.

"I believe I can explain the mystery of Marianne's last pregnancy. It is only in rare cases that this operation is unsuccessful. But living, active sperm are often found in the seminal secretion up to a month or six weeks afterward, sometimes even after that. The surgeon should have told Mark about this, and should also have kept testing him at intervals following the operation."

Mrs. Frost leaned forward. "Doctor, I don't want to criticize Marianne—I loved her too. But oughtn't she to have had the operation herself? She was the one who shouldn't have had any more babies. There was nothing the matter with Mark! Would it have been dangerous or unethical for her to be sterilized? Her doctor advised it after her last baby was born, but she thought she had already been through enough After she had recovered, it appeared to be simpler for Mark to be sterilized than for her."

"So far as danger is concerned, there are conditions in which that might be true. But if Marianne's doctor counseled it, I would imagine there was no such condition in her case. As to the ethics: we have a situation here where the wife apparently was rather neurotic to begin with, and possibly not entirely herself following the last unfortunate childbirth incident. She had had several unfortunate pregnancy experiences before that. Sterilization might have appeared necessary to preserve Marianne's health, possibly her marriage as well. I can see how a conscientious doctor could have advised sterilization, though I might not have myself.

"But I agree with you fully that if sterilization was indicated, it should have been done to Marianne. It is frequently a temptation to sterilize the husband rather than the wife because it's true that under ordinary circumstances it is a simpler, less expensive operation in the male. It can be done in the outpatient surgery of a hospital or even in a well-equipped doctor's office. But for the female it is not a difficult operation if it is performed twenty-four to forty-eight hours after childbirth, as I judge Marianne's doctor suggested. The tubes are higher up then, more easily available. They can be cut and tied quickly with only a minor incision. The hospital stay is increased by only a day or so. A doctor usually knows when a childbirth should be the last one, from the standpoint of a woman's future safety and health. Since the woman herself is the one who needs the protection, she is the one who should be sterilized."

"I understand that sterilization is sometimes done now just to keep a couple from having more babies than they feel they can afford. Does that alter the situation?"

"In these cases, I must admit, the decision is less clear-cut. Hospital committees who review requests for sterilization on economic grounds are likely to require a careful history. They will want to know such things as the ages of husband and wife; whether or not they have tried contraception conscientiously and intelligently; and what their marital status is—whether there is a likelihood of separation or divorce. If sterilization seems justified, I would say that in these cases the husband has an equal responsibility with the wife.

"But I believe that even then it is important that the husband should offer himself willingly for sterilization. Few men actually want this operation, whatever the circumstances. When a husband has been pressured into it, against his own wishes, the results can be pretty serious. Virility is not lessened from a physical standpoint, but it may be affected by the husband's feeling that he isn't a male in the full sense of the word, and by his underlying resentments. It has been quite a common thing in my practice to hear this from the wife. Sometimes it breaks up the marriage.

"In that case, the children are nearly always awarded to the mother. Or a man may lose his whole family in a tragic accident, as happened to Mark. If he marries again, he is likely to want children by the second marriage, but has possibly been deprived for all time of his power to have them. You are by no means the only second wife who has come to me with this particular problem, Mrs. Frost."

Mrs. Frost sighed. "Well, I suppose there's no use thinking any more about it, since nothing can be done."

"That's where you may be mistaken, Mrs. Frost. I said 'possibly has been deprived.' There is chance of repair of a vas ligation."

"I'm sure Mark didn't know that!" Mrs. Frost exclaimed. "Neither did I!"

"Yes indeed. About the same chance of repair as when a woman has been sterilized by having her Fallopian tubes cut and tied off. And it's much easier and less expensive than repairing female tubes. In the case of a male, the surgeon merely makes a shallow incision through the scrotal skin, just enough to expose and cut off a bit of the tied ends of the tube. Then he threads the freshened ends on a small wire, brings them together and sews them together around the wire. An end of the wire is fixed externally so it is easily available later. The wire is left in for several days to keep the tube open, then removed. The man is disabled for only a day or so. About fifty per cent of these operations are successful in skilled hands. Mark would not have to go out of town to get this operation performed. Any reputable genitourinary surgeon would be happy to try to undo the damage that has been done to him."

"Oh, Doctor, that sounds wonderful!" Then the radiance faded from Mrs. Frost's face. "But how can I tell Mark? If he knows I came to see you, he will think I am getting all frustrated at not having babies. Then if the operation failed, he would feel guilty for having deprived me of them."

"Why don't you ask him to come in to see me, let me go over the matter with him? I think I can do it in such a way that he will be fortified against failure if that should occur."

Mark came in for his talk with the doctor, then went to the surgeon the doctor recommended. The Frosts were lucky. Eighteen months later young Mrs. Frost was delivered of a fine baby—her first, but not her last.

Next month Dr. Schauffler discusses a way to end spontaneous abortion.

Have you Ever...

Found a gaping hole in your child's sock
after he had been visiting overnight with one of his little friends?

Stemmed grapes, stirred for hours, and sweat blood over jelly that would put a rubber ball to shame?

Been hiding from a door-to-door salesman and had your youngest drop a pie tin on the floor
just as he was ready to depart?

Helped your first-grader with his reading?

Tried to explain to your husband why you were crying
when you didn't know yourself?

By MARTHA CROSS and MILDRED TROTTER

COMPLEXION: BRONZE

COTY BRIGHT—Illuminates bronze complexions in flame red costumes. A gay light with grey, taupe, and white fabrics.

BRONZE

COTY MEDIUM—Subtle sorcery for bronze beauties in oatmeal fashions. Frankly clairvoyant worn with flame red, golden brown, and smoke blue fabrics.

BRONZE

COTY PRECIOUS PINK Très chic for bronze complexions in smoke blue costumes. Beautiful echo with pink, mauve, amethyst.

BRON

COTY TANGERINE—Shade délicieux for bronze complexions in sage green creations. Surprise dessert with orange, green gold, and earth red fashions.

COMPLEXION: ALABASTER

COTY FRENCH FLING The one shade for alabaster types wearing ice blue—the fun shade with amethyst, sage green, white.

ALABASTER

New! COTY HONEYSUCKLE PINK Lovely discovery for alabaster beauties in moss green. Positively luscious with banana, navy, and earth red ensembles.

ALABASTER

COTY DAHLIA—Prize bloom for alabaster complexions in claret costumes. Perennial favorite with grey, mauve, and smoke blue fabrics.

ALABAST

COTY FLAME RED—Lights up alabaster complexions in taupe attire. Blazing beauty with the subdued smoke blues, oatmeals, greys.

New easy way to key your lipstick and nail polish shade

Keyed

Now it's easy to harmonize your complexion and lipstick shades to costume colors with Coty' new KEYED-TO-YOU COLORS! Here's all you do: (1) Find your complexion above. (2) Select you lipstick shade. Now you can choose the fashion-right costume colors to harmonize with both your com plexion and lipstick shades (matching nail polish, too). So simple. So fashion-right. For leading fashio experts have selected these harmonizing colors. Get Coty '24'—the lipstick that caresses your lips wit vibrant color that lasts and lasts and doesn't fade fast. You'll love KEYED-TO-YOU COLORS by COTY

No printed page can reproduce exactly the truly beautiful colors of Coty lipstick and nail polish. The colors shown here are even more beautiful on your lips. © COTY INC., 1960—ALSO AVAILABLE IN CANAD

COMPLEXION: PINK

PINK

PINK

PINK

PASTEL PINK ful impression for mplexions in ensembles. Work of art hite, banana, sage green.

COTY RUE DE LA PINK
Traffic stopper for pink-hued beauties in bottle green. New direction with amethyst, claret, and beige fashions.

New! COTY CARDINAL RED
Heartbeat hue for pink complexions in lapis blue. Brilliant choice with taupe, oatmeal, and black-and-white costumes.

New! COTY FLAMINGO PINK
Scheme supreme for pink-complexioned girls wearing golden brown. A lucky streak with earth red, banana, sage green.

COMPLEXION: FAIR

FAIR

FAIR

HATS BY LILLY DACHÉ

FAIR

' SUNSET ORANGE
nd rich on fair faces
en gold costumes.
lating with earth red,
green, and grey fabrics.

COTY CORAL PINK—Perfect find for fair-faced beauties in earth red costumes. A treasure with green gold, taupe, and smoke blue fashions.

New! COTY PICARDY PEACH
Shimmering sheen for fair ladies wearing the new banana hue. Colorful accent with ice blue, oatmeal, white.

COTY MAGNET RED
Captivating on the fair-complexioned in amethyst. And just as attractive with claret, bottle green, and black costumes.

your complexion and your costume!

o-you Colors

IN COTY '24' LIPSTICK AND NAIL POLISH

EXCITING NEW COLORS . . . COLORS KEYED TO YOUR COMPLEXION . . . TO FASHION'S NEW HUES . . . TO YOUR WARDROBE! COLORS THAT LAST AND LAST AND DON'T FADE FAST!

PLUS . . . four stunning iridescent icks with matching nail polish—to flatter ery complexion, every summer fashion—CHERRY DIAMOND • ROSY OPAL • FROZEN TOPAZ • LILAC PEARL

Look for the Special Keyed-to-You Color Combination Offer!

COTY '24' LIPSTICK AND MATCHING SUPER-SHEEN NAIL POLISH REGULAR $2.00 VALUE.
ONLY $1.50
REFILLS $1.00
ALL PRICES PLUS TAX.

Keyed-to-you Colors
BY COTY

PAT BOONE TALKS TO TEEN-AGERS

THE SOCIAL SWIM

Speaking of Public Relations . . . The other night my bride and I were having a malted in a diner after a movie—and if your ears were warm it wasn't sunburn and it wasn't because someone was talking about you. It was simply that ol' P. B. wished you were there, for we witnessed a supersquelch which could have been very educational. It might even have changed your life.

Some boisterous huskies were orbiting around the jukebox when an elderly woman came in and didn't quite manage to close the door. A piece of a thundershower blew in after her, and one of the boys yelled, "Hey you! Shut the door. Were you raised in a barn?" My Mrs. B. glared, but the woman, after closing the door, sat down on a stool at the counter, looking sad and maybe close to tears. It was between records and a kind of embarrassed silence set in that made the boy uneasy. He edged over to the woman and mumbled, "I didn't mean to hurt your feelings." Quick as a flash she retorted, using the punch line from an old story, "You didn't hurt my feelings. I just get homesick every time I hear a jackass bray."

Now, believe me, I didn't want you there just to see a little old lady draw teenage blood with a verbal harpoon. I guess the big fella got what was coming to him, but I couldn't help feeling sorry for him. He looked like a nice kid—his clothes were neat, his nails were clean, his hair was cut—and I don't think he wanted to hurt her feelings and I don't think he wanted to be a jackass. He looked to me like a simple bumbler who had never given any thought to his public relations and was well on his way to becoming a genuine social bust. Myself, I believe bad public relations, a lack of ability to communicate the person we really are to others, is at the grass roots of a lot of the Terrible Teenager myth. Do you know why I think it's so tough to get ourselves across when we're teeners? Because we're plunged into the social swim before we're sure what kind of character we really are, and before we're even half awake to the intricate stereo hookup by which we let the outer world know, accept or reject the inner us. A successful social life boils down to what a guy or gal is really like and how to get that over to the elderly lady at the counter, or the new girl in your crowd, or the boy you'd like to date next week.

Or Would You Rather Be a . . . . . ? Do you ever start out the day feeling like Sir Walter Raleigh and wind up acting like Alfred E. Newman? Or go to a party all dressed up like a crown princess and suddenly, halfway through the evening, wish you were a barefoot Polynesian beach girl? That's what's known as the social indecision of youth, and it takes some time to develop a consistent personality. But little by little, as you discover you, you'll begin to have a unique, positive personality to put across to others.

The trick here is to find the individual you and not imitate some general pattern like the "Harvard Man" or the "Sorority Girl" or the "Clubwoman" which would seem to cast human personalities from an exact mold. There is an old story, for instance, which supposedly illustrates some types molded by certain schools of learning. Three young men, from Yale, Princeton and Harvard, were in a room when a lady entered. The Yale boy asked casually if someone ought not to give a chair to the lady; the Princeton lad slowly brought one; and the Harvard boy deliberately sat down in it. Now Harvard men that I've known aren't a bit like the one above—and they aren't like one another. This is simply the public idea of the Harvard,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 26

ABBOT MILLS

Our little friend might envy the lady with the purse, but forcing herself into the "high-fashion" mold would be all wrong, in our opinion. Her beau would probably be the first to agree.

Snider Foods, Inc., Fullerton, Calif.

or a change, try the catsup with one extra spice ider's Catsup is different. One extra spice, chili pepper, makes the difference. adds a little nip to its good tomato taste. Snider's glows a little, t never bites. That's why meat loaf fairly zings with Snider's. Try it?

Snider's

the chili pepper catsup

SPAM® DANDY SANDWICHES

"HERO" SPAM WICH

The bigger you make it, the better they like it!

Start with a mighty chunk of crisp-crusted bread. Split lengthwise, butter. Then stack on all kinds of good things: robust cheese, crisp pickle slices, onion or green pepper rings . . . and above all, thin tender slices of rosy SPAM! (This is the easy-slicing, easy-eating sandwich meat that's so handily kept on your cupboard shelf). Drizzle over all a spicy Italian dressing . . . and eat, and eat!

SPAM PIZZA BUN

lightning-fast way to enjoy pizza goodness.

Top bun halves (or halves of English muffins) with SPAM slices, then slices of Mozarella cheese. Spread with tomato sauce, sprinkle with oregano, garlic salt or powder. Broil until cheese melts, SPAM sizzles.

Because it's made from sweet juicy pork and mild tender ham (choice meat . . . rich in protein) only SPAM tastes like SPAM.

NOW MARKETED IN CANADA HORMEL

SPAM is the registered trademark for a pure pork product packed only by Geo. A. Hormel & Co., General Offices, Austin, Minn., U.S.A.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 24

Yale and Princeton molds; and nobody who's decided he is an individual, with individual gifts and personality, will settle for any mold. A mold, good or bad, is a sort of defense mechanism behind which a body can hide until he's sure who he is. But that ol' college chestnut proves another point. Attitude and manner are a part of the stereo equipment with which we communicate to the outside world.

You take the newspaper-man or -woman; this individual develops certain attitudes and manners that are so effective you have to agree with Emerson: what they are speaks louder than what they say. For instance, I know a guy who had just quit a newspaper for a higher-paying position with an advertising company. The trouble was that he hadn't got reporting out of his blood. He still felt the urge to chase fire engines and ambulances. One day he passed an apartment house where some tragedy had obviously taken place. The street was filled with police cars, an ambulance, a fire truck. A uniformed officer guarded the front door. The old war horse couldn't help himself. He stopped and made a beeline for that door where the officer was passing through only members of the working press. Now this ex-news hound had turned in all his credentials. He didn't have a police card, or a sheriff's badge, or a single physical passport—only that attitude and manner which his years on a paper had given him. The line filed on: "I'm from the Mirror" . . . "the Examiner" . . . "the Times"; "I'm from Missouri," said my friend, who couldn't tell a lie—and the policeman didn't hear what he said: the mental impression "I am a newspaperman" was so strong he could have said "I'm from Saturn" and got passed right through.

Besides that over-all impact of your attitude and manner, which is really just an unspoken statement of what you think you are—as "I am a lady" . . . "I am a minx" . . . "I am friendly" . . . "I am fierce and bite strangers"—there are other speakers hooked up to the inside of you that make music if they're all working and in sync, or static if they're functioning badly.

For instance, your letters tell me a lot about you. I know whether you're the thoughtful or the impulsive type, whether you're studious or social or a combination. I can tell sometimes whether your room at home looks like a page from the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL or a cyclone cellar—all this from what you write and how you write it. Have you ever noticed how much a thank-you note tells about people? It's easy to spot a bread-and-butter let's-get-this-chore-done frame of mind. Or the one mamma or a bad conscience made a compulsory formality. Then there's the willing type, done by a person who wants to do it but is hardly thinking of you at all. Occasionally you get one in which you detect a real note of gratitude and sincerity that makes you feel some hospitality or gift had been really appreciated.

Everyone who meets you should be able to tell a good deal about the real you by the way you look and dress—that is, if you follow your own taste rather than the fashion dictator's (that's another mold the "High Style" type). They can tell if your taste is sound, if you are neat or slovenly, a miss, a muss or a show-off. And here's a tip for gals from a guy who admires you that will help your public relations with the other sex: A male can tell too much about you if you perform your beauty operations (making up, manicuring fingernails and toenails, wearing hair curlers) in public. The girls who always struck me as the dolls, including the loveliest doll of all, my wife, always managed to look good without letting me see how they did it. I thought they always looked that way. If a fellow sees them powdering, filing or running around in curlers, he's in on the secret that good grooming and beauty don't just come naturally to them.

WHAT YOU SAY AND HOW YOU SAY IT

I want to say right here and right out that I'm a man of courage. I opened up by telling you that what a jukebox boy said conveyed the idea he was a braying jackass But I didn't think he was. I then cheerfully agreed with Mr. Ralph Waldo Emerson that you are speaks so loudly I can't hear what say, and took a nice fat chance you'd fully think I'm a pretty confused guy. tually what you are and what you say sh agree if you want to put yourself over t fullest extent. But if both speakers aren' the one that is and is tuned in on the p wave length is the one that will come ov

Your voice, and your tone of voice, i sponsible for a lot of the effect you pro There are voices, and voices—and they ca trained and changed. (I should know—ought to see some of my exercises!) But doesn't apply just to singers. I rememb devastating description I once heard of a y female's shrill speaking voice: "Her high r were like the shriek of a wild motorbus to its mate." Now with a voice like tha thing you say will be used against you. you've all heard or tried experimentally y self what different inflections or tone can a single sentence. Suppose you are truly happy over the sorrow of a friend and fe pretty dramatic. You want to say, "I wee you." But it comes out, "I weep for y Well, you've all had someone say, "I like your tone of voice"—even on variatio those ever-popular social phrases like "Pa me" and "Thank you!"

Now behind the instrument are the and heart that control the voice. You k the old one about what you catch with vi and honey—and about what a soft answe do. What of the little boy who came h

> Nobody ever listened himself out of a job. CALVIN COOLIDGE from a birthday party, and his mother, ch ing on his manners. asked, "Are you you didn't ask Mrs. Jones for another p of cake?"

"Oh no, mother, I only asked her fo recipe so you could make a cake like it, she gave me two more pieces!"

Telephone calls certainly come on the v public-relations wave band—and kno how and when to use the telephone is a some grown folk can't play. My first learned through experience, is "Get o ized!" If I'm going to call Shirley I will k I have, say, three things to tell her. If I review them in my mind first, we'll talk two and I'll forget the third—usually the important.

Myself, I've always disliked telephone cept for business necessities and quick venience. To me, contact by phone with ple I love is frustrating. It gives me the near-and-yet-so-far blues. But it can b asset to teenagers who find it hard to municate with each other. If it's hard t something face to face, it may be easier t it on the phone—easier to create a good pression and break the ice. I personally al felt a little more sure of myself (when aski girl for a first-time date) on the phone, w she couldn't see my knees knock or my twitch. But the telephone should be a brid not a crutch—to face-to-face communica

And now we come to the great telep problem—when and how to get off. It ca real embarrassing. You're through talki neither of you knows how to say good-b and maybe you drop a hint and it do work. If a girl's really gabby on the phone can dampen a guy's spirits. Take a tip one who knows and let him go. The telep technique is to say what you have to say then hang up. It is not an ideal instrumen gossip sessions or arguments (if anything

There's one more coil that fits in this paratus: vocal public relations. Do you s times feel that people don't understand y In a classroom or with a friend, do you yourself saying things that have to be phrased like a teacher saying, "Do you n so-and-so?" Or you have your say and wrong, and then someone else says the s thing in a different way and it's right—and say, "But that's what I said all along"?

CONTINUED ON PAG

Problems you can kiss goodbye forever ...thanks to KELVINATOR

Goodbye to washer gear breakdowns!

Heave out those faulty washer gears and costly gear repair bills once and for all. With a new Kelvinator washer there are no gears . . . no complicated drive mechanisms of any kind to break down. And Kelvinator gets the grimiest playclothes clean without one bit of hand-scrubbing. Yet it's so gentle it won't tear a paper napkin. Only Kelvinator gives you this wonderful Deep Turbulent washing . . . plus all the important automatic washer features you want.

Goodbye to defrosting!

Fling out those disagreeable defrosting gadgets. You'll never need them with Kelvinator "No-Frost"—the simplest, safest, most economical way to end messy defrosting in the freezer section as well as the refrigerator. Kelvinator "No-Frost" is available with freezer at the top, at the bottom, or on the side as in fabulous Foodarama—the upright freezer and big family refrigerator shown here. Foodarama is only 41 inches wide . . . costs much less than two separate units . . . and only your Kelvinator Dealer has it.

Goodbye to oven cleaning!

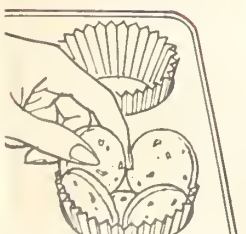
Toss out those torture tools you now use to rid the oven of caked-on grease. No more dirty oven cleaning for you ever again with Kelvinator's "Throw-Away" aluminum foil oven liners. Just whisk out food-stained liners . . . slip in shiny new ones in a jiffy . . . and the oven is as clean as new. What a wonderful work-saver! And so typical of the plus you'll find in every Kelvinator appliance. The Kelvinator plus doesn't cost you a penny extra. But it gives you many, many more useful features . . . saves you money . . . and assures greater service over the years.

There's a PLUS for you in every appliance made by

Kelvinator

Refrigerators, Freezers, Ranges, Washers, Dryers, Air Conditioners, Dishwashers, Water Heaters, Disposers, Dehumidifiers

America's new way to bake



(from Pillsbury)

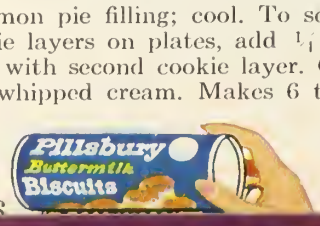
3 TO 4 DOZEN PERFECT COOKIES FROM EVERY PACKAGE!

1. COOKIE PETAL SUNDAE CUPS

NEW! 3 cool dessert ideas fro

1. COOKIE PETAL SUNDAE CUPS

Fun to eat . . . fun to make! Cut Pillsbury Slice'n Bake Cookies ⅛-inch thick. Line muffin pans with paper cupcake liners. Use 5 slices to line each cup—place 1 on bottom, stand 4 around sides (see sketch). Bake at 375° for 6 to 9 minutes until lightly browned. When completely cool, gently remove paper. Just before serving, fill the cookie cups with ice cream and add your favorite topping (such as Kraft's). Makes 10.



2. LEMON-FILLED COOKIE TORTES

Luscious! . . . "lemony"! Cut Pillsbury Slice'n Bake Cookies ⅛-inch thick. Arrange groups of 3 on ungreased cookie sheets, edges slightly overlapping to form "cloverleaves". Bake at 375° for 7 to 9 minutes. Cool 1 minute before removing. Prepare lemon pie filling; cool. To serve, place cookie layers on plates, add ¼ cup filling, top with second cookie layer. Garnish with whipped cream. Makes 6 to 8.

3. CHOCOLATE REFRIGERATOR DESSER

Elegant! Cut Pillsbury Slice 'n Bake C ¼-inch thick. Place 6 slices in a row overlapping, on ungreased cookie Make 6 rows. Bake at 375° for 9 minutes. Cool 1 minute. Remove Spread bottom of each strip with ch whipped cream. Stand on edge, side b in loaf pan. Chill overnight. Slice cro Chocolate Whipped Cream. Beat 1 C. whippin 2 tbsps. cocoa; fold in ⅓ C. sugar, ½ tsp.

Kissin' cousins of America's most popular biscuits . . . at your grocer's dairy case!

2. LEMON-FILLED COOKIE TORTES

3. CHOCOLATE REFRIGERATOR DESSERT

Pillsbury Slice'n Bake Cookies

AKE THEM ALL! Create these 3 exciting cool esserts with any of Pillsbury's Slice'n Bake Cookies:

- Butterscotch Nut
- Crunchy Peanut
- Toasted Coconut
- Sugar Cookies

resh cookie dough all mixed, shaped, refrigerated. ust slice and bake!

NEW! Pillsbury REFRIGERATED FOODS

Nothing says lovin' like something from your oven . . .

For Quality, Fit, PLUS Fashion Active Feet Deserve Edwards THE SHOE FOR CHILDREN

PHILADELPHIA 7, PA.

DISCOURAGE THUMB SUCKING
NAIL BITING

THUM
TRADE MARK

Just Paint on Fingertips
60c at your drug store

SPARE-TIME EARNINGS!
Write us for details and supplies
No obligation.
CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
405 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

GOTTSCHALK'S metal sponges

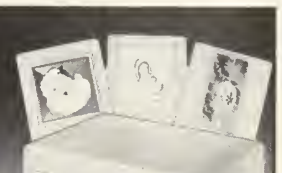
For 45 years, housewives' favorite for cleaning and scouring utensils, tiles, metal, porcelain and enamelware, floors, woodwork. Efficient, long lasting, harmless to hands and fine finishes. Sold everywhere—demand original Gottschalk's Metal Sponges. Gottschalk Metal Sponge Sales Corp., Phila. 40.

FREE NEW, MONEY SAVING
BROADLOOM
Color Catalog

Your OLD RUGS, Carpets, Clothing
SAVE UP TO 1/2
FACTORY-TO-YOU
Write for big New FREE Olson Rug, wall-to-wall Carpet Book!

in Colors

49 Model rooms. New Tweeds! Lovely solid colors, casual texture blends, leaf and floral patterns, Early American and Oriental patterns, Ovals! See how you can get deeper-textured Reversible Broadloom Rugs, any size, at big savings. Monthly payments. No risk trial Offer. Our 86th year...4 million customers!



Lovely Tweeds

Mail Coupon or Postcard to Nearest Address

OLSON RUG CO., Dept. F-70
CHICAGO 41, NEW YORK 1, SAN FRANCISCO 8
Mail Rug & Wall-to-wall Carpet Book, Gift Offer.

Your Name .....
Address .....
Town ..... State .....
© OLC

Earn EXTRA MONEY with Peerless

DELUXE CHRISTMAS CARDS

Sell friends, customers fine quality Personal Christmas Cards - - a wide range of design and price for the most discriminating buyers. Also outstanding selection of Popular Priced Personal Christmas Cards, Holiday Gift Wrappings and fine Personal Stationery. Earn extra money for yourself or your organization.

Send Today --for Samples on Approval with Complete Details

PEERLESS GREETINGS
316 N. Michigan Ave., Dept. R Chicago 1, Ill.

Name .....
Address .....
City .....

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 26

Sometimes the fault here lies with the listener, who hears only half of what you say. Sometimes it lies with the speaker who gets out only about half of what he means. To check thoroughly on your ability to communicate with the spoken word, listen to the tone of your voice and then make sure you're coming in modulated but clear. If you really know what you're going to say, you can say it. This boils down to the art of thinking, and if we can't think we're not social swimmers at all. But that art is such a tall subject, we'll go into it in detail another time. For now, just remember, speaking is a valuable social asset, an invaluable form of communicating. Make the most of it.

WHAT YOU DO AND HOW YOU DO IT

My first personal contact with you would most likely be a handshake, and a handshake is a form of communication. Now I'll be right down Tennessee honest with you. If you don't look at me when you shake hands, you leave me cold. I think maybe you've got something to hide, or there's nobody much home behind those eyes. Furthermore, I shrink at a flabby paw. A good firm handshake from a pretty girl can be delightfully feminine. There's no need to convey the idea you're a wilting flower—unless you are one, of course. On the other hand, don't be a bone crusher. You can lose more friends that way. A nice, in-between-type handshake, looking someone firmly in the eye, does the trick.

Of course what you do and how you do it come under the heading of manners. (The s makes it different from the attitude-manner we spoke of earlier.) Your manner is the grand over-all you. Your manners are how you perform the smaller segments of daily living. If they are "good," your social contacts will usually be good. If they are "bad," your contacts with others are sure to be a reflection.

Mom and daddy taught us to say "Yes, sir" and "No, ma'am," and it became a habit. "Glad to meet you, sir"... "Glad to meet you, ma'am" was a must in our household. I still like it. It seems to me especially becoming in teenage boys and girls. I always think, "That li'l' chil' is well brought up." But I've got news for you. I take a dim view of being called "Mr. Boone." To this day I look around to see if daddy's following me. But I have a reluctance myself to call grownups by their first names when uninvited, and even sometimes when invited, especially if it's someone I respect a lot. Everybody calls Shirley's daddy "Red." I can't. So I call him "Mr. Red."

There are, of course, public manners—such as shopping, driving a car, and so on. Shopping is one project I'd like to avoid at all costs, even with my ever-lovin'. You gals don't know what you do to a guy in a store—but I've often wished that even the loveliest lady could see herself talking to a salesgirl. An awful lot of you check your manners at the door. It makes me think of a nice quiet man who went to a department-store sale to pick up an item for his wife. He got in there, but found two hundred women ahead of him. He stood around on one leg for a while, and then on the other, but he was getting nowhere fast. The goods were fading, and he could see a disappointed wife in the background as he went home that night. Finally, at the end of a couple of hours, he discarded his cane and dignity and waded into the crowd. He stepped on an angry lady's feet and she said, "What's the matter with you? Can't you behave like a gentleman?" He said, "Well, I've been acting like a gentleman for two hours and now I'm going to act like a lady."

As for driving, there are not only driving laws but driving manners. It seems to me sometimes as if normally nice, well-behaved people (of all ages) just wait to get behind the wheel of a car to get even with the world. There's a story about one couple with a teenage son who were arguing about the best way to make him observe certain simple civilized rules. "Let's buy Junior a car," his mother suggested; "do you think that will improve his behavior?" "No," his dad declared, "but it will spread his meanness over a wider area."

Sometimes when I am pursued bumper bumper, when someone is shining brig headlamps in my eyes, or crowding to pass think it must be Junior, or Junior grown u just spreading himself around.

Social manners are a little more persor than what we've called public manners. Th include your private relations, the close on as well as the public relations—such things table manners, courtesy, how to be a go guest or a good host or hostess. If you wond about your desirability as a guest—well, ga check back to the last slumber party you we to. Would your young hostess's mother be gl to see you again? If not, better check up your Emily Post.

A guest is considerate—and a host hostess is the same. I know the guys I rea looked up to were the ones who, when th invited me to their houses, made me feel sp cial. As a house guest, I don't like being fuss over, but you can get pretty embarrassed you're made to shift for yourself in someo else's home. The middle ground is to ma someone feel at home, comfortable, and honored guest as well.

To me, "bad" manners come from selfis ness, and a lack of concern about other pe ple: the guy who's always going through t

Take all the swift advantage of the hours. SHAKESPEARE door first, sits down first, eats first, the gal w shoves her way to the head of the line catches old ladies in revolving doors, is just n stroking smoothly for the social swim.

If you have any social problems, check t Golden Rule as well as the etiquette colun in the daily papers.

LITTLE THINGS YOU DO CAN SAY A LOT

Before I ever met him, and when he fi heard I had signed to do a weekly TV show had a note from Bing Crosby in which he sai "I would never do this myself because of son sage advice George M. Cohan once gave m 'Never stay on too long.' As a result, I ha always tried to keep my appearances at minimum, and make them count for the mo But since you're going on every week, try remember this, and never stay on too long. this valuable advice is gratis."

You can imagine how big these "littl things seem to a newcomer in the field of e tertainment. These are gestures by which bu men show they are big men, too, by reachi out to help a newcomer. But you don't ha to be big and famous to do little things. Yo just have to be thinking about the other gu You can often afford to be a little origin even to the point of punning, if it is som thing someone will remember, and it com from the heart.

I know two things that Shirley remembe to this day, that seemed very little to me at t time. One Easter, before we were married sent her some flowers, and instead of a ca I enclosed a hard-boiled egg on which I h written, "To my Favorite Egghead, fro your Easter Booney." Another time, when were going to a dance, I sent her a corsa and attached to it a little bell. The card rea "To My Belle of the Ball." It was a ten-ce bell, and several bucks' worth of gardenia The flowers died in a day or two, but Shirl still has the bell. She would probably have t egg too—but you know how eggs are. Ho ever, you get the idea.

The whole point in being successful in yo human relations is to decide who and wh you really want to be, and then make su you're beaming that personality to the worl loud and clear, through your appearanc your written and spoken words, your ma ners—public and private—and your abili to make other people know you care. It shou come from the heart when you put out yo hand and say to a stranger, "It's a pleasure And it should come from his heart when he able to say in return, "I'm glad to know you

EN

Add excitement ...add Tabasco®!

(The seasoning that sings)

The unique Tabasco flavor begins when we take this pepper . . . The proud strain that the McIlhenny family has watched over for more than a century . . . Press it tenderly, keeping all the essential flavorful oils . . . Mellow it for years like fine wine in oaken casks . . . And finally put it in this famous bottle. Then this liquid pepper seasoning is ready to spread singing flavor through all your favorite foods. See . . .

MONDAY—SPAGHETTI AND MEAT BALLS

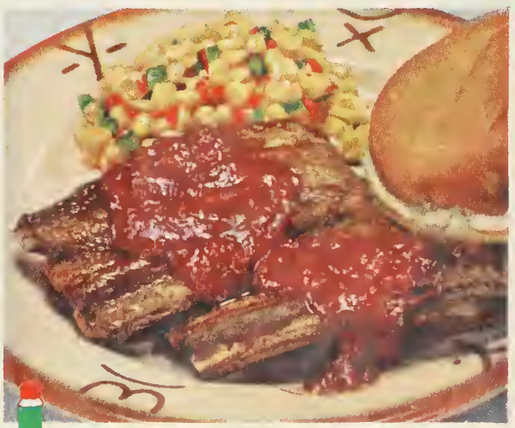
This economical stand-by becomes an outstanding creation, thanks to the clever sauce you create with TABASCO. Add the gourmet dash of TABASCO to make the meat balls all the better. In the new recipe booklet†.

TUESDAY– TABASCO ROQUEFORT SPREAD

Cream together until blended 2 tablesp. butter, a package (3 oz.) Roquefort cheese, ½ teasp. TABASCO. Spread over broiled steaks, chops or hamburgers and serve piping hot. Also good with green peas.

WEDNESDAY– CREOLE SEAFOOD GUMBO

Favorite stand-by of those famous Louisiana cooks—an exciting meal-in-one-dish anywhere. TABASCO brings out the true flavor of seafoods, vegetables and rice. Your new TABASCO recipe booklet† has the recipe.



THURSDAY—TOMATO JUICE COCKTAIL

A sparkling, zestful way for the family to start the day! Blend a large can (46 oz.) tomato juice, ¼ teasp. TABASCO, a tablesp. lemon juice, a teasp. Worcestershire sauce.

FRIDAY– TUNA-OLIVE PUFF CASSEROLE

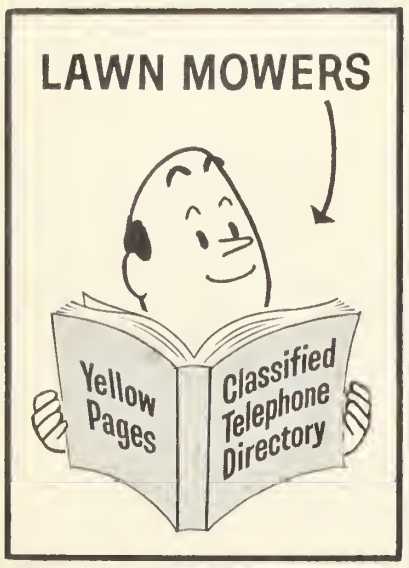
Tuna, celery, black olives and bread crumbs fluffed up in a base of egg and-mayonnaise seasoned with TABASCO, lemon juice and onion, baked golden brown. Recipe in the new TABASCO recipe booklet†.

SATURDAY– BARBECUED SPARERIBS

Done outdoors or in the oven, they're festive for a week-end treat. Sauce? Your compliment-catching blend of brown sugar, mustard, bay leaf, garlic, TABASCO. In the recipe booklet†.

SUNDAY... Have a family celebration at your favorite restaurant ... reward for your fine meals.

†40-PAGE BOOKLET– dozens of exciting recipes. Send inside flap from Tabasco carton or 10c to Tabasco, Dept. LH-8, Avery Island, Louisiana.



"Tabasco" is also available in Canada.

Tabasco*... the liquid pepper seasoning

*stered Trademark for McIlhenny Co. Pepper Sauce

Copyright 1960, McIlhenny Co., Avery Island, La.

garden equipment, generators, stables, laundries, lumber, luggage, labels

whatever you need—

Find it Fast
In The Yellow Pages

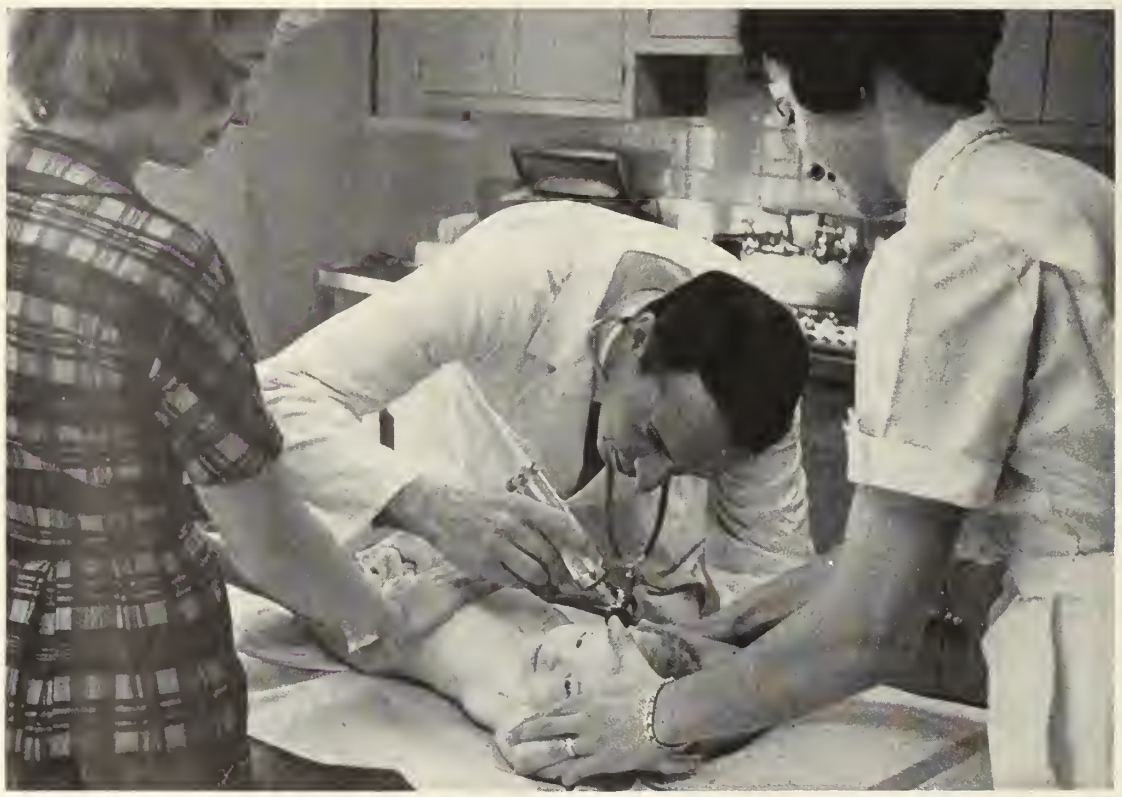
Advertisers displaying this emblem make your shopping easy.

what your doctor looks for when he examines your child

Dr. Spock talks to mothers



"A great part of your child's physical examination depends on what the doctor knows about him beforehand."

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

A mother writes that she feels dissatisfied with the briefness of the physical examinations her child receives on routine visits to the doctor. "What does a good physical examination consist of, anyway?" she wants to know.

It's a risky business for any one doctor to try to explain medical practices when there are 200,000 practitioners in the land, each one of whom will have somewhat different views about each point. But here goes.

In the first place, a physical examination is only one part of the process by which a physician makes an evaluation of an individual. The others are of course the history (the story the patient or parent tells), and the laboratory tests, if any. I think it's correct to say that in a majority of medical visits, especially for checkups, the history of how the patient has been functioning and feeling reveals more information than the physical examination. Think of the areas that are of most concern to parent and doctor in infancy: the diet that's offered and how well it is taken; gain in weight and other measurements; advances in motor skills;

ABBOT MILLS

The doctor's chat with mother often takes longer than the examination—and it may be more important.

social responsiveness; bowel function; toilet training, if any; sleep; contentedness versus crying; respiratory or other infections; skin condition; effect of the baby on other members of the family. On only three of these eleven topics is the physical examination apt to shed much light.

In the older child coming in for a routine visit, diet, growth, sleep, infections are still important subjects. In addition there will be questions about adjustment to siblings, parents, friends, school, self. Only in regard to growth and infections does the examination contribute.

Even in regard to growth and infections, the history is as important as the examination in coming to conclusions. The fact that a child is slender or plump in today's examination would leave us almost completely in the dark about its significance unless we knew the past course of his weight curve and his adjustment. Let's take two examples. A child has been somewhat high-strung and thin since infancy. On a percentile chart his weight at many CONTINUED ON PAGE 141

Ground-in grime... or simply soiled...

...you need CLOROX to get out dirt that suds leave in!

Never doubt it. Suds-proof dirt sneaks into lightly soiled washloads, too. Example: the stubborn soil inside shirt collars or blouses. Worse yet, there's a build-up of this same kind of dirt that makes entire washes gray. How can Clorox get out such dirt when even the best detergents fail?

Clorox cleans in a way suds can't. Detergent will loosen ordinary dirt. But stubborn, gray-causing dirt is locked in too tightly to be loosened. This dirt demands the special dissolving action of Clorox bleach. Clorox literally melts suds-proof dirt away. Next wash, ground-in grime, or simply soiled, discover it for yourself...

Clorox actually dissolves suds-proof dirt that makes clothes gray!

©1960, The Clorox Company

In-laws and the young-in-love

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

DO YOU AGREE?

I am a widow of sixty-three, marrying a widower of fifty-seven who thinks I am his age. Must I tell him?

No. Why destroy his dream?

ASK YOURSELF:

Have I the Middle-Age Doldrums?

With about one half of their lives still ahead of them, many women in their late forties and fifties feel empty and dissatisfied. If your children are no longer at home, you probably should create a new interest for yourself. By answering the first seven questions, you may be able to determine how badly you need one.

Do you feel:

1. That each day is just another day?
2. Lonesome at times when with others?
3. Tired after doing minor chores?
4. Life holds little challenge for you?
5. Bored to death when alone?
6. That shopping is your only interest?
7. That life is passing you by?

If you do, why not

8. Learn how to play golf?
9. Become a really good bridge player?
10. Join an interesting new club?
11. Busy yourself with civic affairs?
12. Try your hand at painting?
13. Take a college correspondence course?
14. Seek a part- or full-time job?

If you have three or four doldrum "symptoms" and your physician says that you are in good health, why not try one or two of the remedies above? All are actual examples of how women found a new zest in life: get busy and become one of them!

CAN HELP DO HARM?

Though interfering in-laws often cause friction, the "interference" is not always so intended. A recent case shows how misguided help can worsen a problem.

After dating about a year, Bill and Susie were married just before returning to college. Though both sets of parents had urged them to wait until they graduated (Bill was a senior, Susie a junior), they relented, and contributed to the couple's support.

But by the end of the year Bill had decided to become a lawyer like his father, and Susie was six months pregnant. Bill's parents approved his decision, but felt they could not finance both law school and the support of his family. Susie's parents wanted her to finish college, but recognized that the couple would need substantial assistance for two or three years. Since the two sets of parents lived in different cities, they never got together to discuss the situation. From Bill's and Susie's reports, it was obvious to the counselor that both sets of parents wanted to do the right thing—but the "right thing" was what they thought best for their own child.

Susie's mother said: "If Bill wants to study law, Susie can live at home. I'll take care of the baby so Susie can get her degree at our local teachers' college. Bill will be only eighty miles away and can come home weekends."

Bill's father said: "I'll pay Bill's tuition and personal expenses. If Susie lives with him, I'll lend him money to support her. But if her parents wanted this marriage to succeed as much as I do, they'd forget about her degree and contribute so Bill wouldn't have to borrow."

Bill said: "If Susie hadn't let herself get pregnant, she could have worked and gone to school nights. As it is, I think my father is right. I'll need my weekends to study. She'd give in if her parents would go along with dad's plan."

Susie said: "If I had finished college before we got married, I wouldn't be in this mess. Bill knew I didn't like housekeeping. I wouldn't have married him if he'd said he was going to law school. I'll live with him if he'll get a job; but if he goes to school, he'll have to let me live at home."

During the summer, the couple lived with Susie's parents and Bill commuted to a job. The counselor hoped that better understanding would develop in these weeks; instead, irritations accumulated and tension increased. Two weeks after their son was born they came in again.

Bill said: "It's not good. I'm not even sure Sue and I are in love any more. My father thinks divorce may be the only way out. If it's a choice between my going to school and sticking out the marriage, I'll go to school. If Sue wants a divorce, she can have it."

Susie said: "Bill's just like his father—rule or ruin. Mother and dad say if our marriage has to break up, now is as good a time as any. If we get a divorce, mother will look after the baby until I graduate. Then I can teach and make a home for us."

Divorce seemed imminent, but as I talked to Bill and Sue separately, I sensed that neither really wanted it. Could any way be found to preserve the marriage and still permit Bill to attend law school and let Susie get her degree?

Part of Sue's attitude stemmed from her ineptitude as a homemaker and her ignorance of child care; there were advantages to her staying with her mother till she gained skill and confidence. Finally this plan was evolved: Bill would enter law school, and Sue would stay at home and attend the local college for one semester. Sue and the baby would then join Bill. His parents would continue to pay his tuition and lend him money for living expenses. If Sue's parents wanted her to get a degree, they would pay her tuition and the cost of a baby sitter.

Fortunately the parents agreed, and Bill and Sue are satisfied. The young husband and wife are emotionally immature, but this plan gives them a year to grow up. With their parents united behind them, the marriage has a chance to work out.

Naturally, parents wish to help their children succeed in marriage. But when the children are emotionally immature individuals who rush into responsibilities for which they are not prepared, an action intended as helpful may do real damage. Assistance should be offered and proposals made only after careful consideration, thorough discussion with the couple, and if possible, consultation with the other set of parents.

PRESSURES OF ENGAGEMENT

"Henry and I became engaged a year after we met, planning to be married in three months, after my college graduation. Almost from the moment we told our parents, nothing went right. We could see each other only once or twice a month, since his job is four hundred miles away, and we had to depend on letters to make plans. This was a strain on everybody. His mother wanted a big expensive wedding which my parents couldn't afford; he got upset if I didn't agree with her on every detail, and I resented some of her suggestions. He thought my idea for a honeymoon plebeian and middle-class; I felt he expected too much intimacy before marriage.

"I got so on edge I began to doubt that we were right for each other. When I foolishly tried to tell him so, he blew up and left. The next day his mother telephoned to point out my mistakes and I lost my temper. Henry asked for an apology, and I gave back his ring, saying I wouldn't wear it till he cut the apron strings. I haven't heard from him since. I really thought we were in love and would be happy together. How could we have avoided breaking up?"

Lois's letter suggests that neither she nor Henry is emotionally mature, so perhaps their marriage would have been unsuccessful. But many of the pressures from which they suffered arise during the engagement of two people who are well suited and ready for marriage. With thought and planning, many of these strains can be avoided, or at least reduced.

Relationships with families. Rarely should two people become engaged before each has become acquainted with the parents of the other; ideally, both sets of parents should know each other as well. If there are serious differences of background, personality or standards, the sooner these differences are discovered and reconciled or accepted, the better. The danger of such unresolved differences is shown by the fact that a fifth of all divorces are caused by in-law difficulties.

Length of engagement. It is impossible to set an arbitrary figure on how long an engagement should be. If the couple date frequently and have had a satisfactory courtship of perhaps a year, an engagement of three to six months may be adequate. The engagement should be longer (or, better still, postponed) if the couple have had a short courtship, or if it will be difficult for them to see each other frequently.

Announcement of the wedding date should ordinarily be delayed until the couple have made tentative wedding plans that meet the approval of both families. Certainly no date should be set until the couple have discussed such questions as whether the wife will work after marriage, whether available income will be adequate, and whether children are desired.

Frank and honest communication during engagement is vital preparation for successful marriage, and one of the best guaranties of its happiness.

Avoidance of stress and strain. Getting ready to be married takes time, patience and energy. If the bride-to-be is also holding a job or completing her education, the pressures pile up. Careful planning, delegation of minor matters to friends and relatives, and adequate rest are essential if the exhaustion so many brides experience is to be avoided.

Other vital decisions immediately affecting marital adjustment concern selecting and furnishing an apartment and perhaps whether the budget will permit car ownership. The sensible couple weigh and decide such issues (including potential in-law problems) during or before engagement; they do not postpone them until their return from the honeymoon!

Easy...no cooking...just mix and freeze.

LEMON SNOW FREEZE

It's easy to make—and easier to eat! The smoothness comes from Eagle Brand sweetened condensed milk . . . a pre-cooked milk and sugar blend . . . the drifts of sweet crunchiness, from Baker's light, moist Angel Flake Coconut.

LEMON SNOW FREEZE

1 cup graham cracker crumbs • 6 tbs. sugar
3 tbs. melted butter • 2 eggs, separated
1 can (1⅓ cups) Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk
1 tbs. grated lemon rind • ½ cup lemon juice
1 can Baker's Angel Flake Coconut

Combine graham cracker crumbs with 2 tablespoons of the sugar, and melted butter. Press mixture on bottom and sides of lightly buttered refrigerator tray; chill. Beat egg yolks till thick. Combine with Eagle Brand Milk. Add lemon rind and juice gradually, stirring until thick. Stir in 1 cup Baker's Coconut. Whip egg whites until foamy. Gradually beat in rest of sugar, then beat until stiff. Fold into lemon mixture.

Pour into tray. Sprinkle top with remaining coconut. Chill in freezer until firm, about 4 to 6 hours.

Creamy smooth Eagle Brand and tender Angel Flake Coconut combine to make this the heavenliest frozen dessert ever. Easy—there's no cooking, no second beating, no refreezing.

Free, 28 page, full color Cookbook! Eagle Brand's "70 Magic Recipes." Write Dept. L. H. J. 80, Box 171, New York 46, N. Y.

Baker's and Angel Flake are registered trademarks of General Foods Corp.

LIFE'S MORE FUN WITH

Colorful Hair!

Use beautiful, temporary

Nestle Hair Color

RINSES IN...SHAMPOOS OUT

Nestle Colorinse glorifies your natural hair shade with glamorous color-highlights and silken sheen. It removes dulling soap film, makes hair easier to manage, excitingly lovely! 12 shades that stay color-true till your next shampoo. 35¢

NESTLE COLORINSE

Nestle Colortint intensifies your natural hair color OR gives you thrilling NEW color. Colortint also beautifies grey and white hair... blends-in grey and faded streaks. More than a rinse... but not a permanent dye. Colortint lasts through 3 shampoos! 10 shades. 35¢

NESTLE COLORTINT

Nestle Spraze adds the final touch of perfection as it sets hair in soft, lovely, lasting waves... keeps hair perfectly controlled in all kinds of weather. 2 types—regular Spraze and Soft Spraze (no lacquer). 4 oz. 49¢, 7 oz. 69¢, Giant size 89¢.

NESTLE SPRAZE and SOFT SPRAZE

Nestle

COLORS YOUR HAIR

WITHOUT BLEACHING or DYEING

Ask your beautician for professional applications

By HARLAN MILLER

There's a man in the house.

"With my check-list system it's impossible to forget the least little item."

"Men are crazy," confides Betty Comfort, bandaging her ankle wounded by a spike heel, "to wear coats and neckties in this weather. My whole dress weighs less than a necktie!"

"Dad, don't worry about the three-minute limit with your egg timer," chides my son-in-law; "I'm paying for this long-distance call." (He leaves me not quite speechless.)

More and more teenage boys in our neighborhood show up with bloudish hair after brief exposure to the sun. The sun's rays seem loaded with peroxide fallout this year.

"I make my wife see two or three different doctors when her health worries her," boasts our town's most audible skeptic. "Just to double-check." Says she: "Such an agnostic!"

Our suburbs' stingiest millionaire promises his wife to dig dandelions, with one proviso: she must agree to cook him a mess of dandelion greens, though she reminds him he doesn't really like 'em.

"You can vote for or against any candidate you wish," argues our lunch table's deepest thinker, "without being guilty of bigotry. If you shrug off the pressure."

Warning about the next war: "It'll break out between smokers and nonsmokers," predicts our country club's most aggressive nonsmoker. "We'll make 'em eat their own cigarette butts!"

If chatter languishes (it isn't often!) local hostesses have the three latest divorces to fall back on (each a lab specimen). They're never exhausted till 1 A.M. if the host isn't exhausted.

A neighborly teenangel named Gwen discovered an artificial daisy made in Hong Kong for only 10 cents after I'd paid $1 for an artificial made-in-Paris daffodil. (I suspect Hong Kong can't really afford to sell 'em for a dime.)

My suspicious neighbor thinks his wife's attempt to interest him actively in her garden is a guileful scheme to enslave him. "She wants to wrap me around her green thumb!" he says darkly.

Brave-new-world bridge-table opinion: A weekly quarrel, argues our intrepid three-no-trumper, actually sweetens a pair of family lovers. (Maybe this works better if the wife wins the quarrel.)

Since the town's barbers began to charge $2 for haircuts, our most extravagant matron is up in arms. She threatens to clip her husband's hair herself if he'll pay her $1.

My Dream Girl's agreement of the month: that the story is always better'n the movie, and the movie invariably better'n the TV production. After all three, you're befuddled.

One of our globe-trotters who ate ham and eggs at New York's ten top restaurants finds ham and eggs at Curt Yocom's place on the edge of town better'n any of theirs. Patriotic, eh?

I discern among young wives that three or four babies in the early years of marriage are the strongest antidote to divorce. (And husbands hungry for security seem to agree.)

Last year, before my Dream Girl's onslaught on our luxuriant crab grass, our lawn from a short distance resembled one of England's lawns with 500 years of care. This year it doesn't even look like a 100-year lawn.

My congrats to our highway patrolman about to tag two out-of-state motorists when he saw both wore safety belts around their middles. He let 'em off with a courtesy warning ticket.

Beyond our hilly pasture, a pair of newlyweds have built a new house in a hollow without a view. "Why do we need a view?" asks the young husband. "We have each other."

Warmest compliment from my Princess of Sheer Delight: "He's easy to feed, he'll eat anything I set before him." Yes indeed, especially if it tastes a little like roast-beef hash or broiled pepper steak.

. . . When my red-haired daughter remembers my love for kaleidoscopes and gives me a new model which makes patterns of my surroundings,
. . . And my flier son phones long distance and asks if I'm adhering to my diet and keeping my weight down,
. . . Or my daughter-in-law tactfully straightens out my goofy bidding at bridge,
. . . And our youngest adopts enthusiastically an opinion of mine
he scorned only yesterday,
. . . Or my Lady Love turns off my bed light when I fall asleep with the seventeenth volume of the encyclopedia on my chest, Then I secretly congratulate myself on becoming such a docile husband and father in sheep's clothing.

A public statement concerning Metrecal, a new concept of weight control

Several months ago, Metrecal was introduced to the medical profession by Mead Johnson & Company, manufacturers of nutritional and pharmaceutical products. Many people have since learned of this product by word-of-mouth. To emphasize the role of the physician in problems of weight control and to provide accurate information on Metrecal, Mead Johnson & Company is publishing this factual report.

September of 1959, a new product—Metrecal was introduced to the medical profession by ıd Johnson & Company. It was developed to ıvide physicians with a new technique for use ıudicious weight reduction of overweight ents.

Ve wish to stress the importance of the physi- in problems of weight loss and control. This articularly the case for individuals who are nendously overweight, patients with disease he kidneys, and patients with various forms of rt and blood vessel disease.

n view of the broad public and medical inter- n weight control, many persons have learned Ietrecal by word-of-mouth; hence, this factual ement.

What is Metrecal?

trecal, when properly used, is an effective ght control agent. It is not a panacea.

Ietrecal is a complete food in powder form ch is mixed with water to make beverage ıls. It is designed to provide a low calorie diet ch contains all basic nutrients required by a son on a reducing program. Metrecal contains rugs.

Ietrecal can be used as the total diet for the iod required to achieve the weight loss which est for the individual. Thereafter, it can be l indefinitely for one or two meals a day, or as the total diet on selected days to maintain desired weight.

In other words, the concept is measured calories according to the needs of the individual.

What does Metrecal do?

Overweight persons are able to lose weight on a properly devised Metrecal program simply because they take in fewer calories than are required to maintain weight. In this manner they lose weight naturally, without resorting to fad diets, complex schedules, or artificial appetite depressants. And Metrecal users are remarkably free from hunger—the appetite is satisfied normally.

What Metrecal cannot do

Metrecal is not a miracle cure for overweight. It cannot provide the will power required for weight reduction. It has to be used properly. It is imperative that the person who desires to lose weight stay on the Metrecal diet. This is not difficult since little, if any, hunger occurs after a day or two.

Medical evidence of effectiveness

Extensive clinical studies, conducted under medical supervision, have shown an average weight loss by Metrecal users of approximately one-half pound per day for periods up to six weeks. Some lose even more.

Most patients in the studies report little, if any, hunger. Many report that they feel better than before. Almost all find it relatively easy to continue on Metrecal.

What is in Metrecal?

One-half pound of Metrecal powder (a frequently specified day's supply) provides 900 calories or energy units, 70 grams protein, 110 grams carbohydrate, 20 grams fat and all essential vitamins and minerals in quantities that meet or exceed minimum daily requirements established by the Food and Drug Administration. Metrecal is available in all drugstores.

How to undertake a reducing program

Your physician is the best source of counsel and guidance in problems of weight loss and control.

This statement has been reviewed by the Department of Advertising Evaluation of the American Medical Association and has been accepted for publication in the Journal of the American Medical Association.

Mead Johnson
Symbol of service in medicine

Lighter, clearer
Wesson
pours in wholesome goodness...

Wesson glorifies chicken

as only pure vegetable oil can

When you reach for the skillet—always reach for the Wesson instead of solid shortening. There's no better or easier cooking method to help you cut down on the more saturated fats in your skillet. You see, shortening is hydrogenated to make it solid. But Wesson is never hydrogenated and so is poly-unsaturated as only pure vegetable oil can be.

So clear, so fresh, so pretty as it pours, Wesson brightens flavors—never adds taste of its own as some other oils do.

When your physician recommends modifying your diet and specifies pure vegetable oil to replace solid fats, poly-unsaturated Wesson is unexcelled among all leading brands.

NEW! WESSON CHICKEN DIVINE (only 275 calories a serving)

Halve 2 whole fryer chicken breasts, coat with seasoned flour. Brown in 3 tablesp. Wesson. Cover, simmer 30 min. Add 1 pkg. frozen broccoli (10 oz.) the last 15 min. Remove chicken and broccoli to warm oven. Stir 2 tablesp. flour into browned bits. Add ½ cup each skim milk and chicken broth, ½ teasp. tarragon. Stir until thickened. Salt to taste. Pour sauce over chicken and broccoli, sprinkle with garlic bread crumbs. Brown under broiler. Four servings, 275 calories each.

Poly-unsaturated
Wesson®
The Pure Vegetable Oil

FREE Cook Book "101 Glorious Ways to Cook Chicken." Write The Wesson People, Box 3333, New Orleans 17, La.

ABBOT MILLS

Poolside picnic at the Brennemans'. Our architectural editor, family, friends.

journal about town

what we do... where we go... whom we meet

Summer, according to Louella Shouer, breezes women out of kitchens while men, armed with aprons and asbestos gloves, try their hand at cookouts (wives breathe easier when men work off the range). At least 20 JOURNAL children wait to savor juicy hamburgers, chicken, hot dogs. John Brenneman has a portable barbecue—a boon when the wind takes a wrong turn. Bill McCleery insists he's strictly nonpro—but no one's turned down a steak yet. Expert Conrad Brown has a few problems—he learned to cook on top of a mountain. When Glenn Whitehead heard this, he looked perplexed: "Near a grill I feel as if I'm standing on top of Old Smoky!" In spite of hazards, count on August to be a sauce-for-the-gander month, and a picnic.

ABBOT MILLS

Color-scheming Pierre Balmain, Mary Bass.

Home swimming pools are making such a big splash Richard Pratt tells us, "In some homes they're taking the place of a third car." There are 171,000 today, all sizes and shapes. Average cost: $1200, but you can "pay as you swim." Tests not required, but lessons are sometimes included in the cost. JOURNAL editors who own pools (such as John Brenneman, above, Helen Everitt, Neal Stuart) estimate at least three hours a week labor. Here's one case where plunging into your work can really be fun!

When Lola Fisher headed for Russia to play Eliza in "My Fair Lady," and found she could take only 66 pounds of personal luggage with her for ten weeks, she protested: "I weigh at least thirty pounds less than a man—can't I take the difference?" No, said airlines men. So Lola consulted Nora O'Leary. "Separates do it," said Nora. "A basic suit like our May one transforms with dickeys, scarves, flowers. Use creaseless fabrics. Going barefoot might help, but since this would raise eyebrows keep shoes (and hats) at a minimum!" Fair Lady Lola boarded the plane with no excess baggage—and not one raised eyebrow.

Speaking of summer travel, our executive editor Mary Bass let us look over her shoulder as she was looking over sketches by Paris designer Pierre Balmain for the Queen of Thailand's wardrobe. (She's just finished an American tour, is now visiting Europe.) Idea excerpted: a different color for each day, complete with accessories, so she can dress quick as a fireman getting ready to slide down a pole. No blue Mondays on her schedule—she'll be cheery in yellow. And Sunday's a red-letter day—bright red, that is.

We noted a new club the other day called the "Singletons," to bring unmarried men and women together for civic work (object matrimony). But our fast-marrying homemaking staff traditionally sticks to good food. Kathy McDonald thinks veal scallopine won her a proposal. Jane Engel tested recipes in the JOURNAL kitchen before trying them out on her fiancé: he proposed. And Liane Waite married her husband because he could cook!

DON ORNITZ

Difficult years for marriages: fifth to ninth. Best place to meet a husband: (1) school, (2) parties, (3) offices. Place of most proposals: cars. These and other facts we culled from the new book, "Can This Marriage Be Saved?", published by Dr. Paul Popenoe and Dorothy Cameron Disney from our pages. Couples photographed for the JOURNAL are the real principals (see picture here), have told out happily married Dorothy that "little problems are the top of the iceberg—you have to sound out what's under them." Human life is in these pages—the material of which great novels are made. The volume is also a handbook of hints for the perceptive—showing them how their own marriages need never ask the question in the title.

Dorothy Disney discusses a problem.

50 years ago in the Journal

In August, 1910, a poor widow who kept boarders jotted down the words and music to The End of a Perfect Day after watching the sunset in Riverside, California. The song made Mrs. Carrie Jacobs Bond rich and world-famous. Mayor Gaynor, of New York, used to walk to work across the Brooklyn Bridge. The Chocolate Soldier was a big Broadway hit, and the average American ate 82.6 pounds of sugar yearly.

In the August, 1910, JOURNAL, Annette Kellerman, best-known swimmer and diver in the world, advises JOURNAL readers, "Don't wear a corset in swimming—they cause many a case of cramps."

In this issue, the first woman to make a night ascension in America writes about My Night in a Balloon. Mrs. Eleanor Burnham says, "As I sat in a small basket 4000 feet above the sea and floated along at 40 miles per hour, a line of airships between New York and Boston no longer seemed an idle dream."

Menus for Summer Days includes this breakfast suggestion: "Iced currants, stuffed green peppers, hominy, beet salad and nut bread."

Concerned mother: "My year-old daughter who has always slept with her parents is a very restless sleeper. Can you suggest anything?" Replies the JOURNAL's baby expert: "Yes. Put her in a bed of her own at once."

"Pale yellow chiffon over pink silk makes a pretty afternoon dress."

THE JOURNAL'S COMPLETE NOVELLA

By STUART CLOETE

THROW YOUR HEART OVER

Sometimes the barriers ahead seem impossibly high. To hurdle them we have to dare a little, and love a lot.

Helen heard her father say, "She's—she's not going to die, is she?"

She was the she, her. It's me they're talking about, she thought.

"No, John," Smitty said. Doctor Smith was his real name, but nobody called him that. "There's even a bit of improvement."

"How long will it take her?" daddy said.

"I don't know, Johnnie. You see, we don't even know just what she's got. It's not polio—at least not an ordinary polio. It's something different—something new. If only this were America. They know more there. In ten years ——"

"Ten years," her dad said. "In ten years she'll be twenty-one and I'll be forty-two. . . . Marriage, children. What's there for her? What'll her life be?"

"She's not going to die, Johnnie. There's some improvement. Let's leave the rest to God. There is a God, you know—that's something we doctors find out."

"Expecting a miracle, Smitty?" her dad said.

"There are miracles too. Wonderful things still happen. Things that cannot be explained."

"Like her being struck down with this thing—an innocent child."

That's me, Helen thought. I'm an innocent child. The idea pleased her. Then she thought about God. She thought He must be something like her grandfather. Bigger, of course, with a bigger white beard, but resembling him in many ways. It was interesting to lie here and hear every word they said in the adjoining bedroom. Of course they didn't know about it. How could they, since she didn't talk to herself?

Then Smitty said, "The kid's bored. She's an outdoor girl. What about a pony? Ever think of a pony, Johnnie?"

Helen pulled herself up in bed and clasped her hands together.

"A pony?" her father said. "You think she could ride?"

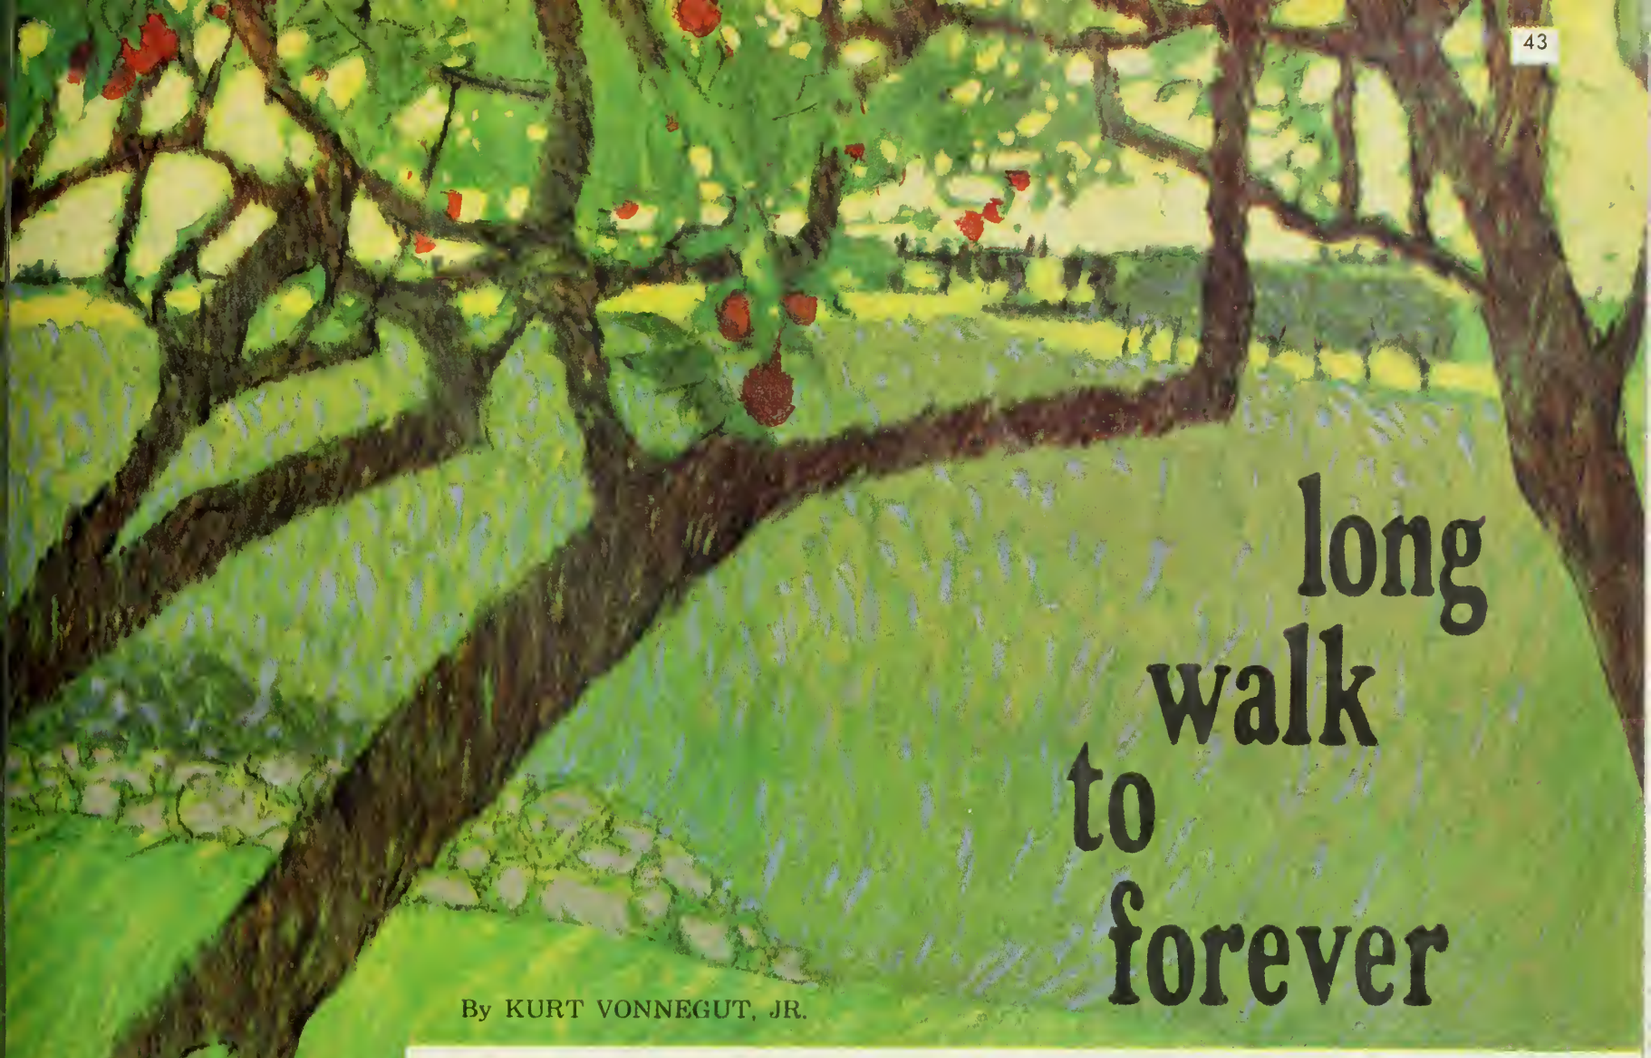
"One of the boys could hold her on. Old Herman, for instance. She could get around and see the veld again. The thorns are in bloom now. Yellow," the doctor said. "Yellow and perfumed." In her mind Helen saw the little fluffy yellow balls of the thorn flowers and smelled them. "I'm going to ask her," Smitty said.

"I can't buy a pony," her father said. "I can't even pay you."

The door banged and Smitty was in the room.

"Do you want a pony, Helen?" he said.

"No, I don't want a pony, doc."



"It would do you good. You could get out. Get around again. Old Herman could hold you on."

Helen gripped the sides of her bed again and leaned forward. The round white enameled bars were hard and cold in her hand. Something big was happening. She was on the edge

CONTINUED ON PAGE 78

He had come for a kiss that would cost him thirty days in the stockade.

long walk to forever

By KURT VONNEGUT, JR.

They had grown up next door to each other, on the fringe of a city, near fields and woods and orchards, within sight of a lovely bell tower that belonged to a school for the blind.

Now they were twenty, had not seen each other for nearly a year. There had always been playful, comfortable warmth between them, but never any talk of love.

His name was Newt. Her name was Catharine. In the early afternoon, Newt knocked on Catharine's front door.

Catharine came to the door. She was carrying a fat, glossy magazine she had been reading. The magazine was devoted entirely to brides. "Newt!" she said. She was surprised to see him.

"Could you come for a walk?" he said. He was a shy person, even with Catharine. He covered his shyness by speaking absently, as though what really concerned him were far away—as though he were a secret agent pausing briefly on a mission between beautiful, distant and sinister points. This manner of speaking had always been Newt's style, even in matters that concerned him desperately.

"A walk?" said Catharine.

"One foot in front of the other," said Newt, "through leaves, over bridges ——"

"I had no idea you were in town," she said.

"Just this minute got in," he said.

"Still in the Army, I see," she said.

"Seven more months to go," he said. He was a private first class in the Artillery. His uniform was rumpled. His shoes were dusty. He needed

CONTINUED ON PAGE 108

You can't get ahead today unless you read

Parents: Encourage your children to READ. Persons who read more write better. speak better. think better and know more. Naturally. then. they are more successful in life. By GEORGE GALLUP

Most famous Gallup Pollster. Dr. Gallup. ex-professor. thinks many children's reading lists dull. He'd like them updated. exciting. rewarding. so more children would happily. and profitably, read.

With knowledge in all fields expanding at a remarkable rate. and with competition growing keener for top positions in the business and professional world. the importance of reading must be carefully reassessed.

The cultural value of reading is well established. Likewise. the pleasures of reading have been widely extolled. These will not. therefore. be the chief concern of this article, but rather the very practical reasons why young and old should spend more time reading.

Fortunately. or unfortunately. competition starts at an early age in our highly competitive society. There was a time in America when the accepted formula for success was hard work. Today the formula calls for a college education. This new factor is so widely recognized that nearly seven of every ten parents throughout the country want their children to go to college. And at least half of all high-school seniors have definite plans to continue their education. During the next few years this proportion is likely to increase. just as it has during the last two decades.

The desire for a college education is most laudable. The only problem is how to expand college facilities and teaching staffs to take care of the onrush of millions of high-school graduates.

The simple truth. which every parent should recognize. is that our colleges and universities will not be able to take care of all those students who are planning to go to college and that a rigorous screening process will be employed to sort out the students who are best prepared.

Already the institutions in the country with the highest academic standards are carefully selecting their students. and in some instances accepting only one of every five applicants. Since only the better-qualified students tend to apply to these colleges. parents can gain some idea of how difficult it is for their sons and daughters to obtain admittance to one of these top institutions.

Even in the universities where by law. or by policy. all graduates of accredited secondary schools are permitted to enter the freshman class. the struggle to stay in for the full four years and to emerge with a college degree has become a very tough one.

Time was when a student who demonstrated a moderate interest in his work and who spent a reasonable amount of time in study could be fairly certain of getting a bachelor-of-arts degree. But those happy-go-lucky days are gone forever. College CONTINUED ON PAGE 145

LOUISIANA PLANTATIONS

GREENWOOD EVERGREEN
SAN FRANCISCO
HOUMAS

By RICHARD PRATT

In the days of their glory, these and their likes were the dreams that decorated both sides of the Mississippi the whole length of Louisiana. The days of their glory were the fifty years that ended with the Civil War. During these years there seemed to be no limit to the wealth of sugar cane and cotton which grew up from the rich alluvial floodlands of Old Man River. Each plantation bore a romantic resemblance to a private principality, with whole populations of help living in oak-lined avenues of cabins. In most cases, grouped around the pillared and galleried great house were gatherings of other buildings called dependencies: the kitchens; the garçonnière for male guests; dovecots called pigeonniers; and often an architecturally elaborate little building that would now be called a rest room. Of all the fine old houses that were, many picturesque ruins remain, but only a few still look anything like the way they looked in the days of their glory. And of those few, these are four of the finest remaining.

GREENWOOD PLANTATION

This great Greek Revival mansion, a hundred feet square, surrounded by twenty-eight columns of plastered brick, was built in the 1830's by the Barrow family from the Carolinas, complete with silver hardware and reflecting pond to mirror the house's glory.

PHOTOGRAPH BY RICHARD PRATT

EVERGREEN PLANTATION

This is a rarity among the surviving Louisiana plantation establishments in that it has been beautifully and thoroughly restored during the years since 1946 when it was bought, just in the nick of time, by Mrs. Matilda Gray, of Lake Charles, Louisiana, New Orleans, New York City, France and Guatemala, where she also maintains handsome homes. What makes it rarer still is the fact that it remains a virtually complete plantation, with many delightful dependencies gathered around the great house, and off at a distance, down a long alley overhung with a double line of live oaks dripping with moss, twenty-four slave cabins, long since unoccupied, but standing there still. The house itself dates from the 1830's.

Kitchen

Bedroom

PHOTOGRAPHS BY EZRA STOLLER

EXTERIOR: FRANK LOTZ MILLER

SAN FRANCISCO PLANTATION

Dreamier even than most of the big plantation houses standing back from the banks of the Mississippi were the famous river boats that did their best to look like floating palaces. San Francisco was a plantation house that did its best to look like one of the wedding-cake side-wheelers, following a style that has become known as Steamboat Gothic. This fanciful house was concocted in 1849, across the river from Evergreen, by a man named Valein Marmillion. But the burden of building the house, both physical and financial, was too much for his health, and he died before he had quite finished it, leaving it a monument to his dream.

The pride and joy of San Francisco are the painted ceilings, walls and doors; in particular the painted ceiling of the drawing room pictured here, one of the four great corner rooms of the gallery floor. If you look closely you will see that the charmingly rococo décor is painted directly on the cypress boards of the ceiling, where it has survived well over a hundred years of bad times as well as good without losing any of its original freshness—the work of Dominique Canova, cousin of the Napoleonic sculptor. San Francisco, like neighbor Greenwood, is open to visitors.

HOUMAS HOUSE

The overhanging roof supported by its surrounding colonnade is no mere stylistic effusion on these big Louisiana plantation houses. This impressive architectural feature served the very practical purpose of shading and cooling the high-ceilinged rooms within from the burning summer heat of the sugar-cane climate. Houmas does this with great magnificence: one of the finest and most famous of the plantation places; for most of its history, and even now, a bachelor's establishment, restored with fine taste and understanding, and furnished with the best work of the renowned New Orleans cabinetmakers. Though the house is of princely palatial size and extent, it is thoroughly homelike throughout, from the informal dining room in the old Creole summer kitchen to the typical vista beneath from breakfast room to parlor. Even the graceful staircase in the huge entrance hall winds upward unpretentiously.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY EZRA STOLLER

Front hall

Kitchen

Dining room

We loved him, but ——

His father was too busy to be with him.
I couldn't bring myself to punish him for misbehaving.
We sided against his teachers when they complained about his schoolwork.
As he grew up, he would hardly discuss the time of day with us.
He was expelled from school.
We gave him money—so he wouldn't steal again.

—— we didn't abandon him, even then.

JERRY YULSMAN

I went when the police called—to turn my own boy over to them.
As I watched them search him, my life seemed to end.

I REARED A CRIMINAL

My only son is a public enemy who is serving his third term in a state penitentiary. He has robbed at gun point, forged checks, stolen cars, abandoned a family, wreaked disgrace on his father and me and brought a thousand teardrops to my eyes. Yet my son possesses above-average intelligence, he is mentally sound and has no handicaps or physical defects that could have warped his mind or made him bitter. Indeed, he is a handsome young man with a winning personality, and he was reared in a fine home by parents who loved him.

Why is he a criminal? Psychologists have said that his father and I "made mistakes" in training him. I look around today and I see many other parents making these same mistakes. I fear these parents are going to pay the same terrible price for their neglect that my husband and I have paid. I am telling how my son went wrong in the hope that I can help other mothers and fathers avoid the heartbreak that my husband and I have known. Let me start my story at the beginning.

When our little boy was born, Leonard, my husband, and I had been married for three years. We had just bought a new home a few miles outside the small Western city where my husband had established a building-supply business. Like many other young couples, we were short of cash, but we had a growing business and a good start on a fine home. We looked to a bright future; and since my husband wanted an heir, he was overjoyed when our first child proved to be a boy.

I had a difficult time carrying my son, and I was very weak after his birth. When our second child, a girl, arrived twenty months later, I nearly died and doctors said I could never have another. But this didn't matter too much because we now had a family, Leonard, Jr. (Lennie), and Judy Ann.

In the early years of our married life, all my problems at home were overshadowed by my husband's struggle to keep our business on a firm foundation, and expand it. Like many other husbands, he worked long hours each day, and when he came home at night he was too tired to devote much attention to household problems. We gradually reached an understanding that I was to take care of the home and rear the children, while he devoted all his attention to the task of bringing in money and building for our future. It wasn't the best of relationships, but do not many husbands today spend much of their time at the office, or with clients, and devote little real attention to problems in their home?

Our children were a joy during those early years. They were handsome, with blond hair and attractive features. They were also happy and very healthy. But as our son reached the age of four it became evident that he had achieved a condition known as "being spoiled." He lorded it over his sister, demanded his own way, and when things didn't please him he gave way to fits of anger. This was due to several things. First of all, I was not strong for several years after the birth of our daughter, so my mother helped me with my household duties. There is nobody like a grandparent when it comes to indulging and spoiling a child, in my opinion. Secondly, I seemed to lack the fortitude that was required to inflict on our son the punishment which he so richly deserved at times. His tears seemed to melt my anger. I rarely spanked him, and often I reneged on my word when I threatened him with punishment if he committed a specific offense again.

Another problem was created by my husband's activities. Leonard felt guilty that he had so little time to devote to the children. To make up for this, he lavished gifts on them, especially Lennie, who occupied a special place in his father's heart. These gifts were not always wisely chosen. Our boy got a bicycle before he was old enough to appreciate it, and when it was rendered useless through neglect he was given another one. Throughout the first six years, our son got almost his every wish from my husband, who attempted to win a place in the child's affections in this manner. This CONTINUED ON PAGE 117

A WELL-KNOWN PSYCHIATRIST SAYS:

"This portrays true typical behavior of parents who cannot believe that they have a desperate problem on their hands until it is too late. Over and over again I have seen this division between parents. First one, then the other tries to avoid harshness, both hoping against hope they are not dealing with a child who will turn out to be a criminal.

"Whether adequate discipline and firmness at a very early age would have changed the picture here is, of course, very difficult to say.

"It might easily be true that the parents were dealing with the 'bad seed.' Studies conducted by Sheldon and Eleanor Glueck, of the Harvard Law School, revealed that in 60 per cent of their cases the tendency toward delinquency showed up by the age of six. If discipline and training are to be brought to bear on the child, they must be started early. But there is no assurance that if one did start early, one would necessarily succeed.

"A number of parents might benefit from this story. It might give them courage to take firmer steps to break up odd patterns of behavior which manifest themselves early—even though they may not be raising criminals. The story of indulgence by first one and then the other of the parents is a typical story about the delinquent boy or girl.

"There are a lot of wasted lives which might be corrected if parents would take a firmer stand early."

WILLIAM PAHLMANN ASSOCIATES

Beautifully painted, silk-lined cabinet houses a charming mixture of old fans and antique china. A most decorative and original collection, it includes exotic Chinese and painted French fans, also examples in rose-point lace and in ivory. English and French porcelains mingle with pieces of Oriental Lowestoft against this pretty background of unusual fans.

Small, cherished objects can be handsomely arrange in bookcases, break fronts, cabinets, on tabletops.

SHELF COLLE

Architectural banks are great fun to collect. Of painted metal, some are inscribed with the names o

Part of actress Hermione Gingold's collection of blue glass is arranged on the top of a chest. Most of these are blue milk glass, some pieces are Bristol. The lettuces are particularly fascinating. Miss Gingold's arrangement of bead flowers provides height under one of her many charming pictures of children.

Here, an idea for powder room or foyer: coral and shells mingle on glass and brass shelves. China shells hold flowers.

A bookcase lined with gay striped fabric makes an amusing background for an assemblage of china cats. These are antique and new, imported and domestic; the collection includes a fat modern Scandinavian charmer, a group of semiprecious felines in amethyst, pink quartz and aventurine, and a large Staffordshire pair.

Very narrow hanging bookcase is an ideal place for this collection of soldiers. Top shelf holds modern English guardsmen; below are replicas of the coronation coach and entourage; underneath that there are four mounted knights, Scots Greys, and more guards, all contemporary.

Recessed shelves embellished with lovely old china can be one of the prettiest forms of decoration anywhere in the house. This collection features, from the top down: first shelf, Oriental Lowestoft platter and teapot, Vienna coffeepot and cup; second shelf, all Spode pieces; third shelf, Oriental Lowestoft pitcher and covered bowl, Spode plate, Worcester bowl, Vienna pot; fourth shelf, all Oriental Lowestoft except for shell-shaped Derby dish in center; bottom shelf, all Worcester except large bowl, which is a French copy of Oriental Lowestoft.

CTIONS

...s of the late 19th century.

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND Interior Decoration Editor

PHOTO BY OZZIE SWEET

PHOTOGRAPHS BY HAROLD FOWLER

ERIC SCHWAB

Mme. Marcelle Brunschwig, of Switzerland, was reared in a country which expects women to do nothing but stay home and look after the children. She did that, too, but when disaster struck she discovered that she possessed unexpected talents.

Some of the richest and most glamorous women in Europe and Asia are almost unknown in America. Here are

The Richest Women

By PETER BRIGGS and MARGARET PARTON

One of them owns the heart of a long-dead Scottish queen, the ghost of a mad ancestor and the skull of an ancient enemy. Another has a herd of wild boars, and forty diamond tiaras. A Spanish lady has, among other possessions, twenty-two letters Columbus wrote to his son; and an Indian businesswoman enshrines a pair of Mahatma Gandhi's sandals in her prayer room. One of the world's richest women almost owned the Brooklyn Dodgers, and another has possession of a secret treasure.

Outside their femininity, the only thing these women have in common with one another and such well-known Americans as Doris Duke and Barbara Hutton is money—lots of it. Most of them are richer than the Americans, and all control their own fortunes. One is a queen, and one an ex-queen. Two are of the nobility. One was a beauty queen and another was a chorus girl. And most of them by their lives indicate that money can bring the possessor many fascinating things—except, perhaps, happiness.

KEYSTONE PRESS

Rumor claims that a vast fortune was hidden away around the world by the wily Aga Khan III, spiritual leader of a Moslem sect of twenty millions who died in 1957—and that only his widow, the beautiful begum, knows the secret of the treasure. True or not, the begum has enough millions to be able to continue to live with her accustomed elegance, although she is now in semiretirement.

PICTORIAL PARADE

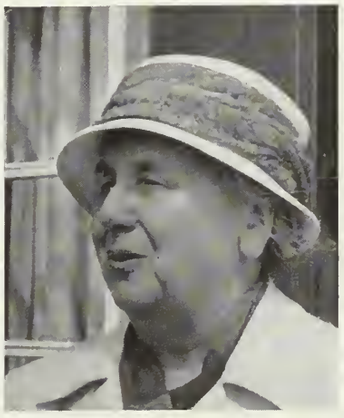
Monarchy may be disappearing in Europe, but the Netherlands and Great Britain each retains a queen of vast popularit and equally vast personal wealth. Juliana, who here welcomes Elizabeth II to the Netherlands, is independently wealth and also the daughter of possibly the richest woman in the world. Elizabeth is the wealthiest woman in her own kingdom her jewelry collection alone is thought to be worth around $150,000,000. To their subjects, this is only as it should b

...n the World

The richest woman in the world is probably former Queen Wilhelmina of the Netherlands, who retired in 1948 after fifty years as a ruling monarch. The exact extent of her wealth is a well-kept royal secret, but it is known that she holds important shares in Holland's largest bank, in its biggest trading firm and in the world-wide oil empire, Royal Dutch Shell. "It would take a big warehouse merely to contain the cases which hold her shares and bonds," says a family friend. If her holdings were turned into cash she would be worth (at a conservative estimate) more than $600,000,000.

Wilhelmina, who took the title of Princess when she abdicated to her daughter Juliana, owns an apartment house in Washington, D.C., and other real estate in the United States, Canada, Western Europe and South America. Last year she gave the nation 18,000 acres of land, complete with farms, homes and hotels. These will belong to the nation, but the income will go to her daughter.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 112



The richest woman in fabled Spain is the beautiful young 18th Duchess of Alba. She is a direct descendant of King James II of England, possesses more than forty lyrical Spanish titles and five palaces inherited from her father. Among other possessions are a duque (a type of carriage) and a favorite pair of American-bought blue jeans.

KEYSTONE PRESS

Nina Caroline Studley-Herbert, the Countess of Seafield, is the second richest woman in Great Britain. Her family history reaches back into mists of time; her father was the inspiration of one of America's most famous books for children; her own life resembles an improbable fairy tale. And if her hair had been a different color she might never have inherited the fabulous castles and great domains.

COMBINE

Former Queen Wilhelmina, 80, is sturdy example for thrifty Dutchmen and also possibly the world's wealthiest woman.

KEYSTONE PRESS

Suzanne Volterra, French millionairess, has a very special attitude toward the matter of luck. This may have something to do with the $40,000,000 she inherited, or possibly even the forty-five horses she thought she didn't want. Today she has 100 Thoroughbreds and quite a reputation on the track.

B.S.V. RAO

In India, where many women still remain behind the veil and close to home, Sumati Morarjee is conspicuous not only for her wealth but for the skillful management of one of her country's largest shipping companies. Her home, now a museum of art, once hid revolutionists; showing it to visitors, she proudly says, "Gandhi slept here."

By JOHN LATHAM TOOHEY

This story really starts with my friends the Sheffields, bless their pointy little heads. The city was hot and sticky, and I had an idea for a television script that I wanted to work on in peace and quiet. I had notions of fleeing to the country for two or three weeks, preferably to an air-conditioned villa. Surely one of my friends has such a villa, I reasoned. All my careful hints fell on flinty soil, though, until I came to the Sheffields.

"Why, you can go to Green Island, Timothy," said Marge. "We have a house there you'll just love, and we're not using it this summer. Of course it isn't the Pierre."

"Does it have all its buttons?" I asked. "Stove, refrigerator, running water?"

"It certainly does," said George Sheffield icily. "There are gradations between the Pierre and a foxhole, Timothy."

"No insult intended," I said. "I just know my limitations."

"Pooh," said Marge. "You writers and your imaginations. You only think you can't do things for yourself, Timothy."

A week and a half later, when a taxi deposited me on a wharf in Rockland, I was carrying a typewriter, a suitcase, and a wicker basket containing Potash and Perlmutter, my Siamese cats. Potash is an old banker-type cat, jowly and sedate, while Perlmutter is altogether different, a lithe, nervous dandy. They had been cooped up all day in the basket, and it was hot. One whiff of the fragrant fish smell of the wharf and Perlmutter began howling, and pacing up and down inside the basket.

"What you got in thayuh?" asked the taxi driver.

"Cats," I said briefly.

"I wouldn't keep no cats in no box all day," said the driver.

"They love it," I said. "The big one brings me the box in his teeth." CONTINUED ON PAGE 135

the playboy and

WHAT CAN A MAN EXPECT FROM A GIRL WHO'S A PLUMBER, ELECTRICIAN AND AN ALL-AROUND HANDY MAN?

"You've got fourteen minutes of your hour left," P. J. said.
"I'll bet the kitchen is a mess.
I'll bet you didn't even make your bed."

the plumber

"I weighed 320 pound. then lost 160"

By cutting her weight in half, Shirley Hambrick, housewife and mother of two daughters, has more than doubled her prospects of future happiness and good health. She says, "Absolute determination to stick to my diet, a friendly, interested doctor and, most of all, a loving and understanding family—those were the 'big three' behind my success story." By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor

Poor me—poor chair— 320

Same chair, but now you can begin to see it—I'm down to a mere 289

I'm beginning to feel like a sylph. 182

Same chair, but I can share it with my daughter, Diana 16

One day in May, 1957, 320-pound Shirley Hambrick, feeling unusually nervous and irritable, telephoned her doctor to ask him to prescribe a pill for her jitters. Her own doctor was out of town and his associate, never having met Mrs. Hambrick, explained that he couldn't prescribe over the telephone for a patient he didn't know, but that if she would stop by he would be glad to see her.

Startled at the sight of grossly overweight Shirley, and horrified at her blood pressure (280 over 150), the doctor ordered her into a hospital the same day. "Diet or die" was the frightening diagnosis. Hospitalized, Shirley subsisted on a 500-calorie-a-day diet supplemented with prescribed amounts of vitamins and minerals. When thorough examinations and tests showed that aside from problems caused by her obesity there was nothing else wrong, she was released in 17 days.

Shirley was told to continue her 500-calorie diet for three months, after which her doctor would raise it to between 700 and 800 calories a day. During her 23 months of dieting, she never ate beyond 800 calories' worth of food a day—and reduced to 160 pounds.

At the end of the diet, Shirley's doctor suggested that she gradually increase her food allotments, weigh herself regularly, and find out how far she could go—in calories—to maintain her new weight. The answer, for Shirley, is between 1200 and 1500 calories a day for maintenance. If she goes over this, the scales tell on her.

"For years," says Shirley, "I suffered through the humiliation and embarrassment with which all fatties are familiar. I was ridiculed, pitied, whispered about, snubbed, sniekered at wherever I went. My personal feelings bounced back and forth from shame to remorse to that chip-on-the-shoulder feeling: 'It's nobody's business what I do—I'll eat all I want.'

"But the worst—the really worst—moment in my life came when I was to weigh in at the hospital. One scale wouldn't accommodate me. Imagine the chagrin I felt when another scale was brought in and I was told to stand, one foot on each scale, for an accurate weight-taking!

"Obviously I will always have to watch what I eat," Shirley adds. "But that is scant price to pay for my new-found happiness and health, my sense of pride, and the glances and words of real admiration I receive from my family and friends."

BEFORE AND AFTER MEASUREMENTS

	MAY, 1957	APRIL, 1959
HEIGHT	5′6½″	5′6½″
WEIGHT	320 pounds	160 pounds
BUST	52″	38″
WAIST	49″	29″
HIPS	60″	40″
UPPER ARM	17″	11″
FOREARM	12″	9¼″
THIGH	30″	21″
CALF	17″	12½″
ANKLE	9½″	7¾″
NECK	17″	13″
DRESS SIZE	52 plus	16–18

JOHN ENGSTEAD

Sample diet days—one day each for 500 calories, 700–800 calories and 1200–1500 calories (for maintenance). Vitamin and mineral supplements were used throughout Mrs. Hambrick's entire diet. Nutritional requirements vary with the individual. The JOURNAL advises each person contemplating a reducing diet to have his or her own doctor plan it.

500 CALORIES A DAY

BREAKFAST	CALORIES
Orange juice (4 oz.)	55
Toast (½ slice, plain)	30
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)	85
Coffee, plain	0
	170

LUNCHEON
Bouillon (1 cup)	10
Roast lamb (1 slice)	100
Cauliflower (½ cup)	15
Tea or coffee, plain	0
	125

DINNER
Cottage cheese (¼ cup)	55
Lettuce-and-tomato salad	30
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)	85
Cantaloupe (½)	35
Tea or coffee, plain	0
	205

Total calories for day 500

700–800 CALORIES A DAY

BREAKFAST	CALORIES
½ orange	40
Poached egg (1)	75
Toast (1 slice, plain)	60
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)	85
Coffee, plain	0
	260

LUNCHEON
Cottage cheese (½ cup)	110
with dietetic canned apricots (½ cup) and lettuce	35
Nonfat milk (8 oz.)	85
Tea or coffee, plain	0
	230

DINNER
Consommé (½ cup)	10
Veal roast (average serving)	200
Fresh green beans (½ cup)	15
Lettuce salad with lemon juice	15
Fresh strawberries (10)	45
Tea or coffee, plain	0
	285

Total calories for day 775

1200–1500 CALORIES A DAY (MAINTENANCE)

BREAKFAST	CALORIES
Grapefruit juice (4 oz.)	50
Scrambled egg (1) in tsp. butter	105
Toast lightly buttered	95
Coffee, plain	0
	250

LUNCHEON
Broiled whitefish, lemon juice	185
Fresh asparagus	30
Sliced tomatoes and cucumbers	40
Whole milk (8-oz. glass)	165
Apple (fresh)	75
	495

DINNER
Broiled steak (average serving)	295
Baked potato (95) with tsp. butter (35)	130
Large tossed green salad, diet dressing	30
Fresh fruit gelatin	90
Tea or coffee, plain	0
	545

Total calories for day 1290

...aReached— 160

Young Woman's World of Fashion...

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Who is she... the young woman in the tweed suit boarding a plane for a university campus, or a bus that takes her to a tall glass skyscraper, or a suburban train city-bound for shopping? College girl, secretary, career girl or young wife—many of her fashions are much the same. You'll see her also in a reversible coat or a gray chinchilla, in a silhouette-making black dress... and always and forever at some point in her beloved sweater and skirt—the insignia of young America.

By Wilhela Cushman
Fashion Editor

College

Gail Jarvis, Vassar '60, summers at home in Venezuela, returns to a New York career in the fall. This plaid wool jacket dress by Dan Keller is ideal for travel or business—a date dress without its jacket.

HANDBAG BY OSCAR WOLF

Secretary

Miss Nadine Cannon, secretary to Mr. Arthur H. Watson, president of IBM World Trade Corporation, likes a gray chinchilla coat by Dan Millstein because it goes with daytime wools, and with black at night.

HANDBAG BY HARRY JASON

Judy Ann Phillips, class of '60 at the University of Miami, now Mrs. William Murphy, of Cincinnati, looks for a wool dress with a new silhouette. The checked tweed by Robert Crystal worn with a reversible coat.

COAT BY MAURICE SUNDERLAND

Young Woman's World of Fashion...

Gold tweed suit with a cotton blouse by Ted Fell for a college or career girl or a newly married. Mrs. William Murphy wears it.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

Sara Hunter, tall blond junior at Sarah Lawrence College, wears the flame tweed suit designed by Stefan, a stitched velvet beret by Janet Sloane, carries out brown accessories in her gloves, bag and pumps.

Young Married

Mr. and Mrs. Hillar Sarepera, married their senior year (he at Rutgers, she at Douglass), will come to New York to begin careers this fall. Her reversible topcoat matches her tweed dress by Frank Adams.

Miss Nadine Cannon likes bright wool dresses at the office, usually wears a single piece of jewelry and a watch. This sapphire-blue wool with unpressed pleats by Morgan Fauth.

Career

Helaine Carlin, class of '64 at Hunter College, prefers the amber colors. With her box-pleated skirt she wears a brushed wool-and-mohair sweater with tied belt, by Mr. Mort.

College

Sara Hunter chooses a clan-plaid wool dress by Pendleton for campus or weekends. Comfort is top specification and this dress, cut like a shirt and softly sashed, takes honors. A red overarm handbag by Roger Van S.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

the long and the short of a coat design

By NORA O'LEARY Pattern Editor

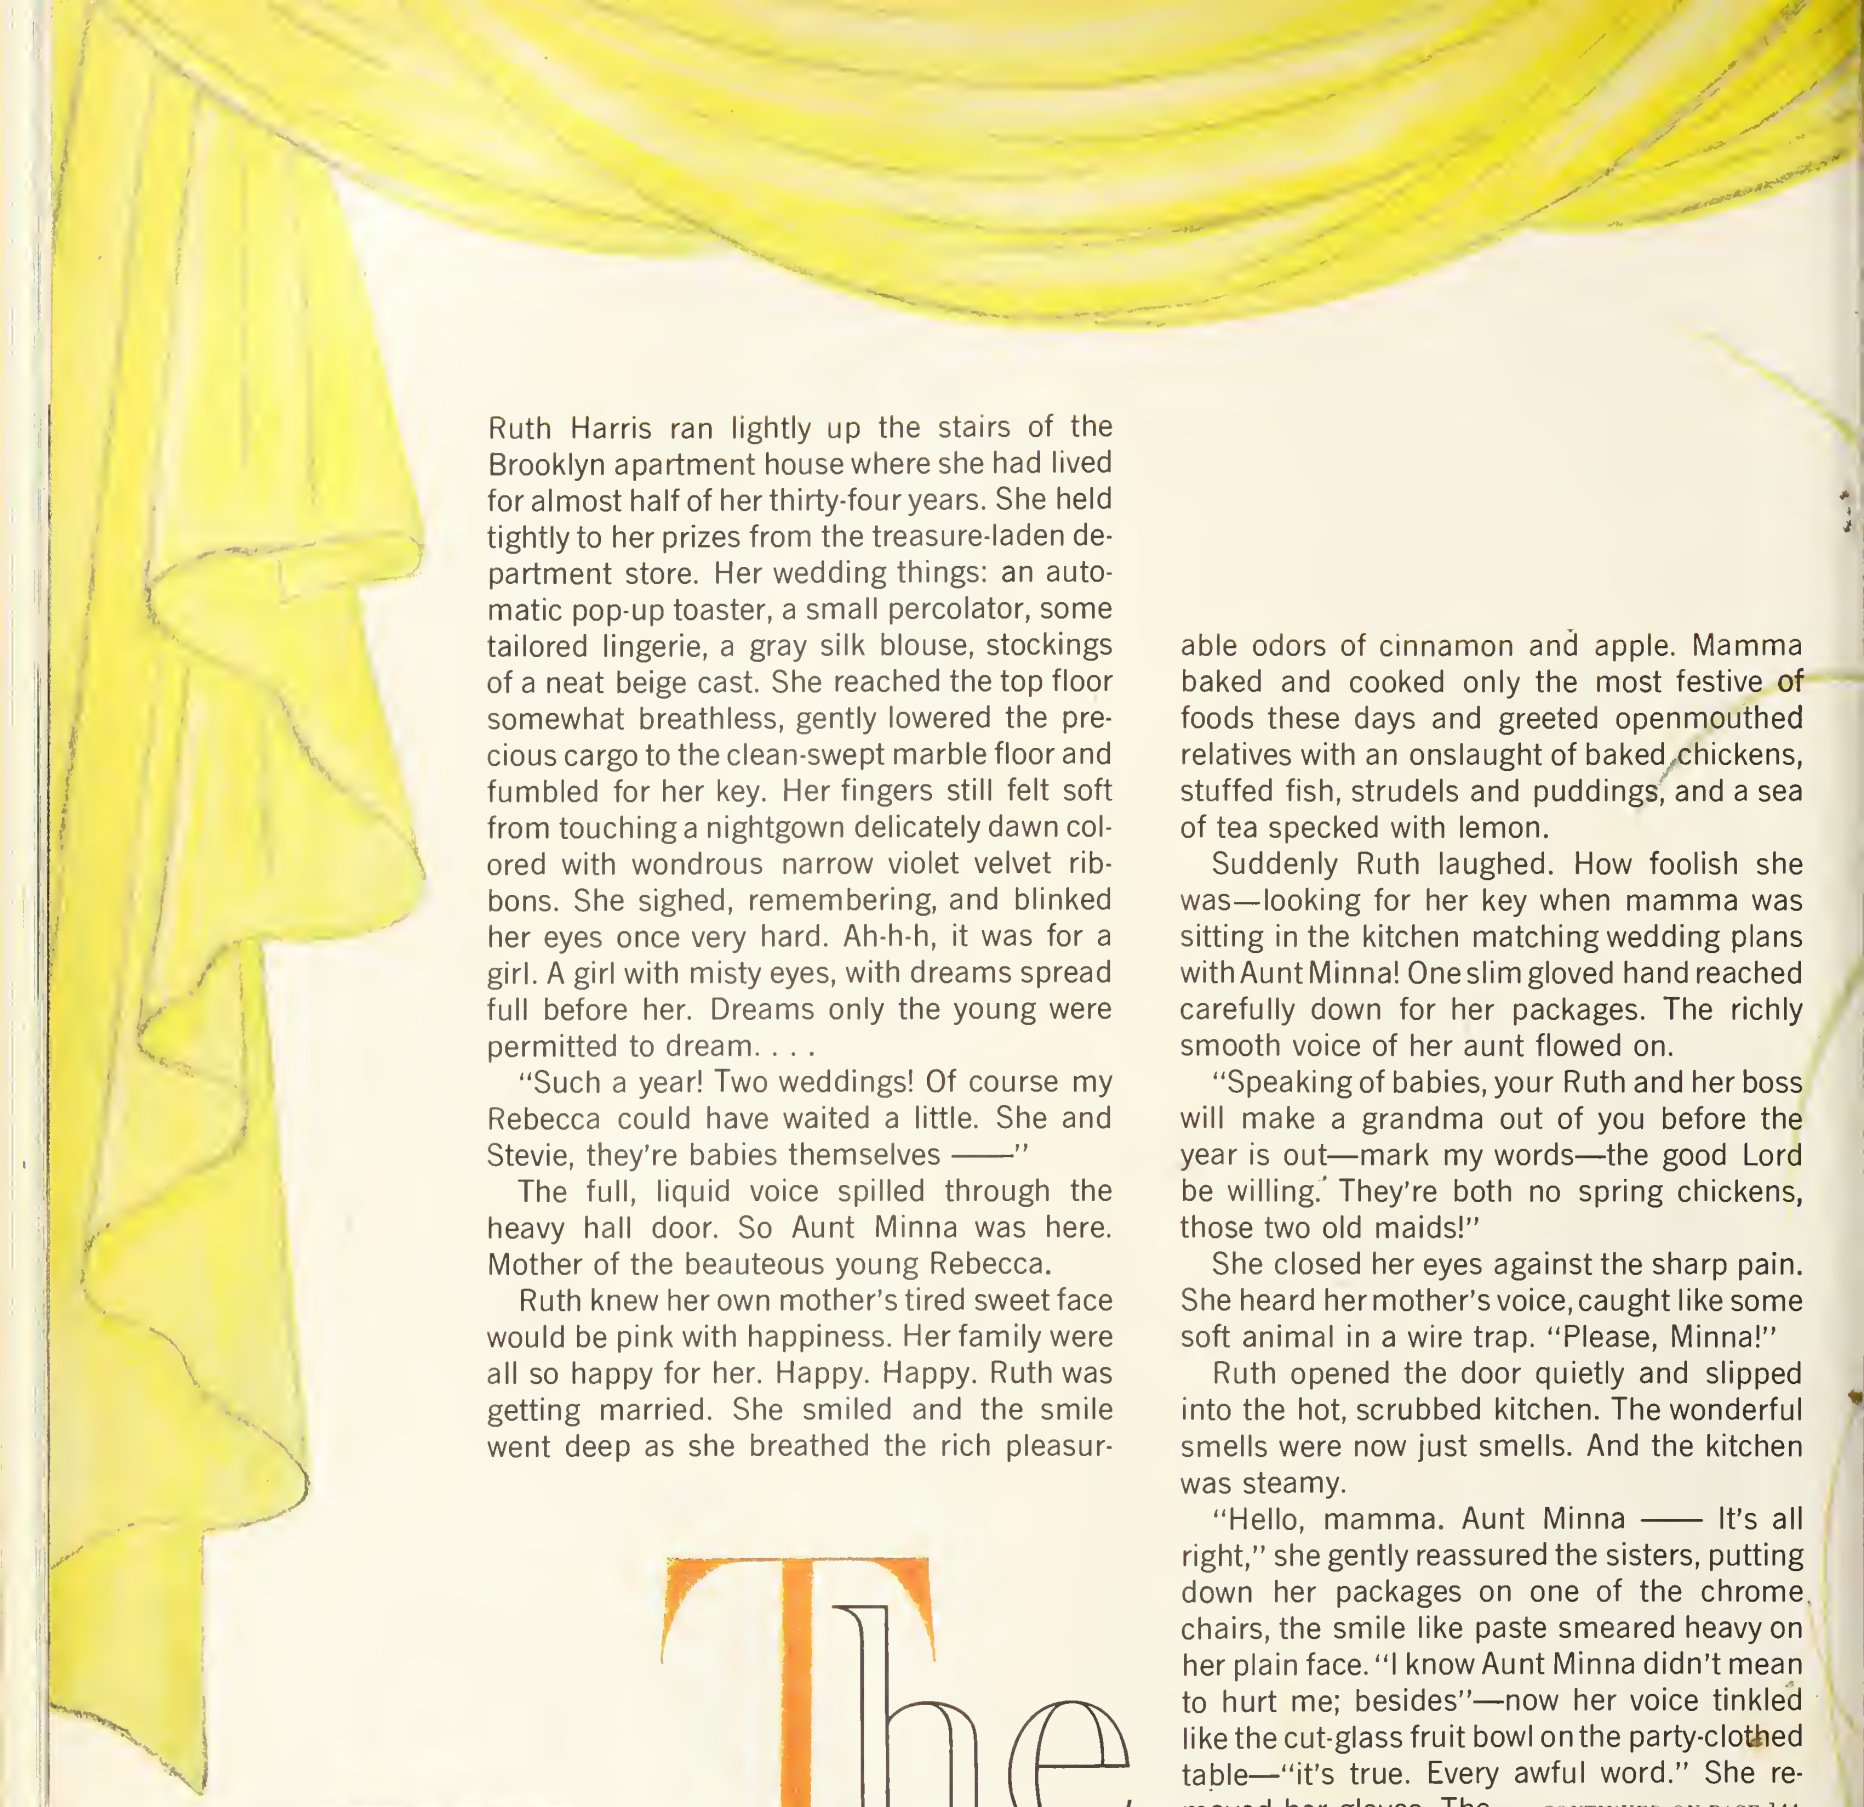
If you are looking for a full-length coat, what could be prettier or more in fashion than our rich gold fleece on the opposite page? The color is surprisingly wearable and pretty over a matching jersey dress or over deeper tones. And if a costume look is more to your liking, the same coat design can be made three-quarter length. This has special appeal if you choose a dramatic combination of fabrics like beige tweed lined in a leopard-fur fabric. Add a matching skirt and an overblouse to complete the effect. The short plaid coat (this, too, is from the same pattern) with a slim basic dress underneath is a perfect costume for first fall days. Your dress could pick up any one of the pretty shades of the plaid. All the coats are made from Vogue Design No. 5082. The gold dress is Vogue Design No. 9998. The beige skirt, Design No. 9593. The overblouse, Design No. 9706; and the lavender dress is Design No. 9988.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 140. Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Calif. and Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 10c additional for each pattern ordered. © Vogue

PHOTOGRAPHY BY LEOMBRUNO-BODI

HAT BY EMME

Combine beige tweed with a dramatic leopard-fur-fabric lining.



HAT BY MR. JOHN

A beautiful plaid with a slim color-co-ordinated basic dress.

A marvelous monotone combination in gold fleece over matching jersey.

BAG BY RICHARD KORET HAT BY MICHAEL WINTER

The Wedding

THE Journal PRESENTS FOR THE FIRST TIME IN ANY MAGAZINE

Lilly Gordon Einstein

GUARD WELL YOUR DREAMS; SOMEDAY THEY MAY COME TRUE.

Ruth Harris ran lightly up the stairs of the Brooklyn apartment house where she had lived for almost half of her thirty-four years. She held tightly to her prizes from the treasure-laden department store. Her wedding things: an automatic pop-up toaster, a small percolator, some tailored lingerie, a gray silk blouse, stockings of a neat beige cast. She reached the top floor somewhat breathless, gently lowered the precious cargo to the clean-swept marble floor and fumbled for her key. Her fingers still felt soft from touching a nightgown delicately dawn colored with wondrous narrow violet velvet ribbons. She sighed, remembering, and blinked her eyes once very hard. Ah-h-h, it was for a girl. A girl with misty eyes, with dreams spread full before her. Dreams only the young were permitted to dream. . . .

"Such a year! Two weddings! Of course my Rebecca could have waited a little. She and Stevie, they're babies themselves ——"

The full, liquid voice spilled through the heavy hall door. So Aunt Minna was here. Mother of the beauteous young Rebecca.

Ruth knew her own mother's tired sweet face would be pink with happiness. Her family were all so happy for her. Happy. Happy. Ruth was getting married. She smiled and the smile went deep as she breathed the rich pleasurable odors of cinnamon and apple. Mamma baked and cooked only the most festive of foods these days and greeted openmouthed relatives with an onslaught of baked chickens, stuffed fish, strudels and puddings, and a sea of tea specked with lemon.

Suddenly Ruth laughed. How foolish she was—looking for her key when mamma was sitting in the kitchen matching wedding plans with Aunt Minna! One slim gloved hand reached carefully down for her packages. The richly smooth voice of her aunt flowed on.

"Speaking of babies, your Ruth and her boss will make a grandma out of you before the year is out—mark my words—the good Lord be willing. They're both no spring chickens, those two old maids!"

She closed her eyes against the sharp pain. She heard her mother's voice, caught like some soft animal in a wire trap. "Please, Minna!"

Ruth opened the door quietly and slipped into the hot, scrubbed kitchen. The wonderful smells were now just smells. And the kitchen was steamy.

"Hello, mamma. Aunt Minna —— It's all right," she gently reassured the sisters, putting down her packages on one of the chrome chairs, the smile like paste smeared heavy on her plain face. "I know Aunt Minna didn't mean to hurt me; besides"—now her voice tinkled like the cut-glass fruit bowl on the party-clothed table—"it's true. Every awful word." She removed her gloves. The CONTINUED ON PAGE 144

vat the big hullabaloo
ding," he said.
I thought I'd never
v—I want it now."

Looking over the President's Shoulder

Good-by to the White House after 21 years as butler there—

by Alonzo Fields

CONCLUSION

The Trumans moved back to the newly renovated White House in March of 1952. It had been a tough job putting the old place back into shape. Though there were many fine improvements, the house looked the same. Care had been taken so that everything would be an exact likeness of the original rooms. I suppose the biggest change was in the State Dining Room. The old English oak-paneled walls had been tinted green instead of their original stain. Many of us were apprehensive about this, but once you saw the change it surprised you how much it added to the room. With the new Truman china, the same shade of green and gold, placed on white damask linen it added brightness to this room which is inclined to be dark and somber.

We christened the new dining room with a luncheon for Queen Juliana of the Netherlands. She and Prince Bernhard were not strangers to us, for during their exile in Canada during the war we had often had them as off-the-record guests. Her Majesty was just as charming as ever and had developed a graciousness and poise suitable to the ruler of a country.

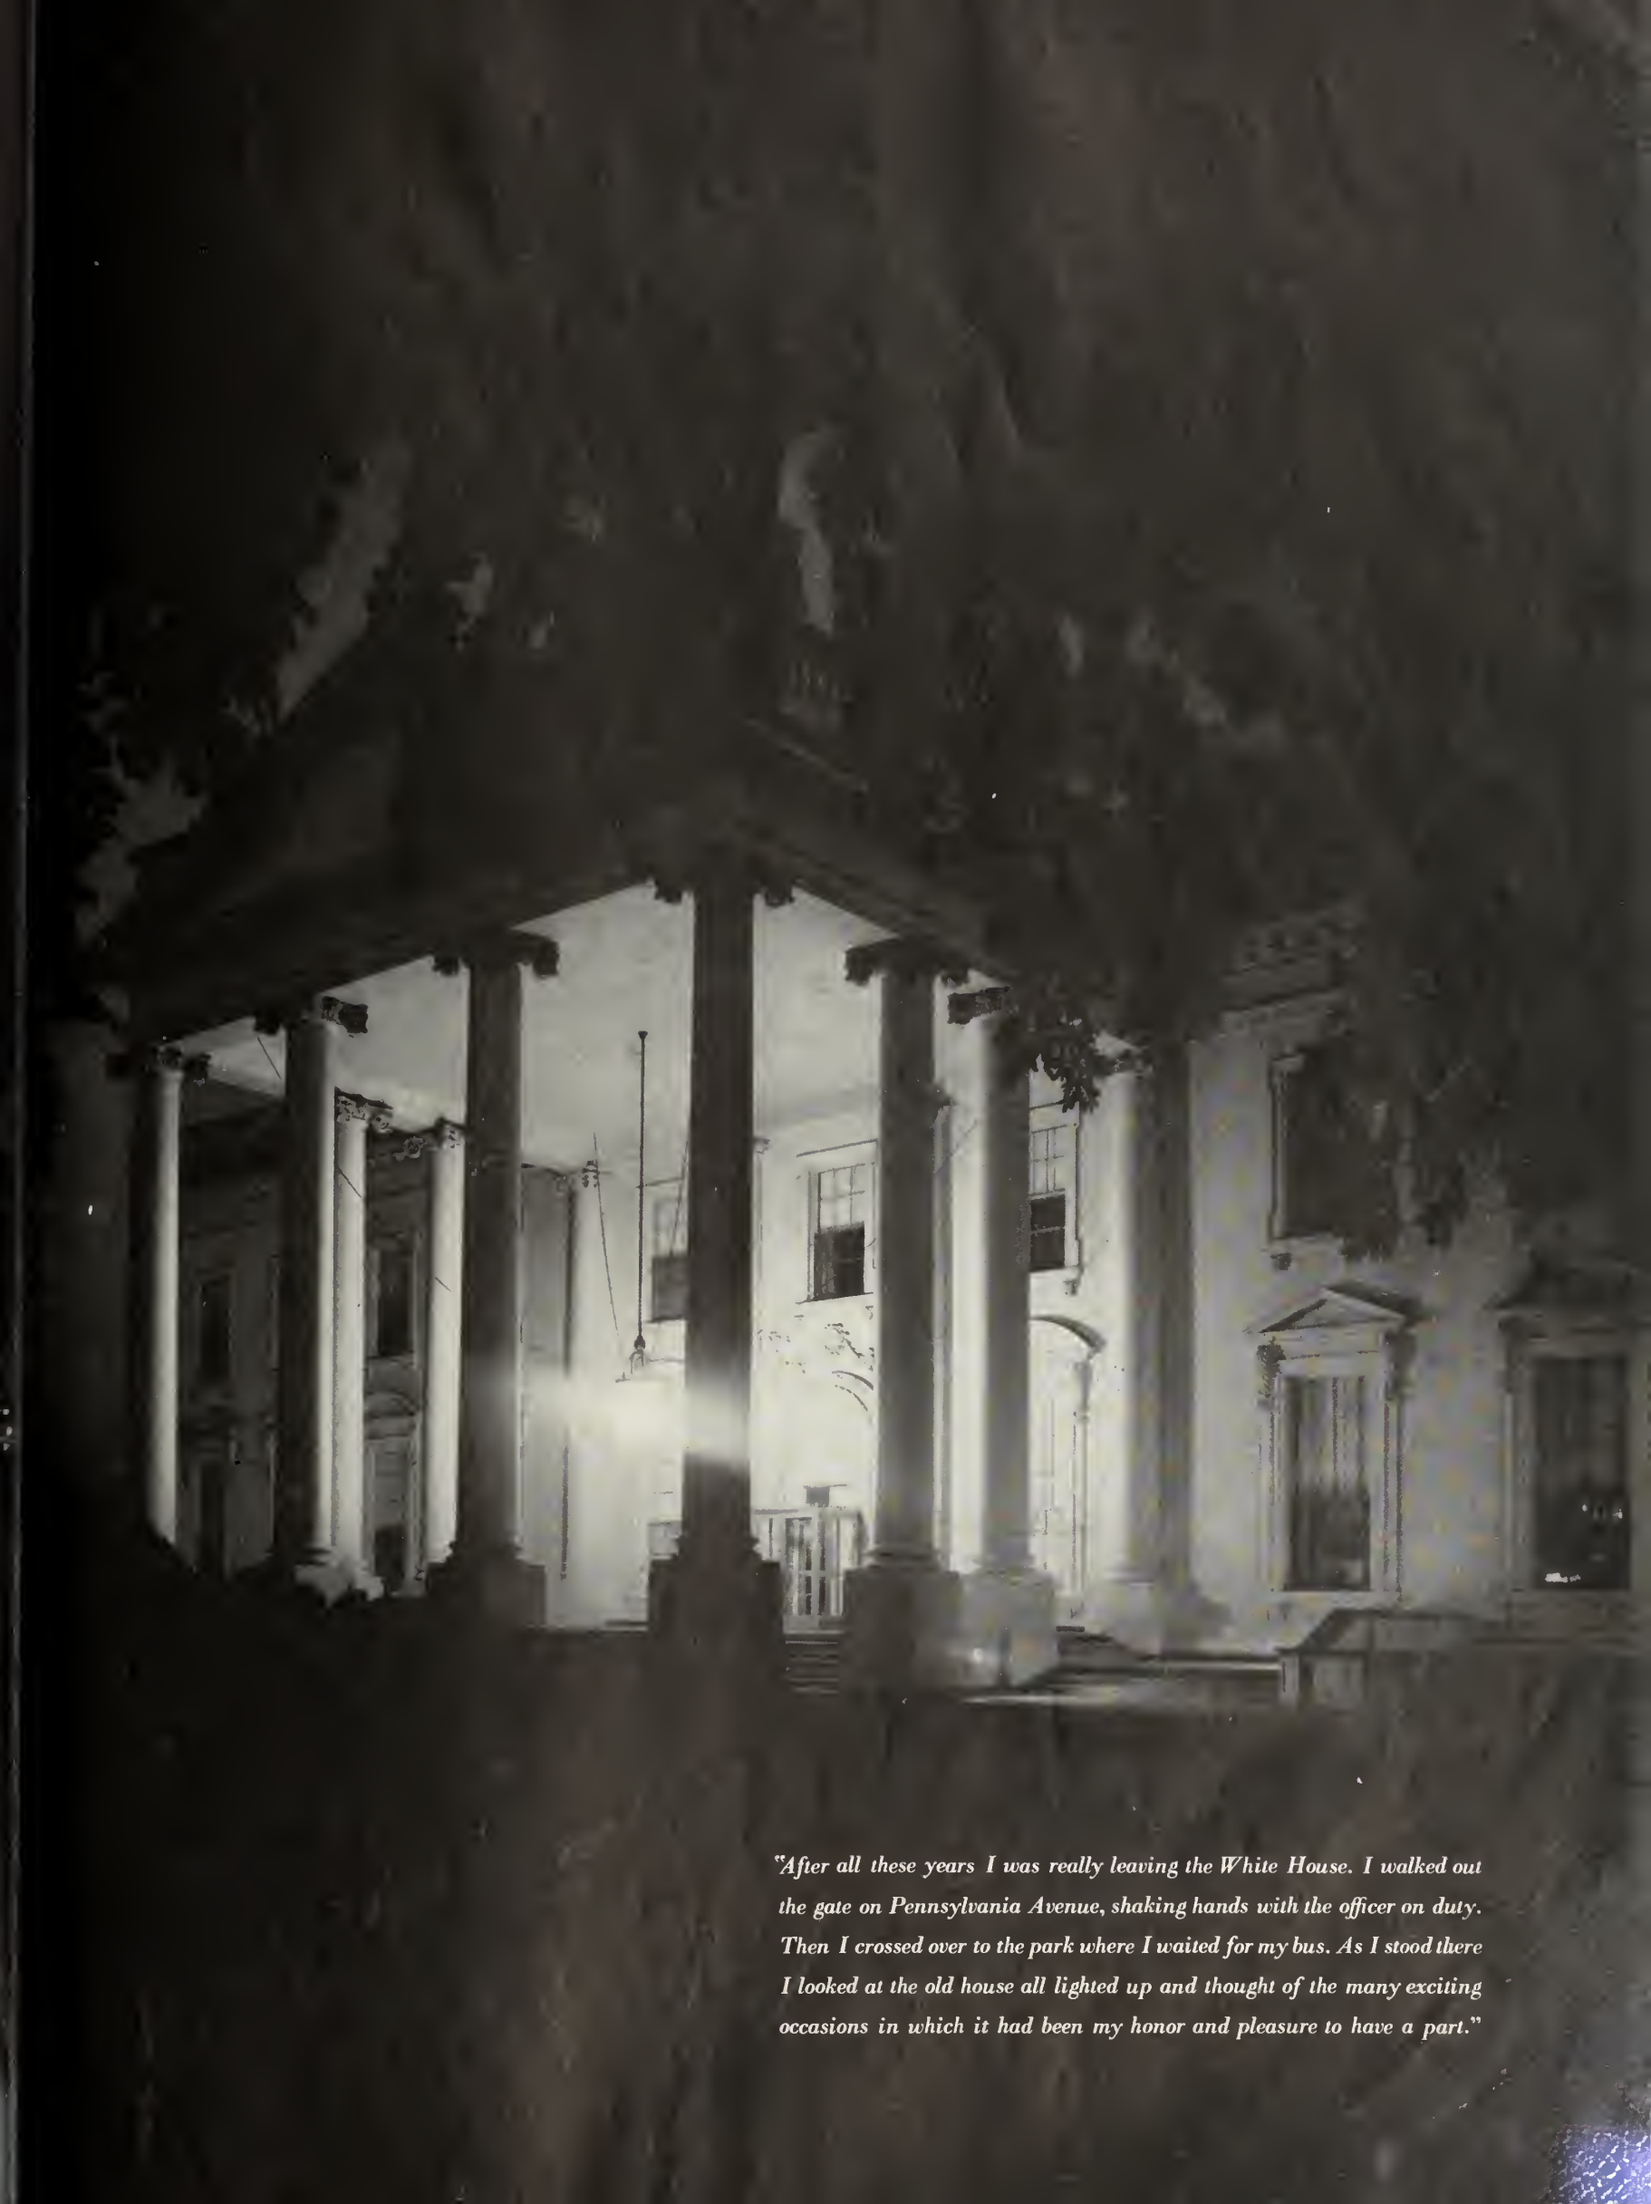
Saturday, April 5, the royal party was scheduled to leave the airport at 9:15. Breakfast was to be served for her Majesty and the CONTINUED ON PAGE 129

© 1960 by Alonzo Fields

COURTESY NATIONAL PARK SERVICE

"As we went over the menus the day Governor Stevenson was expected, President Truman said he wanted me to meet the Democratic candidate. I was fascinated with the warmth of the governor's handshake and his friendly eyes."

EUROPEAN



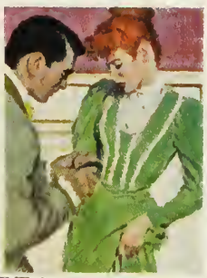
"Mrs. Eisenhower visited Mrs. Truman according to custom, but made no tour to meet the staff. The transformation from one Administration to another is as sudden as death. You serve breakfast to a family with whom you have spent years; at noon they are gone and here are new faces, new likes and dislikes."

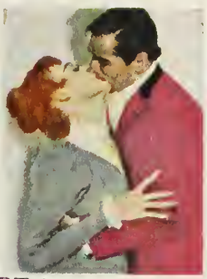
The First Lady samples a presidential birthday cake. The Eisenhowers had "trays for their family dinners—with TV paneled in the walls to watch."

JAMES MAHAN

COURTESY NATIONAL PARK SERVICE

"After all these years I was really leaving the White House. I walked out the gate on Pennsylvania Avenue, shaking hands with the officer on duty. Then I crossed over to the park where I waited for my bus. As I stood there I looked at the old house all lighted up and thought of the many exciting occasions in which it had been my honor and pleasure to have a part."





PART 1

PART 2

PART 3

PART 4

The MISTRESS of MELLYN

BY VICTORIA HOLT

I was afraid, more afraid than I had ever been since I came to this house. The body of Sir Thomas Treslyn, who had died after supping at Mount Mellyn, was to be exhumed. People were suspicious of the manner in which he died, and as a result there had been anonymous letters. Why should they be suspicious? Because his wife wanted him out of the way; and it was known that Connan and Linda Treslyn had been lovers. There had been two obstacles to their union—Alice and Sir Thomas. Both had died suddenly.

But Connan had no wish to marry Lady Treslyn. He was in love with me.

A terrible thought had struck me. Did Connan know that there was to be this exhumation? Had I been living in a fool's paradise? Was I being used by a cynic? Why did I not use the harsher word? Was I being used by a murderer?

I would not believe it. I loved Connan. I had sworn to be faithful to him all my life. How could I make such a vow and then believe the worst of him at the first crisis?

I could see that the household was divided between two topics of conversation: the exhumation of Sir Thomas and the proposed marriage of the master and the governess.

I was afraid to meet the stern eyes of Mrs. Polgrey, the lewd ones of Tapperty and the excited ones of his daughters. Did they, as I had begun to do, connect these two events?

I asked Connan what he thought of the Treslyn affair.

"Mischiefmakers," he said. "They'll have an autopsy and find he died a natural death. His doctor always told him that he must expect to go off like that."

"It must be very worrying for Lady Treslyn."

"She will not worry unduly. Indeed, since she has been pestered by letter writers she may well be relieved to have the matter brought to a head."

I pictured the medical experts. They would no doubt be men who knew the Treslyns and Connan. As Connan was going to marry me—and he was very eager to spread the news—was it possible that they would approach the matter in a different spirit from that in which they would if they believed Lady Treslyn was eager to marry again?

Who could say?

I must drive away these terrible thoughts. I would believe in Connan. I had to; if I did not, I must face the fact that I had fallen in love with a murderer.

The invitations for the ball had gone out. Lady Treslyn, being in mourning and with the autopsy pending, was of course not invited. It was to take place only four days after our return from Penlandstow.

Celestine and Peter Nansellock rode over the day before the ball.

Celestine put her arms about me and kissed me. "My dear," she said, "how happy I am. I have watched you with Alvean and I know what this is going to mean to her." There were tears in her eyes. "Alice would be so happy." CONTINUED ON PAGE 99

CONCLUSION

A voice said, "My darling—my darling." It was Connan's voice, and I knew that a miracle had happened.

© 1960 BY VICTORIA HOLT. THE COMPLETE NOVEL IS SOON TO BE PUBLISHED BY DOUBLEDAY & CO., INC.

DI PIETRO

There's magic in a casserole, it's elegant, yet so easy to prepare!

I LOVE LEARNING TO COOK

By JOANNE WOODWARD

as told to JEAN ANDERSON

When I was growing up in Georgia, my whole life was acting. I don't ever remember cooking or being much interested in it. Then in 1952 when I set out for New York, my father slipped a cookbook into my suitcase, and I think that's what got me started, plus the fact that I was on my own for the first time in my life and had to cook. I wasn't much good at it. My first party was disastrous because I decided to make an asparagus pie which I'd read about. I don't think I've ever seen anything so ghastly, but my guests were polite and brave and ate it all.

My husband, Paul Newman, and I like to entertain, although we don't have enough time for it. When we're in New York, Sunday is our only day and dinner is our time for company. In California it works a bit differently. Sunday is still the day, but life moves more casually and we generally serve buffet brunches. I like to try new recipes on guests, which horrifies my mother. She says a good cook would never dream of such a thing. She also has never recovered from the dinner I gave Paul says my hollandaise sauce is the best he's ever eaten. I often serve it because the recipe is almost foolproof. With us, the simpler the salad the better—just cool crisp greens, oil-and-vinegar dressing.

STUART

recently for twenty. I had spent the entire afternoon in the dentist's chair, then raced home to prepare my favorite casserole—ham and chicken—which seems terribly gourmet but is very easy to make. The dinner was an enormous success in spite of my spur-of-the-moment cooking.

Many of our friends serve dinners with a theme—a Chinese meal authentic to the chopsticks, a German dinner. I've never been able to do this, so I like to think of my meals as kind of United Nations dinners.

Paul, who is an excellent cook himself and the charcoal-grill chef in our family, encouraged me to try gourmet recipes by giving me an elegant cookbook the Valentine's Day before we were married. Some of our favorite recipes are made of leftovers, however. I am a great miser about food—can't bear to throw anything away. And because we move about so much, we're often caught with a refrigerator of odds and ends. One morning I had only three packages of chicken livers, a little bacon, some mushrooms and half a loaf of bread. I put together a brunch which was quite mad, but the guests adored it: sautéed chicken livers with crisp bacon served in a sauce over toast.

This may sound as if I'm a haphazard cook, but I'm not. Actually, I am a great traditionalist about baking cakes. One of our favorites is like the famous Brown Derby grapefruit cake, a recipe that's a deep, dark secret. But I've worked out something rather similar.

I love to bake—especially soufflés. One night while I was pregnant and alone (Paul was doing Sweet Bird of Youth), I made a cheese soufflé and ate it all. I was still ravenous, so I made an orange soufflé and ate that one too. I was halfway through my third soufflé, a chocolate one, when Paul came in and finished it. Making soufflés is wonderfully soothing—there's just something about seeing them come out so puffed and light.

I've had great fun in my kitchen and have discovered that I do like to cook. I'm still beginner enough that many of my concoctions are crazy—"creative," we call them. Still, I'm learning—and loving it!

Grapefruit Cake

1½ cups sugar
1 tablespoon finely grated grapefruit rind
½ teaspoon finely grated lemon rind
¾ cup butter
3 eggs
3 cups cake flour
¾ teaspoon salt
3½ teaspoons baking powder
¼ teaspoon baking soda
½ cup grapefruit juice mixed with ½ cup water

Place sugar, grated rinds and butter in a mixing bowl and cream until very light and fluffy. Add eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Sift cake flour with salt, baking powder and soda. Divide mound of dry ingredients into 4 parts. Now add ¼ of dry ingredients to creamed mixture along with ⅓ of liquid ingredients and mix just enough to blend. Repeat twice, mixing lightly after each addition. Finally, mix in last ¼ of dry ingredients. Place equal quantities of batter in two greased 9″ layer-cake pans and bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for 30 minutes or until cake is browned and pulls from the sides of the pans. Run a spatula around edges of pans and let cakes cool about 10 minutes before inverting on wire racks. Cool layers and frost with fluffy grapefruit-cheese frosting.

Fluffy Grapefruit-Cheese Frosting

3 (3-oz.) packages cream cheese, softened
1 tablespoon softened butter
4 teaspoons finely grated grapefruit rind
1 teaspoon finely grated lemon rind
1 teaspoon finely grated orange rind
¼ teaspoon vanilla
6–6½ cups confectioners' sugar
Sections from 2 grapefruit and 2 oranges (garnish)

Cream cheese, butter, rinds and vanilla until fluffy. Now beat in sugar, a little at a time, until fluffy and of a good spreading consistency. Put together the 2 layers of grapefruit cake with a thin layer of frosting, then frost top and sides of cake, swirling the frosting around. Garnish with alternate grapefruit and orange sections around the top of the cake and with clusters of fruit at the base. This recipe makes enough to frost one 9″ two-layer cake.

Chicken-and-Ham Casserole

1 cup flour
1 tablespoon salt
1 teaspoon pepper
1¼ teaspoons powdered savory
4 chicken breasts, split (8 halves)
¼ pound butter
4 thin slices precooked ham
1 pound mushrooms, wiped (pick out 5 of the prettiest, slice them and chop the rest)
2 onions, peeled and chopped
1 clove garlic, peeled and crushed
1 tablespoon minced parsley
⅛ teaspoon mace
1 cup chicken broth (or ½ cup each chicken broth and dry sherry)
2 teaspoons light brown sugar
½ cup orange juice
2 heads Belgian endive, quartered (or 8 hearts of celery or lettuce)
1 (10-oz.) package frozen peas

Place flour, 2 teaspoons salt, 1 teaspoon pepper and 1 teaspoon savory in a paper bag and shake to blend. Now, lightly dredge the chicken breasts by shaking them in the seasoned flour. Brown chicken in ¼ cup melted butter, adding more butter as needed. When golden brown, remove chicken breasts and drain on paper toweling. Trim slices of ham of extra fat, cut in half lengthwise and roll up, securing with a toothpick. Brown ham lightly and drain on paper toweling. To the same skillet add remaining butter, if any, the chopped mushrooms, onions, garlic, parsley, ¼ teaspoon savory, 1 teaspoon salt, pinch pepper, mace, and sauté until mushrooms and onions are tender. Add chicken broth (and, if you like, the sherry), brown sugar and orange juice. Cook, stirring, for about 5 minutes. Now, as artistically as possible, arrange chicken breasts and ham rolls (remove toothpicks) in a large round shallow baking dish. Pour mushroom-onion mixture over all. Sauté the sliced mushrooms in a little butter and place these around the pieces of chicken and ham along with the quartered endive. Cover casserole tightly with aluminum foil and bake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for 1 hour. Remove foil, baste well with juices. Break frozen peas into clusters and place them in the casserole. Bake for about 15 minutes more, basting frequently, until peas are just done. Serve at once. Makes 6–8 servings.

Sautéed Chicken Livers

6 slices bacon
¼ cup butter
2 cups thinly sliced Bermuda onion
4 cups thinly sliced mushrooms
1 tablespoon chopped chives
1 teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
⅛ teaspoon cinnamon
½ teaspoon powdered rosemary
¼ teaspoon powdered savory
⅛ teaspoon chervil
1 pound chicken livers
1 cup beef consommé (or ½ cup each consommé and dry red wine)
2 teaspoons flour mixed with ¼ cup cold water
2 tablespoons chopped parsley
6 slices buttered whole-wheat toast cut diagonally in half

Cut bacon slices into 1″ lengths. Pan-broil until crisp and drain on paper toweling. Pour off drippings. In the same skillet melt the butter, add onion and mushrooms and sauté just until tender. Add all seasonings and the chicken livers and sauté slowly for about 10 minutes. Add consommé and, if you like, the wine, and simmer slowly 10–15 minutes more. Blend in flour-water paste and heat, stirring until thickened. Add chopped parsley and crisp bacon and serve immediately over hot buttered whole-wheat-toast points. Makes about 6 servings.

Joanne's Hollandaise

3 egg yolks
3 tablespoons cold water
Pinch pepper
½ pound butter, melted
1 tablespoon lemon juice
⅛ teaspoon salt

Beat yolks, water, salt and pepper in top of a double boiler until blended. Place over just-simmering water, heat and beat until mixture thickens and is custardlike—a minute or two. Turn heat to low and add butter, a tablespoonful at a time, beating all the while. When all butter is added, remove sauce from heat and stir in lemon juice. Serve hot over broccoli, cauliflower or asparagus. Makes about 1 cup sauce.

Just about perfect for a party is this golden casserole: tender chicken breasts, rolls of pink ham, mushrooms, onions, all in an herb-scented sauce. Guests adore it and I love a recipe so elegant and effortless. Our favorite sweet: moist and tender grapefruit cake frosted with a fruity cream-cheese frosting.

SALADS

COOL, SATISFYING, BEAUTIFUL

STUART-FOWLER

Vibrantly green, sweet and fresh to the palate—a cold, crisp salad is the perfect meal for a day of sparkling August sun. On the left, a dessert-salad of chilled strawberries, cantaloupe balls and frozen cream-cheese squares, served with a bouquet of Boston lettuce and tangy French dressing. (You might start the meal with a cup of hot chicken consommé, or a heartier hot soup.) A delectable chef's salad includes julienne strips of ham, tongue and turkey, and chilled raw vegetables, tossed with chutney dressing. (Try this one with hot garlic bread, lemon sherbet for dessert.) In the center, a French classic, Salade Niçoise, combines luscious chunks of tuna with cooked, crisp green beans, tomato wedges and anchovy curls, is served with a sharp mustard dressing. (And lots of hot, buttered corn on the cob as first course?) A molded honeydew-melon aspic is surrounded by bright watermelon balls, sections of fresh pineapple and avocado, and creamy Camembert dressing. (Buttered rolls, warm from the oven, with this?) Our Salad Valencienne (upper right) involves big cold shrimp and chicken chunks, bedded in curried rice, and a tart dressing. Finally, at lower right, the lobster salad to outshine them all, Spanish in origin, with potato cubes and jewel-green peas, turned gently in a spicy saffron dressing. More ideas and recipes for salad worshipers on Page 76.

SALADS

COOL, SATISFYING, BEAUTIFUL

SIDNEY KIRSTEIN

The ingredients for a wonderful salad are as varied as the imagination can make them!

SALAD VALENCIENNE

1½ cups rice (4 cups cooked)
1 teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon butter
3 chicken-bouillon cubes
¾ teaspoon curry powder
1 cup finely chopped water-cress leaves, chilled
Pinch pepper
2 cups cooked chicken meat, coarsely chopped and chilled
2 cups cooked, cleaned shrimp, coarsely chopped and chilled
1 head romaine, washed and chilled
2 stalks endive, washed and chilled

Dressing

½ cup vinegar
¼ cup olive or salad oil
¼ teaspoon garlic powder
1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
1 tablespoon finely cut fresh dill

Prepare the dressing by placing all the ingredients in the order listed in a jar an shaking well. Let stand at room temperature for an hour. Cook rice according t package directions, adding the salt, butter, chicken-bouillon cubes and curr powder to the water. Cool and chill. Toss together the rice, water cress and pepper Add the chicken and shrimp and toss again. Now add the well-mixed dressing a little a a time, and toss after each addition. Taste as you go; you may not need all the dress ing. Serve mounded in a bowl surrounded by romaine and endive. Decorate wit sprigs of water cress and a few whole shrimp, if you like. Makes 6 servings.

SPANISH LOBSTER SALAD

2½ cups cooked lobster meat, cut iato bite-size pieces
1½ cups cooked, cubed potatoes
1½ cups cooked peas
¾ cup Boston lettuce, washed and chilled
¾ cup romaine, washed and chilled
6 or 7 large ripe olives (garaish)

Saffron Dressing

1 cup mayonnaise
¼ cup lemon juice
⅛ teaspoon powdered saffron
1 tablespoon water
2½ teaspoons salt
¼ teaspoon white pepper
4 drops liquid pepper seasonin
2 tablespoons minced oaion
1 teaspoon prepared mustard

Chill the lobster, potatoes and peas. For the Saffron Dressing: Mix together th mayonnaise and lemon juice. Dissolve the saffron in the water. Add to the mayon naise with the remaining ingredients. Mix well. Shred the greens into a bowl. Ad the lobster, potatoes and peas and dressing. Toss lightly but thoroughly. Chill fo ¾ to 1 hour. Serve mounded with a frill of Boston lettuce. Garnish with olives Makes 4–6 servings.

SALADE NIÇOISE

2 cups cut, cooked fresh green beans, chilled, or 1 package (9 oz.) frozen cut green beans
3 cups Boston lettuce, washed and chilled
3 cups escarole, washed and chilled
2 cans (3 oz.) white meat tuna, drained and chilled
1 peeled cucumber, sliced thin and chilled
2 tomatoes, cut into wedges and chilled
1 can (2 oz.) rolled anchovies, drained and chilled

Mustard Dressing

¼ cup butter
¼ cup flour
2 cups milk
2 teaspoons salt
1 tablespoon sugar
4 teaspoons dry mustard
¼ cup water
¾ cup vinegar

Prepare the dressing first. Make a cream sauce with the butter, flour and milk. Add salt and sugar. Mix mustard and water to a smooth paste. Add to sauce. Beat in the vinegar. Cool and chill 2 hours. Mix well before serving. Cook the frozen beans according to package directions. Drain well. Plunge into ice water. Drain and chill. Arrange the greens in a large bowl. Pile chunks of tuna in the center. Place cucumber fanwise round the tuna. Arrange beans in mounds. Add tomatoes and garnish with anchovies. Serve with Mustard Dressing. Makes 6 servings. 3 cups dressing.

FRUIT SALAD WITH FROZEN CHEESE SQUARES

3 packages (3 oz.) cream cheese
¾ cup mayonnaise
2 tablespoons lemon juice
1 teaspoon salt
1 envelope unflavored gelatin
3 tablespoons water
1 can (1 lb. 4½ oz.) crushed pineapple
¼ cup finely chopped, seeded green pepper
1 tablespoon grated onion
¾ cup heavy cream
2 pints strawberries, washed, hulled and chilled
4 cups cantaloupe balls, chilled
4 cups grapefuit sections, chilled
4 cups orange sections, chilled
6–8 cups assorted salad greens, washed and chilled

Let cheese soften at room temperature. Beat until smooth. Add mayonnaise, lemo juice and salt. Beat again. Heat gelatin and water until gelatin dissolves. Drain syru from pineapple and add it to gelatin. Beat into cheese mixture. Stir in pineapple green pepper and onion. Whip cream until thick and shiny. Fold into cheese mix ture. Pour into freezing trays to a depth of 1½". Freeze until very firm but no solid. Cut into 16 squares. Arrange on a platter alternately with strawberries, melo balls, grapefruit and orange sections. Place a bowl of assorted salad greens in th center. Serve with your favorite French dressing. Makes 8 servings.

MOLDED MELON ASPIC

2 or 3 very ripe medium-size honeydew melons
3 envelopes unflavored gelatin
¼ cup lemon juice
4 cups watermelon balls, chilled
2 avocados
4 fresh peaches peeled and sliced, or 2 packages (12 oz.) frozen peaches, thawed, drained and chilled
1 cups fresh pineapple chunks, chilled
3 cups chicory, washed and chilled

Camembert Dressing

4 ounces Camembert cheese
1 package (8 oz.) cream cheese
⅓ cup tarragon vinegar
⅓ cup buttermilk
Pinch white pepper
½ teaspoon sugar

Remove seeds from melons and scoop out all soft flesh into a bowl. Purée in a blender or food mill. Put through a medium-fine sieve; discard what will not go through. Heat gelatin and ½ cup melon purée until gelatin dissolves. Add gelatin mixture and 1½ teaspoons lemon juice to 3½ cups melon purée. Mix well. Pour into a 1-quart mold. Chill until firm. Peel and remove pits from avocados. Slice, place in remaining lemon juice and chill. Prepare the dressing. Allow the cheeses to soften at room temperature. Beat until well blended. Then beat in the vinegar, buttermilk, pepper and sugar. Strain to remove Camembert rind Cover and chill for an hour. Beat again just before serving. Unmold the melon mixture on a platter. Tear chicory into small pieces and arrange round base of mold. Place separate mounds of each fruit on the chicory. Serve with Camembert dressing. Makes 6 servings. 2 cups dressing.

CHEF'S SALAD WITH CHUTNEY DRESSING

1 cup julienne strips boiled or baked ham
1 cup julienne strips cooked smoked tongue
1 cup julienne strips cooked white meat turkey
1 cup julienne strips Swiss cheese
1 can (3¾ oz.) boned sardines, drained
4 cups assorted salad greens, washed and chilled
1 cup peeled, cubed cucumber, chilled
1 cup shredded, scraped carrots, chilled
1 cup cauliflowerets, chilled
6 radishes, sliced, chilled
6 mushrooms, peeled, thinly sliced and chilled
1 red onion, peeled and thinly sliced
Radish roses (garnish)

Chutney Dressing

1 cup mayonnaise
1 cup chili sauce
¼ cup chopped chutn
2 teaspoons grated onion
½ cup heavy cream

Chill the meats, cheese and sardines. Mix all the dressing ingredients together the order listed. Chill for an hour. To serve: shred the salad greens and place i large bowl. Arrange meats, cheese and sardines in separate mounds on the gree Pile the cucumber in the center. Toss the remaining vegetables together and arra on the greens. Garnish with radish roses. Serve with Chutney Dressing. Makes 8– servings.

CONTINUED ON PAGE

3 SOUPER SALADS

Make 'em the easy way...with soup!

They're cool. They're quick. They're creamy-delicious. Wonderful soup salads! You make them first thing in the morning (or even the night before) . . . and you make them with soup for extra-rich flavor, subtle wake-up seasonings. Then into the refrigerator. And no matter how high the mercury climbs, your family has a taste-tempting treat when dinnertime comes around. Try a cool-off salad soon.

Creamy Tuna Salad. Sprinkle 1 env. unflavored gelatine on ½ cup cold water to soften; place over boiling water; stir until gelatine is dissolved. Blend 1 can Campbell's Cream of Celery Soup with a 3-oz. pkg. cream cheese; add dissolved gelatine, a 7-oz. can tuna (drained and flaked), ½ cup shredded carrot, ⅓ cup chopped celery, 2 tbsp. chopped parsley, 1 tbsp. lemon juice. Pour into 1-qt. mold. Chill until firm. Unmold; serve on crisp salad greens. 4 servings.

Ham-Macaroni Salad. Combine 1 can Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup, ¼ cup chopped celery, ¼ cup chopped onion, 2 tbsp. chopped green pepper, ½ tsp. prepared mustard, dash Tabasco, dash pepper. Stir in 2 cups cooked macaroni (4 oz. uncooked) and 1 cup diced cooked ham. Chill. Serve with tomato wedges. 4 to 6 servings.

Shrimp Lamaze. Blend 1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup with 1 cup mayonnaise. Add ¼ cup sweet-pickle relish, ½ tsp. grated onion, ½ tsp. prepared mustard, and 1 tbsp. lemon juice. Makes about 2½ cups dressing. Serve over cooked shrimp. Or try with lettuce wedges, hard-cooked eggs or mixed greens. Delicious every way!

Look for other easy recipes on the back of every can.

Good things begin to happen when you cook with Campbell's Soup

THROW YOUR HEART OVER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 41

of an event. Like a precipice, a vast space loomed ahead and below her. This was her opportunity. She had always wanted a pony. But not now.

"Ponies are for kids, doc," she said. "I want a horse—a real horse. I'm a girl now. I'm not a kid any more."

In her mind she saw the horse—a milk-white Arab with a flowing mane and tail. She stared into his liquid eyes. She felt his hot breath in her face. Tears came into her eyes. She brushed her hair back from her face and stared at Smitty and her dad. They looked very big standing there looking down at her in her bed.

"All right, a horse. Do you want one? Do you want to get out?"

Smitty was close to her now. She could smell him. She smelled tobacco, whisky, tweed, dog and the hair stuff he used. His eyes, behind the thick lenses of his glasses, were enormous. She stared into them. She drowned herself in them. I'll marry him, she thought. If he'll wait till I'm grown up and well, I'll marry him. The tears ran down her cheeks. They were salt in her mouth. She could not speak. There was so much she wanted to say, and all she could do was to cry like a baby, like a kid.

Smitty had her wrist in his hand. She could feel his strength pouring into her. She pulled herself together.

"Yes," she said, "oh, yes. A horse. I want to get out." In her mind she saw it all again: the veld, the thorns, the rocks, the cattle, the tall golden grass bent before the wind; the weaver birds' nests hanging like grass balls from the swaying branches of the willows by the spring. She was sobbing now and he held her. Smitty was holding her. Everything was going to come right. There were Smitty and God and a horse.

Then her mother came in. She held her, too, and her father patted her hand. I'm too small, she thought. If I was bigger everyone could hold me. She wanted everyone to hold her.

She knew why her mother hadn't been with them. Helen knew she had been afraid of what Smitty might say after he had examined her. Her mother was beautiful. Fair skin with big blue-gray eyes. She smelled of lavender. Dad smelled of gas and grease and oil. Once he had smelled of the farm—of cows and milk and manure and hay all mixed up with tobacco and sweat. He worked for Mr. de Wet of the Central Garage now and mother ran the farm. It was the only way they could make ends meet, they said, since the drought had hit them. Three years of drought and only one spring—the one where the willows with the weaver nests were still strung. Helen often wondered what meeting ends were. What happened when ends did meet? When they didn't the cattle died and dad went to work for Mr. de Wet. Before that he'd been on the farm. But she had been too small to really notice what went on. I was just small and happy then, she thought. Just a baby.

Vaguely, half asleep, she saw Smitty open the door for her mother and pat her shoulder. "You're a good girl, Grace," he said. It was funny to hear him calling mother a girl. But daddy did, too, sometimes. Grownups were really very funny. There was no way of understanding them—except Smitty. There was something about him with his big owl's eyes. Of course it was the glasses that made them look so big. But I'd like to marry him, she thought. The horse, the milk-white horse, was all due to him. The dream that was going to come true. When she'd been well she hadn't wanted a horse or pony. Why should she have, when she could run about so fast on her own two legs? But since she had been ill she'd thought about horses so much. Looked at pictures of horses galloping. How wonderful that must be, to be on the back of a galloping horse.

The last things she remembered were her dad standing at the door looking back at her and the click of her mother's heels on the staircase. Smitty must be waiting for dad.

In the old car on his way back to the garage Johnnie Blackett went over what Smitty had said. No worse . . . getting better . . . trust in God . . . a horse. . . . A horse. What was the old story? For lack of a nail a shoe was lost, for lack of a shoe a horse was lost, for lack of a horse a battle was lost. . . . "A horse, a horse, my kingdom for a horse." That was Shakespeare—or at least he thought it was. For lack of a horse my daughter may be lost.

He'd never forget the look in her eyes, big as saucers—she had Grace's eyes—with tears balanced like drops of dew in the corners, and her remark: "Ponies are for kids. I'm a girl now." A girl, and in just a few years she'd be ripe for life, for love. Horses seemed to mean a lot to her. She had never mentioned it before. Perhaps because she was ill. Perhaps because as long as it wasn't mentioned it could not be refused. She was an old-fashioned kid with plenty of courage and a mind and will of her own. That frail little fairylike creature made of ivory and gold had a will of steel. And Smitty had seen it and thought of an answer. If she set her mind on anything, she'd do it, or die in the attempt. He remembered what his own father had told him when he began to jump his first pony: "Throw your heart over first, Johnnie, and you'll follow it, Johnnie boy." After that he'd never been afraid. She was like that. But a horse —— Horses cost money. There weren't even any horses around to look at and maybe borrow any more. Ten years ago a dozen men would have lent him a horse. Ten years ago he could have bought a dozen horses.

He looked out at the veld as he drove along the red dirt road. How beautiful it was. Rolling country dotted with clumps of bush and isolated thorns, all splashed with the gold of spring. Soon it would be summer, and they might get good rains this year.

When Johnnie got to the garage he was surprised to find it unchanged. It looked exactly as it had looked yesterday. But yesterday was so long ago. So much had happened since then. How afraid he had been when he drove home to talk to Smitty. Helen was going to live. She was better. She might get well I could get her a horse, he thought. Suc ple thing, really—or it used to be. E even in Africa a horse was a rare anima from valuable show horses and so ordinary farm riding horses had all disa Hendrik de Wet came out of the fro to greet him. "Everything O.K., John said. He meant about Helen, of course time everyone in Boomspruit would k Smitty had made a new and detailed e tion after the specimens came back f laboratory in Johannesburg.

"O.K. At least she's no worse, holds out hope. Slow, of course. But "Slow but sure," de Wet said. "Th ticket." He was an Afrikaner and such phrases. He became businesslik tractors have come, Johnnie. They're siding. Get them down and line 'em u soldiers," he said. "Like a lot of Rooisbadgies—redcoats." He laughe booming laugh that shook the belly th out in a great shaking ellipse below "Nice and straight," he said. "All six so that the farmers can't miss them. he said. "The plowing season. We'll some plows from the store—three plows and disks—and hook them u 'em the idea." He became confiden took Johnnie's arm. "Farmers," he sai to show 'em. You've got to put two together for 'em. See the tractors an never think of plows. See the plows an never think of tractors." He seemed forgotten that Johnnie was a farmer.

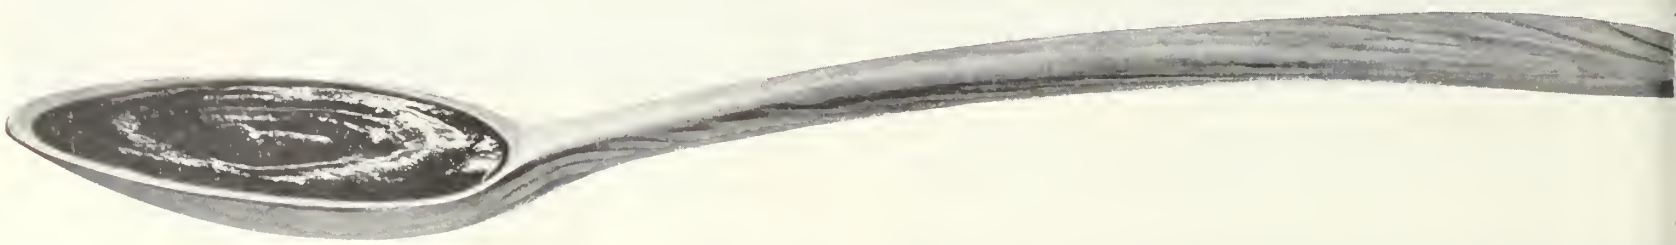
Two hours later the bright red tract aligned with not a six-inch difference them and each had a plow or a disk ho behind it. "All done," he said to "Come, Kyk—look at 'em. Pretty as a



They stood together in the sunlight at the scarlet tractors glistening in the uniforms of paint.

"Pretty," de Wet said. "Beautif stroked the hood of the one nearest

"See the horses, Johnnie?" he said.

"What horses?"

A.1. STEAK SAUCE...in Jiffy Hamburge

the spoonful that enriches every mouthf

Zesty, hearty A.1. Steak Sauce brings out more steak taste in any cut of ground beef

RECIPE: (Serves 6)
1½ lbs. fresh ground beef
1 tsp. salt
2 Tbsps. A.1. Steak Sauce
6 strips bacon

Add A.1. Steak Sauce and salt to ground beef. Work in well. Shape into 6 fat patties. Wrap each patty with a bacon strip. Secure with toothpick. Broil until bacon is crisp and meat done to your taste. Garnish with onion slices and watch 6 hungry people enjoy the tastiest hamburgers you've ever served. P.S. Keep a bottle of A.1. Steak Sauce on the table. Men love it as a pour-on, too.

SEND FOR FREE RECIPE BOOKLET
"Cooking with Your Hat On"
A.1. SAUCE COMPANY (DIVISION OF HEUBLEIN), HARTFORD, CONN.

sale yard. Stock sale tomorrow, you ednesday. The old and the new," de "Tractors coming in and the farm ing out. This lot must be about the d here. That's why I got the tractors heard a lot of farmers were selling a dealer and jumped in. Took a risk, . But a calculated risk. That's busi- nnie boy. That's what I like."
if I go up and look at them?" John-at what?"

orses."
ure, go ahead. If you see any of the ing 'em back to see these beauties." as if the tractors were chorus girls. sit. Easy terms. Go ahead, my boy." him on the back. Hendrik de Wet at patter. Men on the shoulder; chil- e head; and women—well, he patted , wherever he could.
rses, all oldish farm animals, most of ch the worse for wear, work and a k ride, stood with lowered heads in kraal. Grays, blacks, bays; there uch to choose between them.
nnie went up and leaned his arms on one horse, a roan mare that he had before, looked up and came toward en she was about a yard away she and extended her nose toward his er nostrils were wide open. She blew hem softly. Her eyes, one of them a ooked into his. A horse, my kingdom e. . . . For want of a horse my daughter is a great thing, altogether a t good, which alone makes everything that is heavy, and es evenly all that is uneven. it bears the burden without g burdened, and makes sweet tasteful everything that is r.

FROM IMITATION OF CHRIST
BY THOMAS A KEMPIS
THE TRANSLATION OF EDGAR DAPLYN.
RIGHT 1960 SHEED & WARD, INC., N.Y.

"Remember there's still a God," d said.
he and the roan were looking at er a tall, thin, sunburned man came im. "Dog meat," he said. "That's y are. More's the pity. And to think e down to this. There's no good or es no more. Just fat and thin. That's r. Imagine judging men that way, for th—fat or thin."
s?" Johnnie said.
. I was a horse dealer once—real mean. Saddle horses, cart horses, r breeding, studs, even a blood horse again. Do you think I like it?" He n Johnnie savagely. "Man," he said, horses. Take her for instance"—he is head at the mare; "that's a good od mare. I've never seen a bad roan I like a walleye. No, she's not blind le caught her head collar—she was hem now—and flashed his hand over eye. "See her wink," he said.
ohnnie thought, God sent Smitty. God roan. God sent the dealer. God told to tell me. "Will you sell her?" Of course I'll sell her, and much o you than to the knacker." much?"
ou know how they sell horses today,

do they?"
e pound. Like butter or cheese or old ad horse is worth as much as a sound at, that's what they are. Not horses e. Just dog meat. Meat for pets." He he dust with disgust. "Old horses, yes, n-out horses. That's one thing. But 's not even aged. Nine years old she nine years of work left in her and nine ls if you want to breed her. She's bred Roomy," he said. "If you put her to a orse you'd get something. But no- wait no more. Nearly a year's gestation. ore years for the foal to come to hand. t's four years when you think of the of it?"

"How much?" Johnnie asked again.
"Thirty pounds, mister, and that's what she cost me, more or less, but I'll make enough on the others."
"Will you hold her for me while I get the money?" Hendrik would advance it to him. "Will you wait?"
"I'll wait. I got to hang around anyway till the sale tomorrow. You'll find me at the hotel. Ask for Frank Sparrow. Sparrow the horse dealer."
As Johnnie turned to go Sparrow said, "Listen, mister, this is a deal you can't lose on. You take her. You'll feed her up a bit naturally, and if you don't like her I'll buy her back any day and give you a profit. Can't lose, man," he said to Johnnie's back, "and there's not many deals like that in the world today."

Hendrik de Wet began to laugh when Johnnie told him what he wanted the thirty pounds for.
"Man," he said, "this is 1959. What do you want a horse for?"
"She's a good mare," Johnnie said, "a roan with a walleye on the near side, and only nine years old—too good for dog meat."
"Man, you're so bust you've got to borrow to buy her. What is it? You going soft or something?"
"I'm not soft, de Wet," Johnnie said. "No, I'm as hard as hell. So hard that I'll chance everything on this gamble."
"You're not going to race her?"
"I am, Hendrik."
"When? How?"
"I'm going to race her with death, and the stakes are high."
"You're mad, Johnnie."
"I'm not. It's Smitty."
"The doctor?"
"Yes. He thinks if I can get Helen on a horse she has a chance."
De Wet pulled out his pocketbook and counted out six fivers. "Here you are, Johnnie.

No jam tastes like the kind you make yourself!

Easy! Thrifty! No failures—and only one-minute boil with Certo or Sure-Jell!

Sure-Jell and Certo are brands of pectin . . . the fruit substance that causes jelling. The pectin in fruits varies—so Sure-Jell or Certo takes the guesswork out of jam and jelly making. Recipes with package and bottle. Products of General Foods.

Recipe: perfect homemade peach jam. Peel, pit and crush 3 lbs. fully ripe peaches. Mix 4 cups prepared fruit in very large saucepan with 1 box powdered Sure-Jell. (Or use liquid Certo—recipe on bottle.) Stir over high heat until mixture comes to hard boil.

Stir in 5 cups sugar at once. Bring to full-rolling boil. Boil hard for 1 minute only, stirring constantly. A short boil time means less juice boils away—so you get up to 50% higher yield, and the flavor comes through fresher—with Sure-Jell or Certo!

Remove from heat; alternately stir and skim off foam for 5 min. Ladle quickly into 9 medium glasses. Cover with paraffin. Sure-Jell and Certo are recommended by General Foods Kitchens.

GENERAL FOODS KITCHENS

and it's not a loan. You've done more than your job here."

"I'll pay you back, Hendrik."

"In your own time when you are on your feet again."

Johnnie took his hand. They turned away from each other, embarrassed by their unaccustomed emotion. Each had seen something in the other that he had not known existed, for neither had thought the other had a heart.

Mr. Sparrow was in the bar of the Jacaranda Hotel fondling the ears of a crossbred ridgeback with one hand and holding a glass of beer in the other

Johnnie sat down beside him and put the money on the table. "Here's the thirty quid."

Sparrow put down the glass and stuffed the money into the breast pocket of his coat "I'm glad," he said. "She was too good for it. It's not her time yet. You know, Mr. ——"

"John Blackett," Johnnie said.

"Mr. Blackett," Sparrow went on, "we all come to it—man and horse and dog. One day we'll all come to the end of our tether. But it should be the end, not in the middle, like"—he paused—"nor the beginning."

"Beginning?"

"I lost a boy in the war," he said. "Nineteen he was. And he had the making of a good 'un, though I says it myself."

"That's why," Johnnie said.

"Why what, Mr. Blackett?"

"I want her."

"Go on, tell me."

"It's for my girl. She's paralyzed and the doctor thinks riding might help her. I only wonder if she can hang on. It's her legs, you know."

Mr. Sparrow put a brown veiny hand on his knee. "She's alive, Mr. Blackett. That's something. That's a lot."

Johnnie got up. They shook hands. He seemed to be shaking hands with everybody today. "I'm going to say something funny," Johnnie said, "and if you laugh I'll knock you down." His eyes blazed. "I think God sent you and I don't believe in God. At least I didn't."

Then he turned and went out of the bar. The big ridgeback wagged its tail slowly from side to side and looked up at Mr. Sparrow.

Now it was a matter of getting the mare home. It was only five miles and Johnnie arranged with Franz, the boy who did odd jobs around the garage, to take her.

"I'll tell you when," he said, "and take you up to get her "

"Ja, baas." Five bob he was getting. That was a whole day's wage and the baas was driving him back in his car. It was like Christmas. Man, if this happened every day, what a life he would lead!

At five o'clock Johnnie took Franz up to the kraal and they caught the mare. It was not difficult. She seemed to recognize him when he called her, and came up to him on her own.

She led easily. It would take Franz only an hour or so to get her back to the farm. Johnnie drove fast and went straight to Helen's room, and with her wrapped in a blanket on his knees waited on the stoep with his eyes fixed on the farm road till he saw them coming. The black man walked easily, tirelessly. Five miles was nothing to him. The mare followed like a dog, the riem he was holding hanging slack in a loop.

Helen saw them almost as soon as he did. "There's a boy coming, with a horse, daddy," she cried, "a boy with a horse, and they're coming this way. We'll see them. Oh, daddy, we'll see them." To see anything had become an event for Helen.

The man and the horse got bigger.

"It's Franz," Helen said, "with a roan."

"Certainly looks like it," Johnnie said. "I wonder what he wants."

"It's late," Helen said. "Perhaps they could stay the night. Perhaps you could put me up on the horse for a minute, daddy, and we could play pretend."

"Pretend what, darling?"

How stupid could grownups be? "That he's ours," she said, "our very own horse."

"We'll see, darling."

Franz pulled up at the stoep. He tied the riem to the rails. "Here you are, baas."

"What's he mean, daddy?"

"What he says."

"He said 'Here you are.'" Helen was wriggling like an eel in her father's arms.

"Well, here she is, Helen," Johnnie said. "Your horse."

"Oh . . . oh, she's really ours!"

"She's yours, darling. With compliments of Dr. Smith and Mr. Hendrik de Wet."

"Put me up, daddy. Put me up."

"She's filthy."

"Never mind. Mother can wash me again. Oh, please, please." She clasped her hands together as if she were praying.

Her mother came onto the stoep. "What is it, Johnnie?" she said.

"I bought a mare, Grace, and Helen wants me to put her on her back, but she's too dirty."

"Put her up, Johnnie. The child will wash and so will her pajamas."

"Put me up, daddy. Mother says I can. Mother says ——"

Johnnie lifted her onto the mare's back and held her there.

The horse turned her head and nuzzled the child's knee.

"Oh," Helen said, "she's got blue eyes. Just like mother."

"Only one eye," Johnnie said.

"One of each," Helen said. "One like mother's and one like yours. How wonderful!"

Johnnie laughed. It was wonderful to see her so happy. Then he took her down. "Bed now," he said, "and another bath. Tomorrow we'll wash her. I've got to drive Franz back to the dorp now." He kissed his daughter and put her into her mother's arms.

Helen spent all the next day in the kraal sitting on a box beside the mare, listening to her munching hay and crunching mealies. Old Herman sat watching them both, smoking his pipe.

Everything the mare did was wonderful. The way she ate. The way she drank from the bucket Herman brought her. The way she rolled, kicking her legs in the air. When she'd done all this the horse came and stood beside the girl with her soft gray nose almost in her lap, while Helen stroked her face and pulled her ears.

Her father found them like that. He had come home early to wash the horse. It took five washings with soap and water to get her clean enough to satisfy Helen. Then she was dried with a whisk of hay and rubbed down with a bit of sacking. Her tail, mane and forelock were combed with a metal comb Johnnie had picked up in the dorp, and the long hairs on her heels were trimmed off with Grace's dressmaking scissors. She looked a very different animal now.

"She's lovely," Helen said, "ever so lovely."

"Wait till tomorrow. When she's really dry we'll brush her." Johnnie threw an old blanket over the horse and fastened it in place with a surcingle. "Bedtime, Helen," he said. "Bedtime for you both."

Old Herman led the mare off to a shed that had been bedded down with veld grass, and Johnnie carried his daughter into the house.

Before he went to work Johnnie went to look at the mare. She raised her head and neighed when she saw him. He went up to her; she rubbed her head against his chest. He gave her some crusts of bread he had brought from breakfast.

This was not the same horse, not the same horse at all. He wished Mr. Sparrow could see her now.

Life on the farm now changed its pattern. Where Helen had been the center, the axle around which the wheel of their lives revolved, it was now the mare, because it was around the mare—that Helen had named, for some reason, Old Lucy—that Helen herself revolved. Old Lucy and old Herman, who took care of both her and Helen.

There was a regular routine. In the morning Lucy was saddled. The saddle consisted of a pillow fastened with a surcingle. Lucy also wore a head collar with a riem that Herman held with one hand while he balanced Helen with the other. In this fashion they covered the whole farm and even went beyond it. In the afternoon Helen rested and Old Lucy grazed near the homestead. In the evening Helen rode again.

Every day the mare put on condition. Every day she became more tame, more human. "More like a dog than a horse," Grace said.

"Perhaps more horses would be like dogs if they were treated like dogs," Johnnie said.

Helen didn't need Herman to hold her on any more now. She managed very well with her fingers twisted around the mare's mane. Sometimes she even managed a slow canter with Herman running in front of the horse. But they were always out of sight of the house when she tried something new. She was getting better—stronger—she could feel it.

I'm going to surprise them all one day, she thought. And happy. She'd never been so happy before. But perhaps you had to be unhappy before you could be happy.

Sometimes the Metz children came over to play with her and ride Old Lucy. Charmian was twelve, a year older than Helen, and Charlie was ten. They were nice children. They always brought an apple or sugar for Old Lucy. Their daddy brought them over in the afternoon and Helen's daddy drove them home when he got back from work. Helen always sat on the front seat beside him.

One day, after they had been coming for about a month, Charmian said, "Can we try to jump her, Helen?"

It seemed a great idea and the children rolled out two empty five-gallon dip drums, leaving them on their sides, and set a blue-gum lath across them. Charlie led Lucy up to the jump and told her about it.

"Jump it, Charm," he said to l
"You show her how."

Charmian jumped. Then she said, ' if she'll follow." She led Lucy back a and ran to the jump with the mare behind her. She never hesitated, and came over side by side.

Helen clapped her hands. "Ag said, "do it again!"

"Give her an apple," Charlie said

They gave Lucy half an apple and the jump again.

"She likes it," Charmian said. "I'm try riding her over." She climbed on back with Charlie's help. The horse s like this even better.

"I'll stand them up," Charlie said about that?"

"O.K.," his sister said. "We'll patted the horse's neck. The boy s drums up on end.

Lucy cocked her ears and popped

Helen, sitting on the grass with He hind her, was entranced. It was won was beautiful the way Old Lucy came jumps and took them clean. Like a bu like a bird through the air. Her coat nate chestnut and white hairs shone satin. Her mane and long tail flowed.
lock divided itself into two plaits, side of the white star on her forehead
ful, that's what it was, with the blue, sky above and the chickens scratchi veld behind the sheds and kraals wh had set up the jumps.

After this they jumped almost e with an audience of Grace and old
Mr. Metz and Johnnie in the eveni
Metz came over, too, sometimes, t
The jumps were regular jumps now—high—the gum laths resting on pegs poles Herman had sunk into the gro

There was no doubt about Helen's i ment, Smitty said. It was not so much
There was very little difference there her general health, the brightness of in her happiness. She was, as he had fore Old Lucy came, an outdoor girl pining away in the white cage of her b

That was how the conversation
Then it came out.

"I've arranged for her to go into ho
some tests in Johannesburg," Smi
"There's a man there now, an Ameri cialist, who's interested in her case."

"Soon?" Johnnie said. "How lo going to stay?"

"Now," Smitty said. "He's got to g so I'll drive her in tomorrow."

"How much will it cost?" Grace a "Not too much. They're friends of the nursing home."

"We'll manage," Johnnie said.

Grace turned to her husband. "I'll her and stay with Muriel. You can ma
a bit, can't you, Johnnie?"

"I'll manage." He knew he could and the farm did not need much a
now. They couldn't plow till it rained.
few cattle they had left could take themselves. All they needed was a once a week—and he'd do that on Su

Lucy was the only thing that worrie
This was adventure. It was change.
never been in a big town. She said, She'll miss me. You'll look after her,
Her voice was anxious.

"I'll look after her, darling."

"Talk to her, daddy. She likes to b to, especially while she's eating."

What a wonderful kid she was. No about herself at all. Just her horse, horse had become almost a part o symbol of activity.

"I'll talk to her," he said, "and t kids will be over every day, I expect."

"Bed now," Grace said, and that way the evening ended, with Smitty his pipe in silence and Johnnie think lonely he would be.

And Johnnie was lonely. There we from Grace almost every day, but ther
Grace to come home to, and he pi

CONTINUED ON

OUR SUPPLY IS NOW LIMITED!

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

This washable pink-flowered metal file box will hold 350 recipes. A perfect size for recipes you clip, it comes equipped with 12 handy index dividers and 50 all-time favorite Journal recipes, ready to enjoy.

If you'd like additional budget treasures, the Journal has prepared a packet of 50 more recipes. Just add 50c*. Both the Treasure Box and the recipe packets are in limited supply, so order now.

RECIPE TREASURE BOX $1.35* Postpaid

Send check or money order to:

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL RECIPES Department 8,
Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Penna.

Offer good in U.S.A. only
*Pennsylvania residents add 4% Pennsylvania sales tax

This blouse was washed in blue Cheer*

*When blouses are this white, you know your whole wash is perfect.
Let Cheer with the Blue Magic Whitener show you the difference.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 80

letters up at the post office in the dorp. No little girl to be carried in his arms. No talk of Old Lucy and how wonderful she was.

It was to have been a month, but it was longer and the bills were coming in. Not big bills. Smitty had been right. They were cutting things to the bone, but they were bills and they had to be met.

The cattle went. The two last boys were paid off. Only old Herman stayed on.

Johnnie was standing by the spring looking at the weaver birds' nests, just thinking about things, watching the beautiful black-and-yellow birds flying about, watching the green grass balls of their nests sway.

Yes, a lot of things had gone, including Old Lucy. She'd been the last thing. That was his only justification. He'd sold everything else first: his gold cuff links, his father's watch, the silver tray. And he'd not told Helen. No good worrying her. He looked over the empty veld. Empty to him because not a head of stock on the place was his any more. He'd rented the grazing to a butcher.

It was amazing how he missed the mare. She'd been a link with them, with Helen and her mother—with the girls. Every night she'd been waiting for him when he went to see her before he went to bed. Sometimes he'd taken a walk under the stars with her following like a dog, and now she was gone. Metz had sent a boy over for her this afternoon and everything seemed empty, and more lonely than ever.

What a difference the horse had made in his life and Helen's. That was the thing that worried him. How was he going to explain it? The mare had saved Helen. He saw that, saw that now that it was too late. It was Lucy that had given her the lift, made life worth while again. In every letter she asked about Old Lucy. She'd even posted a handkerchief to give to Lucy to smell. I had it in bed all night, daddy. He'd done it. He'd given it to Lucy and she had looked into his face and whinnied, and now he'd sold her. For Helen, of course; and his own things had gone first, everything practically, but how was he to explain it? If only he'd told Grace about the things he'd sold. He hadn't wanted to upset her, but she'd find out when she came back. That was what always happened. One thing led to another. One lie led to the next.

He had his supper and went to bed. The frogs were croaking. There would be rain soon. He would be able to plow if he could get the time off to do it. He had not sold the tractor, thank God. But perhaps he should have; not that it would fetch much—still —— It took him a long time to fall asleep. He woke suddenly. He had been dreaming of Old Lucy—dreaming he heard her.

But he was awake now, and he did hear her. Neigh after neigh. Without bothering to put on a jacket or shoes, he went out. She was there. Lucy was there, standing by the fly-netted door of the stoep.

He went out and she almost tried to climb into his arms, as if she were a dog, as if she were saying, "I'm home again. There has been some awful mistake, but I'm home." She forced her head between his arm and his body. He pulled up her head and kissed her nose. I've never kissed a horse before, he thought. But Helen has kissed her a thousand times, has felt that soft mousy nose with a few prickly hairs against her own lips. In a way it was almost like kissing Helen. He took the mare for a walk. He needed a walk. Then he watered her, put her in the kraal with some hay.

Sleep came easier now. He was exhausted, but Old Lucy was home. It could not last, of course. She had been sold and paid for. The fifty pounds Metz had given him was in the post on its way to the nursing home. Still, for the moment God was in His heaven and Old Lucy was home.

Frank Metz's shouts woke him. It was hardly light. "Johnnie," he shouted, "she's here, I see."

Rubbing the sleep from his eyes, Johnnie got up. "She's in the kraal," he said.

"I saw her."

"What happened, Frank? I was asleep when she came. She woke me."

"I expect I woke you too."

"You did."

"Well, I had to come at once. The kids are crazy with worry."

"What happened?"

"Happened? We put her into the kraal with mealies and hay, and she seemed to be nicely settled. Then in the night the kids climbed out of their windows to look at her and found her gone. They rushed in to us yelling blue murder. Charlie was crying."

"Did you leave the gate open, Frank?"

"Of course not. She jumped the poles—five there are, imagine it—and came straight here—straight as a crow flies."

"There are six fences between us," Johnnie said. "Barbed wire."

"I know. Imagine it. Barbed wire in the dark."

"I never heard of a horse jumping wire," Johnnie said.

"Nor have I, except in Australia. Some horses do it there. But they train them to. Hang a coat or a bag over it at first and then make it smaller and smaller."

"Can't make a mistake with wire," Johnnie said. "Catch a foot in it and it twists. I've seen kudu caught that way."

"I know. Well, that's that. I'll leave the boy I've got with me and he can bring her back. I'll stable her tonight."

Frank Metz got into his car and gave the boy his instructions. "Give him breakfast, Johnnie," he said. "I must get back to the kids. Pity you had your phone taken out."

That was just another of the things. I could have phoned Grace, he thought, if we still had the phone. But that would have cost money too. He looked at Frank Metz's shiny new car disappearing down the farm road and wished he was a checkbook farmer too. Still, Metz was a good guy. Very decent. If he hadn't been so decent it would never have happened.

Whom, then, do I call educated? First, those who control circumstances instead of being mastered by them, those who meet all occasions manfully and act in accordance with intelligent thinking, those who are honorable in all dealings, who treat good-naturedly persons and things that are disagreeable; and furthermore, those who hold their pleasures under control and are not overcome by misfortune; finally, those who are not spoiled by success. SOCRATES

He'd said, "Why don't you let me have the mare, Johnnie? I'll give her a good home. Helen can see her and ride her whenever she wants." He had lit a cigarette and said, "I'll give you fifty quid for her."

That was what had done it. Just the exact figure. Just the number. He couldn't have done it with forty quid or even sixty, though it was ten pounds more. Fifty was the nursing-home account that had just come in the mail. Fifty was the bull's-eye, the target.

"All right," he'd said, and never had anything been less right. It was worse now. Old Lucy hung back in the riem and the boy leading her swung around and hit her with the loose end he had in his hand.

Johnnie was beside him in a flash. Lucy was looking at him. "Don't let him take me," she seemed to be saying. Nonsense, he said to himself, a horse can't talk, but he knew she was saying it.

He gripped the boy's arm. "Do that again and I'll take the hide off you, and I'll call the baas when I get to town and ask him to see if there is a mark on her." He patted Lucy's quarters. She gave him another look and followed the boy slowly with her nose almost on the ground.

Nothing went right that day for Johnnie. Two tractor sales fell through. He got a flat coming home, and old Herman met him with a long face and asked him what he should say to the little missis when she came home. "She loved that horse, baas. They used to talk together. Ja, horses," he said, "talk like people. The little missis would talk and horse would go 'What . . . what.'" He blew air through his nose as if he were a horse. "Ja," he said, "they talked. They talked like people."

That night Johnnie hardly slept at all. He was listening for Lucy. He knew she couldn't come, that she was stabled. But she came. He heard her galloping, faintly at first, then louder and louder till the hoofbeats pulled up with a scuffing, sliding sound below his window and she neighed. Not as she had last night but wildly, giving almost a scream, the way a horse does if it's caught in a fire. There is only one worse sound and it is the scream of a woman. Johnnie's hair stood on end. He thought, The wire. She's hurt herself.

She was standing by the screen door still neighing when he got down. He did not even pat her, but rushed to her hind legs and ran his hands over them, from hocks to pasterns. No blood. Not a cut. Thank God, he thought, thank God. She had turned to him. Her nose was in his belly. His pajama coat was open and he felt her warm breath. She was blowing hard. It sounded almost as if she were sobbing. Her neck was wet with sweat. So were her ears as he fondled them. He thought, Suppose she'd made a mistake and put a foot wrong. There was a bit of a moon. But suppose it had been darker. "Why didn't you come by the road?" he muttered. She whinnied softly as if she were saying, "It's too far by road. I was in a hurry. She might be waiting for me."

I'm mad, Johnnie thought. I'm mad, thinking she said that, but he answered her all the same. He said, "I know, Lucy. It's ten miles by road and five as a crow flies." As a crow flies or a horse jumps.

That night he didn't go to bed again, but sat outside with Lucy beside him. Just before dawn she lay down as near to him as she could get. Well, this is it, he thought. Now everything is clear. He'd raise another mortgage on the farm and buy her back. I'll give Frank a hundred pounds for her and there'll be plenty over to pay for Helen too. More than enough. He wondered why he hadn't thought of it before. He had thought of it and then he'd stopped thinking because the interest on one bond was almost more than he could pay. But God was in this somehow—or Providence—something that was supernatural, which he felt he must not buck.

This time Frank drove up with the children. They were out before the car had stopped and rushed up to Lucy's legs. "She's not hurt, is she? She's not hurt?" they shouted.

"She's all right, Charlie," Johnnie said. "She's O.K."

The children were patting Lucy and kissing her. Charlie climbed onto her back.

"She wins," Metz said.

"I'll buy her back, Frank," Johnnie said.

"She wins, Johnnie. It's something you have to see to believe. She can stay here."

"I'll give you a hundred pounds for her," Johnnie said.

"No. No. But let's put that value on her. I gave you fifty and so she's half mine and lives here and my kids can ride her whenever they want." He held out his hand.

And that was the way that Lucy came home.

At least the lies were over now, and Johnnie could really write to Helen about Old Lucy instead of having to invent as he had yesterday. That had been a hard letter to write with Lucy just gone. Lucy's fine. I put her to bed and went to see her before I went to sleep after dinner. What a tissue of lies. And what could he have said tomorrow if she had not come home? or if she had been hurt? How could he have gone on writing?

Johnnie now began to understand the relationship his daughter had had with the old mare. Not that Lucy was old or looked old now. Helen had given her the name before she'd had her bath and beauty treatment. She had certainly looked old when he'd bought her. But she was still in her prime really. A horse was at its best at five and stayed like that till ten or more if it was looked after.

The worst was over now—even the loneliness—because he had Old Lucy to talk to. Old Herman talked to her too. Of course they didn't really talk to the horse. They just talked and Old Lucy cocked her ears to listen and blew out of her nostrils. She liked the sound of a human voice. But he certainly hoped it didn't get around that he was bats and ta to a horse.

A fortnight later Johnnie was holding ter from Grace with an enclosure from H when Smitty came into the house with a that loosened the screen door on its hi He was smiling all over his face.

"Good news, Johnnie, very good news

"Will she walk?"

"No, no, not yet—but she will. There real deterioration. They've finished all tests. They had to wait for the reports to c back from America."

"Then?"

"Now it's just a mental block. You k the way muscles work. The nerve centers them a message, a sort of telegram, only th no telegraph boy for Helen. But he'll c Johnnie—he'll come!"

Smitty was looking around the room. of things had gone. Johnnie's two guns Purdy twelve bore, and the Manlicher. Sc the big silver tray that had belonged t father. Queen Anne it was supposed to h he hadn't been rooked he should have good price for it.

"She can come back, Johnnie. She's ing. I'm driving in to fetch them tomorr

He saw tears come into Johnnie's eyes. missed them," he said. "Like the sun," he "Like days without any sun and nights out any stars. No sun, no moon, no stars time even. Just emptiness and silence."

"They're good girls," Smitty said. "Y a lucky man, Johnnie. One day you'll back on all this and see what I mean. Helen well again and Grace happy. you'll know the stuff that good women made of. The guts, my boy. Helen never f up, never gave up. Grace never compla Not about the drought that took everyt nor Helen's illness."

"Once she got out she began to imp Smitty. The horse was a wonderful idea

"I'm glad you got her back."

"So you knew?"

"Everyone knew."

"It's going to be hard to tell her, Smi

"She'll understand. After all, you ga everything else first."

"So you knew that too?"

"I've got eyes; and besides, do you you can send all the stuff you have awa post without there being talk? I tell Johnnie, your stock's up in the dorp. You mayor someday if you're not careful, John

"Then I'll be careful." Johnnie was la ing now. "This time tomorrow they' home," he said. "I must go and tell Lucy Smitty gave him a queer look. But he d care. "I talk to her," he said. "She like

Smitty was laughing now. "That's what say in the dorp. 'Johnnie's talking to horse of his now that his wife and kid away.'"

"Everyone talks to Lucy," Johnnie "The Metz kids when they come to jump old Herman ——"

"Everyone, Johnnie? And who's every Some children and a pensioned-off old h that's a bit touched in the head, and you tell you something. It's a good thing to be crazy like that and talk to animals. It sh capacity for love, and that's something short of in the world today. You can't l car or a tractor," he said. "You can keep in good order. You can polish 'em and 'em, but you can't love 'em. People yo love if they're lovable, and animals. But is a thing most people don't want. Th they talk about it all the time." He puffe his pipe. "They want to be admired, to b vied, but not to be loved. To love an loved is a responsibility.

"I'll go now," he said. He got up. "See tomorrow when I bring them." He p Johnnie's shoulder. "You're a good boy

"Good boy be damned—we're the age."

"Perhaps I'm a good boy, too, Joh Who knows?"

Everything was ready for the return. table was laid, the kettle was full of wat

CONTINUED ON PAG

by Hunt Foods, Inc.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 82

make them a cup of tea. He'd bought cakes in the dorp, and cans of peaches that Helen liked. He'd stocked up with staples—salt, pepper, catchup, flour, sugar, tea, coffee, bacon, potatoes, butter. There was an unopened bottle of sherry on the sideboard beside the glasses. He'd put on his blue suit. Old Herman had on the clean khaki pants and shirt he'd given him. Lucy, whose riem he held, shone in the evening light.

Yes, he'd done everything that could be done. Even Grace's stoep plants had had their leaves washed. But he was still worried at the reception his news would get. I'll have to tell her. She'd find out anyway from the Metz kids or old Herman or someone. But how did one do a thing like this? How did one begin?

"They come, baas," old Herman shouted. "They come."

Johnnie was furious. I should have seen them first, he thought. He'd been watching the road for an hour and the minute he looked away they came, and old Herman had seen them first.

After that things were a bit blurred for everyone—a bit choky and hard to talk. They could only kiss and hug one another. To hug Helen, Johnnie had to hug Smitty, who was carrying her, and he almost kissed him in his excitement. Lucy had come into the act and was nuzzling Helen in Smitty's arms. Old Herman had hold of Helen's foot. He could not reach her hand and was shaking it and kissing it. "The little missis," he kept saying, "the little missis."

Grace was a good girl. If she saw anything was missing in the house, she didn't say so. As a matter of fact, she saw that the silver tray had gone the minute she came in. My tray she thought, and opened her mouth to speak. Then she saw the empty gun rack and she knew. She'd wondered all the time about money. Johnnie had never mentioned it. The visit had cost her nothing. She'd stayed with her sister Muriel and even used her car to go to the hospital, so she had never mentioned money in her letters.

She went into the kitchen to make tea and saw that Johnnie had left everything ready for her. Tears came into her eyes.

Smitty stayed on, of course. Helen sat on her father's lap. Old Herman hovered in the background and ate a piece of cake. Lucy, waiting outside, had a piece of cake. Then they all had sherry and Smitty drove off.

Now's the time, Johnny thought. I'll get it over with.

"Helen," he said, "did you know I sold Lucy?"

She looked at him with big sad eyes. "She's back," she said.

"I had to tell you, honey. I sold everything else first. My guns, your mother's silver tray, the cattle ——"

"I must have cost a lot," Helen said.

"It was worth it. You're better."

"I'm better, daddy. They say I'll get well. And Lucy's back."

"I had to tell you," Johnnie said.

"I knew, daddy. Charmian wrote and told me that they had Lucy now and they loved her and would take good care of her."

"And you never wrote to me about it?"

"I think I knew why you'd done it, and then Charmian wrote again to say they didn't have her any more, that she wouldn't stay, and how they worried about her jumping those barbed-wire fences, but that they came over and rode her here nearly every day and that now she was half theirs."

She was quiet for a moment, then she said, "We must buy her back, daddy. I suppose they'll let us buy her back? She's mine, daddy—ours. How can we have half a horse, and which half, which end, is ours?"

It was scarcely light next morning when Helen called her father.

"Get me out, daddy. Show me everything. Get me onto Old Lucy and lead me around."

On the veld beyond the almost empty milking kraals Helen saw the big jumps the Metz kids had put up. "Big jumps for Old Lucy," she said. "Fancy her being able to jump like that."

Johnnie said, "They love it, and she loves it. You've forgiven me?" he asked. "I sold everything else first."

"I know," she said. She could feel his big hand on her thigh. I could not feel it once, she thought. Then she said, "And now, is she theirs or ours?"

"She's half ours, darling, and half theirs. So they have riding rights too."

"They don't hurt her, do they?" Her voice was anxious. "Her mouth, I mean. Or use a whip? They never used to, of course, but the jumps are so much bigger."

"They love her," her father said.

"But she's mine, she's mine, isn't she? One day we'll pay them off and she'll be all mine again." In her mind there was a plan forming. If Lucy can jump I'll jump her, she thought. I'll enter the show and win money. I'll tell her and she'll understand.

They went all around the farm and then it was time for breakfast and the job.

For a month everything went on much as it had before Helen had gone to hospital. There was no doubt about her being better. She was beginning to use her thigh muscles. She rode farther and farther every day and for longer hours. But she had an object in mind, a secret project, and one morning when her father had gone to work Helen got Herman to carry her to the kraal where the mare was munching a mixture of chaffed hay, bran and mealies.

"Put me down," she said.

Herman set her in the soft powdered manure that covered the kraal three feet deep.

"Now," she began a conversation with the mare Lucy, "you've got to jump me. We'll jump in the show and make money and buy you back."

The mare took her head out of the manger and nibbled at her hair, spilling a mixture of chaff and mealies in it.

Herman said, "They say you can't talk to a horse, missis." He felt the time had come to stop this.

"Ja, I can, and do. Put her saddle o lift me up."

"She hasn't finished her scoff yet, mis

"By the time you've got it on sh have." Helen reached out a hand and h mare's foreleg below the knee. Lucy nearer to her.

"Pas op," Herman shouted. "She'll s you."

Helen laughed. "You couldn't mak she said, and holding the leg pulled under Lucy's barrel belly. "Put the sad and no bridle, just the head collar."

When the bag and surcingle were on, said, "Now lift me up."

Herman lifted her.

"Now lead her to the jumps."

"No!" Herman said. "What will th say?"

"The baas won't know."

"And if the missis falls and breal neck?"

"I won't. I promise."

"Ja, you promise, but what about He Ja, what about old Herman if the missis breaks her neck?"

"Put me up," she said.

Herman lifted her up.

"Now to the jumps."

He led her there.

"Take off all the bars except the b one. I've got to learn, you know."

Herman took off the top three poles t Metz children had used.

"Now, Lucy," Helen said, "take it st

The mare turned her ears back to Helen stroked her neck and pulled hers ward.

"Now," she said again, and tapped flank with her hand.

Lucy started off at a gentle canter. she reached the jump she went over it w hesitation, drifting over it as lightly as She went on for twenty yards or so and to a stop.

Helen stroked her neck and pulled h gently. "Good girl," she said. "Good gi Herman she said, "Put up the next bar."

new
Wish-Bone Deluxe FRENCH
hugs the salad...not the plate

Lettuce-lovin' new Deluxe French . . . superb ingredients magically blended to cling tight to each frilly lettuce leaf
All its subtly-spiced French flavor stays on the salad.
Try new velvety-smooth, mild and mellow Wish-Bone Deluxe French now!

give your salads a "touch of Genie-us"
with Wish-Bone
• Italian Dressing
• French Dressing
• Cheese Dressing
• Russian Dressing

led Lucy round by her ear and the ice was repeated. They jumped for hour. Then Helen said, "Get me
v. We'll try again this evening."
Johnnie came home he couldn't be-eyes. Helen was jumping Old Lucy, over three-foot jumps without even
And what a seat! His heart almost eating and then leaped like a bird iroat.
are cantered up to the jump and ver like a buck, like a kudu. With beyond her withers, her face almost the mare's mane, her arms around
t. Her thighs were around Lucy's her legs, out of control, wobbled like a sawdust doll. After clearing the Lucy slowed up and stopped. Helen r by pulling on her ear. She spoke to hey jumped again. Then Helen saw
".
, daddy," she said. "We're jumping."
ee. But it's pretty high, and are you afe?"
' she said. "I was safe in bed when I nove. Do you want me back there?"
ut I still think it's high."
going higher, aren't we, Lucy?" She er the mare's neck.
ised her head and neighed.
'g," Herman said, "baas, this is going
y. She and the little missis talk to," he said, "the horse is tagati, be-and talks like a man. Baas," he said, o give my notice. The devil is here."
," Johnnie said. "Perhaps it is God."
baas says so, I will stay."
e put his arms around his daughter ed her into the house. Old Herman evils! He talked to the horse himself.
s notice was just a trick to try to stop siness in case Helen got hurt and he ied.

were new problems now for Johnnie
ce. Helen had the bit in her teeth. Nothing would stop her jumping, and the mare was a natural jumper. If Helen showed her a jump, she would clear it on her own. She'd jumped 6'6" clean as a whistle that way and come back to Helen to be petted.

"She's got something in her mind, Grace. She's not the same girl since she came back," Johnnie said. "She's got some secret."

"And have we ever got a secret out of her?" Grace asked.

"It's not natural for a kid to be like that," Johnnie said.

"Well, she is like that and I'm glad in a way," Grace said. "That's what'll cure her. Her will. Her iron will."

"The kid with the iron will," Johnnie said, laughing. He was proud and upset at the same time.

Next time Smitty came over they talked to him about it.

"What'll we do, Smitty?"

"Let her go, Johnnie."

"Suppose she falls?"

"Suppose anyone falls?" Smitty said. He put his hand on Johnnie's knee. "There's something in this that's beyond us. Call it what you like. I prefer God myself. But don't interfere. She might come right any day. Just like that. And I believe she will."

But she didn't, and she just went on jumping, with her extraordinary seat, fluttering like a bird above the cushion she still rode on.

Then it came. One evening Helen announced that she was going to compete in the high jump at the Boomspruit stock show.

"No," Johnnie said. "I won't have it."

Helen played her trump. "Then I'll go back to bed. I won't get up." They knew she had them and she knew too.

It was a sensation, that show. Helen Blackett's jumping was all anyone talked about. The cattle were forgotten, the harness horses, hacks, and blood horses that did their stuff in the ring were hardly looked at. Everyone was watching for the paralyzed kid—they called it

THE DEVIL IS ALWAYS WITH US

Children are taught a great deal o "good"—at home, at school and urch—but very little about evil:
God, but not about the devil.
devil—instead of being part of life and the fight against evil a experience—is a distant mana-tail, living in a furnace one canter alive.
ave come to feel that the failure to the closeness and the daily reality il ill fits the young for what life
. A "Pollyanna" approach to hunature is a dangerous approach. It y when one realizes how prevalent evil is that one understands the power of the forces of good.
t beyond this, it is dangerous, for tting up a false measure of the dence of good in human nature—ndeviling the world—one sets a for the unwary. They become dis-oned when they see man fail to ure up to standards falsely set;
lose heart and become discour-
when they first observe evil at —TV scandals, dishonest politi-
, crooked labor leaders, thieving essmen, Communists or just evil bors, evil friends. Those disillu-d become embittered and use the nce of evil in the community
h they should have been taught ts natural state) to be grounds for conceding the battle to the devil and even for losing confidence in the health and vitality of free Western civilization.

History teaches us that the devil is a part of all periods, all communities, all races. If one recognizes evil for the prevalent force that it is, one meets it with greater strength or at least is not taken by surprise by the enemy.

If the devil is so all-prevalent, then it becomes more remarkable that the forces of good do triumph. It might even be that the real news in the TV scandals was not that they developed, not that the perpetrators at all levels had defenders (the devil always has advocates), but the final victory of right-thinking people. The people of strong conviction did not need to be a majority—it was only necessary that they be strong and right.

When the devil is recognized as a normal part of man and of his society, greater emphasis will be placed on the remarkable power of public revulsion, and less on the obvious fact that evil exists. It might even be that if more people recognized that the devil is always among us—and that paradoxically much that is good comes out of evil—there would be more to join in the challenge and they would have a heightened sense of purpose.

AMYAS AMES

Does your husband carry this much extra weight every day?

Suppose, for the next hour or so, your husband carried this 25-pound weight. You'd quickly see the burden of this extra weight on his entire body.

Many men constantly carry a similar or even greater burden—in the form of extra body weight. And there's no doubt that those surplus pounds are a definite health hazard.

For example, a 20-year study of nearly 4 million persons reveals these facts about your weight and your life:

Men weighing 25 pounds above the average have an excess mortality of 20 percent, while a weight of 50 pounds above the average is associated with a death rate as much as 50 percent higher.

After age 30, it becomes increasingly important for men—and women, too—to control their weight. To do so, you must eat less and stick to your new eating habits. Remember, high-calorie foods are the main pound producers—fried foods, rich desserts, creamed dishes, gravies and dressings.

Count your calories carefully. Follow a chart—there's one included in the Metropolitan Life booklet offered below—and learn how to plan low-calories meals and snacks.

Start your weight control program with your doctor's advice. He will see to it that your meals provide all the essential food elements needed to keep well while reducing—and thereafter. Don't be misled by "wonder" diets.

There's no easy way to lose weight. But the struggle is worth the effort. By keeping your weight down permanently, you can avoid the burden which excess pounds put on your heart, kidneys, liver and other organs.

And you can increase your chances for a longer life—and more vitality and better looks, too.

COUPON MAY BE PASTED ON POSTAL CARD

THE LIGHT THAT NEVER FAILS

Metropolitan Life

INSURANCE COMPANY©

A MUTUAL COMPANY

Metropoliton Life (Dept. A)
1 Madison Ave., New York 10, N.Y.
Please send me the free booklet, "How to Control Your Weight," 8-60-J.

Nome
(PLEASE PRINT)
Street
City & Zone State

paralyzed. It was good enough. Crippled, anyway.

It began with the first round. The high jump was set at 4′ and three horses failed to clear it clean before Helen and Old Lucy came on. A sort of gasp, a prolonged "Aaah" went up from the crowd when they saw the little girl with long hair on the roan mare. A kid and not even a proper saddle. No stirrups. No bridle. Only a headstall with a riem fastened under the chin. Her parents must be mad. The committee must be mad. It was a disgrace.

But the mare seemed to know what she was doing. The kid leaned forward and spoke to her. Her hands holding the riem were twisted into the mare's mane.

The horse cantered up to the jump and took off. The girl's long golden hair was flying out behind her as she left the horse's back. Her arms were around the mare's throat her crippled legs dangling. But they were over . . . and safe. For an instant there was dead silence. Then there was a roar of approval and clapping.

It went on like that. Horse after horse was knocked out. At 5′6″ only one other horse, a chestnut gelding, a winner at some of the bigger shows, was left in the competition. He was a big, hot-tempered beast with rolling eyes and touched the bar, knocking it off its pegs at 5′7″.

Smitty and her father were standing beside Helen while she watched.

"You all right?" Smitty said. He knew she was all right—more all right than she'd ever been. She liked the excitement and applause.

"We can do it," was all she said. And they did. As if she knew and wanted to show off, Lucy cleared the bar with inches to spare.

Lucy got her ribbon. Helen got a cup and ten guineas prize money. Everyone congratulated her. But all she said to her father was, "That's the beginning, daddy."

"The beginning of what, darling?"

She didn't answer. She just patted Lucy and began to cry.

That was when Mr. Lonstein came up to them. He was a fat little man who'd made a fortune with diamonds in West Africa.

"You her father?" he said to Johnnie.

"That's right," Johnnie said.

"Magnificent," Mr. Lonstein said. "Wonderful! Wonderful! She ought to jump in Johannesburg."

Helen pulled herself together. "I want to," she said. "Lucy could jump a house."

"It can't be done " her father said.

"Why not?" Mr. Lonstein asked.

"Money," her father said, "entrance fees, expenses; it just can't be done."

"I'll do it," Mr. Lonstein said. "Let me. I'll send the horse up to the city in a trailer, drive you and your daughter up in my car. A pleasure," he said. "What a day it would be. What a thrill."

"It's very kind of you," her father said, "but ——"

"We'll go," Helen said. "And thank you very much."

The show was not till the fall; and a lot can happen between now and then, Johnnie thought. But nothing happened except that the rains were good and his 100 acres of mealies looked wonderful, and Mr. Lonstein came down every month to see Helen and Lucy.

At first he stayed at the Jacaranda Hotel, but after a while he stayed in the house.

They learned a lot about him. That he was rich they knew. That he was eccentric was obvious. That he was generous, lovable and very funny they soon found out.

"I know what worries you, Mr. Blackett," he said. "Why should a fat little Jewish financier do this? And you're right. There must always be a motive. Well, here it is. Like I told you the first day when I met you, there's the thrill of it, the fun of it. Next there is the fact that the world should see how well Lucy jumps and Helen rides and, finally, the courage." He patted Helen's head. "Brains I've got, but no courage."

After that they took him to their hearts and loved him.

At last the great day came.

Helen and old Herman who carried her piggyback were entranced by the crowds and the livestock at the fair. Many of the beef cattle, dairy cattle, sheep, goats, horses, poultry and rabbits were new to them. Never had they seen oxen so fat or dairy cows with such udders.

There were the usual events: a musical ride by the mounted police, the cattle parades, the hacks, the hunters, the ponies, the ladies' hacks, Thoroughbred stallions, a bayonet-fighting display by the Transvaal Scottish. The jumping—five-bar, stone wall, water jump, in and out and the rest of them. On the third day came the high jumps with forty entries. Of them all—even the old-timers—Helen remained calmest, and Lucy, as long as someone of the family was with her, was undisturbed by the noise or the crowd outside the ring.

As their numbers were called the riders went in.

A black gelding cleared the jump. A brown mare with a dark girl tipped the bar. A gray cleared it. A bay Thoroughbred came next, cleared it, and almost ran away when he landed.

Helen was next. Mr. Lonstein led her out and let go. Once again there was a hush. Fancy a kid like that competing with adults . . . the horse looks all right, but ——

That was when Lucy started for the jump. No saddle, no proper bridle . . . a crippled girl. How could they —— But there she was, going at it.

Old Lucy cocked her ears and slowed her canter. Helen pulled herself forward by her mane, climbing the mare's mane like a monkey on a stick, as Lucy dug her heels into the ground and shot forward.

"She's off!" someone shouted. But they were wrong. And the mare was over.

Helen jumped twice more that day time it was the same. She was watch sort of horrified silence that was fol a roar of approval.

That night the Star had headlines:

CRIPPLED GIRL JUMPS

Miss Helen Blackett, of Boomspru strength in her legs which are crippled developed a style of jumping that t hearts of all who watch her into their m gets her over.

Mr. Lonstein was jubilant. "Oh, t it," he said, and took them all out t Helen was a heroine, but she took There was only one thing in her n prize money, a hundred guineas this nothing was going to stop her.

"Then you'll be mine," she whis Lucy, "all mine, not the front half or half, but all of you . . . all . . . all . . . e

Her mother looked at her and about her. The child wasn't smil wasn't proud. She just seemed pre Her mouth was a thin, hard line, her stuck out. Her eyes were cold. She to everyone, but no more.

Her dear lovable little Helen had g was a determined girl. What wa wanted? Kudos? Praise? Adulati didn't seem to. Her mother knew she win.

What she did not know was how f Helen was. Only Mr. Lonstein knew he was so easily made afraid hims known the first time he saw her in Bo That was what he had admired so m was real courage. Any fool with could be brave, but she was smart e be afraid and strong enough to over fear, a kid like that. But he did not k what she said to herself each time she to a jump was, Throw your heart ov and that in her mind she threw it up jump like a ball as Old Lucy took of

Sweet and Simple and the making is double-rich PE

PET AND CHOCOLATE PI

—the beginning of exciting desserts, easy as can be! without baking, fudge-rich and delicious. Hot Fud you'll never make any other way—simply by melting pieces in PET Milk. Frozen Fudge Bars, an oh-boy desse smooth from your ice tray. Recipes No. 1, No. 2 and N to make cake layers something special, our nut-and- Butterscotch Filling and Frosting uses butterscotch pi PET—the milk with the rich thickness of cream. Reci finals there were only three entries oung Englishman riding a gray Irish a Johannesburg girl riding a bay mare Kitty, and Helen. The Irish hunter t 5'10". He cleared it but, being a vas careless and hit the pole with his d hoof. That put him out. Both the he bay and Helen cleared it.

irl said, "Funny us both being girls ng mares."

said, "Yes," but didn't think it irl was slim and beautiful and could e bay mare was beautiful. The girl's and gear were beautiful. The girl's d breeches were beautiful. Her boots autiful. Her long slim thighs that the beautiful saddle on the beautiful re were beautiful. Helen hated her. was only this girl between her and of Lucy she did not own. She thought d have killed her; at least she under- w why people were killed: they were utiful. All those actresses that were d in the Sunday papers.

atted Lucy's neck.

eet eleven inches. It was the girl again. ame was listed as Georgina Haslett, was just the girl to Helen. The girl it. Helen cleared it. Two men put up another notch—6'.

take it," the girl said. "My girth king."

one shouted to the judge. He shouted man ran up to explain. He put his o the mike.

name is Miss Helen Blackett" came air as if God had shouted it.

girl, Helen thought. She's afraid. nothing wrong with her girth. And I am ix feet was so high. As high as daddy. nuch more than an inch higher than She tried to remember the world's mp: 6'6", she thought. Only 6" more. was cantering slowly toward the two d-white posts that supported the bar. The closer they got, the higher it seemed to Helen. Then her courage came back.

"It's for you, Lucy." she said.

The mare laid one ear back to listen. Then she cocked it forward and switched her tail. She seemed to think this was fun. This was real jumping. She slowed up a little as she felt Helen climbing up her neck.

"N-n-now," Helen shouted. "Now, Lucy!" and they were off. One—two great bounds that were almost leaps and they were airborne.

Helen came right up higher than Lucy's head. She could look down on her forehead and the star. She noticed the way her forelock, divided into two as usual, was blowing back. She saw the white faces of the people in the grandstand and then she slid back. They had done it. She patted Lucy and the crowd roared.

Now let her try, Helen thought. Let that girl and her damn bay mare do it. She was surprised at herself. She had never said "damn" before.

But the girl did not do it. She was afraid and the mare knew it. The bay never even came up, but struck the bar with her chest.

Everyone was around them now: daddy and mother and Smitty and old Herman and Mr. Lonstein. They all went up with her. like a deputation, to get her cup, the check in an envelope, and a blue ribbon for Lucy.

She'd done it. It was over.

"You're famous," someone said.

"Fancy a kid winning the Rand Show high jump!"

But Helen hardly heard them. What she did hear was Smitty, who said, "I've got crutches for you, Helen. I'm sure you can use them now," and he slipped them under her arms as he helped her down from the horse. He held her till she got her balance and she found she could use them. Her left leg would support her if someone held her belt.

They stayed two more days. Her left leg could support her. The right was still weak, but she could get about on her own and had seen most of the show again. Everyone knew her and liked her. Most of them had seen her jump Old Lucy.

She was eating an ice-cream cone when a stableboy ran up to her. She knew him well by sight, a boy called Franz. He looked after two other jumpers.

"Missis! Missis!" he shouted. "Come quick. The man," he said. "Ja, the baas, he's trying to jump her and she won't. Then he hit her with his sjambok."

Helen looked at him wide-eyed, wiping the ice cream from her mouth.

"Jumping? Jumping who?"

"Die missis se perd," he said. "Your horse, Old Lucy. Man he struck her, and your boy is killed."

Before he had finished Helen was off, hopping toward the practice jumps like a wounded rabbit. A man trying to jump Old Lucy. Herman was dead. He had tried to stop it. The man had hit him. He'd hit Lucy.

The blood boiled in her veins. Suddenly she knew that she had never been angry in life before. Not like this. I said damn, she thought. She said it again. Damn him! Damn him! A murderer! Beating Old Lucy, and old Herman dead!

He —— She increased her pace. Coming around the side of the stables she saw him—a big redheaded young man on Old Lucy's back, trying to force her over a jump that she had refused. Her mouth was bleeding from the heavy bit he had put into her mouth, and she had a curd of froth and foam on her chest.

"I'll teach you," he said. "Ja, you damn lazy skelm." He raised his whip and brought it down on Old Lucy's quarters. She laid her ears back and showed the whites of her eyes, but did not move. The man jumped off, holding the riem in his hands, and began to thrash the mare.

Without knowing how she did it, Helen was running. She had let one crutch fall and charged the man, using the other like a bayonet. She struck the man in the side. As he turned to face her, Old Lucy pulled free and swung around to her mistress' side.

"What the hell!" the man shouted.

"My horse," Helen hissed at him. "You dared to hit my horse. And my boy." Old Herman was not dead. He hobbled toward her.

"I was just teaching her," the man said. "A horse must learn to respect a man—a woman too. Magtig, never before has a woman struck me. Never before ——"

He did not finish. The crutch point took him in the throat. He went down and Helen beat at him as if he were a snake.

He got up and tried to seize her arm. Old Lucy chopped at him. Then with a flash of teeth and flaring nostrils she took him by the collar of his coat and shook him like a rat.

By now a crowd was around them, white and black, visitors, owners, grooms.

"Like a bloody rat," a man said. "I've heard a horse could lift a man in his teeth, but I've never seen it."

Helen was sobbing, with her arms around Old Lucy's neck. Old Herman was patting her shoulder. "Drunk," he said. "Ja, he was drunk. I tried to stop him and he hit me flat."

It was all a nightmare, a dream. It wasn't true. The mare pushed her nose into her chest. Helen pulled her ears and rubbed her poll, kneading it with her fingers. Then she looked down and saw her crutch on the ground. It had been broken in the scuffle.

What'll I do? she thought. How will I get about, and where is the other one? Then it dawned on her. She was standing. She had run. She had fought a man. She had won a hundred guineas and could buy Lucy back. I can walk, she thought, and Lucy's mine. That she had won a great competition was forgotten. The little Helen that her mother loved was back.

Helen was standing crying bitterly, her arms wound around her horse's neck, when Grace and Johnnie found her. END

WS! PET WHIPS WITHOUT CHILLING,

asily as cream—right from your pantry shelf, in these recipes devel- d in the PET Milk kitchens. No separate beating, either—everything ps in one bowl. Coffee Bavarian is cool and satin-smooth, the coffee or enhanced with a garnish of chocolate curls. Creamy Chiffon Whip ny fruit-gelatin flavors can heap a pie shell, fill shortcake cups arfait glasses as deliciously as any ever made with expensive, calorie- n whipping cream. Read our easy recipes No. 7 and No. 6.

You see Strawberry Fruit Freeze in the making, above. Again PET whips at room temperature—with frozen fruit and powdered sugar. When it's light and whipped-creamy, freeze without stirring. Recipe No. 11.

ONLY PET MILK ASSURES SUCCESS —"thin" milk would never do in these superb recipes. Every one is sweet and simple. Every one depends on PET Evaporated Milk—the creamiest form of milk with twice the country cream in every drop. Try them and discover what's been woman-talk for many years: Whatever would good cooks do without PET!

"PET"—Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. Copr., 1960, Pet Milk Co.

1885 · 1960 PET 75TH ANNIVERSARY

NORTHAM WARREN: NEW YORK • MONTREAL • LONDON • PARIS • COLOGNE
STOCKHOLM • MADRID • MILAN • RIO DE JANEIRO • BUENOS AIRES • MONTEVIDEO

Senhora Julieta Pereira Estrela, Rio socialite, with her debutante daughter, Senhorita Gilda Maria

Senhora Julieta Estrela says: "Why do so many of my friends choose Odo-ro-no? Because they've found through personal experience that Odo-ro-no keeps them feeling sweet and fresh—even in the warm Rio climate."

Yes, in Rio, as in most world fashion capitals, gentle new Odo-ro-no is the largest selling deodorant. Lastingly effective, yet so kind to your skin. So safe, too, for your loveliest gowns and for your filmiest lingerie. Discover the excellence of Odo-ro-no for yourself—in cream, stick or spray.

did you know ODO·RO·NO is the leading deodorant in Rio?

My child has a Teacher

The richest gift our schools offer is not books or buildings, but good teachers.

By NEAL GILKYSON STUART

Alfy is ten years old and in the fifth grade. He knows that t tiny hairs on the rootlets of a germinating rye plant grow total of three miles a day, and that a robin's feet were made for perc ing on tree branches, while a hawk's claws are for picking things u

He knows that India, isolated from other lands by oceans and hi mountains, was "a quiet country" (in contrast to warlike Persi and the right place for Buddhism to develop (he knows the Buddh Eightfold Path, too, and has read parts of the Gita, which is mo than I have done). He knows the really important difference betwe the Ionians, who founded Athens, and the Dorians, who found Sparta. Here is an excerpt from his copybook:

"Archilochus, a young man from the Isle of Paros, joined Ionian army which was fighting in Thrace. Things got too tough f him, so he took to his heels and ran, then wrote:

'Some lucky Thracian has my noble shield,
I had to run. I dropped it in a wood.
But I got clear away, thank Zeus!
So, hang the shield! I'll get another just as good.'

"Would a Spartan ever write such a thing about a shield? Wou a Spartan ever write?"

Those last two lines are pure Mr. Kirk, his teacher at Kimbert Farms School. Mr. Kirk is a tall young man, well able to handle bas ball and gym in the afternoons (he's a former track man himsel but no one would look into his sensitive, thoroughly nice face a call him the athletic type. I don't know many particulars about hi but the ones I do know add up. He made a trip to India as a ve young man. He and his wife have adopted two little girls from Pea Buck's Welcome House, the older part Japanese, the baby part Ea Indian. They have bought a farm miles and miles out in our Easte Pennsylvania countryside, and he dreams of someday establishi his own school for boys there. His wife, whom I have never me wrote Alfy a thank-you letter for his Christmas-gift subscription f the Ladies' Home Journal—a vivid three-page letter describing t excitement of being snowed in (deer were in their back yard looki for food), showing so much warmth and imagination that only a ra person could have written it. I have an idea that Mr. Kirk's ov mind is constantly waylaid by the remarkable things in the worl and that no other profession than that of waylaying the minds oung, startling them with all the things s, could conceivably make him happy.

y knows what Heraclitus thought about e orld, and he knows Socrates' prayer to y heart ("Beloved Pan and all ye other who haunt this place, give me beauty in e ward soul . . ."), but he can also handle ers as nimbly as the Mesopotamians, who e learned this year) hadn't invented mul- tation tables, and multiplied by the most ng method of adding and subtracting a small boy could proudly learn and nstrate to his mother.
. Kirk founded an arithmetic club, the ership requirement being that the boy or each the others something new. Alfy d for a slide rule and spent the next few ngs teaching himself how to multiply and with it. Another boy taught the club how l square roots, and for days Alfy invented e-root problems for himself. This was urricular, you understand. For fun.
. Kirk invents charming arithmetic prob- using the names of the children in the in which the girls bake enormous cakes ing 32 eggs (some drop on the floor) and picnic lunches involving 9⅞ jars of pea-

THOUGHTS FOR A NAP

By KATE BARNES

he wild poppies grow by the river,
The hills are full of sheep,
nong the shadows of the rocks
Gray lizards creep.

hite sky and white dust
And cattle lying down,
he river running very small,
The hills all shimmering brown.

mmer lies across the land
In a dreaming tide of noon
d sheep like stones drift among stones
Where the wild doves croon.

atter, and the boys build tree houses. ("It 428 swings of the hammer for Calvin to the first nail in. He then had 17⅞ blisters s left hand and 34¾ on his right.")
. Kirk, to my certain knowledge, had no le keeping his class alert for most of the He told them in the fall that one day, day in the coming year he would stand certain spot, point to a certain place on ackboard, and tell them a story about an . Anyone who spotted him when the nt came would be allowed to stand s desk and wave his hand. The reward unprecedented and delightful that Alfy to bed every school night for six months ering if Mr. Kirk would do it tomor- I could imagine the entire class watch- m like hawks. He was as good as his word pring, and I understand the whole class gleeful few minutes on their desk tops.
. Kirk gives a great deal of thought to his tional theories, and wants the parents of ildren to understand them. He has visited and when something is on his mind that n no longer hold back he mimeographs conversational, sometimes quite funny . He wrote one at the time our children the national standard achievement tests, ning that he did not really believe in ple-choice tests himself, and he would we didn't take them too seriously either. rote another, asking, "How many of emember who fought the Peloponne- War?" This was by way of explaining in certain "idea" subjects (geography, y, science), his chief aim was to leave hildren with a memory of joyful in- , with mastery of facts secondary, but n others, which he called the "skill sub-jects" (reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic), competence was his first aim, with enjoyment second.

We received no bare statistics by mail from him on our children's ranking in the national tests. Those who wanted the figures were invited to come see Mr. Kirk personally and confer about the whole child. On the other hand, he does not mark from charity. Alfy has unshakable faith in Mr. Kirk's fairness and high standards, and will spend half an hour doing over a botany lesson because of a blot at the bottom of a page. He knows: he got a C in history in one quarter because, although he had done the work adequately, he had been careless about keeping up his notebook—the tangible evidence of work completed which each child is expected to keep not only up to date but visually attractive.

The new crafts teacher said to me in her first week, "Ah, Alfy's in Mr. Kirk's class. That's the only class I have sorted out yet. It's the best behaved, you see." Alfy says, "There was another fight at recess today. Gosh, why do the other grades always have to get in fights? In our class we all like each other. Mr. Kirk says cliques are silly."

The words "Mr. Kirk says" are a refrain often heard from Alfy. "Mr. Kirk says the purpose of man is to be conscious." . . . "Mr. Kirk says you shouldn't be wishy-washy with your teacher. If he says, 'Trains have wings,' he doesn't want us to say, 'Yes, teacher, oh yes, teacher.' He wants us to say, 'I don't think so. This is what I think.'" . . . "Mr. Kirk says nowadays everybody spends their free time looking at television, but in the old days they used to get together and talk about things. That's what we do in our class, we talk about things. We're like a Greek academy."

There's just one postscript to add to this a remark of a board member, said with a sign: "How we all wish we could pay our faculty a living wage!" END

New medicated beauty care gives you a Complete Complexion Clean-up!

It's 3 ways better for your skin!

1 Cleans up dirt.
Cleans like soap, but it's better because it doesn't dry skin. Put Noxzema on, wash it off with a wet facecloth. It's greaseless, washes off with water. It leaves your skin "soap-and-water" clean, but not dried out or drawn.

2 Cleans up dry skin.
Softens like cream, but it's never "butter-y," never greasy. Doesn't clog pores. Helps your skin stay moist, helps fight dry skin as only a moisturizing cream can . . . leaves skin feeling "cream-soft," but so clean and fresh.

3 Cleans up blemishes.*
Helps clear skin because it's medicated. Five medicinal ingredients help heal *surface blemishes fast. Regular beauty care with Noxzema Skin Cream helps "wake up" a dull, lifeless complexion to new glowing vitality.

Makes your skin look lovely —even without make-up!

Imagine you with a skin so fresh and clear and radiant! Regular Noxzema beauty care gives you a complete complexion clean-up every day.

Use Noxzema for cleansing, a make-up base, a night cream. See a beautiful difference in days. Get Noxzema Skin Cream today.

MEDICATED • GREASELESS

*surface blemishes

Beautiful Hair

B R E C K

A SPECIAL BEAUTY OFFER - CREME RINSE WITH A BRECK SHAMPOO MAKES HAIR EASY TO MANAGE, LEAVES IT SOFT AND LUSTROUS

Breck Creme Rinse, used after the shampoo, gives added softness, lustre and manageability to your hair. It takes only a minut and eliminates snarls, tangles and fly-away hair. Breck Creme Rinse leaves your hair soft, easy to comb and arrange

1. Shampoo and rinse

2. Apply Creme Rinse

3. Rinse with clear water

4. Hair combs out easily

5. New softness and lustre

Enjoy fragrant Breck Creme Rinse after your next shampoo; it is especially helpful in the care of dry, damaged hair

A 2½ oz. Breck Creme Rinse with a $1.00 bottle of one of the Three Breck Shampoos – for dry, oily or normal hair – both for $1.00 plus 3¢ fed. tax

JOHN H BRECK INC · MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS · SPRINGFIELD 3 MASSACHUSETTS

Copyright 1960 by John H. Breck Inc.

E MISTRESS
MELLYN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 71

nked her and said, "You have always ch a good friend to me."
as so grateful that at last the child had governess who really understood her." d, "I thought Miss Jansen did that."
ss Jansen, yes. We all thought so. It was he was not honest. Perhaps, though, it e temptation of a moment. I did all I o help her."
r had come up. He took my hand and it lightly. Connan's look of displeasure ny heart beat fast with happiness, and I hamed of my suspicions.
tunate Connan," cried Peter exuber-'No need to tell you how much I envy there! I've brought over Jacinth. I told
I make you a present of her, didn't I?
she's my wedding present. You can't to that."
oked at Conan. "A present for us
I said.
, no," said Peter. "She's for you. I'll of something else for Con."
ank you, Peter," I said. "It's generous
."
uldn't bear the thought of her going to else. I feel sentimental about that mare.
a good home for her. You know I'm t the end of next week."
soon?"
erything has been speeded up. There's nt in delaying further." He looked at nificantly. "Now," he added.
w that Kitty, who was serving us with was listening with all attention.
stine was talking to Connan, and Peter n: "So it's you and Con after all. Well, keep him in order, Miss Leigh. I'm sure t."
m not going to be his governess, you
"
n not sure. Once a governess, always a ess. I thought Alvean seemed not dis-d by the new arrangement."
nink she's going to accept me."
nink you're an even greater favorite than ansen was."
or Miss Jansen! I wonder what became
."
leste did something for her. She was worried about the poor girl, I think."
, I'm so glad."
lped her to find another place—with riends of ours, actually. The Merrivales, ave a place on the edge of Dartmoor. I r how our gay Miss Jansen likes Hood-Manor. Finds it a bit dull, I should imagith Tavistock, the nearest town, quite les away."
was very kind of Celestine to help her."
ell, that's Celestine all over." He lifted ass. "To your happiness, Miss Leigh.
henever you ride Jacinth, think of me."
hall."
d if," he went on, "you should change nind ——"
ised my eyebrows.
out marrying Connan, I mean. There'll ittle homestead waiting for you on the side of the world. You'll find me ever l, Miss Leigh."
ughed and sipped my wine.
next day Alvean and I went riding to-
, and I was mounted on Jacinth. She wonderful creature and I enjoyed every nt of the ride. I felt that this was another glorious things which were happening
. I even had my own mount now.

ball was a great success and I was sur-how ready the neighborhood was to t me. I felt that Connan's neighbors were ding one another that I was an educated woman and that my family background passably good. Perhaps those who were of him were relieved because he was ento be married, for they would not wish o be involved in the Treslyn scandal.
e day after the ball Connan had to go again on business.
neglected a great deal during our stay at ndstow," he said. "There were things I simply forgot to do. It is understandable. My mind was on other matters. I shall be away a week, I think, and when I come back it'll be but a fortnight before our wedding. You'll be getting on with your preparations, and, darling, if there's anything you want to do in the house—if there's anything you want to change—do say so. It mightn't be a bad idea to ask Celestine's advice; she's an expert on old houses."

I said I would, because it would please her, and I wanted to please her.

"She was kind to me right from the first," I said. "I shall always have a soft feeling for her."

He said good-by and drove off while I stood at my window, waving. I did not care to do so from the porch because I was still a little shy of the servants.

When I went out of my room I found Gilly standing outside the door. Since I had told her that I was to be Mrs. TreMellyn she had taken to following me around. I was beginning to understand the way her mind worked. She was fond of me in exactly the same way that she had been fond of Alice, and with the passing of each day the two of us became in her mind merged into one. Alice had disappeared from her life; she was going to make sure that I did not.

"Hello, Gilly," I said.

She dropped her head in that characteristic way of hers and laughed to herself. Then she put her hand in mine and I led her back to my room.

"Well, Gilly," I said, "in three weeks I am going to be married, and I am the happiest woman in the world."

I was really trying to reassure myself, for sometimes talking to Gilly was like talking to oneself.

I thought of what Connan had said about altering anything I wished to in the house, and remembered that there were some parts of it which I had not even seen yet.

Summer is the time of roses, and the floribunda roses are abundant, even in the small garden. Here—set off in a simple white vase—are floribundas shading from deep crimson to shell pink. Scarlet petunias and a few delphinium complete the picture.

By JANET COTTIER

Summer Flowers from a small garden

A blaze of flowers—reds, yellows and pinks—is the signature of the summer garden.

JOSEPH DI PIETRO

The warm colors of zinnias bring the glow of outdoors to the shady corners of the house. Above—stripped of their often rather shabby leaves and mixed with viburnum foliage—a variety of red and pink zinnias makes a pleasing bouquet in a lined wicker basket. At left, yellow marigolds, wonderfully long-lasting even in the heat, in a copy of an old Etruscan vase.

I suddenly thought of Miss Jansen and what I had been told about her having a different room from the one I occupied. I had never seen Miss Jansen's room and decided that I would go now and inspect it. I need have no qualms now about going to any part of the house I wished.

"Come along, Gilly," I said. "We'll go and see Miss Jansen's room."

She trotted along contentedly by my side, and I thought how much more intelligent she was than people realized, for it was she who led me to Miss Jansen's room.

There was nothing very unusual about it. It was smaller than mine. But there was a rather striking mural. I was looking at this when Gilly tugged at my arm and drew me close to it. She pulled up a chair and stood on it. Then I understood. There, in this wall, was a peep like that in the solarium. I looked through it and saw the chapel. It was, of course, a different view from that to be seen from the solarium, as it was from the opposite side.

Gilly looked at me, delighted to have shown me the peep. We went back to my room, and clearly she did not want to leave me.

I could see that she was apprehensive. I understood, of course. Her somewhat confused mind had so clearly associated me with Alice that she expected me to disappear as Alice had done. She was determined to keep an eye on me so that this should not happen.

All through the night a southwest gale was blowing in from the sea. The rain which came with it was driven horizontally against our windows, and even the solid foundations of Mount Mellyn seemed to shake. It was one of the wettest nights I had known since my arrival in Cornwall.

The next day the rain continued; everything in my room—the mirrors, the furniture—was misty with damp. It was what happened often enough, Mrs. Polgrey told me, when the southwest wind came bringing rain with it, which it invariably did.

Alvean and I could not go out riding that day.

By the following morning the skies had cleared a little, and the heavy rain gave way to a light drizzle. Lady Treslyn called, but I did not see her. She did not ask for me; it was Mrs. Polgrey who told me she had called and that she had wished to see Connan.

"She seemed very distressed," said Mrs. Polgrey. "She'll not rest until this terrible business is over."

I felt sure that Lady Treslyn had come over to talk to Connan about his engagement to me and that she was probably distressed because he was not at home.

Celestine Nansellock also called. We had a chat about the house. She said she was so pleased because I was becoming very interested in Mount Mellyn.

"Not only as a home," she said, "but as a house." She went on: "I have some old documents about Mount Mellyn and Mount Widden. I'll show them to you one day."

"You must help me," I told her. "It'll be fun discussing things together."

"You'll make some changes?" she asked.

"If I do," I assured her, "I shall ask your advice."

She left before luncheon, and in the afternoon Alvean and I went down to the stables for the horses.

We stood by while Billy Trehay saddled them for us.

"Jacinth be frisky today, Miss," he told me.

"It's because she had no exercise yesterday." I stroked her muzzle and she rubbed against my hand to show she shared my affection.

We took our usual ride down the slope, past the cove and Mount Widden; then we went along the cliff path. The view here was particularly beautiful with the jagged coast stretched out before us and Rame Head lying in the water, hiding Plymouth and its Sound from view.

Some of the paths were narrow, cut into the cliffs at spots where it had been convenient to do so. Up and down we went; sometimes we were almost down to the sea, at others we climbed high.

It was not very easy going, for the rain had whipped up the mud and I began to feel a little anxious about Alvean. She sat firmly in her saddle—no novice now—but I was conscious of Jacinth's mood and I expected Black Prince's was not much different, although, of course, he hadn't Jacinth's fiery temperament. At times I had to rein her in firmly; a gallop would have been more to her taste than this necessarily slow careful walk along paths which were a good deal more dangerous than when we had come this way on our last ride.

There was one spot on this cliff path which was particularly narrow: above the path loomed the cliff face, dotted with bushes of gorse and brambles; below it, the cliff fell almost sheer to the sea. The path was safe enough ordinarily; but I felt a little nervous about Alvean's using it on a day like this.

I noticed that some of the cliff had fallen in places. This was continually happening. Tapperty had often said that the sea was gradually claiming the land, and that in his grandfather's day there had been a road which had now completely disappeared.

I thought of turning back, but if we did I would have to explain my fears to Alvean;

RITUAL

By ELIZABETH GRAHAM

Early summer morning,
  Golden in its luster,
Girls not half awake
  Meet in petal cluster;

Put Baby in a Cradle,
  Circle Round the Moon—
Giggle over jacks
  Till it feels like noon.

Gather up the game
  And Last Tag for home,
Find a strange true
  In a hum-paper comb.

Four-o'clocks and daisies
  For a honey-jar bouquet,
Hide-and-Seek, Red Rover,
  First Star I Wish I May.

Take a Giant Step,
  Bend a bough for plums,
And gather up the game
  When night comes.

and I did not want to do this while she was mounted.

No, I thought, we'll continue on this path until we can climb to the top road. Then we'll go home a roundabout way, but on firm land.

We had come to that danger spot and I noticed that the ground was even more slippery here, and that there had been a bigger fall of cliff than I had seen on other portions of the path.

I held Jacinth in and walked her slowly in front of Alvean and Black Prince, for we naturally had to go in single file.

I pulled up and looked over my shoulder, saying, "We're going very slowly along here. You just follow."

Then I heard it. I turned quickly as the boulder came tumbling down, bringing in its wake shale, turf and vegetation. It passed within a few inches of Jacinth. I stared, in fascinated horror, as it went hurtling down to the sea.

Jacinth reared. She was terrified and ready to plunge anywhere—over the cliff, down to the sea—to escape what had startled her.

It was fortunate for me that I was an experienced rider, and that Jacinth and I knew each other so well. Thus it was all over in a matter of seconds. I had her under control. She grew calm as I began to talk to her in a voice which was meant to be soothing but which shook a little.

"Miss! What happened?" It was Alvean.

"It's all over," I answered, trying to speak lightly. "You managed perfectly."

"Why, Miss, I thought Black Prince was going to start a gallop."

He would, I thought, if Jacinth had.

I was terribly shaken and afraid to show it, either to Alvean or to Jacinth.

I suddenly felt the need to get off that dangerous path immediately. I glanced nervously up and said, "It's not safe to be on these paths, after the weather we've been having."

I don't know what I expected to see up there, but I was staring at the thickest of the bushes. Did I see a movement there, or did I imagine it? It would be easy for someone to hide up there. What if a boulder had become dislodged by the recent rains? What an excellent opportunity if someone wanted to be rid of me. It merely had to be rolled down at that moment when I was on the path—a perfect target. Alvean and I had made a habit of coming along this path at a certain time.

I shivered and said, "Let's get on. We'll get onto the top road and won't go back along the cliff path."

Alvean was silent; and when in a few minutes we were on the road she looked at me oddly. I saw that she was not unaware of the danger through which we had passed.

It was not until we were back in the house that I realized how alarmed I was. I was telling myself that a terrifying pattern was being formed. Alice had died; Sir Thomas Treslyn had died; and now I, who was to be Connan's wife, might easily have met my death on the cliff path this day.

I longed to tell Connan of my fears.

But I was a sensible, practical woman. Was I going to refuse to look facts in the face because I was afraid of what I might see there if I did so?

Suppose Connan had not really gone away. Suppose he had wanted an accident to happen to me while he was believed to be away from home. I thought of Lady Treslyn at the Christmas ball. I thought of her beauty, her sensuous, voluptuous beauty. Connan had admitted that she had been his mistress. Had been? Was it possible that anyone, knowing her, could want me?

The proposal had been so sudden. It had come at a time when his mistress' husband was about to be exhumed.

It was small wonder that the practical governess had become a frightened woman.

To whom could I go for help?

There was Peter or Celestine—only those two, I thought. No, I could not betray these terrible suspicions of Connan to them. It was bad enough that I entertained them myself.

Don't panic, I cautioned myself. Be calm. Think of something you can do.

I thought of the house, vast and full of secrets, a house in which it was possible to peep from certain rooms into others. There might be peeps as yet undiscovered. Who could say? Perhaps someone was watching me now.

I thought of the peep in Miss Jansen's room, and that set me thinking of her sudden dismissal. Then I was saying to myself, Hoodfield Manor near Tavistock.

I wondered if Miss Jansen was still there. There was a good chance that she might be, for she must have gone there about the same time that I came to Mount Mellyn.

Why should I not try to meet her? She might have some light to throw on the secrets of this house.

I was desperately afraid, and at such times it is always comforting to take action.

I felt better when I had written the letter.

Dear Miss Jansen: I am the governess at Mount Mellyn and I have heard of you. I should so like to meet you. I wonder if that would be possible. If so, I should like our meeting to be as soon as you can manage it.

Yours sincerely,
MARTHA LEIGH.

I went out quickly to post the letter before I could change my mind. Then I tried to forget it.

I longed for a message from Connan. There was none. Each day I looked for his return. I thought, When he comes home I am going to tell him of my fears, because I must do so. I am going to tell him of what happened on th path. I am going to ask him to tell me the I am going to say to him, "Connan, why ask me to marry you? Was it because y me and want me to be your wife, or wa cause you wished to divert suspicion from self and Lady Treslyn?"

The devilish scheme which I had in seemed to gain credibility with every p moment.

I said to myself, Perhaps Alice died b dent, and that gave them the idea of r themselves of Sir Thomas, who was th obstacle to their marriage. Did they slip thing into his whisky? Why not? And it not have been merely by chance that the der came hurtling down at that preci ment. Now there was to be an exhumat Sir Thomas and the countryside knew relationship between Connan and Lady lyn. So Connan became engaged to th erness in order to divert suspicion. Th erness is now an obstacle even as Alic even as Sir Thomas was. So the gov could have an accident on her newly ac mare to which it might be said that she h yet grown accustomed.

Three days later there was a letter Miss Jansen, who said she was eager to me. She would be in Plymouth the foll day and if I would meet her at the White which was not far from the Hoe, we have luncheon together.

I told Mrs. Polgrey that I was going Plymouth to shop. That seemed pla enough, since my wedding was due to place in three weeks' time.

I made straight for the White Hart.

Miss Jansen was already there—a tremely pretty, fair-haired girl. She g me with pleasure and told me that Mrs. the innkeeper's wife, had said that we have luncheon together in a small ro our own.

We were conducted to this private roo there took stock of each other.

The innkeeper's wife talked with en asm of duck and green peas and roast but we were neither of us very interest food.

We ordered roast beef, I think it was as soon as we were alone, Miss Jansen "What do you think of Mount Mellyn?"

"It's a wonderful old place."

"One of the most interesting houses saw," she replied.

"I did hear from Mrs. Polgrey, I think old houses specially interest you."

"They do. I was brought up in one. ever, the family fortunes declined. That's happens to so many of us who become ernesses. I was sorry to leave Mount M You have heard why I went?"

"Y-yes," I said hesitantly.

"It was a very distressing affair. I was ously angry to be unjustly accused."

She was so frank and sincere that I bel her, and I made that clear.

She looked pleased; and then the foo brought in. As we sat eating it she told the affair.

"The Treslyns and the Nansellocks been having tea at the house. You kno Treslyns and the Nansellocks, of course

"Oh, yes."

"I mean, I expect you know quite about them. They are such friends of the ily, are they not?"

"Indeed yes."

"I had been treated rather specially." flushed slightly, and I thought, Yes, you pretty. Connan would have thought so. aware of a flash of not so much jealou uneasiness as I wondered whether in the to come I was going to be continually je of Connan's appreciation of the attra members of my sex.

She went on: "They had called me in t because Miss Nansellock wanted to ask questions about Alvean. She did dote o child. Does she still?"

"Indeed yes."

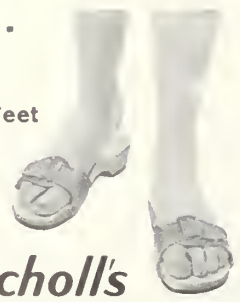
"She is such a kind person. I don't what I should have done without her."

"I am so glad somebody was kind to

CONTINUED ON PAG

Joy saves your hands for nicer things than dishwashing

At the piano or the bridge table, you know you're putting your best hands forward if you use Joy for dishwashing every day. It's different from other liquids. Joy has a mildness you can see on your hands...leaves them soft and pretty. That's because Joy is as mild as a bubble bath. Try Joy and see how it helps keep your hands nice, for all the nice things they have to do.



Mild as a bubble bath to your hands

JOY HAS A MILDNESS YOU CAN SEE ON YOUR HANDS

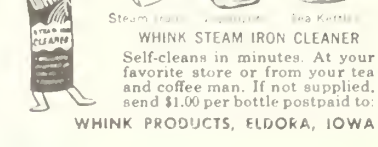
New soft plastic bottle

NOW...
Exercise, Strengthen, Comfort Your Feet WHILE YOU WALK, WORK or PLAY!

Dr. Scholl's
FOOT EXERCIZER SANDAL
For Men, Women and Children

Now—make every day a holiday for your feet this scientific, exhilarating, easy way of Dr. Scholl's. By exercising the toes and strengthening the muscles from toe to heel, tired, aching feet are relieved . . . sagging arches are lifted . . . fatigue from exertion is abated . . . elasticity of the foot is increased. All this WHILE YOU WALK in Dr. Scholl's Foot Exercizer Sandals for a short time each day! Adjustable straps for extra comfort. Men's, Women's, $9.95 pair. Children's, $7.95. At select Shoe, Dept. Stores and Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort Shops. Booklet sent on request. To order by mail send price with outline of both feet in standing position. State Men's or Women's.
DR. SCHOLL'S, Dept. 13F2, Chicago 10, Ill.

I'll Send You 2 Different Assortments of CHRISTMAS CARDS ON APPROVAL AND 4 LINES OF PERSONAL CHRISTMAS CARDS FREE



—and Show You How to Make $75 to $500 in Your Spare Time
Rush coupon for 2 sensational fast-selling Christmas Card Assortments on approval (21-card "Feature" and 21-card Regal Luster Ass'ts.) and FREE Samples Personal Christmas Cards. $5 money-makers: more Christmas Assortments (Golden Elegance, Religious, etc.), Everyday Assortments for birthdays, etc. Also Stationery, Novelty Gifts. Friends, neighbors order on sight. Keep up to 50c of every $1 you take in. No experience needed. Last year thousands of folks made $75 to $500 this easy way. Send the coupon below TODAY!
WALLACE BROWN, 11 East 26th St., Dept. F-9. New York 10, N.Y.

WALLACE BROWN, Inc., Dept. F-9
11 East 26th St., New York 10, N. Y.
Rush 2 Christmas Card Ass'ts. on approval—plus FREE Samples of Personal Christmas Cards & FREE Catalog.
Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

Barbecuing? Heroes are the outdoor chefs who use Adolph's for meat tenderness . . . Adolph's
ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT FROM ADOLPH'S RESEARCH KITCHENS

REMOVE CLOGGING SCALE with WHINK

WHINK STEAM IRON CLEANER
Self-cleans in minutes. At your favorite store or from your tea and coffee man. If not supplied, send $1.00 per bottle postpaid to:
WHINK PRODUCTS, ELDORA, IOWA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 100

"I think that she looks upon Alvean as her child. There was a rumor that Miss Nansellock's brother was the father of Alvean, which would make her Miss Nansellock's niece. Perhaps that is why ——"

"She certainly does feel strongly about Alvean."

"So I was called down to talk to her and I was given tea and chatted with them—as though I were a guest as they were. I think that Treslyn woman resented it—she resented my presence there altogether. Perhaps they were a little too attentive to me—I mean Mr. Peter Nansellock and Mr. TreMellyn. Lady Treslyn has a hot temper, I am sure. In any case, I believe she arranged the whole thing."

"She couldn't be so vile!"

"Oh, but I am sure she could. You see, she was wearing a diamond bracelet and the safety chain had broken. It had caught in the upholstery of the chair, I think. She said, 'I won't wear it. I'll take it down to old Pastern to get it repaired as soon as we leave.' She took it off and put it on the table. I left them at tea and went to the schoolroom to do some work with Alvean. It was while we were there that the door was thrown open and they all stood there looking at me accusingly.

"Lady Treslyn said something about having a search made because her diamond braeelet was missing. She was trueulent. One would have thought she was already the mistress of the house. Mr. TreMellyn said very kindly that Lady Treslyn was asking that my room be searched, and he hoped I would not object. I was very angry and I said, 'Come on, seareh my room. Nothing will satisfy me but that you should.'

"So we all went into my room, and there in a drawer, hidden under some of my things, was the diamond braeelet.

"Lady Treslyn said I was caught red-handed, and she was going to have me sent to prison. The others all pleaded with her not to make a scandal. Finally they agreed that if I went at once the matter would be forgotten. I was furious. I wanted an inquiry. But what could I do? They had found the thing there, and whatever I had to say aftcr that they wouldn't believe."

"It must have been terrible for you."

She leaned across the table and smiled in a kindly way. "You are afraid that they may do something similar to you. Lady Treslyn is determined to marry Connan TreMellyn."

"Do you think so?"

"I am sure there was something between them. He was, after all, a widower and not the sort of man, I think, to live without women."

I said, "I suppose he made advances to you?"

She shrugged her shoulder. "At least Lady Treslyn imagined I might be a menaee, and I am sure she ehose that way to get rid of me."

"What a foul ereature she is! But Miss Nanselloek was kind."

"Very kind. She was with them, of course, when they found the bracelet. And when I was paeking she came to my room. She said, 'I'm very distressed, Miss Jansen, that this should have happened. I know they found the bracelet in your drawer, but you didn't put it there, did you?' I said, 'Miss Nansellock, I swear I didn't.'

"I had very little money and I shall never forget her kindness to me. She asked where I was going and I gave her this address in Plymouth. She said, 'I know the Merrivales are going to want a governess in a month or so. I am going to see that you get that job.' She lent me some money, which I have now paid back, although she did not want me to do so; and that's how I lived until I went to the Merrivales'."

"Thank goodness there was someone to help."

"Heaven knows what would have beeome of me if she had not been there! Ours is a precarious profession, Miss Leigh. We are at the merey of our employers. No wonder so many of us beeome meek and downtrodden." She brightened. "I try to forget all that. I'm going to be married. He is a doetor who looks after the family. In six months my governessing days will be over."

"Congratulations! As a matter of faet I, too, am engaged to be married."

"How wonderful!"

"To Connan TreMellyn," I added.

She stared at me in astonishment. "Why-y," she stammered, "I wish you the best of luck."

I could see that she was a little embarrassed and trying to remember what she had said about Connan. I felt, too, that she thought I should need that good luck.

I could not explain to her that I would rather have one stormy year with Connan than a lifetime of peace with anyone else.

"I wonder," she said after a pause, "why you wanted to see me."

"It is because I had heard of you. They talk of you often. Alvean was fond of you and there are things I want to know."

"But you, who are soon to be a member of the family, will know so much more than I can tell you."

"What did you think of Gilly—Gillyflower?"

"Oh, poor little Gilly. A strange, Ophelia-like creature. I always felt that one day we should find her floating on the stream with rosemary in her hands."

"The ehild had a shock."

NEXT MONTH

"Henry," Belinda said quietly, "no one is going to understand, no one could possibly think it right—except us."

They were in love, deeply, truly. But Henry was already married—to a wife who was mentally ill.

Thus the very love that gave meaning to their existence bore always the threat of scandal and shame. They were intelligent people caught in a trap of hopeless circumstanee. Was there any way out for them?

ECHO ANSWERS

By MARGARET CULKIN BANNING

Complete in the September JOURNAL, condensed from the novel soon to be published by Harper & Bros.

"Yes; the first Mrs. TreMellyn's horse nearly trampled her to death."

"You must have gone there soon after the death of Mrs. TreMellyn "

"There were two others before me. I heard they left beeause the house was too spooky. A house couldn't be too spooky for me!"

"Oh, yes, you're an expert on old houses?"

"Expert! Indeed I'm not. I just love them. I've seen a great many and I've read a great deal about them."

"There was a peep in your room, Gilly showed it to me the other day."

"Do you know, I lived in that room three weeks without knowing it was there."

"I'm not surprised. The peeps are so cleverly concealed in the murals."

"That's an excellent way of doing it. Do you know those in the solarium?"

"Oh, yes."

"One overlooking the hall; the other, the chapel. I think there's a reason for that. You see, the hall and the chapel would be the most important parts of the house at the time it was built."

"You know a great deal about period and so on. At what period was Mount Mellyn built?"

"Late Elizabethan. At the time when people had to keep the presence of priests in their houses secret. I think that's why they had all these peeps."

"How interesting."

"Miss Nansellock is an expert on houses. That was something we had in common. Does she know we're meeting?"

"No one knows."

"You mean you came here without telling even your future husband?"

Confidenees trembled on my lips. I dered if I dared share them with this stra I wished it were Phillida sitting opposite Then I could have poured out my hea her; I could have listened to her advice, w I was sure would be good.

But although I had heard Miss Jan name mentioned so much since I had eon Mount Mellyn, she was still a stranger to I could not tell her.

"He is away on business," I said. "W to be married in three weeks' time."

"I wish you the best of luek. It must happened very suddenly."

"It was August when I went to the hou

"And you had never met before?"

"Living in the same house, one quickly to know people."

"Yes, I suppose that is so."

"And you yourself must have become gaged in almost as short a time."

"Oh, yes, but ——"

I knew what she was thinking. Her plea country doctor was a very different pe from the master of Mount Mellyn.

I went on quickly: "I wanted to meet because I believed you had been falsely cused. I am sure that many people at the h think that."

"I'm glad."

"When Mr. TreMellyn returns I shall him that I have seen you, and I shall a something can be done."

"It is of little consequenee now. Dr. combe knows what happened. He is ver dignant. But I have made him see tha good purpose could be served by bringin the matter again. If Lady Treslyn ever tri make more mischief, then something coul done. But she won't; her only desire was t rid of me, and that she did—quite effectiv

"What a wicked woman she is!"

"I know. But don't let's talk of it. You tell Miss Nansellock that you have me?"

"Yes, I will."

"Then tell her that I am engaged to Luscombe. She will be so pleased. there's something else I would like he know. Perhaps you'll be interested too, about the house. That house will soon be home, won't it? It's one of the most inte ing places I've ever seen."

"What were you going to tell me to pas to Miss Nansellock?"

"I've been doing a little researeh on a tecture, and my fiancé arranged for me t Cotehele, the Mount Edgeumbes' place. more like Mount Mellyn than any house ever seen. The chapel is almost identical, to the lepers' squint. But the squint at M Mellyn is much bigger and the construc of the walls is slightly different. As a matt fact, I've never seen a squint quite like th Mount Mellyn. Do tell Miss Nansellock. would be interested, I'm sure."

"I'll tell her. I expect she'll be more i ested to hear that you are so happy and you are going to marry."

"Don't forget to tell her, too, that I rem ber I owe it all to her. Give her my kin regards and my thanks."

"I will," I said.

We parted, and on my journey home I that I had obtained from Miss Jansen s fresh light on my problem.

There was no doubt that Lady Treslyn ranged for Miss Jansen's dismissal. Miss sen was very pretty indeed. Connan adm her and Alvean was fond of her. Con would eonsider marriage because he w want sons; and Lady Treslyn, possessive tigress, was not going to allow him to m anyone but herself.

I believed now that Lady Treslyn was p ning to remove me as she had removed Jansen; but beeause I was already engage Connan she would have to use more dr methods.

Connan did not know of this attempt on life. I refused to believe that of him and fusing, I felt a great deal happier.

Moreover, I had made up my mind. W Connan came back I was going to tell everything—all I had discovered, all I feared.

The decision brought me great comfort days passed and still Connan had not l.

Nansellock came over to say good-by.
leaving that night for London on his join the ship which would carry him ralia.
tine was with him when he came to say . They thought Connan would have l by now. As a matter of fact, while re there a letter arrived from Connan.
coming back if possible late that night;
as early as possible next day. I felt lously happy.
e them tea, and as we talked I men-Miss Jansen. I saw no reason why I not do so in front of Peter, because it who had told me that Celestine had er a job with the Merrivales.
t Miss Jansen the other day," I began.
were both startled. "But how?" asked ote and asked her to meet me."

it made you do that?" asked Celes-l, she had lived here, and there was a about her, and I thought it would be interesting, so, as I was going to th ——"

harming creature," mused Peter.
You'll be pleased to hear that she's to be married."
interesting," cried Celestine, her face pink. "I'm delighted."
he local doctor," I added.
ll make an excellent doctor's wife," lestine.
husband's male patients will all be in h her," put in Peter.

tory records that France had y-nine kings, of which number y three were loved by their sub-ts. Those three were the only gs who had been raised by their thers, the others being reared private tutors, and governesses.

CHARLES ALLEN AND C. L. WALLIS

t could be disconcerting," I replied.
good for business," murmured Peter.
e send us greetings?"
icularly to your sister." I smiled at
e. "She is so grateful to you; you were ful to her. She says she'll never forget."
as nothing. I could not let that woman she did and stand by doing nothing."
think Lady Treslyn deliberately that theft? I know Miss Jansen does."
re is not a doubt of it," said Celestine at an unscrupulous woman she must lieve that to be so."

l, Miss Jansen is happy now, so good ut of evil. By the way, I have a special for you. It's about the house."
at house?" asked Celestine with great

one. Miss Jansen has been to Cotehele been comparing their squint, in the with ours. She says ours is quite really! That's very interesting."
"
bigger, she says—I mean ours is. And something about the construction of ls."
stine is aching to go down and have at it," said Peter.
miled at me. "We'll look at it together
ne. You're going to be the mistress of se, so you ought to take an interest becoming more and more interested.

ng to ask you to teach me lots about miled at me warmly. "I'll be glad."

ed Peter what train he was catching, answered that it would be the ten from St. Germans. ride to the station," he said, "and he horse there. The baggage has gone ad. I shall go alone. I don't want any rewells at the station. After all, I shall bt be home this time next year—with a fortune. Au revoir, Miss Leigh," he went on. "I'll come back one day. And if you do feel like coming with me—it's not too late even now."

He spoke flippantly, and his eyes were full of mischief. I wondered what he would say if I suddenly agreed to his proposal, if I suddenly told him that I was filled with terrible doubts about the man I had promised to marry.

I went down to the porch to say my last farewells. The servants were there, for he was a great favorite. I guessed that he had bestowed many a sly kiss on Daisy and Kitty, and they were sad to see him go.

He looked very handsome in the saddle, and beside him Celestine seemed insignificant.

We stood waving to them.

His last words were, "Don't forget, Miss Leigh—if you should change your mind!"

Everybody laughed and I joined with them. I think we all felt a little sad that he was going.

As we were going back into the house Mrs. Polgrey said to me, "Miss Leigh, could I have a word with you?"

"Certainly. Shall I come to your room?"

She led the way there. "I've just had word," she said. "The result of the autopsy. Death through natural causes."

I felt floods of relief sweeping over me. "Oh, I'm so pleased about that."

"So are we all. I can tell you, I didn't like the things that were being said—and him dying after he'd had supper here."

"It seems as though it was all a storm in a teacup," I said.

"Something like that, Miss Leigh. But there you are—people talk and something has to be done."

"Well, it must be a great relief to Lady Treslyn."

She looked a little embarrassed and I guessed she was wondering what she had said to me in the past about Connan and Lady Treslyn. It must have been disconcerting to discover that I was going to be Connan's wife. I decided to sweep aside her embarrassment forever, and said:

"I hoped you were going to offer me a cup of your special Earl Grey."

She was pleased and rang for Kitty.

We talked of household affairs while the kettle boiled. When the tea was made she tentatively brought out the whisky and when I nodded and a teaspoonful was put into each cup, I felt we had indeed resumed the old friendly relationship.

I was glad, because I could see this made her happy, and I wanted everyone about me to be as happy as I was.

I kept telling myself, If Lady Treslyn really did attempt to kill me by sending that boulder crashing down in front of me when I was mounted on Jacinth, Connan knew nothing about it. Sir Thomas died a natural death, so there was nothing to hide; he had no reason to ask me to marry him except the one which he gave me: he loves me.

It was nine o'clock and the children were in bed. It had been a warm and sunny day and there were signs of spring everywhere.

Connan was coming home either tonight or tomorrow and I was happy. I wondered what time he would arrive. Perhaps at midnight. I went to the porch to look for him, because I had imagined I heard horses' hoofs in the distance.

I waited. The night was still. The house always seemed very quiet at times like this, for all the servants would be in their own quarters.

I guessed that Peter would be on his way to the station by now. It was strange to think that I might never see him again. I thought of our first meeting in the train; he had begun by playing his mischievous tricks on me even then.

Then I saw someone coming toward me. It was Celestine, and she had come by way of the woods, not along the drive as usual.

She was rather breathless. "Why, hello," she said. "I came to see you. I felt so lonely. Peter's gone. It's rather sad to think that I shan't see him for a long time."

"It does make one sad."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 105

Now! Scotkins in Color!

You're an artist . . . blending Scotkins' exclusive new colors! You're inspired . . . creating new table settings, making table magic every day! And with each lustrous shade comes rich linen-like texture, linen-like strength. Scotkins® don't shred, don't fall apart . . . just one lasts the meal. Look for new colored Scotkins in luncheon size. Traditional white, too, in luncheon and dinner sizes. All in the bright new Scotkins box. Scotkins also made and sold in Canada

ONLY WHOLE KERNELS IN LIQUID GIVE SUCH KETTLE-COOKED FRESHNESS

When you cook fresh corn in your own kitchen, you cook it in liquid. And unlike so mu other whole kernel corn, that's the way Del Monte Family Style Whole Kernels are pack and cooked, in liquid. That means a younger, sweeter flavor—a kettle-cooked freshness. T liquid makes the kernels easier for you to heat, too—even keeps leftovers juicy, bright, a fresh-tasting. Discover this better way to buy whole kernel corn—Del Monte® Family Sty

NT UED FROM PAGE 103

H layed the fool a great deal, of course,
I very fond of him. Now I've lost both br hers."
Co e in," I said.
Co naan's not back, I suppose?"
N I don't think he can possibly be here or midnight. He wrote that he had busis attend to this morning. Won't you he ?"
D you know, I rather hoped you'd be he D you?"
I nted to have a look at the chapel—
s int, you know. Ever since you gave me s nsen's message I've been eager to see c n't say so in front of Peter. He's apt au at my enthusiasm."
D ou want to have a look at it now?"
Y please. I've got a theory about it.
re ay be a door in the paneling which s another part of the house. Wouldn't e in if we could discover it and tell in about it when he arrives?"
Y " I agreed, "it would."
L s go now, then."
Ve ent through the hall, and as we did so ri d up at the peep, because I had an un-ny eeling that we were being watched. I ag I saw a movement up there, but I was st , and said nothing.
Ve vent along to the end of the hall, ou the door, down the stone steps, and e the chapel.
h lace smelled damp. I said, "It smells ugh it hasn't been used for years." And v e echoed weirdly through the place.
e tine did not answer. She had lighted the candles which stood on the altar.
it ed the long shadow which the flickerfi t threw against the wall.
L s get into the squint," she said.
r gh this door. There is another door in st int itself which opens onto the walled de That was the way the lepers used to ea."
h arried the candle high and I found that
we in a small chamber.
T s is the place," I said, "which is bigger
th ost of its kind."
h did not answer. She was pressing difn parts of the wall. I watched her long e at work.

u enly she turned and smiled at me. "I've a had a theory that somewhere in this s here is a priest's hole—you know, the ey ole of the resident priest into which he it l when the queen's men arrived. As a t of fact, I know that one TreMellyn did wi h the idea of becoming a Catholic. I'll a here is a priest's hole somewhere. Con-co uld be delighted if we found it. . . . It wi be the best wedding present I could gi m." She hesitated, and her voice was wi ith excitement. "Just a minute—there's so ing here."
c ne close to her, and caught my breath in mazement, for the panel had moved inan nd shown itself as a long, narrow door.
sh urned to look at me. Her eyes were brilit ith excitement. She put her head inside ap erture and was about to go forward sh he said, "No, you first. It's going to be yo ouse. You should be the first to enter it."
sh caught her excitement. I stepped ahead in and was aware of an unrecognizable, sli ht odor.
I said, "Have a quick look. It's probably ho ul in there. Careful. There are probably ra She held the candle high, and I saw we ere two of them. I went down those ste and as I did so the door shut behind me.
"C lestine!" I cried in terror. But there was a wer. "Open that door," I screamed. But I ice was caught and imprisoned in the dr ss, and I knew that I was a prisoner wi Celestine's prisoner.
"I darkness shut me in. It was cold and ra foul, evil. Panic seized me. How can I in such terror? There are no words to de-sc it. Only those who have suffered it could un tand. Thoughts—hideous thoughts—an to be battering on my brain. I had tr apped. I had walked the way she who ha to be rid of me had directed, and, like bo I had asked no questions.

My fear numbed my brain as it did my body.

I mounted the two steps. I beat my fists against what now seemed to be a wall. "Let me out. Let me out!" I cried.

But I knew that my voice would not be heard beyond the lepers' squint. And how often did people go to the chapel?

She would slip away—no one would know she had even been in the house.

I was so frightened I did not know what to do. I heard my own voice sobbing out my terror, and it frightened me afresh because, for the moment, I did not recognize it as my own. I felt exhausted and limp. I knew that one could not live for long in this dark, damp place. I pulled at the wall until I tore my nails and I felt the blood on my hands.

I began to look about me because my eyes were becoming familiar to the gloom. Then I saw that I was not alone. Someone had come here before me. What was left of Alice lay there. At last I had found her.

"Alice!" I screamed. "Alice! It is you then? So you were here in the house all the time?"

There was no answer from Alice. Her lips had been silent for more than a year.

I covered my face with my hands. I could not bear to look. There was the smell of death and decay everywhere.

I wondered, How long did Alice live after the door had closed on her? I wanted to know because so long I might expect to live.

I think I must have fainted for a long time and I was delirious when I came to. I heard a voice babbling; it must have been my own because it could not have belonged to Alice.

I was mercifully only half conscious. But it was as though a part of me understood so much.

During that time I spent in the dark and gruesome place I was not sure who I was. Was I Martha? Was I Alice?

Our stories were so much alike. I believed the pattern was similar. They had said she

SHAW

THE WELL-FED BRIDEGROOM*

By MARGARET WILLIAMS

STUART

Sure way to a man's heart—this delicious dinner featuring jellied veal and strawberry pie.

For your first dinners at home, keeping calm and cool is necessary for the bride—as well as her new husband. I have deliberately kept all this in mind, and planned a meal that is easy and delightful.

So, start in the cool of the morning and work at a leisurely pace. This meal can't be hurried anyway. And who wants to hurry when the temperature is climbing? Here is your menu:

Hot Tomato Bouillon
Veal in Jelly
Marinated Salad
French-Fried Potatoes
(if your husband is a hearty eater)
Orange Muffins
Strawberry-Glaze Pie

TO PREPARE THE MEAL:

1. Begin by making—

Hot Tomato Bouillon: Mix together 1 cup tomato juice with 1 cup undiluted beef consommé. Season with a clove, a good grating fresh pepper, a dash of salt and one of onion salt. Hold in the refrigerator until a half hour before serving dinner—then just heat and serve.

2. Buy a thin veal cutlet weighing no more than a pound.

Veal in Jelly: Sauté the veal in 2 tablespoons butter until lightly browned—about 20 minutes. Add 1 can undiluted chicken stock and 2 tablespoons minced onion. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon each marjoram and savory, and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Cover and simmer until very tender—about 1½ hours. Remove the meat from the pan and trim away all the fat and bone. Divide the cutlet into two servings. Chill. Add another can undiluted chicken stock to the pan and heat. Skim off all fat. Add 2 envelopes unflavored gelatin. Heat until the gelatin is dissolved. Pour a thin layer of stock into a small pan. Chill until set. Arrange the meat, along with a small garnish, on the gelatin. Chill the remaining stock until very thick and syrupy and pour over the meat. Return to the refrigerator until ready to serve.

3. While cooking the veal, bake an 8" pie shell.

4. Now you are ready to make the filling.

Strawberry-Glaze Pie: Whip two 3-ounce packages cream cheese. Add 1 tablespoon each milk and sugar and 1 teaspoon grated lemon rind. Spread evenly over the bottom of the baked crust. Wash and hull 1 quart strawberries. Stand the prettiest on end in the cheese, covering it entirely. Crush the rest, or buzz in a blender. You should have about 1 cup juice. If not, add water. Now mix in a saucepan ⅓ cup sugar and 2 tablespoons cornstarch. Add the strawberry juice, 1 tablespoon lemon juice and 1 teaspoon grated lemon rind. Heat, stirring constantly, until the glaze is thickened. Spoon over the berries and chill.

5. This salad is excellent for long standing. Marinate it for at least 2 hours before serving.

Marinated Salad: Toss together in ¾ cup well-seasoned French dressing ½ cup each diced artichoke bottoms and sliced, cooked celery, and ¾ cup cooked peas. Cover and chill.

6. Wash, separate and chill the lettuce cups for your salad. Slice four radishes. Toss these into the salad at the last minute. Now you have finished everything to be done ahead and can relax.

7. An hour before serving time, set the table. Unmold the jellied veal and arrange the two servings on dinner plates. Return to the refrigerator to keep cold. Light your oven so that it will be preheated to 400° F. for baking muffins. Heat the soup.

8. A half hour before dinner, mix the orange muffins and bake according to package directions. Put the frozen French-fried potatoes in the oven, on the top shelf, and heat at 400° F. for 25 minutes. Package directions indicate heating time for these potatoes is flexible—and it is.

9. Make the coffee. Drain the salad from the extra French dressing and arrange in lettuce cups on the plates with the jellied veal.

10. Everything is done now, so set out your strawberry pie and enjoy a delicious meal with the person who means the most.

FOR THIS MEAL YOU WILL NEED: 1 small can tomato juice, canned beef bouillon and canned chicken stock, 1 veal cutlet, 2 envelopes unflavored gelatin, 1 package frozen French-fried potatoes, 1 package orange-muffin mix, 1 small can artichoke bottoms, two 3-ounce packages cream cheese, and 1 quart strawberries.

YOU SHOULD HAVE ON HAND: butter, whole cloves, salt, onion salt, pepper, onion, marjoram, savory, French dressing, lettuce, radishes, lemons, milk, flour, cornstarch, sugar, cooked peas and a little celery.

✳ Margaret Williams, whose first book is a cookbook, The Well-Fed Bridegroom (Doubleday and Company, Inc., Garden City, N.Y.), was born in New York City. She now lives in New Orleans, runs a gift shop, helps cater Mardi Gras balls and, in addition, manages to keep her own large home running smoothly.

©1957 by Margaret Williams

Villa

Milan

Pumps...slimmed and trimmed!

That's the fall fashion excitement in shoes! Fiancées' beautifully detailed pumps are pretty proof you don't have to spend a fortune for elegance and chic! Milan: a dressy dash of braid trim, high heel, in Swiss Chocolate, Meadow Brown or Black calf. Villa: pleated tab toe, mid-high heel, in Swiss Chocolate, Meadow Brown or Black calf; also Black suede. The only shoes ever awarded McCall's Magazine "Use Tested" seal for quality, style and fit! At fine stores everywhere or write to Fiancées, Clark Shoe Company, Auburn, Maine.

(FIANCEES ARE ONLY $12.98 AND $13.98. SLIGHTLY HIGHER WEST OF DENVER.)

Fiancées

America's best fashion buy!

ran away with Geoffrey. They would say I had run away with Peter. Our departure had been cleverly timed. "But why," I said, "but why?"

I knew whose shadow I had seen on the blind. It was hers—that diabolical woman. She had known of the existence of that little diary which I had discovered in Alice's coat pocket and she was searching for it because she knew it could provide one of those small clues which might lead to discovery.

I knew that she did not love Alvean, that she had tricked us all with her gentle demeanor. She had used Alvean as she had used others, as she was going to use Connan.

It was the house that she loved.

I pictured her during those delirious moments looking from her window in Mount Widden—coveting a house as fiercely as man ever coveted woman, or woman man.

"Alice," I said, "Alice, we were her victims—you and I."

And I fancied Alice talked to me—told me of the day Geoffrey had caught the London train and how Celestine had come to the house and told her of the great discovery in the chapel.

I saw Alice—pale, pretty, fragile Alice—crying out in pleasure at the discovery, taking those fatal steps forward to death.

But it was not Alice's voice I heard. It was my own.

Yet I thought she was with me. I thought that at last I had found her, and that we had comfort to offer each other as I waited to go with her into the shadowy world which had been hers since she was led by Celestine Nansellock into the lepers' squint.

There was a blinding light in my eyes. I was being carried.

I said, "Am I dead, then, Alice?"

And a voice answered, "My darling . . . my darling . . . you are safe." It was Connan's voice, and it was his arms which held me.

"Are there dreams in death, then, Alice?" I asked.

I was conscious of a voice which whispered, "My dearest—oh, my dearest ——" And I was laid upon a bed, and many people stood about me.

Then I saw the light glinting on hair which looked almost white.

"Alice, there is an angel."

Then the angel answered and said, "It's Gilly. Gilly brought them to you. Gilly watched and Gilly saw ——"

And oddly enough it was Gilly who brought me back to the world of reality. I knew that I was not dead, that some miracle had happened; that it was in truth Connan's arms which I had felt about me, Connan's voice I heard.

I was in my own bedroom from the window of which I could see the lawns and the palm trees and the room which had once been Alice's, on the blind of which I had seen the shadow of Alice's murderer who had sought to kill me too.

I called out in terror. But Connan was beside me.

I heard his voice, tender, soothing, loving. "It's all right, my love. I'm here—I'm with you for evermore."

AFTERWARD

This is the story I tell my great-grandchildren. They have heard it many times, but there is always a first time for some.

They ask for it again and again. They play in the park and in the woods; they bring me flowers from the south gardens, a tribute to the old lady who can always charm them with the story of how she married their great-grandfather.

To me it is as clear as though it happened yesterday. Vividly I remember my arrival at the house and all that preceded those terrifying hours I spent in the dark with dead Alice.

The years which followed with Connan have often been stormy ones. Connan and I were both too strong-willed, I suppose, to live in perpetual peace; but they were years in which I felt I had lived life richly, and what more could one ask than that?

Now he is old, as I am, and three more Connans have been born since that day we married—our son, grandson and great-grandson. I was glad I was able to give Connan children. We had five sons and five daug and they in their turn were fruitful.

When the children hear the story they every incident explained.

Why was it believed that the woma died in the train was Alice? Because locket she wore. But it was Celestine wh tified the locket as one which, she sai had given Alice, but which, of course, s never seen before in her life.

She had been eager that I should Jacinth when Peter first offered the m me—I suppose because she feared it w possible that Connan might be interes me and therefore she was ready to enc the friendship between myself and Pete it was she who later, discovering the lo boulder on the cliff, had lain in wait f and attempted to kill or maim me.

She was the sender of the anonymous to Lady Treslyn and the public prose commenting on the suspicious circums of Sir Thomas's death. She had believe if there was a big enough scandal, ma between Connan and Lady Treslyn have been impossible for years. She had oned without Connan's feelings for me when she knew that I was engaged to him, she immediately planned to remo

NEXT MONTH

It was a frightening decision make—whether to tell this seventee year-old girl. If she didn't know, might be killed when she could ha saved herself. If she did know, might talk sometime—in the m innocent way. . . . This new three-p serial is the story of "a perfect crim and the women who were involved

OPERATION TERROR

BY THE GORDONS

begins in the September JOURN

She failed to do this on the cliff path, the I was to join Alice; the fact that Pete leaving for Australia on that day mus made her decide on this method. The household knew that Peter's attitude had been a flirtatious one, and it would a that I had run away with him.

It was Celestine who had put the dia bracelet in Miss Jansen's room becau governess was learning too much abo house and the knowledge would ine lead her to the lepers' squint and Alic had worked on Lady Treslyn's jealousy pretty young governess, for she had Lady Treslyn to be a vindictive woma given the opportunity, would bring a malice to bear on Miss Jansen.

She was in love—passionately in with Mount Mellyn, and she wanted to Connan only because thus she would b tress of the house. So in the first plac covering the secret of the squint, she ha it to herself and had chosen her oppor to murder Alice. She knew of the love between Alice and her brother Geoffre knew that Alvean was his child. It work so easily because she had waited for h portunity. If it had not been possible to Alice's death appear to have occurred train accident, she would have found other way of disposing of her, as she h tended to dispose of me through Jacint

But she had reckoned without Gilly. would have thought that a poor simple should play such a big part in this diab plan? But Gilly had loved Alice, as lat was to love me. Gilly had known Alice the house, for Alice had made a habit o ing to say good night to her when she c same to Alvean; she had always done it she went out to a dinner party. Becau

r forgotten, Gilly did not believe she otten this time. Gilly therefore con- believe that Alice had never left the nd had gone on looking for her. It 's face which I had seen at the peep. w all the peeps in the house and used equently, because she was always for Alice.

he had seen Celestine and myself en- all from the solarium. I imagined her the room and looking through the the other side of the room so that she nter the chapel. We crossed to the ut that side of the chapel could not seen from the solarium squint, and sped along to Miss Jansen's room, om that peep she could have a good he squint. She was just in time to see earing through the door, and waited come out. She waited and waited, tine naturally left by the door to the d and slipped away so that, since she that no one had seen her come into e except myself, she could let it ap- t she had not been there at all.

while I lived through that period of n Alice's death chamber, Gilly was on her stool in Miss Jansen's room, the door to the lepers' squint.

n returned at eleven and expected the ld to give him a welcome.

Polgrey received him. "Go and tell gh that I am here," he said. He must n a little piqued because he was—is—the sort of man who demands the ffection and attention, and the fact uld be sleeping when he came home nceivable to him.

ired the scene: Mrs. Polgrey reporting is not in my room, the search for me, ible moment when Connan believed Celestine had intended he should believe. Nansellock came over this afternoon od-by. He caught the ten o'clock from hans."

: wondered often how long it would n before they discovered that I had away with Peter. I could imagine what might have happened. Connan's losing that belief in life which I believed I was beginning to bring back to him, perhaps continuing his affaire with Linda Treslyn. But it would not have led to marriage; trust Celestine to have seen to that. And, in time, she would have found some way of making herself mistress of Mount Mellyn. Insidiously she would have made herself necessary to Alvean and to him.

How strange, I thought, that all this might have come to pass and the only two who could have told the truth would have been two skeletons behind the walls of the lepers' squint. Who would have believed that even at this day the story of Alice and Martha would never have been known, had not a simple child, born in sorrow, living in shadow, led the way to the truth?

Connan has told me often of the uproar in the house when I was missing. He told me of the child, who came and stood patiently beside him, waiting to be heard; how she tugged at his coat and sought for the words to explain.

"God forgive us," he says, "it was some time before we would listen to her, and so we delayed bringing you out of that hellish place."

But she had led them there—through the door into the lepers' squint.

She had seen us, she said. And for a moment Connan had thought that Peter and I had left the house together, slipping out that way so that we should not be noticed.

It was dusty in the squint—for no one had entered it since Alice had gone there with her murderer; but in the dust on the wall was the mark of a hand, and when Connan saw it he began to take Gilly seriously.

It was not easy to find the secret spring to the door even if it had been known that it was there. There was an agonizing search of minutes while Connan was ready to tear the walls down.

But they found it and they found me. They found Alice too.

They took Celestine to Bodmin, where she was eventually to be tried for the murder of Alice. But before the trial could take place she was a raving lunatic. At first I believed that this was yet another scheme of hers. It may have started that way, but she did not die until twenty years after, and all that time she spent locked away from the world.

Alice's remains were buried in the vault where those of an unknown woman lay. Connan and I were married three months after he had brought me out of the darkness. That experience had affected me even more than I realized at the time, and I suffered from nightmares for a year or more. It was a great shock to have been buried alive, even though one's tomb was opened before life was extinguished.

Phillida came to my wedding with William and the children. She was delighted. So was Aunt Adelaide, who insisted that the wedding take place from her town house. Thus Connan and I had a smart London wedding. Not that we cared, but it pleased Aunt Adelaide, who, for some reason, seemed to have the idea in her head that it was all her doing.

And so we honeymooned, as we had originally intended, in Italy and then we came home to Mount Mellyn.

I dream over the past when I have told the story to the children. I think of Alvean happily married to a Devonshire squire. As for Gilly, she never left me. She is with me now. At any moment she will appear on the lawn with the eleven-o'clock coffee which on warm days we take in that arbor in the south gardens where I first saw Lady Treslyn and Connan together.

I must confess that Lady Treslyn continued to plague me during the first years of my married life. I discovered that I could be a jealous woman—and a passionate one. Sometimes I think Connan liked to tease me, in repayment, he said, for the jealousy he had felt of Peter Nansellock. But she went to London after a few years, and we heard she married there.

Peter came back some fifteen years after he left. He had acquired a wife and two children, but no fortune. He was, however, as gay and full of vitality as ever. In the meantime Mount Widden had been sold; and later one of my daughters married the owner, so the place has become almost as much home to me as Mount Mellyn.

Connan said he was glad when Peter went back, and I laughed at the thought of his ever feeling he had reason to be jealous. When I told him this, he replied, "You're even more foolish about Linda Treslyn."

That was one of those moments when we both knew that there was no one for us but each other.

And so the years passed and now, as I sit here, thinking of it all, Connan is coming down the path from the gardens. In a moment I shall hear his voice.

Because we are alone he will say, "Ah, my dear Miss Leigh ——" as he often does in his most tender moments. That is to remind me that he does not forget those early days; and there will be a smile on his lips which tells me that he is seeing me, not as I am now, but as I was then, the governess somewhat resentful of her fate, desperately clinging to her pride and her dignity, falling in love in spite of herself—his dear Miss Leigh.

Then we shall sit in the warm sunshine, thankful for all the good things which life has brought us.

Here he comes and Gilly is behind him—still a little different from other people, still speaking rarely, singing as she works, in that off-key voice that makes us think she is a little out of this world.

As I watch her I can see so clearly the child she once was, and I think of the story of Jennifer, the mother who one day walked into the sea, and how that story was part of my story, and how delicately and intricately our lives were woven together.

Nothing remains, I think, but the earth and the sea which are here just as they were on the day Gilly was conceived, on the day Alice walked unheeding into her tomb, on the day I felt Connan's arms about me and I knew that he had brought me back to life.

We are born, we suffer, we love, we die, but the waves continue to beat upon the rocks; the seed time and the harvest come and go, but the earth remains. END

The oven is big enough to take a 24-pound turkey; yet the range is small enough to fit in only 30 inches of space.

It can be hung on a wall—or mounted on its own base cabinet for built-in convenience without the usual cost.

Everything's where it should be. Oven and broiler at reach-in height, surface units low to let you see into pans. All cooking controls can be set without stooping.

Gleaming in brushed chrome, easy to clean as a china plate.

The 'Fabulous Debutante 400' by TAPPAN

For complete information write: The Tappan Company, Department LHJ 8-0, Mansfield, Ohio

LONG WALK TO FOREVER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 43

a shave. He held out his hand for the magazine. "Let's see the pretty book," he said.

She gave it to him. "I'm getting married, Newt," she said.

"I know," he said. "Let's go for a walk."

"I'm awfully busy, Newt," she said. "The wedding is only a week away."

"If we go for a walk," he said, "it will make you rosy. It will make you a rosy bride." He turned the pages of the magazine. "A rosy bride like her—like her—like her," he said, showing her rosy brides.

Catharine turned rosy, thinking about rosy brides.

"That will be my present to Henry Stewart Chasens," said Newt. "By taking you for a walk, I'll be giving him a rosy bride."

"You know his name?" said Catharine.

"Mother wrote," he said. "From Pittsburgh?"

"Yes," she said. "You'd like him."

"Maybe," he said.

"Can—can you come to the wedding, Newt?" she said.

"That I doubt," he said.

"Your furlough isn't for long enough?" she said.

"Furlough?" said Newt. He was studying a two-page ad for flat silver. "I'm not on furlough," he said.

"Oh?" she said.

"I'm what they call A.W.O.L.," said Newt.

"Oh, Newt! You're not!" she said.

"Sure I am," he said, still looking at the magazine.

"Why, Newt?" she said.

"I had to find out what your silver pattern is," he said. He read names of silver patterns from the magazine. "Albemarle? Heather?" he said. "Legend? Rambler Rose?" He looked up, smiled. "I plan to give you and your husband a spoon," he said.

"Newt, Newt—tell me really," she said.

"I want to go for a walk," he said.

She wrung her hands in sisterly anguish. "Oh, Newt—you're fooling me about being A.W.O.L.," she said.

Newt imitated a police siren softly, raised his eyebrows.

"Where—where from?" she said.

"Fort Bragg," he said.

"North Carolina?" she said.

"That's right," he said. "Near Fayetteville—where Scarlet O'Hara went to school."

"How did you get here, Newt?" she said.

He raised his thumb, jerked it in a hitchhike gesture. "Two days," he said.

"Does your mother know?" she said.

"I didn't come to see my mother," he told her.

"Who did you come to see?" she said.

"You," he said.

"Why me?" she said.

"Because I love you," he said. "Now can we take a walk?" he said. "One foot in front of the other—through leaves, over bridges ——"

They were taking the walk now, were in a woods with a brown-leaf floor.

Catharine was angry and rattled, close to tears. "Newt," she said, "this is absolutely crazy."

"How so?" said Newt.

"What a crazy time to tell me you love me," she said. "You never talked that way before." She stopped walking.

"Let's keep walking," he said.

"No," she said. "So far, no farther. I shouldn't have come out with you at all," she said.

"You did," he said.

"To get you out of the house," she said. "If somebody walked in and heard you talking to me that way, a week before the wedding ——"

"What would they think?" he said.

"They'd think you were crazy," she said.

"Why?" he said.

Catharine took a deep breath, made a speech. "Let me say that I'm deeply honored by this crazy thing you've done," she said. "I can't believe you're really A.W.O.L., but maybe you are. I can't believe you really love me, but maybe you do. But ——"

"I do," said Newt.

"Well, I'm deeply honored," said Catharine, "and I'm very fond of you as a friend, Newt, extremely fond—but it's just too late." She took a step away from him. "You've never even kissed me," she said, and she protected herself with her hands. "I don't mean you should do it now. I just mean this is all so unexpected. I haven't got the remotest idea of how to respond."

"Just walk some more," he said. "Have a nice time."

They started walking again.

"How did you expect me to react?" she said.

"How would I know what to expect?" he said. "I've never done anything like this before."

"Did you think I would throw myself into your arms?" she said.

"Maybe," he said.

"I'm sorry to disappoint you," she said.

"I'm not disappointed," he said. "I wasn't counting on it. This is very nice, just walking."

Catharine stopped again. "You know what happens next?" she said.

"Nope," he said.

"We shake hands," she said. "We shake hands and part friends," she said. "That's what happens next."

Newt nodded. "All right," he said. "Remember me from time to time. Remember how much I loved you."

Involuntarily, Catharine burst into tears. She turned her back to Newt, looked into the infinite colonnade of the woods.

"What does that mean?" said Newt.

"Rage!" said Catharine. She clenched her hands. "You have no right ——"

"I had to find out," he said.

"If I'd loved you," she said, "I would have let you know before now."

"You would?" he said.

"Yes," she said. She faced him, looked up at him, her face quite red. "You would have known," she said.

"How?" he said.

"You would have seen it," she said. "Women aren't very clever at hiding it."

Newt looked closely at Catharine's face now. To her consternation, she realized that what she had said was true, that a woman couldn't hide love.

Newt was seeing love now.

And he did what he had to do. He kissed her.

"You're hard to get along with!" she said when Newt let her go.

"I am?" said Newt.

"You shouldn't have done that," she said.

"You didn't like it?" he said.

"What did you expect," she said—"wild, abandoned passion?"

"I keep telling you," he said, "I never know what's going to happen next."

"We say good-by," she said.

He frowned slightly. "All right," he said.

She made another speech. "I'm not sorry we kissed," she said. "That was sweet. We should have kissed, we've been so close. I'll always remember you, Newt, and good luck."

"You too," he said.

"Thank you, Newt," she said.

"Thirty days," he said.

"What?" she said.

"Thirty days in the stockade," he said—"that's what one kiss will cost me."

"I—I'm sorry," she said, "but I didn't ask you to go A.W.O.L."

"I know," he said.

"You certainly don't deserve any hero's reward for doing something as foolish as that," she said.

"Must be nice to be a hero," said Ne Henry Stewart Chasens a hero?"

"He might be, if he got the chance, Catharine. She noted uneasily that th begun to walk again. The farewell ha forgotten.

"You really love him?" he said.

"Certainly I love him!" she said ho wouldn't marry him if I didn't love hin

"What's good about him?" said Ne

"Honestly!" she cried, stopping again you have any idea how offensive you're t Many, many, many things are good Henry! Yes," she said, "and many, many things are probably bad too. Bu isn't any of your business. I love Henry, don't have to argue his merits with you

"Sorry," said Newt.

"Honestly!" said Catharine.

Newt kissed her again. He kissed her because she wanted him to.

They were now in a large orchard.

"How did we get so far from home, N said Catharine.

"One foot in front of the other—th leaves, over bridges," said Newt.

"They add up—the steps," she said.

Bells rang in the tower of the school f blind nearby.

"School for the blind," said Newt.

"School for the blind," said Catharin shook her head in drowsy wonder. "I've go back now," she said.

"Say good-by," said Newt.

"Every time I do," said Catharine, " to get kissed."

Newt sat down on the close-cropped under an apple tree. "Sit down," he sa

"No," she said.

"I won't touch you," he said.

"I don't believe you," she said.

She sat down under another tree, t feet away from him. She closed her eye

"Dream of Henry Stewart Chasens said.

"What?" she said.

"Dream of your wonderful husband-t he said.

"All right, I will," she said. She clos eyes tighter, caught glimpses of her hus to-be.

Newt yawned.

The bees were humming in the trees Catharine almost fell asleep. When she o her eyes, she saw that Newt really was a

He began to snore softly.

Catharine let Newt sleep for an hou while he slept she adored him with a heart.

The shadows of the apple trees grew east. The bells in the tower of the scho the blind rang again.

"Chick-a-dee-dee-dee," went a chicka

Somewhere far away an automobile s nagged and failed, nagged and failed, fe

Catharine came out from under he knelt by Newt.

"Newt?" she said.

"H'm?" he said. He opened his eyes.

"Late," she said.

"Hello, Catharine," he said.

"Hello, Newt," she said.

"I love you," he said.

"I know," she said.

"Too late," he said.

"Too late," she said.

He stood, stretched groaningly. "A nice walk," he said.

"I thought so," she said.

"Part company here?" he said.

"Where will you go?" she said.

"Hitch into town, turn myself in," he

"Good luck," she said.

"You, too," he said. "Marry me, C rine?"

"No," she said.

He smiled, stared at her hard for a mo then walked away quickly.

Catharine watched him grow smaller long perspective of shadows and trees, that if he stopped and turned now, if he to her, she would run to him. She would no choice.

Newt did stop. He did turn. He did "Catharine," he called.

She ran to him, put her arms around could not speak.

THE KING

By ARNOLD WEINSTEIN

Weak lions roar outside my rusting gate to tend my windless town and state.

My palace spreads toward a faithful few who sing as you sang, but are not you.

It is not perfection makes me hate the imperfection of my town and state.

It is one member of my royal crew sings not as you sang, but is you.

A special deodorant

—when a girl needs protection most

- Safe—medically approved
- Relieves chafing
- Neat—drying—non-scented

In the opinion of a leading pharmacologist QUEST Deodorant Powder contains the safest—yet the most effective—deodorizer for sanitary napkins. QUEST can be used where strong irritating sprays or creams may be dangerous to sensitive tissue.

QUEST relieves chafing because it is soft and absorbent. It's so neat to use. Get QUEST at all drug and toiletries counters.

Hair spray feel like varnish?

New spray holds gently, softly

O STICKINESS, NO DRYNESS, NO DULLNESS EVER

New finger-rest lever... easy to press... easy to aim there's a spray that's made for real live beautiful hair- Made to hold them longer...with none of the varnish-y ıg, none of the sticky stiffness you're used to in other sprays. How come? The secret's in the super-fine "lano- ' mist that keeps hair soft, soft, soft...that gives your ody, brilliance, springiness. Could you ask for anything ? Well...more there is! You spray with an exclusive r-rest lever that gives you a super-fine spray with perfect ort, perfect aim! So spray away with new 3 Way... and let old-fashioned hair sprays get in your hair. 1.50 plus tax

NEW 3 WAY® CURL SPRAY

SHULTON

Holds without stickiness...conditions dry hair...brightens dull hair

Maybelline

SPECIALIZES exclusively IN EVERYTHING TO MAKE EYES BEAUTIFUL

Magic Mascara
4 fashion shades

Solid Mascara
4 fashion shades

Cream Mascara
4 fashion shades

Self-sharpening Eyebrow Pencil
7 flattering shades

Eye Shadow Stick
6 iridescent shades

Fluid Eye-liner
8 iridescent shades

Eye-liner Pencil
8 iridescent shades

professional Eyelash Curler

Brow and Lash Brush n' Comb

precision
Eyebrow Tweezers

In all the world, nothing does so much to make eyes beautiful as Maybelline, the pure eye make-up you know you can use with perfect confidence. Maybelline offers everything for eye-beauty . . . quality unrivalled, prices unmatched . . . in a wonderful range of precious jewel colors that give eyes shimmering, glimmering loveliness. That's why Maybelline is so necessary to every woman who wants to appear perfectly groomed, fashionable . . . as lovely as she was meant to be. Maybelline is a specialist in eye beauty!

Remember, for purity, for complete confidence in your eye make-up insist on Maybelline

For her wedding, Mollie chooses traditional white: a wedding gown worn by two cousins before her. She adds a new finger-tip veil, a double half circle of white illusion. The headband is covered in embroidered organdy. Price of fabrics to make the veil is $8.90.

trousseau finale

BETH HART

We love a wedding, and especially so when the bride is our own Barbara Journal! Mollie Farnham, who has been Barbara J. for the past whole year, became engaged four months ago. Since then, she has made all fashion purchases with her trousseau in mind: a bright pink basic dress in May, play and travel clothes in June, and other final midsummer fill-ins last month.

Mollie left her going-away costume and special dress for evenings until the very last. She wanted them to have a look of the fall season ahead, and to wear in her new role as Mrs. Richard Love. Mollie's two major investments shown here, incorporated with past purchases, make a wardrobe complete for any time, any season. Mollie has spent a minimum of fashion $'s because she knew (and will always know):

HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!

Mollie adds a chiffon overskirt (yards of chiffon gathered onto black satin ribbon) for her most glorious addition of all, $4.56. A huge red rose could accent this or the dress alone, $2.00.

PRIGENT

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Love. Here she wears her other important trousseau addition: a black crepe dress which costs her $17.95. The narrow straps can be worn with or without the tiny matching bolero. Turquoise handbag, $2.98.

DRESS BY PETRINA LA BARBARA

SUIT BY JEANNE ESSIG

© VOGUE

Mollie's biggest investment for her trousseau is her new suit. She fell in love with color and fabric—a lilac wool tweed. The skirt is slim, the jacket cropped and semifitted. Jacket, $17.95; skirt, $11.95—and a new beige handbag for $2.98.

Mollie makes a beige silk blouse from Vogue's "Easy to Make" Design No. 9628.* This addition costs her $4.56. She also adds a lavender chiffon scarf, $1.00, and a gold butterfly pin with "diamonds," $4.00.

*For back view, sizes and price, see page 119.

THE RICHEST WOMEN IN THE WORLD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 55

Included in estimates of Wilhelmina's fortune is jewelry amassed by the reigning House of Orange during four unbroken centuries. The collection, said to be the most valuable of any royal jewelry collection in Europe, includes forty diamond tiaras and fourteen different table services of pure gold. Just before the Germans invaded the Netherlands in 1940, Wilhelmina managed to ship all the jewelry, the other valuables and the stocks and bonds to England, where they remained in safety for the duration of World War II.

They are back home again now, but these days their owner has little use for diamond tiaras or gold plate. Princess Wilhelmina will be eighty years old on August 31, and now lives a life of strict retirement from which she emerges only rarely to officiate at patriotic occasions. Even as queen she was never interested in fashion, society or clothes, and now in retirement she is free at last to lead the quiet life she prefers, attired in her favorite baggy tweeds and comfortable, clumpy shoes.

During the winter she usually stays at her mansion at The Hague, and in spring and fall she sometimes goes to a secluded country house in the dunes on the coast of the North Sea. But her favorite home is a small castle on her estate, "Het Loo" in East Holland, where she lives very simply in only a few rooms and occasionally shelters Dutch refugees from Indonesia in the rest of the palace. The castle is surrounded by a wild and lonely forest inhabited by wild boars which serve effectively to ensure the ex-queen's privacy.

Painting is her principal occupation. Often she goes out into the forest before dawn in a little pony-drawn house on wheels; while the princess sets up her easel and prepares to paint a favorite view, smoke curls from the chimney of the little house and a servant cooks breakfast. The princess also likes to walk and read and to be with her four granddaughters, the children of Queen Juliana. Last year she published her memoirs, the title of which breathes the contentment she now feels: Lonely, But Not Alone.

Not quite in a class with Wilhelmina's fortune, but almost, is the wealth rumored to belong to Miss France of 1930, who became the fourth wife and later the widow of the Aga Khan III. The begum, who once worked as a dressmaker, was married to the aga in 1944, when she was thirty-five and he was sixty-six. For many years the aging leader of the Ismaili sect of Moslems and his tall and beautiful wife were conspicuous and glittering members of international society, but since the aga's death in 1957 the begum has lived in semiretirement. Before her husband's death she promised him she would spend every winter near his tomb in Aswan, Egypt; she now spends several months a year in her glistening white villa overlooking the Nile 700 miles south of Cairo. Her favorite hobby, sculpture, helps to pass the warm, lonely hours, but she has little use at Aswan for her dazzling jewel collection or her magnificent Paris wardrobe. The rest of the year the begum lives quietly at beautiful "Yakamour," the villa overlooking Cannes on the Riviera, which she shared for so many years with the devoted aga.

WOMEN'S IDEA EXCHANGE

When you appliqué, use white school paste to hold pieces in place, suggests Mrs. W.A.R., of Darby, Montana. Paste saves tedious basting, keeps threads from fraying—and washes out in the laundry.

After his death the begum was said to have inherited between $150,000,000 and $750,000,000. Her stepson Aly Khan called these figures "ludicrous," but rumors nevertheless persist that the wily old aga (who was literally worth his weight in diamonds many times over) left a half-billion-dollar fortune hidden around the world, safe from the prying eyes of tax inspectors, in places which only the begum can (but won't) reveal.

Nobody knows exactly how rich the begum is, and nobody knows exactly how rich the Queen of England is either. It is known, however, that Elizabeth II is the wealthiest woman in Great Britain, with vast personal holdings in real estate and a personal jewelry collection (apart from the state-owned Crown jewels) which has never been officially valued but which is thought to be worth around $150,000,000.

Every year she receives $1,330,000 from the government, tax-free. (She has to pay taxes on the income from her personal holdings.) Philip gets an additional $112,000 a year. This would seem to be rather a lot of income for a young couple until one realizes that a ruling sovereign is expected to use the official allowance for "royal expenditures of a personal character" and that in Elizabeth's case this means the maintenance of five official residences, bevies of upstairs and downstairs maids, butlers, grooms, jewelkeepers and nannies. It can mount up.

There are many other wealthy women in Great Britain, but the richest by far is the gentlewoman listed in Burke's Peerage as: "The Countess of Seafield (Nina Caroline Studley-Herbert), Viscountess Reidhaven, and Baroness Ogilvy, of Deskford and Cullen, and Viscountess and Baroness Ogilvy of Cullen, all in Scotland."

The countess is a shy woman, and despite the fact that she is the second richest woman in England her name is little known today. But back in the '20's when she was a beautiful young girl newly come into a vast inheritance and betrothed by rumor every weekend to a different European prince, she was a favo subject for the Sunday-supplement writ And no wonder, either, for her history h sort of romantic glow which fiction can ra match.

The Ogilvy and Grant lineage goes b almost a thousand years to the thunder beginnings of Scottish history. In 1701 earldom of Seafield was created, and var peers and peeresses have held it ever s along with 500,000 acres of valuable Scot real estate. They have also held, held on to increased, a family heritage of many mill of pounds—a few millions of which accu lated during the lifetime of a sporadically sane eighteenth-century earl who didn't sp much money because he was so frequentl confinement.

Due to a family squabble the eighth e James, found that he had the title but that elder brother's widow, Caroline, Dow Countess of Seafield, had the great estates all the money. James's son, Francis, in the of penniless heirs, thereupon became a ro black sheep. After many disgraceful ad tures he finally landed in New Zealand, wh he was married and redeemed to a worthy by a Salvation Army worker. Several y later he died, leaving a young son who unaware that he had become the eleventh of Seafield.

If the story begins to sound like someth out of Frances Hodgson Burnett—it is. W the impoverished little earl was discovere the dowager countess's sleuths late in nineteenth century, the story became a wo wide sensation, and Mrs. Burnett used it the model of Little Lord Fauntleroy.

Real life, however, was not so smooth as book's plot. When the dowager countess fered to raise the boy in Scotland his mo refused, thus incurring the deadly enmit the old countess. The boy was reared in N Zealand and married the pretty daughter New Zealand physician. A few years late sailed for England with his wife and his l daughter, Nina, to take his place in the p age of Scotland and Great Britain. But

Whether you like high, mid or low heels . . . dressy or tailored styles, you'll love the kitten-lightness of the softest shoes you've ever worn. $15 to $18. Watch for the exciting 1960 "Kitten Contest" in September Ladies' Home Journal. Where to buy? Write Brauer Bros. Shoe Company, St. Louis, Missouri.

r still held the purse strings and the the castles.
night never have relinquished them or one thing: five-year-old Nina had , the flaming, golden-red hair which all true Seafields. When the countess 1911, shortly after the child had won rt, she made Nina her heir; in 1915, e eleventh earl was killed on the bat- of France, the nine-year-old girl be- istress of the estates and Countess eld, one of the few titles in Great that a woman can hold in her own e mid-'20's Nina was considered the catch and the greatest heiress in all ritain and the empire. She had inher- additional $30,000,000 from a New relative. Queen Marie of Romania ng to arrange a match between Nina rie's second son, Nicholas. But the ell through, and in 1930 the countess a wealthy but comparative unknown, Herbert Studley-Herbert, of the Grena- ards. They have two children: Ian Francis, Viscount Reidhaven, who is agricultural student; and Pauline pretty sixteen-year-old who attends n Switzerland.

narriage ended in divorce in 1957. A er the countess's husband was married merican society woman, Mrs. Marga- s Potter. And two weeks later the s announced that she would marry Archbold, an American oil millionaire rginia, whom she had met in Nassau lebrate the engagement the couple set a cruise among the Hebrides Islands the countess's yacht. But two days r. Archbold collapsed and was rushed to a Scottish hospital, suffering the f a gastric-ulcer hemorrhage. He died afterward, with the countess at his

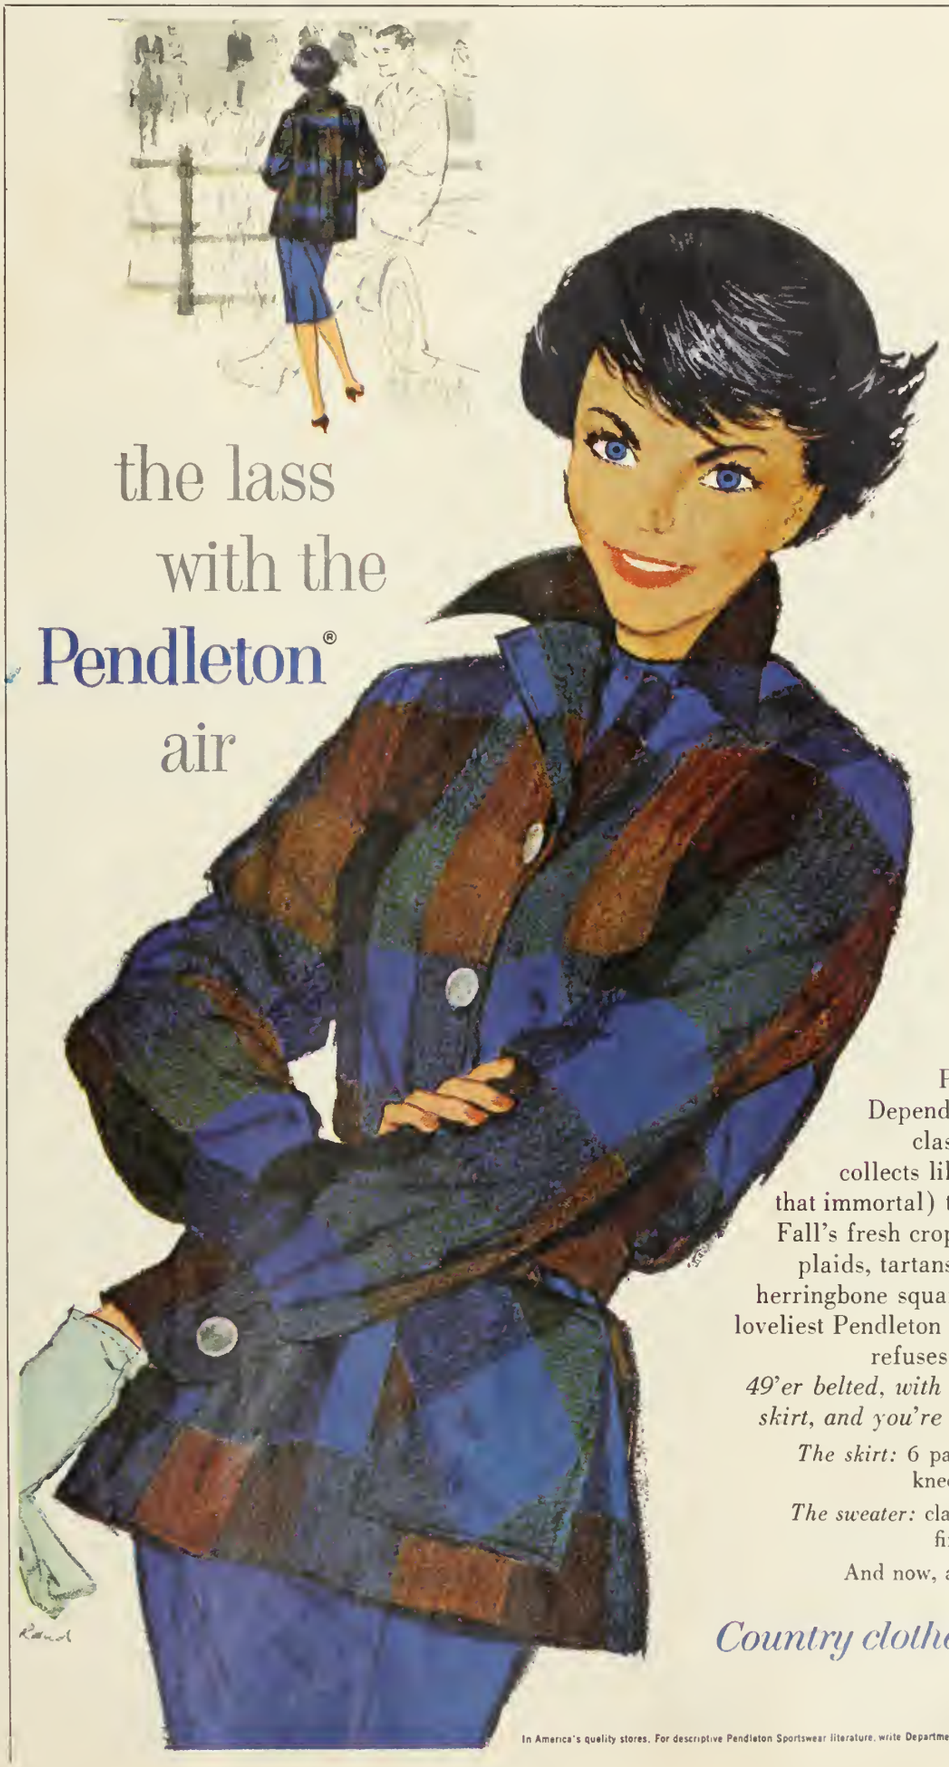
f cannot be bought off," says the s today. "Naturally, one enjoys having but there are so many things in life not for sale. Happiness, for one."

She took Mr. Archbold's ashes to his family in Virginia, and returned to Scotland to revisit the places which they had visited and loved together. "It's my way of saying thank you and good-by to Armor," she explained. "I loved him very much."

The countess owns 500,000 acres of land in Scotland, which were valued in 1948 at $24,000,000. She also owns a shooting lodge and two castles. One of these is old Castle Grant in Morayshire, which is partially in ruins but which still contains some hoary relics of ancient battles, among them the skull of Comyn of Fraichie from whom the castle was captured some 500 years ago. The other is Cullen House in Banffshire, the countess's principal residence, a magnificent show place dating from the sixteenth century and filled with priceless family paintings, furniture and tapestries. The ghost of the mad fifth earl is said to haunt the Pink Staircase, and the heart of a wife of Robert the Bruce is buried in the chapel. The castle has forty bedrooms, seven miles of corridors, and a permanent staff of nine (supplemented by "locals" when the countess is in residence). Outside are resplendent gardens and 800 square miles of deer forest and grouse moor. The countess often entertains shooting parties although she herself hates to shoot. She also maintains a three-bedroom apartment in London and a house in Nassau.

Her interests are those which come naturally to a shy woman with a bad stammer (which she has). She loves music, and the perfection of Cullen House reflects her interest in interior decoration. She likes to cook, and sometimes rents a villa in France, where she feels free to do all her own cooking. She has little personal interest in fashionable clothes, and owns no fabulous jewels. Her friends consider her friendly, charming, generous, but awfully vague about places, time and people.

The countess was a bit rueful when she heard of the engagement of her godson early



A PROMISE FOR CYNTHIA, ON HER SEVENTH BIRTHDAY

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN

ithia, take heart. For your horse is there;
a will find him tomorrow or perhaps in May,
l he will be all that the storybooks say—
t and delicate and wild and gay
l marvelous as your dreaming will dare.

lare to dream marvels. Set your heart,
the heart too cautious of being broken
ardly worth breaking. Wishes must be spoken,
uted, perhaps—and defended
with art.
t-throated whisperers are lost
at the start!

l if you must wait, be glad there is time
take your dream's measure and will it higher;
l time to grow worthy of your heart's desire:
ilver-maned steed, the sun at prime,
orld of reason, a spirit of rhyme.

She's a girl on the go. Packs 28 hours into 24. Depends on Pendleton and her classic 49'ers® (which she collects like coins, they're nearly that immortal) to take her everywhere! Fall's fresh crop is bright and bracing: plaids, tartans, checks, the handsome herringbone squares pictured. In softest, loveliest Pendleton virgin wool that simply refuses to wear out. Wear your 49'er belted, with a color-cued Pendleton skirt, and you're wearing a suit. 17.95

The skirt: 6 panels, half-lining, knee-pleats fore and aft. 14.95

The sweater: classic short-sleeved slipover. fine-gauge virgin wool. 7.95

And now, all sweaters mothproof too.

Country clothes by Pendleton

ALWAYS VIRGIN WOOL

In America's quality stores. For descriptive Pendleton Sportswear literature, write Department K60, Pendleton Woolen Mills • Portland 4, Oregon

this year. "I feel awful," she told a friend. "I've never done much about him."

Her godson happens to be Antony Armstrong-Jones, whose godmother may be a countess, but whose bride is a princess.

Separated by more than the English Channel from the heiresses of Great Britain is dashing Suzanne Volterra, one of the wealthiest women in France. Born forty-eight years ago in a Parisian near-slum, Suzanne's heritage consisted only of beauty, a talent for dancing, a shrewd head and a sunny outlook on life. "Always behave as if bad luck didn't last" is her favorite motto. For Suzanne, it hasn't.

As a girl Suzy fought her way up through the Paris theatrical world, becoming in turn a chorus girl and then a ballerina at the Paris Opera. One holiday at the race track she met Leon Volterra, a former penniless program seller and ticket scalper who, through many clever deals, had become the multimillionaire owner of a dozen Paris theaters, night clubs and music halls. Suzy married Mr. Volterra, and stopped being a ballerina.

Her husband's ruling passion was the turf, and when he died unexpectedly in 1949 after only four years of marriage, he left Suzy $40,000,000 and 45 Thoroughbred horses. Suzy knew what to do with the forty million but not with the horses (which her husband's will asked her to keep, if possible). At that point she knew little about the care and maintenance of prize-winning horses, but when the late Aga Khan promised to help her she decided to keep the stable.

Today she has a great stable of 100 Thoroughbreds, which provide her principal interest in life. She was the first Frenchwoman to win England's Epsom Downs classic, and her horses have twice taken first place in the Grand Prix de Paris, the French equivalent of the Kentucky Derby. "I'm not only happy my horse won," she told Queen Elizabeth at Epsom Downs, "but happy because he carried my husband's colors. That was the greatest homage I could have shown him."

Suzy devotes almost all her time to her horses, and two years ago gave up using a favorite perfume because it made the horses nervous. She has an apartment in Paris, with a couch covered with a huge leopardskin and walls lined with gold and silver trophies. She has a beautiful villa on the French Riviera, where she goes swimming and boating when the horses aren't running. She also has a blue chauffeur-driven limousine, which she often drives herself.

"This elegant Amazon, Suzy," a friend once called her. She is five feet ten inches tall, slim and still blond. She dresses quietly but elegantly, loves to listen to gypsy music in small cabarets, and prefers old friends to high society. "They're faithful," she says, "and that's the most important thing in the world. Happily, they know nothing about horses."

What could be defined as "democratic friendliness" in America is sometimes thought of in French aristocratic circles as too effusive. Mme. Volterra, who dislikes formality, loves to laugh and encourages even her jockeys and stableboys to call her "Suzy," is therefore not welcomed in their inner circle by some high-born Europeans. Suzy, however, doesn't seem to care a bit. She is one of the world's richest women who seems truly happy, perhaps not only because of what money can accomplish but also because of her heritage.

Moving to the south, we come to a different type entirely—a Swiss lady who inherited two fortunes and a flourishing department store, who manages them all but who believes that the best thing a woman can do is take care of a family.

"All I've done in my life is to marry, keep a good house and bring up a good family," she says. "In fact, I seem to belong to a vanishing breed. That's all I was brought up for. In my youth, nobody in our kind of society thought of preparing a woman to do anything else, and certainly not of preparing her to meet catastrophe as women today so often have to do."

Nevertheless, Mme. Marcelle Brunschwig, now fifty-eight, has for many years managed a fortune inherited from her parents, and a fashionable Geneva department store inherited from her husband. In a country where women still do not have the vote, and men hold most of the purse strings, Mme. Brunschwig is very definitely, but also very quietly, the richest woman now controlling her own wealth.

Her big, rambling and informal house straddles a ridge above Geneva, and looks out to spectacular views in either direction. There she entertains Swiss society, or French diplomats who fly down from Paris for dinner. She has three sons and five grandchildren; all of them visit her frequently and for their benefit she has recently installed that rarity in Switzerland, a swimming pool. She herself is an active sportswoman, and loves to ride, ski and play golf.

"The doctor told me," she recently reported happily to her worried family, "that I had another ten years of skiing and fifteen years of golfing in me."

Not all her activities are devoted to business, social life and sports. Loving music, she has helped many young musicians in Switzerland. Conscious of her Jewish heritage, she is devoted to the cause of Israel and serves fervently as an officer of the Geneva chapter of the Women's International Zionist Organization, which sponsors schools and welfare centers for children and women in Israel.

In Greece, as in Switzerland, it is unusual for a woman to control her own fortune, and augment it if possible; if she does so she lives quietly and stays out of the public eye as much as possible lest anyone think her "unfeminine." Thus, not very much is known about Marika Venizelou, of Athens, Greece. What is known is that she owns and manages millions.

The source of Mrs. Venizelou's fortune is a shipping business inherited from her father, a wealthy Greek shipowner. Today she owns and manages five large tankers and dry-cargo vessels with a shrewdness which has won her the respect of other Greek owners. She has multiplied by five the family fortune which she took over in 1943, and is now worth many millions—an outstanding feat in a land where women do not ordinarily take part in business.

Marika Venizelou was married to Kyriacos Venizelos, son of Greece's great modern statesman, Eleftherios Venizelos (masculine and married feminine surnames have different endings in Greece). After the death of her father Marika turned the shipping business she had inherited over to her husband to manage, and devoted herself to raising their two boys, Nikitas and Eleftherios, and their daughter, Charis.

During World War II the young family, following a pattern set by other Greek shipowners, moved bags, baggage, ships and themselves to New York for the duration. Then, in 1943, Mrs. Venizelou suddenly found herself a widow in a strange land at war, with three young children to bring up, and a flourishing shipping business badly in need of continued management. Energetic and intelligent, she accepted the challenge, mastered the intricacies of the tough, cutthroat business, developed an ability to foresee trends in the fickle freight market—and was soon making money hand over dainty fist.

She managed to find time, however, to see to the education of her children and to make sure that they were well launched in life. Nikitas has been trained for the business, in which he now works with his mother. Charis has been married off to a promising Greek diplomat. And Eleftherios has been sent into politics to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious grandfather.

In 1947 Mrs. Venizelou tried a second marriage, this time with a writer, the author-playwright Alecos Lidorikis. It ended in divorce after a few months, and she has vowed since never to marry again.

Now in her mid-fifties, the richest woman of Greece lives quietly and is little known in her own country or elsewhere. She maintains a town house in New York, where she spends much time, and a home in Athens, where she moves only within a closed circle of friends and relatives. She deliberately stays out of the limelight as much as possible.

Her enemies charge her with dominating her family to the point of suffocation. Her friends say that she has youthful effervescence and a lovely smile which breaks the long lines of her patrician face—in non-office hours only. Everyone agrees that she has energy and brains.

Oddly enough, the only other woman in the world who controls her own shipping business lives in India, where women have for cen been even more confined to the home they have in Greece. The exact extent o wealth is unknown, for in India it is no moral nor prudent to reveal how much m you have. Finance officials in the governm however, think that she is the richest wo in India—in other words, worth many lions.

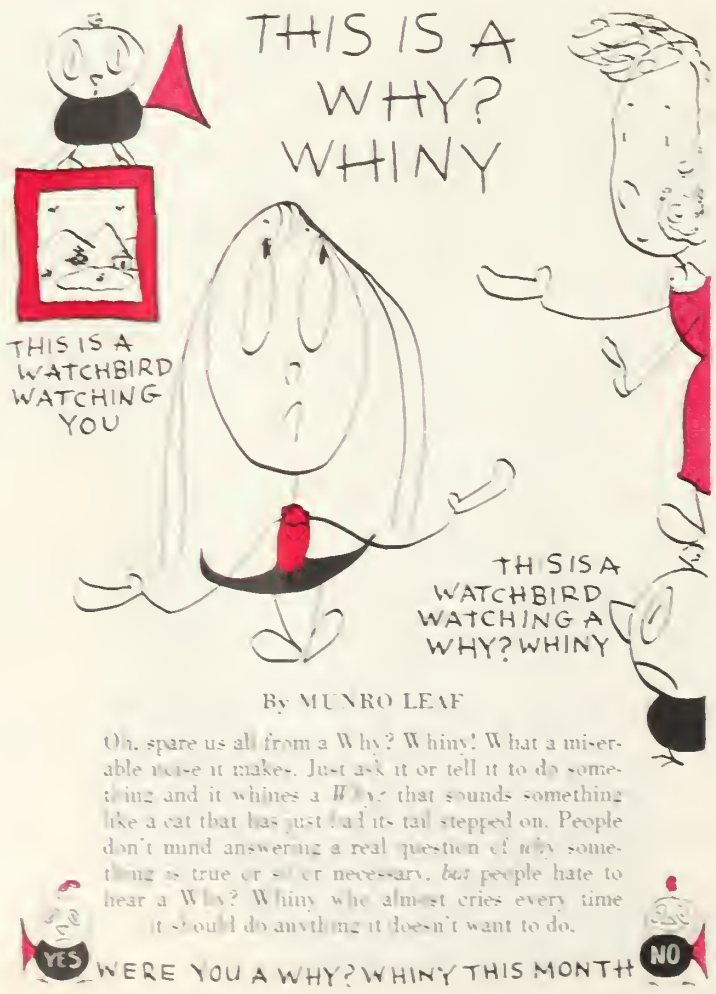
Her name is Sumati Morarjee, and s managing director of the Scindia Steam N gation Company, which controls more th per cent of India's seagoing vessels.

Mrs. Morarjee was born in Bomba March 13, 1903. Her father was a fina wizard who became known as "the kin Indian textiles." Her mother was a de Hindu. Sumati learned much from both today her Bombay office is filled with fine statues of Hindu gods as well as with trib models.

Sumati was educated at home by pr tutors, and at thirteen was married to S tikuman Morarjee, the son of a Bombay ping tycoon. Her new father-in-law was a crusader for women's education, and en aged the young girl to continue her stu As she grew older he began teaching he shipping business, and by the time she twenty-one Sumati was going to sea in family's vessels, frequently as hostess to dreds of veiled Moslem women on the se of their pilgrimage to Mecca.

When her father-in-law died in 1929, S became a partner in the family firm. Sh so successful that in the years that foll her husband gradually stepped aside an the real decisions to his wife. Both are st the board of directors, although they are rated and now maintain different reside They have no children.

The only activity ever seriously to thre Mrs. Morarjee's preoccupation with ship was the struggle for Indian independence British rule. Her big, rambling house on B bay's Juhu Beach was a haven for leade the Quit India movement. Jayaprakash rayan, the Socialist leader, hid in the h after escaping a British prison in 1942. hatma Gandhi used it as his headquarte Bombay and frequently preached from Morarjee's garden wall to thousands of ans assembled on the beach below. Becau her reverence for the great leader, Mrs. M jee calls her house "Gandhigram."



Gandhigram is a cream-colored stucco sion, surrounded by a garden and a high The garden is filled with scores of mem and ancient carvings: a huge ship's bell tolls the hours; ship's lanterns; a thous year-old statue of Jalanath, the Hindu g the sea; wood carvings and statues fro earliest days of Indian history.

"My home," says Mrs. Morarjee, "is vate place. Only my friends are invited My business requires me to entertain quently, and I always give these parties ab whatever one of the Scindia liners happe be in the harbor."

In any case, Gandhigram is too filled her art collection to allow much roo parties. One room is given entirely to s ture, another to wood carving, anoth ancient toys and still others to bronzes, p lains and antique textiles. The room Gandhi used to sleep is a miniature mu and shrine. Some sandals once worn b mahatma stand beside the hard pallet he rested. His copy of the Bhagavad-Gita of the holy books of Hinduism, lies nearby table. The house will become a tional trust after the owner's death.

Mrs. Morarjee actually uses only a sparsely furnished rooms of the mansio her own living purposes. Her tastes in clo are gay, however, and her closets are with hundreds, possibly thousands, of b silk saris, most of them in her favorite and many of them heavily embroidered in and silver. She also has a large collectio precious jewels, but rarely wears them. O other hand, she likes to poke about in kitchen overseeing her cooks, and on a idle afternoon she likes nothing better th make hot South Indian pickles.

CONTINUED ON PAGE

No baby-sitter needed for this trip across town!

Whenever you want, just pick up your phone and go visiting. A friendly chat is so welcome at both ends of the line. It opens the windows of familiar routine, lets in laughter and companionship to brighten the day.

Friends and family—the folks you love to visit with—are only a casual call from your favorite chair right now.

Bell Telephone System

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 114

Mrs. Morarjee has been too much influenced by her mother and Mahatma Gandhi to lead a "society life," in the Western sense of the phrase. She is a nondrinker and a strict vegetarian who declines eggs as well as meat on religious grounds. She rises early, and her normal day begins with prayers at 6 A.M.

"My mother taught me to pray," she says. "I could no more stop praying than I could breathing."

East is East and West is . . . well, different. Across the world from India, for instance, lives a lady who tried to buy the Brooklyn Dodgers for $8,000,000. Once when she was sick her husband spent $150,000 laying a special television cable to her home so that she could watch all the games played by her favorite baseball team.

This rabid fan is Mrs. Dorothy Killam, of Canada. She is far and away the richest woman, and maybe person, in Canada; some say she's a runner-up for the richest-woman-in-the-world sweepstakes.

She was born Dorothy Johnston in St. Louis, Missouri, some sixty years ago, and in 1922 married Izaak Walton Killam, a Canadian millionaire who made most of his money in paper, pulp, newspapers and brilliant investments. He died in 1955, leaving his wife a fortune estimated at between $250,000,000 and $275,000,000.

Mr. Killam was a sportsman, and his wife shared his interests. She is a fly-fishing expert, and still maintains a lavish fishing camp in New Brunswick, as well as homes on the Riviera and in Nassau and an apartment in New York. Her principal home, large but unremarkable, is in Montreal on a fashionable but changing street which would be the equivalent of New York's Fifth Avenue. She spends the winter in Nassau, the spring in New York and later New Brunswick (for the salmon fishing); the rest of the year is divided between Montreal, New York and the Riviera. She has no children.

She was a baseball fan as a girl in St. Louis, and her husband shared this interest. They had a box seat at Ebbets Field and went year after year to see the home games and to see their friends, the Dodger officials and star players. At all the games, says a Montreal sportswriter, "Mrs. Killam did her share of shouting." After her husband's death, Mrs. Killam offered to buy the team in an effort to stop the move to Los Angeles, but was turned down because the profit prospects in California were so bright.

A dainty, quick-humored woman, Mrs. Killam entertains moderately and dresses with quiet elegance. She loves jewels, and doesn't mind paying for them—as why should she? A few years ago, for instance, she bought $150,000 worth of diamond gewgaws from a Montreal dealer, but indignantly rejected the paste replicas which accompanied the real jewels.

"If I'm going to spend this much on gems I want to wear the things, not imitations," she announced.

THE GOSSIPS

By MARY PETERS

Oh, let them talk! I find delight In dodging barbs. A withered tongue
Does little harm and pain is slight
When flesh is young.

But should they cease to find me
food
For slander; should I fail to keep Their pot of defamation brewed,
Then shall I weep.

Another lady who prefers the real to the imitation is a gentlewoman whose family has been accustomed to the genuine for a good many centuries now: the beautiful young eighteenth Duchess of Alba, the richest woman in Spain.

Her full name is Maria del Rosario Cayetana Fitz-James Stuart y de Silva, Duchess of Berwick, Alba de tormes, de Liria y Xerica, de Arjona, and de Montoro. Through the Fitz-James Stuarts she is the direct descendant of King James II of England. When asked last winter how many titles, English and Spanish, she has, she replied vaguely, "Forty-two or forty-four, I think." Some set the figure at sixty-six, but no one dares to set the amount of her wealth at anything more exact than "enormous."

The Duchess of Alba seems to have had more fairy godmothers and happy wishes around her cradle than any of the other of the world's richest women.

At thirty-two she is a golden-skinned beauty, tall and slim with a sensitive face and soft brown hair.

She has a tall, dark and handsome husband named Don Luis Martinez de Irujo y Artazcoz.

She has four small, dark and handsome sons, ranging in age from twelve down to one year. Alfonso, the ten-year-old second son, plays the guitar and is talented at painting, as is his mother.

She is religiously devout, active in charitable works, and would rather paint or go horseback riding with her children than fritter her time away in frivolous Spanish society. No breath of scandal has ever touched her life.

She knows how to dress, prefers elegant sports clothes, never wears hats except to luncheons in New York. She loves to travel, and always travels modestly. The last time she visited America, she brought only three suitcases, one hatbox and one maid. She took back with her one pair of blue jeans and one American bathing suit.

"She rides, I don't ride," her husband the duke says affectionately. "I shoot, she doesn't shoot. I sail, she doesn't sail. But we ski."

Much of her time and interest go to s causes, and at least 10 per cent of her i to orphanages, hospitals, health reso children, a private symphony orchest aid to young artists.

She inherited five palaces from her all declared "national monuments" b government because of their architectur historic value. The greatest of these Palacio de Liria in Madrid, which was b 1792, partially bombed during the S Civil War and recently rebuilt. It co twenty-two salons filled with paintings b masters as Titian and other great artists Renaissance. It also contains the letter Columbus to his son, as well as a map New World drawn by Queen Isabella tégé. "Anyone who wishes may see," sa duchess graciously. The duke and duche in a four-room suite on one floor, the ch on another.

In spring they all spend a few weeks i Seville palace, a fantasy of Moorish ar ture dating from the fourteenth centur palace has five courtyards with fountair is situated on a farm raising cows, shee goats.

She also owns a vast ranch in Salar and assorted other property around She loves bullfights, but doesn't raise fi bulls.

The duchess has a little Fiat, whi drives herself. In Seville, following old c she often rides with her family in a carri landau or berlin—with a driver up in In Madrid she sometimes likes to go fo ings in a duque, which is a two-horse c seating four in facing seats. This she herself, although a groom rides along afraid I'm the last person in Madrid to carriage," the duchess says sadly.

She is, very definitely, an aristocrat traditionalist. She is also a woman of tion, charm and great good fortune. Th things, alas, cannot be said for all the w wealthiest women.

GLAMOROUS HOURS are just a step away. Your gown, glorious. Your stockings, Belle-Sharmeer. Only Belle-Sharmeer will so surely live up to the importance of the evening. They enhance and romance your legs—bring an added touch of perfection to every costume. Exclusive legsize knit means exquisite fit, faultless fashion from toe to top. Naturally, they wear much longer. Your choice of seamless or fully fashioned styles in all the season's most desired shades. At fine stores everywhere . . . when your legs must be fabulously dressed.

EARED RIMINAL

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 51

unusual, however, as a psychologist ied our case said—it was a typical be- attern of a father who is unable to me to his children.

l years came. Judy Ann did well, but was a problem. I literally talked him the elementary grades by seeing his promising them I would help the etter, convincing them that he should oted when he did not deserve to be. often stayed out of school and got th it. He lost so much school that and Judy Ann were in the same class. d sit in the back of the room, put his n the desk and ask irrelevant ques- get the teacher off a subject he hadn't He was smart enough when he wanted himself, but he was always trying to game." Once when he was supposed written a paper and had come to class ed, he asked classmates what they ten, and when called on to recite he od report from a blank piece of paper. Ann was always complaining to me, I mention Lennie's poor schoolwork usband on several occasions when it I that our boy might fail again. My passed off these reports by saying, just a little country school. Those are no good. We'll send Lennie to a hool someday." I was inclined to e were taking our child's side against ol. How many parents reading this ve done the same thing?

were other reports of my son's mis- : from the school-bus driver, from ager of the local theater that held matinees, and others. He misbe- badly on the bus that the driver often off along the road. He would call to his sister, "Tell maw to come and " (He knew I hated to be called When he didn't arrive on the bus I the car and made the two- or three- e to bring him home.

high time that Leonard and I got over our son's problems, but we took rted action. I tended to withhold in- n concerning our boy's bad behavior onard. My husband came home from e, and he was usually tired and pos- ite worried over some matter. His d never lightened, because after he building-supply business on an even ranched out into contracting. He was our great future, and it didn't seem me to annoy him at night with re- out the petty misbehavior of our boy. sbehavior was a household matter should handle.

ay, on the occasions when I couldn't nie's misdeeds to myself, my husband eplied, "It's just a stage the boy is rough. He'll outgrow it. I was full of when I was a kid." I felt my husband t. Surely our son would straighten out w older and more responsible.

t mention that our daughter was problem. As I look back, I feel that ons included the fact that I made a on out of her, and such a relationship rely lacking between my son and his taught my daughter household duties, ith her, learned what was going on nind and tried to help her. Further- e was not the recipient of so many toys, knickknacks and candy from and and thus did not develop such a ttitude as our son did.

passed; my husband's business ven- gan to prosper, we added a basement oom and a guest bedroom to our d we acquired some extra land with es and room for a vegetable garden. uld have been very happy for all of t wasn't always happy, because when ntered high school the battles of the e, chores and family car got under oking back, I can see that my husband st all these battles, primarily because had learned how to exploit the division between his parents. He sensed that my husband and I were not together in disciplining and training him, and he quickly learned how to turn this to his advantage.

In the matter of an allowance, my husband felt quite strongly that when a child is old enough to want money he's old enough to earn it. Lennie was to be given $2.50 per week while in high school and this allowance was to cover his lunches as well as provide spending money. If the boy wanted anything that cost more, the money could be advanced to him, provided he would work at the business office or at home to repay the advance. My husband thought this plan would teach Lennie to be industrious. It probably would have worked had my husband and I stood together to enforce its terms.

As things turned out, our son got his advances to buy things he wanted, but the work he was supposed to do never quite got done. When I wanted Lennie to work at home he would plead that daddy had a job for him at the office and vanish. Likewise, his father never got much work out of our son because Lennie would plead that he had repaid a certain debt by doing chores at home.

I remember how angry Judy Ann used to get about this. One fall their father asked the two children to go out and pick a box of apples. They were not supposed to shake these off the tree because the fall would bruise them. Lennie took the car and drove Judy Ann all over the countryside. They got back late. Lennie did a quick job of shaking the fruit to the ground and then rushed the boxful into the cellar so nobody would see the bruises. He told us the reason he was late was that he had picked each apple carefully.

In those days I didn't know exactly what was going on. Looking back, I am certain that our son simply obtained money and then bamboozled both of us into believing that work had been performed to pay for the advance. My husband and I bear a guilt for our negligence during this period. We should have got together and supervised this doling out of allowances and advances, for much harm was done to our child in those years. He received more money than the average high-school student sees, he spent freely and he learned to obtain money through trickery or deceit. Unfortunately, it was the same old story: my husband was "too busy."

It was the issue of the family car that finally brought our son's waywardness forcibly to our attention. Leonard taught the boy to drive, and as soon as Lennie got his driver's license he wanted the car. He was given the car on Saturday nights to take his girl to the dance nearby. This permission was granted with misgivings, for both Leonard and I had noticed that Lennie was traveling with a wild crowd. The upshot was that our car was completely demolished on the third Saturday our son took it out. Lennie was in the hospital with back injuries for several days, and another boy suffered a broken leg. State patrolmen said that our son was driving recklessly when the accident occurred.

My husband put his foot down and ruled that Lennie was never again to drive the family car. But what a battle this decision brought on. Lennie wanted the car badly, and he had never been denied anything in his life that he really wanted badly. He plagued my husband, and begged and argued and made every Saturday night a nightmare. It didn't seem that he was going to take no for an answer; then suddenly he stopped mentioning the car, although he still went to the dance.

My husband and I were foolish enough to think that we had won this argument until one Sunday morning when we got up early to go to town and discovered that the car's engine was still warm. It had been used, but not by my husband, who had parked it in the garage Saturday afternoon. Our son had learned, from his friends, how to wire around the ignition and start the car without the key. This brought on another series of battles in our house, and my husband commenced parking the car by a kitchen window where it was visible at all times.

About three weeks later a bombshell hit us; the police called from town to say that our boy had been arrested for car theft. He and two friends had been caught joy riding in a stolen vehicle and were being held in the city jail while their parents were summoned. We rushed to town and got Lennie out of jail. Later, through our friendship with the local magistrate, we managed to get the charges against our son dropped by promising that we would supervise the boy closely and see that he didn't do such a thing again.

Now we were beginning to pay for our neglect of our child's training. Our son had grown into a young man who would scarcely discuss the time of day with his parents. He came and went as he pleased and he told us nothing about his activities outside the home. He would be pleasant enough most of the time, but if we tried to question him about his activities, or impose any curbs on him, he became sullen and silent. He would take no advice, nor would he make any explanations of his waywardness. He couldn't be reasoned with; we couldn't seem to reach his mind.

He became so delinquent at school he was expelled in his junior year. Since Leonard and I had no control over him, we lived in dread that he would steal another car or get into some other trouble. My husband, who once was too busy to devote time to our son, was now so worried over the boy he scarcely had time to devote to business.

BE COOL...
BE BEAUTIFUL...

DESERT FLOWER
...USE beauty Ice®

It's like bathing your face in champagne! Mokes you feel bright ond light and lively, mokes you look glowy os o rose! Stimulotes and tones your complexion os it refreshes.

Silkens dry skin, reduces oiliness! Beouty Ice is the first beouty oid mode that can keep port-dry, part-oily skin altogether beautiful! The second you stroke it on, dull, porched areas seem to vanish, shiny, oily spots toke on o velvet texture.

Magic make-up base, blissful bedtime facial! This frosty-cool "solid moisture" disoppeors into your skin instontly, works invisibly. Use it morning ond night — it's pure pleosure! 1.50 plus tax

At leading cosmetic and tolletries counters

SHULTON

Abbott Laboratories, North Chicago, Illinois and Montreal, Canada. ®Sucaryl—Abbott's Non-Caloric Sweetener

The real tragedy of the situation was the fact that the damage to our son could not be undone. My husband tried, at this late date, to make a companion out of our boy. He took Lennie fishing, to sports events, even to church. But this effort was a complete failure. Even though they had lived together for sixteen years, Leonard and his son were strangers to each other. Lennie's outlook on life had grown so warped that the more my husband learned about the boy, the more appalled he became. A psychologist whom we consulted at the time told us that Lennie was unlikely to make a distinct change for the better. The boy had reached maturity, and people do not readily change at that stage of life. The sapling had grown into a bent tree and little could be done. This psychologist recommended a strict program of supervision for our son, and if the boy would not adhere to this program, to withdraw all his support and, in effect, abandon him and see what results this method would produce.

But we didn't abandon him; we stood by him for the same reason that many parents stand behind wayward young men and women. We felt guilty because we knew that our neglect was at the root of the boy's troubles. We allowed him to stay at home, come and go as he pleased, and even complied with his requests for money because we were afraid he'd steal if we didn't provide for his support. All the while we pleaded with him to straighten up and go back to school. He promised to return to school, then one day he came to us and said he would like to quit school, get married and settle down. His choice of a wife was amazingly good, a fine young girl.

My husband was overjoyed and immediately offered to take Lennie into the business. We also made the down payment on a home for the young couple, and helped them buy furniture and other essentials. Leonard and I treasured the hope that our problems with the boy would soon vanish. We should have known better. We should have guessed that a young man who would not be responsible for himself certainly would not accept the responsibility of taking care of others. He made the worst kind of husband, being gone much of the time, refusing to do any chores around his home and spending most of his income on himself, leaving his wife to look to Leonard and me for support.

Even worse was his performance of his duties at the office. He showed up in the morning whenever he pleased, kept demanding more money and did as little work as possible. He and Leonard quarreled constantly, and Lennie's presence in the office demoralized everyone working there. Finally, Lennie simply disappeared one day after an especially bitter argument with my husband, leaving his wife and baby for us to look after. We were worried sick over his disappearance. Then a forged payroll check showed up in my husband's bank statement, soon another and another. When the forged checks totaled $1000 we still continued to honor them because we knew who was cashing them. We tried desperately to trace our son by searching the nearby cities where the checks were being cashed. Finally, when a check written for nearly $500 came in, my husband refused to honor it, charging that it was a forgery. Leonard said that he had taken all he could take from the boy. Almost immediately Lennie was arrested, jailed and charged with forgery. Once again we went to his aid.

Lennie was frightened and weeping, and oh! how we love him when he's that way. That's the only time a person can get to him; he's penitent, willing to admit the error of his ways and full of promises that he'll do better. My husband was grief-stricken over causing his son's arrest and tried to get the charges dropped. We couldn't kill the charges, but we did manage to get his sentence so reduced that the boy actually served only about five months.

We had hopes that this sentence would teach Lennie a lesson and bring about an improvement in his behavior. What futile hopes these were! We have learned that serving time in prison usually makes an offender worse. First of all our son became addi a habit-forming type of pill called a "b which prisoners circulate. Secondly, contact with all decent friends and dev a circle of companions who were as he was. I know that people who prison are not supposed to get togeth side prison walls when they are parole they do. In prison they make appointm meet when they are free, plan escapad even crimes. When they get out the together and there isn't much hope that of them will truly "go straight."

Our son came home from the refor hardened and full of prison lingo. Frien dropped around to visit him bore the o stamp of ex-cons. He was as much a p as ever, and his wife finally divorced hi father had kept Lennie's name, as an as in his business, on his trucks and on hi ness stationery all through the time was in the reformatory; now, final ceased attempts to sponsor Lennie in bu However, we still allowed him to live at for our feelings of guilt were great.

My story has a climax which was r on a stormy December night. Police came to our door and said that Lenn in "real trouble." They said our boy try to contact us, and if he did to notify headquarters immediately. They left w telling us the nature of Lennie's crime.

My husband and I sat up that ni silence, crushed by the chain of terrible in which one child had enmeshed us. 10 P.M. the telephone rang and I hear nie's quivering voice whispering to me, me the car and some money. You bet this. I need help bad." He said he Berry's Tavern, a cheap pool parlor a at the lower end of town.

I called the police and they said, down and pick us up. Then keep your ap ment with your son." I drove to the s where two officers got into the back se crouched. Then I headed the car towa tavern. It was the longest drive of my li a thousand thoughts ran through my

"Do we always have to spend my day off having fun? Why can't we just sit around and do nothing?"

how many times Lennie had disas a little child, and I had not —I couldn't bear to see him cry hen go to his room and pout.
the time Lennie was in the sixth he driver had put him off the or misbehavior. I drove out on and picked up my son, but I that if he was ever put off the again he would have to walk pened again, and I couldn't bear my boy alone on the highway in kness, so I went after him again.
of the time we had bought Lennie esire, a pony. We warned him not my go free in the yard where he n the highway and possibly be Lennie turned the animal loose nd a truck killed the pet. Our sobeyed us, but he was so heartthe loss of his pony that we another one.
lone Lennie a favor by being so and willing to forget his mis-we had betrayed him in the worst sible, for we had failed to teach live and be happy in this world.
d in front of the tavern, and I saw nder figure emerge from the door ward me. I closed my eyes. The pened and Lennie started to say,
" then the back door shot open cracked, "Put up your hands!"
n of the tavern lights I watched my son; when they pulled a re-his coat my life seemed to end.

t have passed since that terrible brought a repetition of our trou-n has constantly been in and out have consulted several psychol-ad them examine our son, and us, develop some treatment or method n that might bring Lennie to his hologists can't help us, and here ict:
d foremost, Lennie was reared in ome." There was no divorce or alcoholic problem or anything like that. There simply was a division between the parents; my husband and I did not stand together in training our son. Our son learned to exploit the situation and profit through dishonesty and deceit. He is still trying to do this in his relationship with the world. He prefers dishonest tactics to hard work, and he isn't apt to change his outlook because deceit and dishonesty were so deeply ingrained in him during his formative years.

2. We destroyed our son's "insight into the future" by constantly protecting him from the evil effects of his misdeeds. If he broke a toy, he got another; if he disobeyed, he was forgiven; when he got into trouble at school, he was defended and fished out of trouble; when he got into trouble with authorities, we shielded him as much as we could. As a result, he cannot see clearly ahead and realize that improper behavior is bound to cause him trouble. He can't realize that "crime does not pay." Petty crime paid him handsomely for a long period of time, and he will ever search for ways to make it pay again. Prison sentences may change the pattern of his criminal activities but they will never truly reform him. This inability to see clearly all the probable effects of misbehavior is present in the make-up of virtually every criminal, according to psychologists.

3. Our son is dangerous. When denied what he wants, he tends toward the same fits of anger he displayed when denied things at the age of four. The only difference is that now he carries a gun and is capable of killing.

4. Nothing can be done for him. On one of my visits to him in prison—and it is a terrible thing to see someone you love behind those bars—I brought him a picture of his son. "Who's that?" he asked. When I told him, he laughed and said, "He's a nice-looking boy." He might have been commenting on a stranger—as indeed his own son is. He has no sense of responsibility for anybody. There is nothing wrong with him mentally or physically, so there is no treatment for his condition. Because of improper training he grew into the wrong mold, and now that he has matured he can't be "unmolded." The material of which his character is fashioned has, in a sense, cooled and hardened.

So, a home which produced a daughter who graduated from a university with honors, became a college instructor, then married and settled down to rearing a fine family, also produced a son who is not only a criminal but who is ranked as a dangerous public enemy. Why the difference between these two children who were reared in the same environment by the same parents? Nothing more than the training and companionship extended to one, but which did not reach the other.

It can be truly said that our son was our ruination. The stories of his misdeeds, and the sensational capture in which I participated, were widely printed in the newspapers. It was more than my husband and I could stand. We sold our business and our home at a loss, and moved far away from the city where we had suffered so much unhappiness. Today we are not in the best of circumstances, and we still must help our son's divorced wife rear our grandchild. The future my husband worked so hard to build has turned into a nightmare, all because we neglected one child.

The moral of this story should be quite clear to readers, but I will sum it up.

First of all, one parent cannot properly rear a child. Parents must stand together, and cooperate in the training of children. It is bad enough when a child loses a parent through divorce or death. It is much worse when the child has two parents but learns to play one against the other to achieve his ends. This child loses all respect for his parents, and bows to no authority.

Secondly, training must be administered from the cradle to the day the child leaves home and enters the world. There is no such thing as a child's "outgrowing" his shortcomings. The process of "outgrowing" actually is a result of training and discipline being applied by parents and the world as a child grows older. If improper training and discipline are applied at home, and the youth is protected from learning lessons in the world, the child will not outgrow anything. Instead, he will confirm and expand his bad habits. A growing child will not show any improvement in conduct at any given age; rather, his character is being molded every day of his young life. A mother can well look at her young son each morning and say, "What he is today he'll be when he's twenty-one."

Never be too busy to pay heed to the training of a child. Never put off discipline. Tomorrow may be too late, and damage that is being done to a child each day through neglect can never be undone. Furthermore, when parents make a failure of the task of training a child, everything they have worked for in life is apt to be lost. That's the bitter lesson that my husband and I have learned.

Above all, bear in mind that rearing a criminal is easier than you think. END

BACK VIEW,
SIZES AND PRICE OF VOGUE
PATTERN ON PAGE 111

Vogue Design No. 9628.
"Easy to Make" Blouse; 10-18 (31-38). 60c. Version shown requires 1 yard of 45" fabric without nap, size 14.

NEW BETTY CROCKER COUNTRY KITCHEN CAKE MIX

"It's so  nice to have a cake around the house! Especially one of our new Country Kitchen Cakes. They taste as rich—and keep as fresh—as homemade butter cake. Pink Azalea Cake recipe's on the White Cake package."

the red spoon tells you it's Betty Crocker and General Mills guarantees it!

Rich in Living is their Harvest

From Texas to Montana, from May to September, the Wisdom family follows the harvest.
Raymond and the crew sometimes work 24 hours a day;
Faye feeds 11 from a trailer kitchen, delivering hot meals to fields 25 miles away.
For their children, the summer is one long, golden holiday.

Dear Editors: We do commercial harvesting. Raymond, my husband, runs combines in the summer and I go along and cook for the hands. There are eleven to cook for, including our children. We have a forty-foot trailer house with two bedrooms, a bath, a complete kitchen and a living room.

The Wisdom caravan—house trailer, two pickups, three combines, three hauling trucks and the crew's bunk bus.

My family is: Raymond, our two sons, Steven Ray, who is 7 years old; Raymond Paul, 4; and our darling little girl, Judy, 18 months old.

We have a bus with bunks and a shower in it for the boys who work for us to live in. We start harvesting wheat, oats and barley around the middle or last of May at Crowell, Texas. And we move slowly north until September finds us in Northern Montana. I have gone on harvest six years and love every day of it. It is hard, dirty work and the hours are long.

A day at Crowell begins at about 4:30 or 5. Raymond pushes me out of bed and I start breakfast. Everyone eats a big breakfast because it is a long time until lunch. Then the men are off to the field to service the combines and start cutting. I dress the children; the little boys, Steven and Paul, can go with their daddy if they want to.

Trailers are compact, but everything has its place. Beds have to be made up and clothes washed and toys put away. I start lunch as soon as breakfast is over and the dishes are do Sometimes I have to take lunch as far as twenty-five miles to t field. I sometimes stop on the road and feed a truck driver w is taking in a load of wheat. I cook in large pans and take t food to the field in them. I make about 4 gallons of tea a sometimes 1½ gallons of ice cream.

It is usually 2 or 3 o'clock when I get back to the trailer bring Steven and Paul back. We all have a bath. I do the dish and start supper. I like to have it to the men in the field by 6: and usually get back to the trailer around 8 or 9 P.M. Anoth bath and to bed for the kids. But I have dishes, dishes a more dishes to wash.

Some may frown on our life and think it is a bad way bring up children. But our children are as normal as any a I would be proud to stand them up with the best. Steve report card shows A's, B's and C's, and the past six wee he made all A's.

I think my story proves that teenage marriages can wo out. I was fifteen years old when I married and moved in the house with my mother-in-law and father-in-law. I do gi all the credit to my wonderful husband, who is nine yea older than I and is very thoughtful. Our son Steven was bo sixteen months after we were married, and I think his birth w the most wonderful thing that ever happened to me. And th the birth of our other two children was just as wonderful.

Sincerely,

FAYE WISDOM (Mrs. Raymond W

BY NELLE KEYS BEL

Judy loves the fields. There are jack rabbits, pheasants, curlews—and sometimes her father takes her for a ride on a combine.

"There's only one thing about going on harvest that I don't like," avers pretty 24-year-old Faye Wisdom, sorting armfuls of freshly laundered clothing and linens. "Sometimes it's impossible to get the children to church and Sunday school—we may be fifty miles from a church. But that's the only thing I mind.

"Oh, well," she concedes, looking over the big stack of clean towels, "I do miss my clothes dryer a little; it leaves towels and rugs so nice and fluffy. We have a good washer in the trailer, though, and things smell so nice when they're dried in the sun. Velora Drosselmyer told me to use her clotheslines any time I want to, and I keep them full."

She looks through a side window to the elm-shaded plastic pool where dimpled, agile Judy is splashing away. "Just during the last two weeks," she explains, "Judy has reached the stage where I never know what she'll get into next. If I don't watch her, she'll be halfway to Wyoming in five seconds."

Inviting odors are rising from the large pots on the butane-fueled range. Faye inspects the contents, and invites attention to the well-equipped kitchen, with double sink, nine-cubic-foot refrigerator, and generous counter and cupboard space. She is equally proud of the handsome bathroom, with both tub and shower; and of the more-than-adequate storage spaces throughout the trailer. Each member of the family has his own closet, and ample drawer space. "It's as easy to live in as our house in Lockney," Faye remarks. "As a matter of fact, this is a better kitchen than the one at home."

The trailer is parked near Glen and Velora Drosselmyer's farmhouse in Two Buttes, Colorado, where the Wisdoms expect to stay about three weeks. Raymond and the crew are cutting 1000 acres of wheat for the Drosselmyers, and will cut smaller acreages for several other farmers. The little boys, Faye explains, are out in the fields with their father.

Two Buttes is a small crossroads community which lies on the high plains of Southern Colorado. In every direction golden fields of wheat, level as the palm of a hand, stretch away to the horizon; they are broken only by the twin-peaked hill that gives the area its name, an occasional Chinese-elm tree, and the steadily moving combines gulping their way in wide swaths round and round the fields. Not one wisp of cloud marks the intense blue of the sky; and morning sun beats down in waves of heat that shimmer off the silvery sides of the trailer. The interior is kept comfortable, though, by the wind—which seems to blow all the time.

A red pickup truck swings to a quick stop beside the blue one parked near the trailer. From it descends blond, stocky Raymond Wisdom, 33, whose blue eyes sparkle from a face black with grime. Behind him come two small Westerners, Steven and Paul, with eyes as blue and faces as dirty as his own. "They all started clean this morning," Faye says hastily, "but you can't stay clean in a wheat field."

Raymond swoops his dripping daughter from the pool and brings her in with him. "Honey, we're moving to a new field," he says, helping himself to a drink of cool water.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JOHN LEWIS STAGE

Wheat grows so tall that when Paul (here still eating) walks into it, all that can be seen is his Western hat floating over a sea of waving grain.

"The crew is taking the combines and trucks over, and I came by to tell you how to get there."

The crew, he explains, consists of six high-school boys from "back home," one of whom is Faye's 17-year-old brother, Douglas Boone. "They all have to be good drivers and know how to handle heavy equipment," Raymond says, "and they have to be able to take responsibility and be willing to work hard and long. I've got a good crew this year—Jake, Ron, Curtis, Wayne, Butch and Doug. We guarantee all our work, and I have to have boys I can depend on."

When their father hurries off to the new field, Steven and Paul remain at the trailer. They are sturdy, intelligent little boys, interested in everything that goes on, and courteously amused by a benighted adult visitor who can't tell the difference between growing wheat and barley.

"I'm hungry, mamma," Paul remarks, "I want somefin' to ate . . . please."

"Wash first," says Faye automatically, dealing out cookies and milk all around.

Having quickly tucked away his share, Paul edges close to the visitor and confides, "One time down in Texas, me and my daddy were out in the field and we saw a jack rabbit and I shot him."

"You shot a jack rabbit?"

"Well," he asserts firmly, "me and my daddy did!"

"This morning," Steven reports, "we saw two combines on the road, and they were labeled 'His' and 'Hers.'"

"Why didn't we ever think of that?" Faye laughs. "Up till last year we could have called ours 'Ours' and 'The Bank's.'"

On harvest Faye and Raymond start the day by breakfasting alone—"The only time all day when we have any chance to really talk. When he comes in at night he's so tired he can barely stay awake long enough to get a bath and fall in bed."

Raymond goes to the bunk bus to waken the crew, who come to the trailer two or three at a time for breakfast. Freshly scrubbed, dressed in virtual uniforms of skin-tight Levis, wide, tooled-leather belts, and sport shirts, and carrying the inevitable broad-brimmed Western hats, they tuck their cowboy boots under the table and stow away remarkable quantities of food: about two pounds of bacon, two dozen eggs, a gallon each of juice and milk (Raymond is the only one who drinks coffee), three kinds of jams and jellies, and pan after pan of toast or hot biscuits. Faye serves pancakes about twice a week, making both buckwheat and "regular" ones, to suit all preferences.

Steven, Paul and Judy waken in their own time and fill in around the table; the little boys wear miniature versions of the crew's garb, complete with "buckle belts" and Texas hats whose brims are bent to a razor-sharp point, "just like Jake's." Members of the crew who have finished breakfast move to the living-room couch to play with Judy, and to josh the late arrivals. "You got a letter," Doug teases Jake, "but it was from some girl, so I just threw it away." CONTINUED ON PAGE 126

As far as eye can see, the wheat fields stretch level as the palm of a hand, an occasional tree breaking the monotony. Harvest is finished in this field, and the crew prepares to go on to the next.

How to make vegetables the interesting part of the meal

It's easy with appetizing foods by STOKELY-VAN CAMP!

Add life to Green Beans—devil with tempting sauce. Blend one teaspoon prepared mustard, two teaspoons Worcestershire Sauce into ¼ cup soft butter, add to hot, drained Stokely's Finest Green Beans—they're always . . .

young, tender and stringless!

Serve peas in a new light, topped with crumbled, crisp bacon (fresh mint, slivered almonds, or Stokely's Finest Diced Pimiento). With Stokely's Finest you're sure of peas that are just-picked sweet and . . .

young, tender and tasty!

Shellie Beans—interesting dish all by itself . . . tender green beans with the meaty, nut-like flavor of shelled-out beans. An old-fashioned taste as delicious as grandma's. Try 'em, but remember . . .

only Stokely-Van Camp makes 'em!

CORRECTOL—the woman's gentle laxative for easy relief

A single tablet helps take care of nature's tardiness

Because you're a woman, you may have very special needs when you're constipated. The laxative you use should be extra gentle to your sensitive system, and extra dependable, too—one you can count on to stimulate the normal movement so essential to regularity.

Correctol® is made to meet these special needs of women. It contains a medical discovery that softens waste for easy, relaxed elimination, plus a small amount of mild laxative that moves the waste gently.

Working together, these ingredients bring a comforting kind of relief more naturally than any ordinary laxative can.

Hospital-proved Correctol is recommended even when your system is particularly sensitive—from adolescence through the older years. 30 tablets, $1.00.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

MORE PEOPLE USE refreshing, calorie-free

Sugarine
LIQUID SWEETENER

SWEETER THAN SUGAR
YET NO FOOD VALUE

Recommended by doctors for diabetics, overweights and lo-calorie diets. Use for beverages, desserts, cooking. Pure. Harmless.

USE-TESTED by McCall's

GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 oz.– 75c

AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

nails cry "help"

Would you rather sit on your hands than show them off? Do you envy the lovely hands of the stars? Wishing won't help brittle, cracked, thin, never-grow nails—they need professional care! Treat them to Juliette Marglen's world-famous Protective Method for longer, stronger nails...see Juliette Marglen's unique nail care cosmetics at finest stores or send $1.00 (includes tax, postage) for problem-nail "Sampler Kit" of Base and Seal to

Juliette Marglen Laboratories
5 West 54 Street, New York 19

STOP PAIN INSTANTLY
COMBAT INFECTION-PROMOTE HEALING
WITH STAINLESS

Campho-Phenique

(PRONOUNCED CAM-FO-FIN-EEK)

WHEN USED ON PIMPLES-ACNE

CAMPHO-PHENIQUE HELPS PREVENT THEIR SPREAD AND RE-INFECTION

It's wonderful, too, for fever blisters, cold sores, gum boils, cuts and scratches, minor burns caused by book matches, hot cooking utensils, hot water or steam. Campho-Phenique relieves itching of insect bites, poison ivy, etc. Just apply Campho-Phenique next time and see how fast this pain-relieving antiseptic goes to work. And it doesn't stain the skin! Get a bottle today.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 121

Ron asks, "Ma'am, may I have some eye-drops from the first-aid kit? This dirt up here burns my eyes a lot worse than Texas dirt."

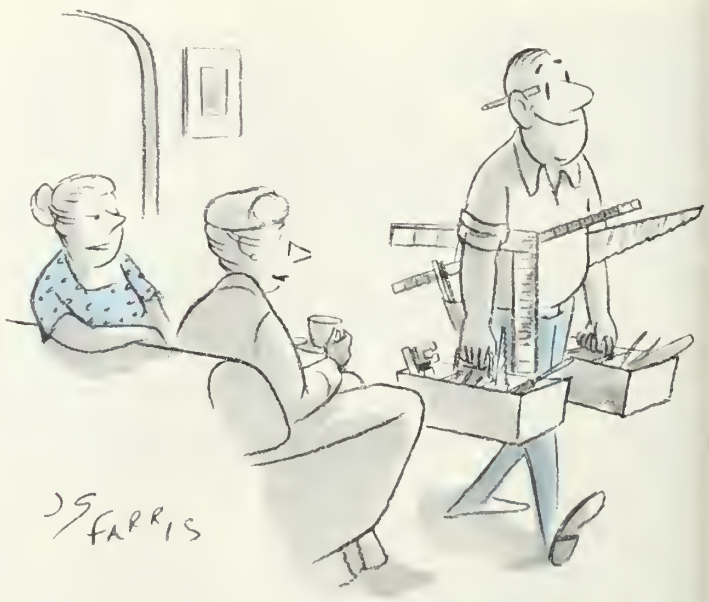
By 6:30 the men leave for the harvest field. Steven and Paul go with their father, eager to "help" on the combines and ride in the big trucks. "They are no trouble in the field," Raymond says. "They know how to take care of themselves around machinery and what to stay away from. Of course I keep an eye on them, and so do the hands. I think it's good for them to grow up in the fields—I learned my business that way, and they will too."

Judy bitterly resents the fact that she is not permitted to go to the fields with the boys ("That'll be the day!" Faye remarks), but aside from that drawback the long summer on harvest is a golden holiday for the three small Wisdoms. Their parents carry a weight of work and responsibility that would strike many people as downright drudgery, but they, too, persist in having a fine old time. In reminiscing about former years on the road, they remember only the good times and the fun: meeting old friends (they harvest for many of the same people year after year, such as the Drosselmyers); the side trips to scenic spots, and the vacation at Lake Louise or Glacier Park with which they wind up each summer; the time when wheat straw, jammed around the exhaust on a truck, caught fire and Raymond put it out with the iced tea Faye had meant for dinner; the pride on Steven's face when, at age two, he was allowed to cross the road alone to go to the store right there in Two Buttes; perhaps the most vivid of all, the pleasure they get from being constantly together and working side by side to make a success of their summer's project.

And they do work, and work hard. Raymond has charge of the combines, the trucks, the work crew and the whole complex operation of harvesting. He is a good mechanic, and if something goes wrong with a machine he usually repairs it himself. Seven days a week he and the crew hit the fields in the early morning and keep at it, sometimes until one or two o'clock the next morning. One time when rain threatened, they worked all day and all night; Raymond came back to the trailer at dawn for a shower and breakfast, and then went back to work all through another day.

Faye is equally busy, keeping the trailer house meticulously clean, washing, ironing, marketing, looking after three active children, cooking three solid meals a day for family and crew, and delivering noon dinner and supper (both meals hot and plentiful) to whichever field the men are cutting in.

Whenever a spare part or some other piece of equipment is needed, she drives wherever is necessary to find it. "I'm the only one who can be spared," she says practically. "I fix a big bunch of sandwiches so they'll have something to eat while I'm gone, take Judy and either Steven or Paul—I always feel safe one of them along—and take off for P [150 miles] or maybe all the way ba Texas."



Each day brings some small crisis Faye—mentally rearranging schedules a planning menus—takes them all in easy On only one point is she adamant: she a has time for her children. Complete att greets Steven and Paul as they pour ou adventures; when Judy gets tired, Faye whatever she is doing and rocks her to "That's as much for me as for Judy, tho she remarks. "I just love to hold her." are almost the only times when Faye sits all during her busy day.

Faye's major task on harvest, of cou keeping the workers fed, a full-time j itself. But one summer when they were handed, she drove one of the big truc addition to all her other work. She b "I never had a bit of trouble with the and I didn't lose a grain of wheat. Not drivers can say that!"

With the men gone to the field, dresses Judy (for the first of many times the day). Asked how often she changes she laughs. "Top or bottom? I guess she five or six dresses and play suits a day like to keep her clean—and she never is washes dishes, puts a load in the wa machine, makes beds, dusts, and mo vinyl-tile floor throughout the trailer decides what to have for lunch, and st if it is to be something that needs long ing. Once or twice a week she may tak and drive into Springfield to do errand buy groceries—frequently $100 worth time. (Normally she must buy groceries other day, but here in Two Buttes Drosselmyer's generous invitation to u freezer gives Faye more flexibility in m ing.) Always she allows herself time e to have noon dinner ready to take to th at twelve o'clock.

Faye fits tight covers over the pots and which she packs into heavy cartons and in the back of the pickup. Iced tea accompanies the meal, which may be roast of ham or beef (or four fried chic with potatoes, a couple of green vegeta large pot of gravy and loaves and loa bread (all the men like gravy, and it is an how fast bread vanishes), and always green salad.

And always dessert; sometimes she ice cream in the electric freezer. For a meal she may bake cakes or pies—app cherry, if they're fruit pies; one day she four different pies: chocolate, coconut, b cream and pineapple. Asked why so ma explained, "Raymond likes chocolate always make those; Jake likes chocolat Doug and Wayne both are crazy about nut, Ron likes banana; and I can't fi what Butch and Curtis like specially. I the pineapple so they'd have a choice."

"He's going through a phase."

the eminence of her 24 years she "The boys are a long way from d most of them have never been on efore, so I like to pamper them a ess I just feel maternal toward them

Faye and Raymond are proud of the "crew is treated just like family," ay help to explain why the Wisdoms o hire and keep a dependable, hard- crew. The boys are paid $1 an hour d; by the end of summer each will ned around $1000 toward college The bunk bus where they live is with its own shower and air con- . Last year when they ran into unex- ld weather in Montana, the Wisdoms lectric blankets—both for their own d for the bunk bus.)

dinner stowed in the pickup, Faye her own and Judy's crisp cotton or pants and shirts. Then she faces problem: finding the field.

ond has given her directions: "Hon, v where the strawstack is, about three on the road to the buttes? Well, you out four miles and turn left—it's not road, just a trail. Go about a mile nd you come to a wheat field that's y planted around the edge; after that first night Lory screamed his nts were near hysteria. What had over their handsome, bright -year-old? Ruthe and Sheldon know now: they are parents of f the most cruelly afflicted of be- —a mentally ill child.

EXT MONTH

SCREAM N THE NIGHT

EAL GILKYSON STUART

HOW AMERICA LIVES in the September JOURNAL

pasture—about a quarter section; catty-cornered across the pasture and e to another quarter section with one side and plowed ground on the nd a patch of sunflowers between Drive right down through the sun- about two miles, and at the far end e is down into the field where we're You ought to be able to see the com- om there. By the way," he added, ys there are rattlesnakes in that field. en't seen any, but keep an eye on field Steven and Paul come tearing, the exciting events of the morning. found a baby owl," Steven tells her "He's going to name him Oliver."

as had a busy morning too. "Mamma," me and Jake took a woad in to the and you know what? I saw a boy and freckles on his stomach!" He pauses ve the effect of his startling news and ds, "I'm hungry. I want somefin' to sets up a folding table in the lee of the nd lays out the mountains of food, covers on as protection against the wing dust. Plastic glasses, paper plates, and cutlery are ready; and paper o the men can dry their hands after them in a little of the precious drink- r from the water bags carried on each d combine.

body in the field is caked with dust ff—when they remove their hats, there rtling line of demarcation between ed face and clean forehead—so Faye e plates and fills the glasses with ice . She serves the children with the ut is so busy seeing that everyone is supplying "seconds" that she hardly has time for a bite for herself until the others have finished.

Raymond waits to eat with her; then he gives her a hearty, if somewhat grimy, kiss and tells her, "That was a mighty fine dinner, honey. Thanks a lot." Crew members add their encomiums: "Sure enjoyed that, ma'am"; or "Law, ma'am, what in the world did you put in those beans? I could only eat three helpings."

Sometimes Faye brings Steven and Paul back to the trailer, but more often they succeed in persuading her to let them remain in the field. First order of business now is baths and fresh clothing all around: "Every trip to the field automatically means a bath." Then Judy has a nap, and Faye washes the accumulated dishes and puts another load in the washing machine. If Paul has come in with them he may also nap, but only sheer weariness can force him into bed. Paul regards an afternoon nap as beneath his four-year-old dignity.

Threshing is hungry work, and for supper Faye takes another solid meal to the harvesters. Darkness has fallen by the time she leaves the field (this time Steven and Paul are brought back with no concession to argument). Raymond and the crew have returned to work, with lights on the combines and trucks. The stars are out, so brilliant in the clear air that you can almost reach up and touch them. Three tired children go to sleep on the seat of the pickup; to Faye the road back to the trailer seems long and lonesome under the night sky.

The drowsy children are bathed and tucked into bed before Faye starts on the dishes. "At home in Lockney, dishes are the only thing I mind about housekeeping," she remarks. "I really detest them. But on harvest I don't mind anything. I love going on harvest. We'll have to give it up someday, when Judy gets older—it's no place to take an adolescent girl—so I just enjoy it while I can."

"Raymond wouldn't let me come along summer before last," she reminisces. "I was six months pregnant with Judy and he thought it would be too much, so I stayed home in Texas with Steven and Paul. I was so lonesome I could have died; the little boys were uneasy too.

"Then one night, soon after Raymond had gone, the tornado alarm went off. It was some time after midnight, pitch dark, with rain pouring and wind tearing. I didn't know how soon the storm might strike, but I knew there was no time to waste—I had to get the boys to the storm cellar.

"I'd never had to face a real crisis without Raymond, and I was terribly afraid—I've never been so frightened—and I had to decide which of my children I'd take first, knowing I might never see the other one again. This all happened much faster than it takes to tell about, but it was just agonizing. Steven was five, and I knew that if he awakened alone in the storm he'd be terrified; Paul was too young to realize what was going on.

"I caught up Steven and ran like crazy, through the back yard, down the alley and across another lot. There were people in the shelter, so I thrust Steven, drenched but still asleep, at somebody and gasped, 'I've got to go back,' and tore back for Paul. I kept a suitcase packed for emergencies, and this time I grabbed it, too, so we'd have dry clothes. We made it back to the shelter all right; but I never wished for Raymond so hard in my life!

"After the harvest crew had been under way about two weeks Raymond came back to Lockney for a night. I begged again to go, but he still wouldn't agree unless I got an O.K. from the doctor. But my doctor knew how I felt about Raymond, and he said I'd be better off on harvest with him than fretting at home. So the children and I got to go after all, and everything was fine. We'd finished the harvest and been back in Lockney almost a month before Judy was born." She smiles. "After that night, anything that has ever happened on harvest looks like a picnic."

It is illuminating to watch the work crew in action. These hard-muscled youngsters are all in their teens—ages range from 17 to 19. Curtis graduated from high school in the spring, is saving toward college. Douglas is a junior; the four others are seniors. Yet all are doing a man's work and taking a man's responsibilities.

During leisure moments, they yak about girls, and football, and the natural superiority of Texas; but on the job they are steady and dependable, and take as much pride in work well done as does Raymond himself. In the field one evening, Wayne approached Faye quietly. "Ma'am," he said, "the boys wanted me to ask you. Will you talk to Raymond and get him to let us work all night? We could finish this field by breakfast; then we could sleep a couple of hours and start the next one."

(Faye declined to interfere; that was Raymond's business, and besides, she thinks they all need more sleep than they get.)

"I like a young crew," Raymond says. "If I hire men around my age, they are likely to resent taking direction and want to do things their own way; the kids are willing to listen and learn. But I don't give them responsibilities unless they're qualified to take them. That's expensive equipment they're handling, and I'm not about to turn it over to some young squirt just to improve his character. These are good boys."

His very words are spoken in another context by Glen Drosselmyer. "Raymond is a good boy," says Glen, "conscientious, hard-working, and proud of his work—and you can't say that about all harvesters. I'm a hard man to satisfy; but if I were, say, laid up in a hospital, I wouldn't worry a minute if I knew Raymond was taking care of my crop. I know he'd do it just the way I'd want it done."

Raymond and Faye met on a double date in Hobbs, New Mexico, where her father was a sign painter-blacksmith. After his discharge from the Army, Raymond had borrowed money to buy a farm near Hobbs. "It was new land, and it looked good," he says wryly, "but the topsoil was only three inches deep in places and there was caliche under th worked like a dog on that farm, and it pu five thousand dollars in debt; but"—he s at his wife—"I've never been sorry I we Hobbs."

Faye laughs. "That first date was The boy who arranged it was suppos have finished planting cotton, but hadn' Raymond helped him, and we girls rod the tractors with them. Raymond and I t up a storm—I remember telling him being drum majorette in the school band that Daniel Boone was my great-great- great-great-grandfather. He talked abou on the farm where he'd grown up, ba Lockney; and about the ten jumps he'd in the paratroopers—he's taught all our dren how to fall properly. And we agr was quite a coincidence that both our m were nurses."

They were also impressed by the coinci that both their birthdays come in July, bu subject that they didn't discuss was their Faye was only 15; Raymond was 2 thought he was about eighteen," Faye "If I'd known how old he really was, I I'd never have thought of him again. B the time I knew, it didn't make a spe difference. I was in love."

One evening three weeks after thei meeting, they drove out to the Torch, petually burning natural-gas flame tha favorite spot for young couples in the There Raymond asked her to marry hi for the first time the question of age ca It no longer mattered to them, but it ma quite a lot to Faye's father. "He hit the c he said she was too young to get marri I was too old for her. And he told me t and not come back."

They continued to meet in secret, a August Raymond brought her an engag ring. "I would have run away with hi if I could have talked him into it," declares, "but he wouldn't marry me w my father's permission—and it didn't l if we were ever going to get it."

Faye's mother had disapproved e but she grew to like and trust Raymo eventually talked her husband into gi grudging consent. (He and Raymond ar of each other now.) They were marri day, November 1, 1950, "before dad change his mind," by a justice of the They went immediately to the farm, ar hours after the wedding the bride was the fields in jeans helping her husba feed.

"The house on the farm was just Faye remembers, "and we had to heat on the stove, but I wouldn't have cha thing. It was all so wonderful. Ever seemed as natural and right as turning a page in a book. Being a little girl—my er's little girl—was all over and done. was Raymond's wife." She laughs. "T thing my mother said to Raymond was if she needs spanking, you spank her. depending on you to finish bringing properly.' But of course he never did."

Faye was 5′4½″ tall and weighed 14 she was married. (She now weighs 130 5′6½″—"I stopped growing when I tall as Raymond!") She was a good co a competent housekeeper, having had years of active practice; her mother ha ill frequently and had lost three ba birth from Rh complications. (Faye had been a "blue baby.")

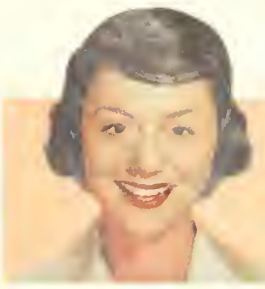
"I knew about the Rh factor, of c Faye says now, "but it never occurred that it could affect me personally unti was pregnant with Steven. Then I was sick. But the most wonderful thing— one chance in a million—it turned o Raymond is Rh negative too!" She half seriously, "Before I ever let one children even date anybody, I'm go make them take a blood test.

"My mother likes to tease me," Fa on. "She'll say, 'You'd better enjo daughter while you've got her. She ma at fifteen and leave you.' Why, I hop isn't even dating at fifteen!"

She adds firmly, "But it still seems me that I was married at fifteen, and right—even though I can't understa

You're so smart to choose even heating* Wear-Ever Aluminum

This year, whether you're celebrating your first anniversary or your twenty-first, gift yourself with Wear-Ever's Hallite. For here is cookware that spreads heat as only aluminum can, quickly and evenly, to bring out the full flavor of food. Favorite recipes become new adventures in taste—fresh, tempting, delicious . . . prepared to perfection.



Easy to clean, too . . . with a choice of rich, copper-colored or turquoise covers that keep their luster, never need polishing. Available individually or in attractive sets, at better stores. (And remember, Hallite utensils make wonderful shower and wedding gifts for daughters, favorite nieces, friends!)

Wear-Ever Aluminum, Inc.
New Kensington, Pa.

WEAR-EVER ALUMINUM

wear-ever ALUMINUM

*JOIN THE MAGIC CIRCLE OF SMART HOSTESSES WHO COOK WITH WEAR-EVER'S MAGIC CIRCLE OF EVEN HEAT

Mrs. Irving R. Stotter of Shaker Heights, Ohio, says: "When I was a bride, Wear-Ever Aluminum was the gift I treasured most—and I still do! Cooking is wonderfully fast and easy inside that 'magic circle of even heat,' and pans come clean in a jiffy because food neither scorches nor sticks."

ever managed to talk my parents into n't think most people should get marat young—girls should finish high at least—but teenage marriages can be ful. Ours certainly is. Raymond is so d kind and good—and so funny!"
reason, Faye thinks, why their maris worked out well is "Raymond is the this family, and I like it that way. He go around setting a big foot down—he runs the business and I run the
And he isn't bossy about money. I girls who have to ask their husbands hey can buy a new dress! We keep our in a joint account—I write most of the
—and if I need something and we have ney I just get it. We usually agree on but if something does come up we out—and I'm always the one who , because I always end up seeing that ht.
ver let Raymond leave the house un-
" she adds earnestly. "He's good with es and sensible about safety, but if he orried or upset he might not be quite ful. We've never had an accident, but l that heavy equipment, you never nond gives equal credit to his wife for od marriage. "She has a happy disn and she's a wonderful mother and a usekeeper. She makes everything more e enjoyed every minute since I've known d we've never had any trouble—except l, and that hasn't counted, as long as ld be together."
k them two years to pay off the debt
d at Hobbs. Soon after their marriage urned to Lockney to help run the farm nd live with his parents. ("My mother-is a wonderful woman," Faye says.
ever gives advice unless it's asked.") ought their present home in Lockney fore Paul was born; it is paid for, and ll the farming equipment. The only they now owe is a balance on the house bought last year, which they are paying 73.50 per month. Raymond still shares ork and management of the farm, but ajor income is made during the three on harvest.
take in quite a bit of money at com-harvesting," Raymond says, "but there's a big outgo, too, gas and oil and labor, and depreciation. A combine costs about $5500 new, and they really take a beating.
We figure it's more profitable to run them about two years, then sell them off and buy new ones. Last year was the first time we've ever cleared anything to speak of—we've been putting everything back into equipment. We paid taxes last year on a little over $6000; we've never got out of the 20 per cent bracket."

"Our children get spanked when they need it," Raymond says, "but not very often. Only for things like disobedience or sheer impudence—or for doing something that's really dangerous. Mostly we talk things over with them, and reach an understanding. And we believe in letting them find out things for themselves when it doesn't involve danger."
He grins. "Last summer Judy got hold of one of those fiery-hot Mexican peppers. I told her, and her mother told her, that it would burn;
but she bit into it anyway. She went around sizzling and 'whew'-ing for an hour—but now she knows those peppers are hot."

When their father is away, Steven and Paul consider it their business to "look after mother and Judy"; Faye's dependence on them is actual. "Yesterday," she says, "Raymond sent me into Springfield to get a hundred feet of rope, and when I got into the store I had forgotten the size he wanted. So I just went out to the pickup and asked Steven to come in and show me the kind of rope daddy needed. He knew exactly too."

Raymond wants the children to go to college. "They'll probably be farmers," he says,
"for they already seem to like the fields as much as I do. But they'll need education for farming."

"If they want to go to college, I'd want them to go," Faye says, "but what I want for them most is to grow up in the church and be fine, decent people, and have a good family, and a wife or husband to love and care for."
She finished, out of breath, "I want them to be happy."

That evening in the field, Steven and Paul came running to show Faye the baby jack rabbit they'd caught in the wheat. She said,
"It's a beautiful little rabbit, but I want you to let it go. It needs its mother and she wants it; listen, I think I hear her crying now."

"Jack rabbits can't cry!" scoffed Steven.

"Maybe not, but I know she's sad. Just think how sad I'd be if a mamma jack rabbit caught you and took you off for her babies to play with."

Paul's eyes grew large and serious. He said quietly, "Wet it go, Steven."

Sometime in the future, the Wisdoms hope to sell off part of their equipment and buy a ranch. "I'd like about four hundred acres of wheat and a thousand acres of grassland, and cattle and horses," Raymond says. "But, of course, we would like to have another baby, too, and we need a new car. I don't know which will come first, but if the harvest this year goes as well as we hope, we might get a start on something.*

"We wouldn't sell off all the equipment," he goes on. "We'd keep one combine. Someday we'll quit harvesting, but probably not completely. It's hard work, but I like it. We usually finish a summer swearing we'll never go on harvest again, but by the next year
we're raring to go."

*Of necessity the Wisdoms' story was written during 1959 harvest season. The year went extremely well for them—they now have a new farm; a new car; and a new baby: Barry Wayne, who weighed 7 pounds 14 ounces at birth, March 15, 1960. Right now, Barry Wayne is somewhere in Colorado—on harvest.—THE EDITORS.

OKING OVER IE PRESIDENT'S OULDER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 68

in the East Hall at 8:05. Her Majesty's
's were the Rose Room, and for the
the Lincoln Room where the Emanci-Proclamation was signed.
table was in readiness and the queen time, but the prince was not ready. I ced breakfast to his Royal Highness replied, "Just a minute!" as he poured snort of Holland gin.
tly he rushed out and the queen, in gave him a talking to. She was not
; and the tone of voice was that of a olding a husband. And as a wise hushe prince kept quiet. I left the butlers to erving and I thought, "Maybe they are and prince, but right at that moment ere just plain man and wife." At 8:45 le farewell to this delightfully human and their royal party.
afternoon we had a tea for those on the House Social Register and it was like es again, for we were having 793 guests.
paration for the affair I ordered the section to make lacy roll cookies. Be-we found that the oven was not yet per-even. These cookies are very delicate.
tter is thin and must spread evenly dur-baking, for while the cookies are warm ll them on the handle of a spoon. When , they are very brittle and transparent-g and tasty. In the new oven we found hen the batter was spread it would run an eighth of an inch thick on one side, prevented them from rolling. Of course we did not have lacy rolls for that tea. Eventually the oven was leveled and we had the old ship in shape for the many activities ahead.

We had a series of dinners attended by businessmen, labor and political leaders who were trying to induce President Truman to run for a second full term. He refused to commit himself. When the insisting grew strong he would always break it off by suggesting a tour of the newly renovated White House.

There was one of these stag dinners on June 24 and, as usual, when the talk began about the President's running again he suggested a tour of the house. But at this dinner he said he desired to walk out of the White House instead of being carried out. It was then that I felt sure that the President had no intention of running again.

Not too long afterward at a Democratic banquet in the Mayflower Hotel he told the TV and radio audiences of his intentions. Mrs.
Truman was very happy over the President's decision.

Then came the Democratic convention and the President sponsored Adlai Stevenson, governor of Illinois, for the top spot. The convention nominated Governor Stevenson, with Senator Sparkman of Alabama in the second spot. The Republicans nominated General Eisenhower and Nixon, and again the parade of campaign orators swept over the country.

The President invited both candidates to a luncheon at the White House for the purpose of briefing them on world conditions. The Republican candidate refused the invitation but, most naturally, the Democratic candidate accepted. Mrs. Truman and the rest of the family were in Independence for the summer, so that morning when Mr. Stevenson was expected, I went over the menus with the President. He told me that he wanted me to meet the Democratic candidate. This was indeed a courtesy never before extended to a man in my position.

So after the luncheon the President took the governor and Senator Sparkman on a tour of the place. The group went into the ushers' office and he introduced them to the ushers:
Mr. Crim, Mr. Searls, Mr. Claunch and Mr.
West. I was in the dining room watching the boys break down the table when the President called me.

He said, "Come in, Fields. I want you to meet the next President."

So I went into the ushers' office. The President introduced me, saying, "Governor, I want you to meet just about the best man in this business. This is Fields. He takes care of the food end of the house."

Whereupon the governor said, "By all means, this is the man to know," and he came over to shake my hand. I was fascinated with the warmth of his handshake and his friendly eyes which made you feel at ease. Senator Sparkman I had known for some time.

Next day when the President had finished his breakfast, as usual I presented him the menu for the day. He said, "Fields, you made a hit with my boy, Stevenson."

I thanked him for the courtesy he had extended me by this introduction. The President was sure of the governor's election, for it was the opinion of many of the politicians that General Eisenhower's campaign was bogged down in a dry creek through August and September.

After that the campaign waxed warm and then cold. The climax was Eisenhower's declaration that he would go to Korea himself, if elected, and see what could be done to end the war. The President was making speeches, too, and taking an active part in the campaign.

Mrs. Truman returned early in September and we had a few important teas. One was for Unqualified Offer to Every Dishwasher

Owner in America!

Results
You
Can See...

or Your First Box
Is FREE

FINISH now contains two miracle cleansing agents to end spotting and filming. Only FINISH has both. No matter what kind of dishwasher detergent you are now using, try FINISH. If you're not delighted with your very first package, send us the boxtop. We'll refund the price you paid, plus postage.

Another famous product of ECONOMICS LABORATORY, INC.
New York, N. Y.

Copyright, 1960

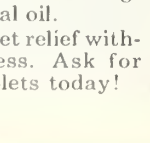
Corns

Callouses
Bunions
Sore Toes
Tender Spots

No Other Method Like Instant-Acting Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads

Size for Corns, Sore Toes

SPECIAL SIZES FOR



Super-Fast Relief!

Multiple-acting Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads do more for you by far than any other method. Zino-pads end pain of corns, callouses, bunions, sore toes in a jiffy . . . stop corns, callouses before they can develop . . . remove corns, callouses one of the quickest ways known to medical science when used with the separate Medications included. Water-repellent. See how they stay on in bath.

Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads

FEET HURT, BURN?

Dr. Scholl's Foot Balm quickly relieves foot discomfort caused by exertion. Very soothing and refreshing. Costs but a trifle. Try it!

Dr. Scholl's FOOT BALM

Stops Bad Breath INTERNALLY!

You Simply Can't Offend

No other method dares make this claim!

For quick, safe, sure, 'round-the-clock freedom from odors of strong food, alcoholic beverages, smoking, etc., take wonder-working, pleasant-tasting "ENNDS" Tablets containing the miracle extract, Daratol®

"ENNDS" act internally where sprays, mouthwashes, toothpastes simply can't reach. Can't upset the stomach. Trial size at Drug counters only 54¢.

"ENNDS"®

CONSTIPATION Make You Weak?

No need to let constipation "get you down." To get the kind of relief that doesn't cause weakness, be sure to get Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets. Doesn't cause cramps. Contains ingredients that act to soften waste, stimulate intestines without causing upsetting digestive distress.

In clinical study Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets rated 71% better, on the average, than other laxatives tested. These included candy and chewing gum laxatives, so-called "liver" pills, a well-known bulk laxative, milk of magnesia and ordinary mineral oil.

So why look further? Get relief without distressing weakness. Ask for Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets today!

the Daughters of the Confederacy. At this particular tea we served a confetti bread. One lady spoke to Mrs. Helm about how good it was and wanted to know what it was called. Mrs. Helm referred her to me, so the lady approached and told me she was from Georgia and wanted to know the name of the tea bread we were serving.

I told her it was confetti bread. She must have thought I said "Confederate" bread, for she said, "I think it is just grand to serve it to this group. It is just too thoughtful of Mrs. Truman and I am going to write her for the recipe."

I never heard if she did or not. Then she whispered to me, "I'll bet you have never served a party like this here."

I replied, "Why, madam?"

"Because," she said, "there isn't a damn Yankee in the crowd."

On October 31 Mrs. Truman left to join the President, who was campaigning and would wind up the trip by continuing to Independence to vote.

Well, on November 4 Eisenhower was elected by a landslide, carrying 39 states. There were two happy people in my family—my wife and my father out in Indiana. Dad said he was beginning to think he would never see another Republican President, and I had promised my wife that if a Republican was elected I would try for a transfer to Boston so she could have a home near the Lahey Clinic.

On November 5 the President, Mrs. Truman and Miss Margaret returned to Washington. When I saw the President I inquired how he was feeling. He laughed, saying, "I feel fine, but you know, Fields, I could have felt a lot better."

I laughed and said, "I think I know what you are referring to."

Early in December, Mrs. Truman's mother, Mrs. Wallace, passed away. She had been sick for the past year or more. Mrs. Wallace was a kind and lovely person, never complaining through all her illness. She was ninety years old, and though her death had been more or less expected, we were all upset over her passing. The President rushed over from the office, forsaking matters of state to comfort Mrs. Truman the way any other husband would do.

My wife had not been able to return from Boston and the doctors had given her not more than from six to nine months to live. I had talked with Dr. Poppin of the clinic and it was felt she should have home comforts near the clinic. When my first chance came I spoke to the President about transferring to a Federal position in Boston. He said that he would look into the matter, but I would have to stay until the new people got organized.

We had a farewell dinner, a stag affair, for the President's official family, past and present, on December 18. There were many speeches made in compliment to them—even to those he had fired.

A week later the family had their last Christmas dinner in the White House. Miss Mary Truman, the President's sister, was present and Mrs. Truman's three brothers, their wives and Mr. Fred's children were all there. When dinnertime came we had thirteen at the table. The Trumans had no superstitions about the number thirteen, but neither the Roosevelts nor the Hoovers would sit at a table for that number.

Well, we rolled along into January, 1953, and the day of the inaugural was soon—much too soon—at hand. We had been hearing rumors, as there always are, about the incoming family. It is funny how these start, but once started, they never seem to stop. There were stories from the War Department about the temper of General Eisenhower and his ability to blast you with the language of a sergeant. Mrs. Eisenhower, too, was reputed to have a temper and to be very difficult to deal with. In all my years in the old place, I had found out that people like to gossip. There is no excitement in talking about the good qualities of people, so what you hear is the opposite.

Mrs. Eisenhower visited the White House according to the custom of incoming First Ladies, but she made no tour with Mrs. Truman to meet the help. Mrs. Truman, however, told me she had talked with Mrs. Eisenhower about my desire to transfer because of my wife's health. She had told Mrs. Eisenhower that she was sure Charles Ficklin, whom I had groomed to take over, would make an excellent man to take my place. I thanked her for this.

The President had me go to Boston for interviews about the job transfer. I had appointments with the General Services Administration and the navy yard. First I went to the GSA office and talked with Mr. Paul Healy, assistant to the director, and Mr. Hanson, the personnel director. Mr. Healy made an appointment for me to see the regional director, Mr. J. J. O'Connor.

Upon my arrival at the navy yard Captain Gold, the commander, told me that he would like me to read the job description prepared for me. I read the description and, not being too familiar with the build-up sometimes read into these job descriptions, I almost jumped out of my skin. I was to head two divisions for the purchasing of electronic equipment and submarine equipment—not knowing the first thing about either, plus the fact that my chiefs and subchiefs would be men with fifteen to twenty years of experience in their lines.

I told the captain that I would not make my decision until I had had further talks with the GSA people. When I returned there and met Mr. O'Connor, he said he thought they could teach me to be an inspector of general supplies. I accepted this.

When I returned to Washington and told the President about my decision he said, "Oh, you could have learned to handle that job in the Navy all right. But perhaps this is the wisest thing. If you think this is it, we will set it up for you."

We still had received no information about the inaugural plans from Mrs. Eisenhower. The President and Mrs. Truman held a reception to say good-by to the office force and the household. Two or three days before the inaugural we were told that there would not be anything doing at the White House except for the family dinner that night. This was something new, for the old house always befor been a beehive of activity at such a time.

On the morning of the inaugural some Cabinet members came in after breakf say good-by to the President. Talk was around about the rebellion of the Presi elect against wearing a high hat and Pres Truman said he would not wear one eith

My crew had all gathered in the state d room where we said our final good-by t Trumans. Then the cars pulled out o ground, and still no information fro Eisenhowers except that there would, per be trays for dinner.

The old White House seemed so quie had thought that, after not being ther twenty years, the Republicans would w celebrate, but this was denied the rank file. After we had listened to the Presi acceptance speech the chief usher cam office and told me that Mrs. Eisenh wanted tea at 4:30 for 200 or 300 people "Can you do it?" he asked.

I said, "As far as food is concerned, w serve two or three thousand. The menu ready. All we have to do is to prepare the wiches, and the kitchen and pantry can do that."

By 4:30 we had set up for 300 people State Dining Room when Mrs. Eisenh sent orders from the reviewing stand to sandwiches and 50 cups of tea and coffe out to the stand.

Then at 5 P.M. we were told there wou only about 50 people for tea after the p So we cut the table down and at 6 P. President and Mrs. Eisenhower, Vice dent and Mrs. Nixon and fewer than 20 arrived for tea. They did not stay long much, for the dinner hour was near dancee was to follow. But everything was along fine until Mr. Nixon said to Mrs. hower, "What are you going to do wi this food that is left?"

Mrs. Eisenhower turned and looked table. Like so many critics, the Vice Pre did not know the story behind the scene

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

Our budget took a setback when it was discovered that, by adding a code number, I could dial a daughter in the next state.

Appreciation note from a seventh-grader to her teacher:

Dear Miss ——: I think my success in passing should be contributed to you for helping me with patience with my studies.

May I wish you luck and best wishes for further years in teaching.

Sincerely yours,

When a wandering boy finds himself, then all roads lead to Home.

The modern parent expects a child to do what he is asked to do, the old-fashioned parent expected him to do what he was told to do.

Human beings, like birch trees, often seem more interesting when a little off center.

Vacation's end: when dispositions, the shore and the lawn all become crabby.

Filling a sensible person with wholesome praise, like filling a sterilized jar with good fruit, never causes the container to explode.

Writes one mother, "Now that our son has his driver's license, he finds it hard to sit still unless he has wheels under him."

Three kinds of husbands: those wh throw clothes on sofas or seats; tho who hang them on chair backs; ar those who go the final mile—to t hangers in a closet.

Some women enjoy moving the shru bery around, spring and fall, as much they do the furniture.

Exact copy of a young boy's letter fro camp to his parents:

Dear Mother and Father: I could with some underwear. Please send some sox. Where is that film you we going to send me? We went to town see Romeo and Juliet. I rekomend th you see it. Thanks to the show I ov Georgie one dollar.

YOUR LOVING SON.

Woman with portable TV: "Now last I won't have to undress after I f asleep watching a program."

A mother-in-law says a house will only as clean as the can opener on t wall.

—— the kind of woman who wou take gravy to a picnic.

A parent will carry cards on his ov person giving full identification, b put nothing on a toddler who ca plainly tell his own name.

For wives of all ages: Wiles a preferable to wails.

ht, "Of all things—for a man to bring up stion like this!" Well, I knew then that lixon was going to have to grow up, for would be bigger and more important for him to do than to watch the leav- om a tea party.

in Mrs. Eisenhower turned and looked ıy. I said, "On occasions when indefinite ers have fluctuated, we have sent the left- to the children's hospitals and homes." s was my first impression of Mr. Nixon e President and I wanted to put an apron n. But I was impressed by the President at initial day. He told a colonel to be nd see about the status of Mooney, his right away. I am always touched by a vho is interested in the welfare of the who serve him.

transformation in the household from dministration to another is as sudden th. By that I mean it leaves you with a ious emptiness. In the morning you breakfast to a family with whom you pent years. At noon that family is gone your life and here are new faces, new itions, and new likes and dislikes. You o learn a new routine and to assure the mily that you are responsible and trust- y.

next day, naturally, there was a lot of king. The President had set up the small Room which had been used by Mrs. velt and Mrs. Truman as their private as his art room. He was working on a it of Bobby Jones.

n May until January the White House orn its new coat of renovation, but to o people to agree on a color scheme, es- y women in a home, is too much to or. One of the first acts of the new First was to change some of the colors on the floor, the presidential living quarters. ine Arts Commission of the District of bia has control over changes in the offi- rt of the house. Otherwise. it would ess lose its distinction.

derstand that when Theodore Roosevelt esident the State Dining Room was a s sight—more or less like a gameroom ib with trophies of stuffed animal heads, y the President, hanging on the walls. I eard Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt talk about s of "Uncle Ted" and how awful it was njoying a meal and then suddenly look ind the eyes of a stuffed moose or some nimal staring down at you.

new house communication system was ed to be the latest and most efficient, s did not meet the approval of the new amily, so electricians set to work tear- o the walls to set up a system to their ident Eisenhower went into action like President Franklin D. Roosevelt e was determined to correct problems l by a long period of Republican ation. However, President Eisenhower t faced with a domestic crisis as Presi- oosevelt had been. The conferences the nt was holding nearly every morning at ast with Secretary Dulles and Mr. Stas- me to believe that he thought foreign were most urgent. Mr. Stassen's posi- s not clear to me, but most of the time present.

ng the time I was with the Eisenhowers ere no family breakfast gatherings. The nt never lunched at his desk in the s President Truman did. He had lunch e First Lady, served anywhere from one to two. Of course this was at the be- g of the Administration and no doubt settled down to a routine later. Trays e custom for the family dinner and V paneled in the walls, it did make ng TV and eating from a tray very en- . The Eisenhowers seemed to en- . Steaks and a standing roast of beef eir favorite meat dishes.

day the President gave the crew an un- ed problem. The chief usher, Mr. Crim, d to get some yoghurt, and the house- and Charles, like Mr. Crim, did not what yoghurt was. This little incident prevented my transfer being O.K.'d. s, whom I had been grooming for the d been declining it. Finally Charles accepted, telling Mr. Crim he would do his best, but not to expect him to be another Fields with all the answers. Well, this was flattering, but I have always had the habit when compliments were passed around to sort of take stock of myself. And it made me more or less ashamed, for I knew that I had not always had the answers, but the confidence others placed in me made me search for the answers and never let down people who believed in me.

It was not long before my transfer was effected, and the day came for me to say good-by to the old place. Mr. Crim told me that the President and Mrs. Eisenhower wanted to say good-by to me.

They were in the West Hall and Mr. Searls came for me and ushered me in as he would a person for any other appointment. Both the President and Mrs. Eisenhower have that gift of being able to put one at ease. The President talked about my new job and my Civil Service status. He was very precise about it and said, "If anything goes wrong, let me know right away."

Mrs. Eisenhower was interested in my wife's health. She said, "We appreciate your desire not to leave us, but we all have to do so many things for the sake of our families."

I replied, with a lump in my throat, "Good-by and thank you very much."

It was then I thought that, after all these years, I was really leaving the White House. I walked out the gate on Pennsylvania Avenue, shaking hands with the officer on duty. Then I crossed over the street to the park where I waited for my bus.

As I stood there I looked at the old house, all lighted up, and thought of the many exciting occasions in which it had been my honor and pleasure to have a part. I have often thought how, when we are a part of something, we do find fault and complain and say, "I sure will be happy when the day comes that I can walk out of this place." But, comes the day, somehow it is not always a day of rejoicing. I knew I would soon miss all the responsibilities I so often had complained about.

Within three days I was working on my new job, trying to find something important about counting the numbers of turns of wire on the neck of a broom or the ply of an illustrating board. Testing the strength of a sheet of paper and counting the threads in the warp of a piece of cloth were hard to get excited over.

I said to myself "It must be tough for a President who has had his finger on the pulse of the world suddenly to find that he is just a plain nobody, in a sense, or a has-been champ. Here I am, almost ready to feel sorry for myself, when after all it is the job that is important. So give your best and forget about the glories of what you now think were the great days."

However, I still would think of the fun we used to have amidst all the ceremony and formality. For instance, we had code names for the Presidents so that, for security or any other reasons, listeners would not know whom we might be talking about.

President Hoover, because he seldom smiled, we called, "Smiley." President Roosevelt I gave the name of "Charlie Potatoes." Out in Indianapolis there was a corner Greek grocer whose name was Charlie Pertastumas. He was a real diplomat. When people were displeased he could always sell them something else and leave them feeling that he was doing them a favor. I had an uncle who couldn't or wouldn't call him anything but "Charlie Potatoes." Hence we got a lot of fun out of talking about Charlie Potatoes.

President Truman, because of his outspoken manner, we coded as "Billie Spunk." Often when we were talking about some affair we would say, "Wait until Billie Spunk gets there. He will tell them where to get off." I was not with President Eisenhower long enough to give him a code name, but I don't think the boys on the staff have continued the practice.

Many people have asked, "Of all the Presidents you served, which one did you like the best?" When they ask this I think of my mother. She would never say that she liked someone. She would always say, "I do understand them so well and I am sure that they

8 of your 12 active hours are

SHELTON STROLLER HOURS. Morning greeting . . . afternoon meeting . . . evening get-together . . . your Shelton Stroller completes the day in wrinkle-free fashion. It's 100% nylon jersey, even to the thread . . . machine-washable in minutes, it drips dry, needs no ironing. Convertible neckline, easy-on zipper front, two side pockets in the graceful skirt.

Shelton Stroller®

"THE CARE-FREE FASHION"!

SIZES 10 TO 20; 12½ TO 22½. AT LEADING STORES, ABOUT $13. (Others with both short and long sleeves and ensembles, from $13. to $18.)

For FREE fashion folio, and name of nearest store, write to: Department A, Shelton CASUALS, 1350 Broadway, New York 18.

Low-Cost White House Recipes

During the heavy entertaining of Franklin D. Roosevelt's Administration, White House Butler Alonzo Fields worked out a number of recipes such as these designed to keep food costs within the budget, "when we had to try to get at least three parties for what one would normally cost."

STUFFED SWEETBREADS

Soak 4 pairs sweetbreads in cold water to cover for 1 hour. Rinse. Cover with boiling water to which 1 stalk celery, 1 bay leaf, 1 slice onion, juice of 1 lemon, ½ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon pepper have been added. Cook gently for 20 minutes. Drain and plunge into ice water. When sweetbreads are cold and firm, remove the skin and membranes, and cut each sweetbread in half lengthwise.

Dressing: Sauté 1 peeled and crushed clove garlic in 2 tablespoons butter a few minutes, until garlic is tender. Remove garlic. Put 1 pound mushrooms through a food grinder and add to the butter. Simmer for 5 minutes. Stir in 1 tablespoon flour. Gradually add 1 cup cream, ½ teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper and ¼ cup chopped parsley, and cook until thickened. Cool. Spread the dressing thinly on half of sweetbreads, placing other halves on top, holding them together with toothpicks. Place in buttered shallow casserole and spoon remaining dressing around sweetbreads. Pour ½ cup melted butter over sweetbreads and bake 25–30 minutes in a moderate oven, 350° F., basting frequently. Pass the following sauce:

Sauce de la Real: In a small saucepan brown 1 tablespoon butter. Stir in 5 teaspoons flour and continue cooking until roux is very brown. Gradually add 1½ cups beef bouillon or consommé, 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce, ¼ teaspoon bottled steak sauce, 2 teaspoons catchup, ¼ teaspoon paprika, ¼ teaspoon salt and a dash of pepper. Simmer for ½ hour. Add ¼ cup cream (and, if you like, 2 tablespoons sherry) and cook another 10 minutes. Makes 8 servings.

DUTCH PORK TENDERLOIN

Slit 3 medium-sized fresh pork tenderloins lengthwise and sprinkle with ½ teaspoon salt and a dash of pepper. Peel, core and cut into eighths 2 Jonathan or Rome Beauty apples. Cook 24 small pitted prunes. Fill slits in tenderloins with alternately placed slices of apple and prunes (quantity depends on size of tenderloins). Sprinkle with 1 tablespoon sugar. Fold over and tie in three or four places. Dredge with a little flour and brown in 3 tablespoons bacon drippings in a hot oven, 400° F., for 15 minutes. Lower heat to moderately slow, 325° F. Add 1¼ cups water mixed with 1 teaspoon dry mustard. Cover lightly and cook until meat is tender, 30–40 minutes. Place meat on heated platter and carefully remove strings. Skim fat from pan. Stir in 1–2 tablespoons flour and 1 cup chicken broth. Adjust seasonings. Pass gravy with meat. Makes 6–8 servings, depending on size of tenderloins.

VICHYSSOISE

Peel and cube 4 medium potatoes and place in a large saucepan. Add 3 cups boiling water, 5 chicken-bouillon cubes, 3 tablespoons butter, and 5 leeks, minced fine, including 3" of green top (or 1½ cups minced onion). Cover and cook until potatoes are very tender, about 30 minutes. Press mixture, without straining, through sieve, or buzz in a blender. Mixture must be very smooth. Pour into saucepan. Add 1 cup heavy cream, 1 cup milk, 1 teaspoon salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Mix well. Serve very cold with a garnish of ¼ teaspoon minced chives and 1 teaspoon paprika, or reheat and serve very hot. Makes about 1½ quarts soup.

MINESTRONE

Place 4 pounds lean beef, cut into small cubes, and 2 quarts water in a Dutch-oven-type utensil or kettle, and simmer, covered, until very tender. Remove meat and cut into bite-size pieces if necessary. Skim fat from stock. Season with 2 teaspoons salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Slightly beat 2 egg whites and 1 tablespoon cold water. Crush the eggshells and add with the egg whites to the stock. Bring to the boiling point, stirring constantly, and boil 2–3 minutes. Steep 20 minutes over very low heat. Strain through cheesecloth and the broth will be clear. Meanwhile, sauté 2 peeled and thinly sliced onions; 1 peeled and crushed clove garlic; 1 thinly sliced stalk celery; and 1 teaspoon chopped parsley in 1 tablespoon olive oil until tender and golden. Now add to the stock the diced meat, onion mixture, ¼ cup diced bacon, 1 cup canned tomatoes, 1 cup chopped spinach, 1 cup canned kidney beans, drained, 1 cup chopped cabbage and 1 cup cooked elbow macaroni. Simmer until all vegetables are tender. Reseason to taste and serve sprinkled with Parmesan cheese. Makes about 3½ quarts soup.

HERB GREEN SALAD

Toss ⅔ cup soft bread crumbs with 2 tablespoons melted butter and toast until golden in a moderately slow, 325° F., oven. Remove from oven, cool, mix in 1 tablespoon freshly grated horse-radish. Place 1 bunch water cress and 1 head lettuce or about 3 cups shredded lettuce hearts in salad bowl. Salt and pepper lightly. Toss with bread-crumb mixture. Add about ⅓ cup herb dressing and toss again. Makes enough salad for 4 to 6 servings.

Herb Dressing: Mix together 2 cups olive oil, ½ cup wine vinegar, 2 teaspoons salt, ½ teaspoon white pepper, ½ teaspoon paprika, 2 teaspoons prepared mustard, 3 tablespoons chili sauce, 1 teaspoon each tarragon, basil, chervil and minced parsley, ½ teaspoon dill, 2 garlic cloves cut in half. Chill well. Makes 3 cups dressing.

STUART

Although pictures of White House meals are never allowed, with the help of the Lenox China Company, which has produced White House china since Woodrow Wilson's Administration, we have duplicated a State Dining Room buffet. These service dishes were ordered by President Truman when he changed the presidential seal—facing the eagle the other way, toward the olive branch of peace and away from the arrows of war.

equally understand me." So if the questi
"Which one of the Presidents did I unders and which one did I think understood m person?" I must say that the answer is I dent Truman. I always felt that he unders me as a man, not as a servant to be toler and that I understood that he expected r be a man, sincere in my duties and trying what is right at all times.

President Roosevelt was genial and y
but he left you feeling, as most aristocrat that they really do not understand you.
less fortunate human being, they exter you a charitable, human tolerance, but permit you the right to understand them brother, who served him as a valet, an other valets like McDuffie and Prettyman haps were able to bridge this gap and so the feeling of understanding and being u stood.

President Hoover was much like Dr.
uel W. Stratton of M.I.T. He was an inte human and kind man, very charitable, bu never felt that you understood him or he
For the short time that I was with Pres Eisenhower I sensed this feeling of u standing. Perhaps it is rather presump and unbecoming to one of my standing tempt any appraisal of these great men
this is my humble impression.

Here is an example of what I mean.
President Truman is in Boston I always call on him. I make no appointment. I find out what hotel he will be stopping his time of arrival and place myself in a tion where he might see me. And he a does. He will call out to me amidst a people he is with, "Hello there, Fields, make his way to me and shake hands. Th will say, "Come on up. I want to talk to I felt when he first came to Boston th would expect to see me and would appr my sincere desire to see him.

I would not have dared to assume that dent Roosevelt would expect to see me where and recognize me in public. Of c it has been so long since I have seen Pre Hoover that I doubt that he would ev member my name.

Some people have asked if I was ever of the attitude of President Truman bef wrote some of his blistering letters, esp
the one to the music critic about his re concerning Miss Margaret's singing.
fully, of all the men I have known, Pre Truman never seemed to have a problem not know of any attitude of his by his e sion or manners, and I first heard of this when I read it in the paper. I am sure n in the household could tell when he was bled. President Hoover always wore a s expression, though he had a keen se humor and wit. President Roosevelt change his expression as suddenly as a tor, and so likewise President Eisenh Like all great leaders, they never per themselves to show anything but firmne confidence.

People have also asked about Mr.
Hopkins. Was he really the brain behi scene? Well, of course I would not be know that. One thing, though. Mr. H was a very sick man during most of h and he was devoted to the President. A most sick people, I think you have to stand that they cannot be all smiles, ar unfair to point to this as a lack of goo position.

President Roosevelt was one in a tho
With his difficulty in walking, he seem enjoy living and gave you a feeling that contented with his lot. So I can say, fr point of view, that Mr. Hopkins was many others in our democracy who giv all to a cause when their personal health should have forced them into retiremer

During the Christmas of 1953 I r from the White House the portrait copy ing of Lincoln by the President to co
the cycle of such gifts from the four Pre
I had served, and I am very proud of th session. It was during this time that I formation of the changes in the relation household help and going back to workdays, similar to the old system.

CONTINUED ON PA

One simple change will make a remarkable difference in these deviled eggs...cross out "salad dressing"....specify

MIRACLE WHIP

Actually, Miracle Whip is more than a "salad dressing." It is a truly different dressing, luxuriously rich and smooth...and so wonderful tasting.

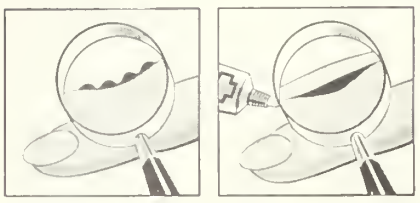
To make Miracle Whip, Kraft uses more expensive ingredients and more of them—plenty of good country eggs and the very best salad oil.



And Kraft combines these fine ingredients in a special way that gives the creamiest, smoothest texture imaginable.

But it is Miracle Whip's flavor that's really exciting. A lively, teasing, uniquely delicious flavor that no one has ever been able to copy.

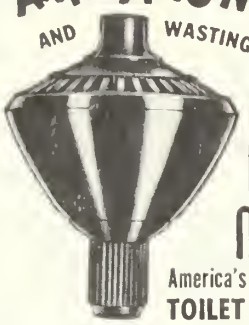
Try it! You'll see why Miracle Whip Salad Dressing by Kraft is America's favorite by far.

UNGUENTINE® BOOSTS NATURE'S HEALING POWER

as no plain antiseptic can!

1. Nature sends its healing serum to the surface of a skin injury. But tension may keep serum droplets apart. As germs get through, healing slows down!

2. Unguentine instantly spreads this healing serum, creates a protective blanket to lock out germs and to promote healing more effectively than nature itself!



Gives instant aid to everyday cuts, scrapes, scratches, as well as burns — Relieves pain, fights germs, promotes healing and forms a protective antiseptic dressing as no cream or liquid can! Nothing's safer for all kinds of everyday skin injuries, painful sunburn, too!

Play it safe—
Let Unguentine take over!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

ANTISEPTIC FIRST AID DRESSING
UNGUENTINE
WITH DIANESTOL

ANNOYING NOISES AND WASTING WATER STOP

GET THE GENUINE WATER MASTER
America's Largest Selling
TOILET TANK BALL

Noisy running toilets can waste over 1000 gallons of water a day. Stop this annoying noise, waste and expense. The efficient patented Water-Master Tank Ball instantly stops the flow of water after each flushing, stops the flow everytime, not just some of the time.

75c AT HARDWARE STORES EVERYWHERE
Higher in Canada

EARN EXTRA MONEY SELLING MITCHELL GREETING CARDS and GIFTS

Pair of candle trimmers

Praying children salt and pepper set

FREE, NEW BIG CATALOGUE and literature with pictures and descriptions of hundreds of unusual, profitable items.

87 SAMPLES, NAME-IMPRINTED beautiful new Christmas Cards Free, Everyday and birthday cards, gifts, tays, household and baby items. Samples sent on approval.

ALSO, IMPRINTED STATIONERY, Wedding announcements, napkins and matches. BIG COMMISSIONS.

Write today for everything you need to start earning money.

BONUS GIFT FOR EARLY ORDERS

Mitchell Greetings Co., Dept. LJ-860
47 W. 7 Mile Road, Detroit 3, Michigan

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 132

said that Mrs. Eisenhower insisted on saving the leftovers—even a spoonful of peas, carrots or a lamb chop. These had to be wrapped up and placed in the freezer. Of course I had doubts about this as to quantity—surely not a spoonful of peas.

At the time of President Eisenhower's second inauguration I spent a week in Washington and, like a visiting fireman, spent most of my time at the White House. I was fortunate in seeing the private swearing in of the President in the East Room and it was like being home again. During this trip I saw for myself the improved freezer system with the tiny packages of leftovers. Charles was doing a grand job and had added some improvements that made me wonder why I hadn't thought of them. I also found that, though Mrs. Eisenhower was a hoarder of leftover dabs, she had a great sense of appreciation, for Charles had many personal notes from the First Lady thanking him for his thoughtfulness in serving a special cake or something else pleasing to her. There were personal notes, too, written by little David for a party served him. Such little memos of thank-you are invaluable.

Many times I have been asked about the children and grandchildren in the White House families. President and Mrs. Hoover had two grown sons. Mr. Herbert, Jr., was married and his family lived for a short time in the White House. He was a very fine gentleman but his quiet, studious way made it difficult to approach him. He was very much like his father in that he did not appear to see you. Now Mr. Allan, though he seldom spoke, was very much like his mother. He could and would spot any breach of service, even the way a servant would walk as he approached the table. One waiter had to be transferred to a houseman's job because he sort of rocked or strutted when he walked. It was the man's natural gait, but Mr. Allan did not like his appearance as he walked to the table and that was that.

As for the Roosevelt children and grandchildren, they were without doubt the most individualistic. Mr. James was married, and Mr. Elliott also. Mr. Franklin and Mr. John were in Harvard, so they were not children. But these young men, when they got together, could raise a real roughhouse. One time Mr. Elliott, Mr. Franklin and Mr. John had such a roughhouse in the Lincoln Room that during the scuffle Mr. John sustained a fractured ankle and was laid up for weeks.

Mrs. Hoover during her stay had made a search and found the original Monroe furniture and had it brought to the White House. The Monroe sitting room was set up as an informal room for the serving of teas on the second floor. When the Roosevelts moved in the first thing the President said when he saw this room was, "Oh, my Lord! We cannot have this delicate furniture here. Can you imagine what my roughnecks would do to it after one fracas?" So the Monroe furniture was stored away for safekeeping.

I suppose Sistie and Buzzie Dall were the most popular grandchildren during my stay. They were such sweet children and so friendly. They were devoted to their maid and cook Kattie, who was with them in Tarrytown. After they left the White House to live in Seattle, whenever they visited Washington they would go to Kattie Hollyness' home in northeast Washington for dinner. They were just as excited about this as if they were going to the Mayflower Hotel. Mrs. Boettiger was a most understanding person, and she and Mr. James were the most friendly of the family. Both Sistie and Buzzie had their mother's charm and they were taught to be unspoiled.

With the Trumans, Miss Margaret was an only child and she was a very attractive and charming young lady in college. I do not think any young lady in our time was ever so suddenly thrust into the limelight as Miss Margaret. Although she was an only child, she had not been spoiled. Mrs. Truman is a woman of great character, down-to-earth ideas and wholesome dignity. Miss Margaret was devoted to her mother, father and grandmother. I can still see her walking to the table, escorting her grandmother by the arm, and Mrs. Wallace was so pleased and happy for her attention.

I must say Miss Margaret did disappoint me in one respect, for I had hoped to plan a wedding in the White House. Despite this, if I live to be 150 years old, I shall always remember Miss Margaret.

As for the Eisenhowers, there were only Major Eisenhower and his children and I was not there long enough to get acquainted with them.

This is my story of some of the happiest I have seen, heard and had a part in during long years which I spent in the White House doing my best to help four Presidents and their families to live and work in the midst of world history for our God and country and mankind.

NEXT MONTH

"Marian Anderson, when did you first know you were a Negro?"

"I knew my skin and hair were different from white children's," the great singer answered quietly, "but as for putting my finger on the exact time, it would be like setting the alarm clock for the moment when day turns into dusk." But once, in Philadelphia, awareness was thrust upon the young girl like a fist blow. And there are still incidents, even though Marian Anderson is world-famous. She tells her old friend, Emily Kimbrough, all about them—including why she hasn't sung in the South for over five years. "My Life in a White World."

"My husband is a household tyrant!"

Even on our honeymoon, Buff told me how to comb my hair, how to apply my lipstick, what dress to wear. He bullies and yells at Jimmy and me. I won't stand his violence any longer!" Strangely enough, most of the improvement in this marriage depended on Donna. The counselor was able to show her that Buff's pride in his masculinity, a vital part of his appeal for his wife, was in her hands. "Can This Marriage Be Saved?"

"What do you want?" she whispered, stalling. "You, Miss Sherwood, you."

Cautiously, Kelly Sherwood eased the car up the narrow driveway, a tunnel of blackness cut briefly by the headlights. Routinely, she silenced the motor and turned the lights out. Then a most unusual thing happened. Someone slid the garage door shut behind her. . . . Begin now the novel of suspense that will sweep like a rising wind through the homes of your friends. "Operation Terror," by the Gordons.

When a beloved child shrieks

It was a scream such as should never have to issue from the throat of a well-cared-for, adored little boy. It went on all that night, and the next day and night, and the next. Ruthe and Sheldon Paul did not know it then, but they do now: they are the parents of one of the most cruelly afflicted of beings—a mentally ill child. "Scream in the Night," by Neal Gilkyson Stuart, is an unforgettable "How America Lives" article about real people.

The man who saves marriages

Back in the 1890's, when Paul Popenoe was a small boy in Topeka, Kansas, his Victorian grandmother pointed out a large house in the neighborhood. "Over there," she breathed, in tones of horror and disapproval, "lives a divorced woman!" Today, one in four American marriages is breaking up; but Dr. Popenoe, now the renowned marriage expert, believes that most could be salvaged. "After all, monogamy is so well adapted to human nature!" "The Man Who Saves Marriages," by Betty Hannah Hoffman.

Also, "Our Practical Dream House," 11 wish-fulfilling pages of beautiful and usable ideas; high-fashion photographs rich with the glory that was (and still is) Rome; 4 pages of teenage patterns; Pat Boone; Jean Kerr; food, lovely food; and much more.

IN THE SEPTEMBER JOURNAL

S LADS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 76

SHRIMP AND ARTICHOKES VINAIGRETTE

u. s cooked, cleaned shrimp
p. anned artichoke hearts, drained cu olive oil
up hite wine vinegar
as on salt
a on pepper
bl oons vinegar
bl oons finely cut fresh dill bl oons finely chopped fresh tarragon n on monosodium glutamate
a on dry mustard
bl oons lemon juice
bl oons capers
a Boston lettuce, washed and chilled

s imp and artichoke hearts in a bowl. t ether the oil, white wine vinegar, salt, pe vinegar, dill, tarragon and monoso- n lutamate until well blended. Mix mus- d lemon juice until smooth. Add to sa . Beat again. Pour dressing over m and artichoke hearts. Add capers. Mix li tly. Cover and refrigerate 4 hours. Stir fr om time to time so that all the mixture e n contact with the dressing. Drain. re n lettuce cups. Makes 8 servings.

POTATO SALAD CARUSO

6 cups cooked cubed potatoes
1⅓ cups chopped celery
1 onion grated
2 teaspoons finely chopped parsley
16 slices bacon
2 eggs beaten
¼ cup sugar
¼ cup vinegar
¼ cup tarragon vinegar
1½ teaspoons salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
⅛ teaspoon powdered savory
½ teaspoon dry mustard
¼ cup cold water
6–8 cups assorted salad greens, washed and chilled
4 tomatoes, chilled

Toss together the potatoes, celery, onion and parsley. Fry the bacon until crisp. Remove and drain on paper toweling. Crumble into potato mixture. Measure the drippings in the skillet; you will need about ¼ cup. Mix the eggs, sugar, vinegar, tarragon vinegar, salt, pepper and savory. Make a smooth paste with the mustard and water and add to the egg mixture. Pour into the drippings in the skillet. Cook and stir until smooth and thickened. Add to the potato mixture. Mix thoroughly. Cover and chill, 4–6 hours or overnight. Serve mounded on a bed of assorted salad greens, with tomato wedges. Makes 6–8 servings.

T E PLAYBOY A D THE P UMBER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 56

w ked down to the end of the wharf with sl ting, yowling load. There was a small y d up at the foot, with a large, wind- n bearded pilot.

H' I said. "You go to Green Island?"

A ays have so far," said The Beard.

T t's good," I said. "I'm going to the ff ds'."

h Beard looked over at a wizened crony, s iled. The crony smiled back, tooth- y ilently, ominously.

T y do have a place there, don't they?" I

L t time I looked they did," said the y deadpan.

o ght all the Marx Brothers at once, I g t. The cats howled again. "P-o-o-o-or n tter," said Perlmutter.

Y got cats in that box," said the crony s gly.

L t time I looked I did," I said. Har-de- t ou, Groucho.

w s the only customer for the prehistoric ic wagon that came rattling down to e Island's stone wharf as the ferry nosed w in. The vehicle was in charge of a s nymph of fifty-odd, wearing dungarees a nan's shirt and an old felt hat.

T fella's goin' to the Sheffields', Mabel," c The Beard. "Cats and all."

h e was no door on either my side or o s, creating an interesting open-air effect. o drove her machine with the zeal of an g Ben-Hur; every now and then I'd r out and see a house zip past in the slip- a and once a block of about five build- n ooshed by.

V age!" bellowed Mabel, jamming her f wn even farther on the gas. Then she h brake and screeched into a sharp right a nd we went bouncing down a two-rut r d into the cool shade of a pine forest. A couple of minutes we slowed down, for a parent reason. The car creaked and p and panted, and then stopped with a d ring sigh.

H e you are," said Mabel, giggling. "a t much."

h pointed through the woods to a clearing, a there was a small brown house that k as if it had been constructed by leaning c of wood against one another.

U ," I said.

"Thank you and good day," said Mabel. "You need anything, there's a phone inside."

Off she went, rattledy-bang. I opened the cat box. Perlmutter leaped out and took off for the woods like a scalded bat. Potash slid over the side, sniffed at the grass, and then looked up at me sadly.

"So it's the country," I said defensively. "You wouldn't have liked it all by yourself in New York. You know how lonesome you get."

I picked up my typewriter and my suitcase and headed for the sagging porch. Thumbtacked to the front door was a shiny business card:

SEE P. J. FOR ANYTHING!
LAWNS MOWED, PLUMBING
ALL ELECTRICAL WORK
BAIT SUPPLIED, CLAMBAKES ARRANGED

P. J., I said to myself, staring in through the dusty glass of the front door at a truly Augean kitchen, you have just acquired a brand-new pigeon.

Inside, I turned the lone faucet in the kitchen sink. There was a drone as of distant bagpipes, and a trickle of dark brown water began to drip reluctantly onto my outstretched hand. I finally found the phone and jiggled the receiver. Nothing. Then I twisted the crank at the bottom.

"Ayeh," said a distant female voice.

"Can you tell me how I get hold of this P. J.?" I said.

"You're the man with the cats at the Sheffields'," said the voice.

"How do I ——"

There was a great clanking and buzzing on the line, and then another voice, male this time, said:

"Ayeh."

"This is the man with the cats at the Sheffields'," I said. "P. J.?"

"No, sir."

"Is this P. J.'s number?"

"Ayeh," said the voice.

"Good," I said. "I would like to see P. J. for anything. Did every summer house on the island get one of those cards?"

"Yours was the first we tacked up," said my new friend.

"I can understand that," I said. "Can P. J. be here in an hour?"

"Ayeh," said the voice. "We figured you'd be callin'. P. J. saved the time open."

I walked up to the store and bought a lot of canned stuff, and when I got back to the house I saw a jeep parked on the lawn. A pair of dungarees was sticking out from under the side of the house, and there was a great deal of clanking and muffled panting.

Plan your trip to EUROPE now with these exciting new HOLIDAY MAGAZINE TRAVEL GUIDES

Now you can visit Europe with the most informative, helpful and authoritative travel guides ever published—and who but HOLIDAY could have produced them?

These handy guides, produced by the editors of HOLIDAY and published by Random House, contain all the basic things you need to know—plus the unusual and interesting sidelights readers have come to expect from HOLIDAY.

The guides will give you the latest details on hotels, restaurants, tours, prices, tipping, travel preparations and points of interest—things to help you get the most out of your trip. And they include many helpful maps and illustrations in color and black and white to simplify your planning.

They're yours at only $4.95 for any five you select—less than many one-country guides previously available. And if you wish more than five of these books, additional guides cost only $1 each.

With the five or more HOLIDAY Guides you choose, you'll also receive, at no cost, a European currency converter to help you figure American equivalents of European currencies in seconds.

Check the titles you wish to receive in the coupon on this page and mail it today. Or buy the books you want from your favorite bookstore, news dealer or travel agency. If you order direct from us, there's no need to send money now—we'll gladly bill you later. (P.S. These guides will make a wonderful gift for someone you know who's planning a trip, too!)

HOLIDAY, Dept. 1402, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania

Please send me the HOLIDAY TRAVEL GUIDES checked below PLUS my FREE currency converter. (Minimum order, five books for $4.95; additional GUIDES $1 each.)

Penna. residents please add 4% state sales tax.

☐ Italy ☐ The Riviera and Southern France ☐ London ☐ Rome
☐ Scandinavia: Denmark, Sweden, Norway ☐ Britain: England, Scotland, Wales ☐ Paris ☐ Florence and the Hill Towns ☐ Spain ☐ France

Name_____

Street or R.D._____

Town_____ Zone____ State_____

☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Bill me the cost of the Guides I've ordered plus a few cents for postage and handling.

If you're not completely satisfied with the GUIDES, return them within 10 days for a full refund—or pay nothing if you've requested billing. Either way, the currency converter is yours to keep. This offer good only in the U.S. and Canada.

"Hey, under there!" I called. "Come on out!"

Out into the daylight came a denim shirt and a perky, dirt-streaked face that scowled up at me. Its owner looked about thirteen.

"Hello, little girl," I said. "Where's your father? I thought he was saving the time open."

Dirty Face knelt on the grass and wiped her forehead. "I saved the time," she said. "And I am not a little girl."

I looked at her more carefully. She was absolutely right; she was by no means a little girl. "You're P. J.," I said. "How'd you know where to start?"

"I just picked up where I left off last year," she said. "Let's see if the water's running inside."

We went in and looked at the water. There was a lot of it to look at, for I'd never turned off the faucet, and the dark brown trickle had turned into a gushing stream. P. J. leaped for the faucet.

"What did you do under there?" I said.

"Turned your water on, is all," she said.

"You sure did," I said. "How are you with electricity?"

"That can't be out," she said. "I know for sure."

"No?" I said smugly.

I flicked three switches in rapid succession, and nothing happened.

"Uh-huh," said P. J. "Did you throw the master on?"

"H'm-m?" I said.

P. J. gave me a strange look, opened a cupboard, and pushed a big switch from OFF to ON. Every light in the kitchen blazed.

"I knew it," I said. "The angels sent you." I pointed to the kerosene stove. "I bet you even know how to work that."

She went over to the stove and twisted a gizmo and struck a wooden match. One of the burners flared into blue, glowing life.

"Amazing," I said respectfully.

P. J. walked over to the icebox, op[ened] door and peered in.

"This monster eats ice like peanu[ts]," said. "You'll need about sixty poun[ds] times a week. I bring it."

"Is there anything you don't do?" I [said]

"I don't usually have long conve[rsations] with strangers ——"

" —— in the middle of your workin[g]," I said.

"Yep," said P. J. "Well, it's been ch[arming]. And now, if you'll excuse me, I've g[ot] other calls to make."

"Come back at ten o'clock tomorro[w morn]ing, please," I said briskly. "The law[n needs] mowing."

"At ten I'm shingling Mrs. Ha[ll's] roof," said P. J.

"Noon, then."

"At noon I'm putting out Mr. Ha[ll's] outhaul." She had slid under the wheel of her jeep and was gunning th[e motor]. "Why don't you mow your own lawn?"

"Because I'm as shiftless as Jeeter [Lester]," I said. "Two o'clock? This is a cry f[rom the] heart."

P. J. hesitated. Why, her eyes are gray, I said to myself, and her sunburn[ed nose] are as brown as cocoa.

"O.K., helpless," she said. "Two o'[clock]."

She threw in the clutch, and the jeep [lurched] off down the road like a drunken h[ot rod]. I watched it out of sight, and then hear[d it] cough. Some twenty feet or so awa[y] a boy of about eight was leaning against a [tree] staring at me.

"Hello," I said.

"That was my sister," said the boy. "[That's] old dame that just left."

"How old is she?"

"Twenty-three," said the boy. "I [told] she can come here, I can come here."

"Absolutely," I said. "You want to [help] feed the cats?"

"Sure," said the boy. "My name is H[erbert]."

Herbert and I fed the cats, and he f[illed me] in a little on the recently departed cro[w].

"You live here all year?" I asked.

"You crazy?" said Herbert. "Sum[mers] I live here with my Uncle Pruett. Winte[rs] in Maplewood with my daddy. Penny['s in] New York. Some dumb apartment, bc[ause] got a statue you can put your han[d] through. It's got a plain old hole wh[ere the] belly oughta be."

Herbert brooded for a moment on [the] iquity of Henry Moore, while I spent [a] few seconds trying to equate my [old] plumber with this new picture of a Ne[w] sophisticate.

"Your sister's a very interesting [girl]," said.

"She's dumb," said Herbert. "All g[irls] dumb."

P. J. showed up right on the dot of [ten] next afternoon. I heard the jeep com[ing] by the time I got out of the hous[e] wrestled a little power lawn mower [out] back seat and onto the grass. She ha[d a] shirt on, and shorts instead of dungar[ees] looked quite unlike any other plumb[er] ever had dealings with.

"Just trim the edges, and not too [much] the middle," I said.

"Relax," said P. J. "You're talkin[g to] world's leading authority on this [—] could write a book."

She turned on the motor with a who-o[p] and started marching up and down bel[ow] tugging mower, round and round in [an] ually diminishing square. Her face w[as] serious, almost frowningly so, but h[er] legs were merry, and her red shirt was [a] I sat on the porch railing and sipped [a] beer as the grass melted away to a thic[k] stubble. P. J. did the grass in front, [then] did around each side, and then she ste[pped] mower up to me and shut it off. Tiny [beads] perspiration were sparkling on her fo[rehead].

"There!" she said.

"Bravo!" I said. "I will puncture [a] beer."

"I wouldn't dream of drinking beer [on] time!" said P. J. indignantly. "You [have] fourteen minutes of your hour left. I'll [be] CONTINUED ON PA

High roof makes the outdoors enjoyable, shelters terrace activities, glamorizes this living room.

RODNEY MC CAY MORGAN

EXCITING AND PRACTICAL

This house is expansible; carport can become a living room, the living room a family room.

By JOHN BRENNEMAN, Architectural Editor

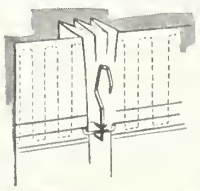
A beautiful roof line can give a house great distinction. In this friendly house that feature is well mated with a unique plan to produce an outstanding family house.

At front the children's wing has three bedrooms and a bath including a well-located laundry. Upstairs is a big playroom for children's activities so the more formal living areas can remain serene.

The master suite is a luxurious retreat for parents, with a wealth of storage; if finances are tight, this wing can be built later.

The lovely high-ceilinged living room gives the house an air of practicality and excitement seldom matched. Plans available.

ARCHITECT: HENRY NORRIS, A.I.A.
AREA: 2600 SQUARE FEET
COST: $27,000 TO $33,500 AND LAND



Hunt . . . for the best tomato catsup

You know YOU'RE RIGHT WITH Kirsch AT THE WINDOW

Incomparable!
Kirsch Superfine Traverse

When it comes to curtains and draperies, put your trust in Kirsch, the leader in window beauty. For a new home—or a new look—rely on the unmatched combination you find only with Kirsch: the most complete line of dependable drapery hardware—and helpful, adaptable curtain and drapery styling ideas for using it. Be sure of the brand name! . . . Kirsch is offered—in several price ranges—by dealers who have your needs in mind, as to style, quality and value. It pays to ask for Kirsch!

Genuine Easypleat pleating tape is made only by Kirsch. It stays firm through repeated washing or dry cleaning. See the latest adjustable type. Insist on Kirsch Easypleat—by name!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

Kirsch
DRAPERY HARDWARE

It's easy—and it's fun—to plan windows with this book

Let the experts help you with their hints, tips and pictures. Room effects. Instructions for making curtains, draperies. And a Color Selector Kit. Only 50c.

KIRSCH COMPANY
163 Prospect, Sturgis, Michigan

Gentlemen: Enclosed is 50c; please send one copy of "Window Decorating Made Easy—by Kirsch."

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ Zone____ State_____

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 136

kitchen is a mess. I'll bet you didn't even make your bed."

"Stop betting," I said. "You'll break me."

"Hmpf," said P. J., marching into the house with me right behind her. She stared at the kitchen sink.

"I told you I was shiftless," I said.

"Maybe I could have guessed," she said.

She washed the dishes, bustled past me with a see-what-I-put-up-with! glare, and made the bed before it knew what hit it. "There!" she said, as she mitered the last corner.

"Great," I said. "Now we can start on the second hour."

"All right," said P. J. "You name it."

"Well, I guess you don't have time to arrange a clambake," I said. "And I really don't want any bait. So suppose you sit down and have a beer with me. At the going rate."

P. J. turned a fascinating shade of puce.

"I am not a taxi-dance-hall girl, Mr. Thompson," she said. "I will not sit with you while the clock ticks."

"All right, all right," I said quickly. "There must be something else that needs doing. Let's see now." I walked out into the living room, looking around.

"First things first," said P. J., at my elbow. "Do you have a garbage pit dug?"

"Pit?" I said. "I intend to give all my garbage to the collector. Why would I save it?"

"You are far from collectors, Mr. Thompson," said P. J., smiling coldly. "Is your broiler clean?"

"I wouldn't know," I said. "I'm normally a poacher and a boiler."

"M'm-m," said P. J.

She went over and opened the oven and plucked out a black relic that looked old enough to have come from an Egyptian tomb.

"I thought so," said P. J. grimly. "You can tell a lot from a broiler. I'll put in another hour here. I can't stand this."

"You go right ahead," I said. "I'll have a beer, and kibitz, and keep you cheerful with witty sayings."

"Feel free to have the beer," said P. J., tossing the broiler into the sink with a clonk.

I had my beer in injured silence, while P. J. did the broiler, washed a couple of windows, thumbtacked some fresh paper on the shelves, swept up the kitchen and living room, and then went outside to dig a neat little hole just beyond the edge of my newly mowed side lawn. Finally she rested on her shovel, and blew a wisp of hair off her face with a sharp upward breath from the corner of her mouth.

"That's all for now," she said.

"It's frightening, all that energy," I said.

"It's the way I am," said P. J. "Now, being shiftless, that is frightening, if you ask me."

"I had not planned to ask you," I said. "How much for all the chores?"

"I'll give you a bill when you leave," said P. J. She hopped up into her jeep.

"Wait a minute!" I said. "Why don't you come back after dinner? On your time?"

"To do what?"

"To do whatever," I said. "Sit around and talk; it gets lonely here. I may even be moved to broil you some cookies."

"Nobody broils cookies," said P. J. "Not even you."

"All right," I said. "You can't have any."

"Eight-thirty," said P. J. "But I won't stay long."

She stayed pretty long, though. She showed up in a light blue print that did her no harm at all, and her hair was anything but tousled. We talked, and we played cribbage, and we talked some more.

"P. J., you drive yourself too hard," I said. It was about midnight, and we were at the kitchen table, living it up with beer and pretzels and cheese crackers. "Selective shiftlessness is the key to the good life."

"You're nuts," said P. J., banging her fist down on the table. "Work is the key. Hard, efficient work."

"I have nothing against work," I said. "In its proper place, I like work. I got a whole page of my script done this afternoon."

"How many pages is it going to be when it's finished?"

"Seventy-five," I said.

"It is just as well," said P. J., "that you are not embarking on Gone With the Wind."

She stood up and smiled.

"Good night, Jeeter," she said. "It's past my bedtime."

Maybe it was that smile; who knows? All of a sudden I didn't want her to go, and no measure was too desperate.

"Sit back down, P. J.," I said. "I just had an idea."

"I can't sit down," she said. "I'm on my way home."

"Hurry-hurry-hurry," I said. "For what?"

P. J. raised her eyebrows.

"Did it ever occur to you," I said," that we both might be able to use a change of pace?"

"No," said P. J.

"Think of the changes we could make in our lives! You slow down, I speed up. My typewriter will chatter like a machine gun, and I will do four pages an afternoon. Your jeep will slow down to a gentle crawl, and your ulcers will stop bubbling away ——"

"I don't have ulcers!"

"—— and by the time we get back to New York we will both be better-rounded people. I will have a tidy pile of manuscript, and you will find yourself able to walk, not run, to the Museum of Modern Art, or wherever else you go in the afternoon."

"I see Herbert's been talking," said P. J. "Why on earth should we do all this?"

"Because although I have known you for only a day and a half," I said, "I suspect I want to know you a great deal better. But first we have to shift our personalities so that we meet somewhere in No Man's Land, between the extremes of my laziness and your zeal. See?"

Hope is a light diet, but very stimulating.
BALZAC

"How much of that beer have you had?" said P. J.

"This is sweet reason speaking, not the beer," I said. "Come on, P. J. Bargain?"

P. J. thought it over for a good five seconds.

"This is crazy," she said finally. "Bargain. I guess you might be very different if you were less shiftless."

"Like day and night," I said.

"I think we'll start you off," said P. J. thoughtfully, "with a good brisk swim tomorrow morning. Seven o'clock."

"Nobody gets up at seven o'clock!" I said.

"I'll even join you," said P. J.

"Unfair," I said. "You're supposed to make changes too."

"Usually I'm up at five," said P. J. "This way I'll loll in bed for two extra hours. Good night, Timothy."

"Drive slow, now," I said.

She was out the door and walking across the lawn, and she wiggled her fingers over her head to say she'd heard me. Then she got into the jeep and drove off. Slow too.

The next morning I was summoned from the deep caverns of sleep by the rhythmic bellows of an enraged moose.

"Honk," he went. "Honk. Honk-honk!"

I burrowed deeper into the pillow.

"Honk-honk-honk!" went the moose fiercely.

I staggered over to the window and stared blearily out at the pearl-gray morning. P. J. was leaning on the horn. I groaned, and put on my trunks. Potash and Perlmutter, who'd been sleeping on the end of the bed, stared at me with wild surmise. I couldn't remember the last time I'd got up at seven. Neither could they.

I walked through the wet grass to the jeep, rubbing the sleep out of my eyes. P. J. had on a two-piece suit and one of those far-out new cars. "Good morning!" she said.

"No commercials, please," I said.

I climbed in beside her and we jounced very sedately down through the pines to the cove.

"You're going to love the swimming here, Timothy," said P. J.

"I am counting the seconds," I said politely.

It turned out we had the little beach all to ourselves. P. J. kicked off her sandals.

OUCH! DON'T TOUC

STOPS SUNBU PAIN...instantly

From Florida comes a medicated r that stops blistering skin fire . . . cold! Solarcaine, it's an "anti-pain" lotion f burn, kitchen burns, all "burning" ski tions. Contains benzocaine, puts pain to sleep, as its refrigerant ingredient emollients soothe, antiseptics promote of the inflamed tissues . . . fast!

Greatest discovery ever for sunburn Greaseless. Wonderful for itching, de hands, other skin pain. Save on large

"In Florida I got a bad sunburn—was ur walk. Solarcaine gave me wonderful relie Maxwell S. Sobel, Syracuse

"I had the most awful case of detergent They were red, cracked and sore. Solar the only thing that gave me relief."
Harriette Brudner, Glen Oak

SOLARCAINE
Another quality product of Plough, Inc.

C. L. Evans, Pres. of New England Art Publisher

MAKE UP TO $300 OR EXTRA MONE
Now To Christmas—In Spare Ti

Show Friends Fabulous Evans of over 300 New 1960 Ite
Christmas & All Occasion GREETIN Assortments Folks Buy On Sig

Cash Profits to 100%
No-Money-Down, No Starting Sample Plan. You up to $1.00 per item for yo Self-selling EVANS Chr Card and Gift Line, huge mean more sales, faster s All you do is visit friends, bors, relatives, co-workers around your town. Everyon comes you. No experience n

WRITE TODAY For All New 1960 Feature Box Assortments On Approval, 2 Big Order-Getting Catalogs — plus Big Free Album of Personalized Christmas Cards

Read What One Money Maker!
"Last year I bought new lin for my living room and paid of my doctor's bills and me and bought clothes and money for gifts."
Mrs. Hugh F. Tennant,

NEW ENGLAND ART PUBLISHERS, N. Abington 827

Shrinks Hemorrhoid New Way Without Surg

STOPS ITCH—RELIEVES PAI

For the first time science has fo new healing substance with the ast ing ability to shrink hemorrhoids relieve pain – without surgery.

In case after case, while gently r ing pain, actual reduction (shrin took place.

Most amazing of all – results w thorough that sufferers made ast ing statements like "Piles have to be a problem!"

The secret is a new healing subs (Bio-Dyne®) – discovery of a famous research institute.

This substance is now availab suppository or ointment form und name Preparation H®. Ask for it drug counters – money back guar

Ingrown NAIL

Just a few drops of soothing Dr. Scholl's ONIXOL in nail groove relieve soreness and pain, soften embedded part of nail for easy removal. Sold everywhere.

Dr Scholl's ONIX

you in," she said with a grin.
get wet in my usual stately manner," )on't rush me, pal."
pposed to rush you. Fair is fair."
d down to the water's edge and put a took it right out and did a furtive ny toes.
ldn't throw a fish in there," I said.
ss me."
nse," said P. J. "The swimming's ly this summer. Go ahead!"
ny eyes and held my breath and did a ive. P. J. knifed into the water, and sleek and dripping next to me. She head and grinned.
it's like a bathtub!" she said.
d my blue lips and my chattering
a feeble, wordless smile.
hat!" said P. J. "You look just like om of the Opera."
eled ourselves dry on the beach, and ation started to come back to my b legs.
ou're ready for breakfast!" said P. J. ggs, toast, coffee. Sound good?"
ls great," I said. "Where are you go-)k it?"
going to cook it," said P. J. "It's a zy man who hasn't got the gumption is own breakfast, Timothy."
ainly is," I said.
)ped at the store, and P. J. saw that I l sorts of absurdly healthy things to and bacon and milk and tomatoes—dropped me off at my house.
)ut all my work today except the ice
e said. "What a couple of changed we're going to be!"
" I said.
back with your ice about noon.
d!"
demon," I said. "Drive slow."
etcha."
at do-it-yourself breakfast provided r of innocent merriment for the cats, else. They came arching against my nudged the smoking, spitting bacon e frying pan or tried with notable ccess to turn my fried egg over. The me on the cheek, pop!, and it stung chin, pop!, and then pop-pop-pop!
on the nose and twice on the fore-mped the whole sizzling mess onto nd grimly began to eat it all.
big mouth," I muttered to myself.
t of the morning ran along in the ral pattern. In washing the dishes I cup and busted a glass. Net result:
nger, one surly dishwasher. It took y-five minutes by the clock to make nd even then it looked as if it had by Slovenly Peter. By the time I got pewriter I was a fuming mass of at there for two solid hours, staring te paper. This was all that emerged:
You don't really mean that, Monlu can't.
GUE: Of course I mean it, Mary. Do to say I don't mean what I say?
That is exactly what I mean to say,
—
GUE: Ah, shut your bee-stung mouth.

den banter was obviously as profit-e as it was for Montague and Mary,
d the paper out of the typewriter,
t into the sunshine, picked up a t had been leaning against the back se, and began to hack at the grass ed the side lawn. It had no more he thin, wiry stuff than if I'd been t, and on every second stroke or so d end of the scythe would bury itself nd, and I would wrench it out and ther patch. These maneuvers so ir-I never heard the jeep drift up.
farmer," said P. J. The back of her ull of big chunks of ice, under a wet paulin. "How's work?"
," said. "How's leisure?"
aid P. J. "I've been lying around on listening to Jean's Other Husband.
we've got problems."
mind," I said. "It will do you good."
ved her into the kitchen as she a chunk of ice.
w going to take ten minutes off," I nch?"

"Sure," said P. J. "What's going?"

"I don't know," I said. "Tomato sandwiches, I guess."

I found a tomato, and cut it in half, and put one of the halves between two pieces of bread and handed it to her.

"This is a tomato sandwich?" said P. J.

"I don't know how else you'd define it."

"It stopped me for a minute," said P. J. "In our house we do not cut the tomato."

We moodily gnawed at the sandwiches.

"Well," said P. J., "I've got to get the rest of my ice delivered. And then it will be time for my nap." She said good-by wanly.

I started the afternoon off by sitting down at the typewriter again, but Montague and Mary remained gracelessly mute, mired in their idiotic quarrel. Ten cigarettes, four glasses of water and two frustrating hours later I was in my trunks and on my way back to the beach, figuring that anything was better than staring at the keys. But the water was even colder than it had been in the morning, and I stubbed my toe on an unfriendly rock, and there was no P. J. to look at.

That was the way things went all day—all week, in fact, as can be seen from a few stabs I made at keeping a diary:

Monday: Early up, icy dip, lousy breakfast (black coffee, black toast, seeded orange juice, oh boy), arid stretch at typewriter. Why Montague so stubborn? Why Mary so stupid? While leaning on hoe (verified name of primitive tool from dictionary picture) saw P. J. at distance, walking across field, sun behind her, lovely sight. Waved at her, wistfully. She waved back, impossible tell how. Wistfully? Carelessly? Wish knew.

Tuesday: Montague and Mary still not speaking, but nice day today, because Ice Day today. P. J. very fetching in checked shirt, dungarees, very friendly in sharing cucumber sandwich. Turned down evening date, though, pleading Double Canfield engagement with Uncle Pruett. Seemed genuinely sorry.

Wednesday: Late up, no dip—have figured pneumonia is not the answer. More frantic staring at blank pages in machine. Brief visit from Herbert, reporting sister in apparent state of mild collapse: no vim, no vigor, just moody concentration on radio. Told Herbert to tell her keep stiff upper lip. Braced own lip by scything jungle in back of house. Now nursing stiff upper back.

P. J. was back on the ice run Thursday, and succumbed without too much arm twisting to an offer of dinner. We had all the bean soup anybody could want, and celery, and some of my famous black toast. Afterward we played cribbage and I trimmed her. About ten o'clock she looked reluctantly at her watch.

"I told Uncle Pruett I'd be early," she said.

"I guess it's just as well," I said. "I get behind in my scything if I don't get up early."

"Poor Timothy," said P. J., smiling. "I'm proud of you." She stared at me speculatively. "You do need a haircut, though, you know? You've got such nice hair, and it's a shame to let it get all shaggy."

"Thank you," I said. "On the other hand, you don't need a haircut at all. Your hair looks just fine."

"Thank you," she said.

We looked at each other just a little longer than necessary. And then we said good night.

The next afternoon, after a typically feckless morning, I sat on my porch and drummed my fingers, and then got up and went nosing restlessly through the closets. The Sheffields were apparently mad for broken electric fans and unstrung tennis rackets; I found four of each. I also found a large collection of wood of varying lengths, yellow and new-smelling.

Ah-ha! I said to myself. This is a sign. I will build something.

I stacked the wood neatly on the lawn, and rummaged around until I found a hammer and some nails. This all took the better part of an hour, and most of the afternoon was shot by the time I sat down on the grass next to my woodpile. Herbert appeared out of nowhere, and leaned over my shoulder.

"Hello," he said. "What're you going to make?"

"Hello, Herbert," I said. "I don't know. Any suggestions?"

"Maybe a box for the cat," said Herbert.

"That's what it will be," I said.

"Something's still wrong with my sister," said Herbert. "She's been muttering to herself."

"Tell you what, Herbert," I said. "You go on home and tell her to come over here. Say I said we should be miserable together."

"I don't get it," said Herbert.

"You don't need to get it," I said. "Here's a quarter just for remembering it."

I hammered away vigorously at the cat box for an hour or so, and it grew gratifyingly tall and wide, but strangely lopsided too. P. J. finally showed up, driving slowly through the trees and then over the lawn. She sat down next to me on the grass.

"I have kept the faith," she said quietly. "I have slowed down to an absolute creep."

"I have kept it too," I said. "I have speeded up into a scything, carpentering demon. Look at this."

P. J. looked at the box. "What is it?"

"A box for Perlmutter," I said. "One of my cats. I wanted to keep busy, so I made it."

"What is Perlmutter going to do with it?"

"Sit in it," I said.

There was a small silence.

TENSION ENDS HERE

Englander

TENSION·EASE mattress

Lie down. Feel that tense, tight feeling drain away. Feel your body become calm . . . relaxed. This is the first mattress designed to help you unwind!

The Englander Tension-Ease is the only firm mattress specially made to relieve tension . . . because it's the only mattress made with an extra level of Tension-Ease coils.

Only the Tension-Ease is available with a mattress of genuine Airfoam, by Goodyear. The Airfoam mattress is truly sag-proof, never loses its shape, never needs turning, and is completely non-allergenic.

Every Englander Tension-Ease mattress is identified by a red line around the border. Available in your choice of Airfoam (shown) or Innerspring, $79.75

© 1960 The Englander Company, Inc. * T. M. The Englander Company, Inc. † T. M. The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company

BRINGING UP BABY®, HINTS COLLECTED BY MRS. DAN GERBER, MOTHER OF FIVE

comfort cues for the crib and carriage set

Since a brand new baby spends most of his time sleeping, his comfort should be the big consideration. A few suggestions for sweeter dreams:

- The crib mattress should be firm, but not too hard. No pillow please—baby will sleep more sweetly without one.
- The nursery should be well-ventilated, but free from drafts. Make sure baby is dry, his tummy reasonably full.
- Your cherub needs plenty of wiggle-room when visiting in the land of nod. Nightie, sleeping bag or blankets should not be hug-tight. And there should be at least 2 fingers of space between your darling and his diaper.

Comfort cues for cooler weather. Baby should be as comfortable in his carriage as in his crib. The weather will have its ups and downs from here on, so when you take baby gallivanting, it's wise to check weather reports and dress baby accordingly. Remember, overdressing leads to overheating and thus chilling. Tight bundling restricts freedom of movement.

Four-in-one for your honey-bun. Almost before you can believe it, baby will be on cereal. That's the time to try Gerber Cereal Quads. This handy, 4-in-1 package contains Rice Cereal, Oatmeal, Mixed Cereal and High Protein Cereal to introduce baby to the delights of different flavors. Nutritionally, Gerber Cereals are enriched with blood-building iron, B-vitamins for appetite and growth, calcium for strong bones. All four are famous for a smoother than smooth texture. And they stir to creamy perfection in seconds when mixed with formula or milk.

Vitamin C . . . a necessity. Your doctor will probably specify vitamin D drops for baby, but when the need for vitamin C arrives, he'll most likely recommend orange juice. Gerber Strained Orange Juice is rich in this important vitamin . . . one can provides over 100% of the amount baby needs daily. Mild in flavor, it's carefully pasteurized for baby's protection. Another fine starting juice: Gerber Strained Apple Juice, enriched with vitamin C.

babies are our business... our only business!®

FREMONT, MICHIGAN
8 CEREALS · OVER 100
STRAINED & JUNIOR FOODS

"He's a ruddy fool if he does," said P. J. "That box is a superb symbol of everything that's been wrong this week. Do you have a hatchet, Timothy?"

"I believe I have two of them," I said.

I went inside and got a couple of hatchets I'd seen earlier, and brought them out. P. J. hefted one, and then wound up like a windmill and let fly at the box. It shuddered, but did not split.

"Permit me, madam," I said, aiming at the box with my hatchet, almost dislocating my shoulder as I missed it completely.

"Ireland forever!" shouted P. J. wildly, taking a grand whack at the box and cleaving a jagged hole in its side.

"On Wisconsin!" I cried, giving the box a mighty wallop that split it in two.

P. J. had a fine furious look in her eyes as she dropped her hatchet and stared at me. I dropped my own hatchet and stared back.

"I can't slow down!" she said. "m erable! I've been miserable all wee

"If I try to be anything but shift affects my writing!" I said.

"But what will we do?"

"Off with the new and on with said. "It's very good for the pe relationship to be complementary. us is going to be lazy, why can't

"And if somebody's going to be why can't it be me?" said P. J.

"Exactly!" I said. "For instanc now going to cook us both an excell for which I will pour the beer. And have done the dishes, you will tak wild and whirling ride in your jeep, tell you what the Spider told the F

"What did the Spider tell the othy?" said P. J.

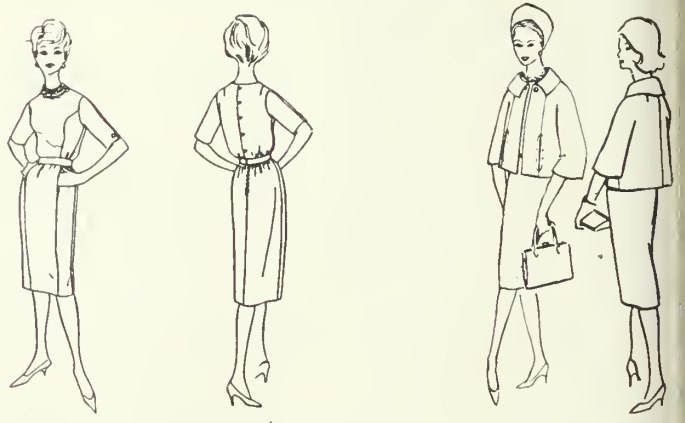
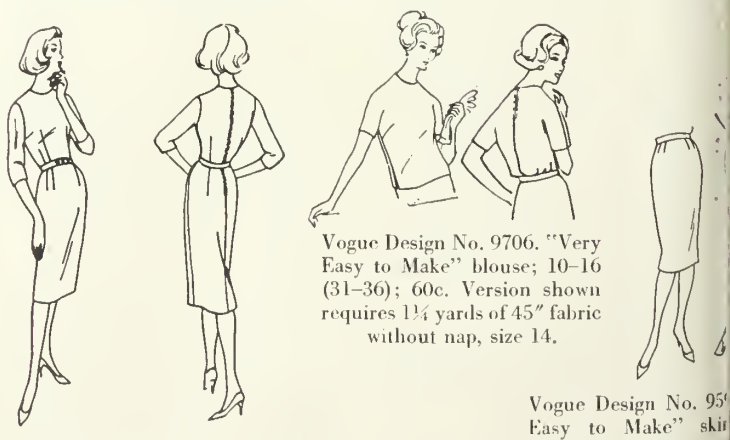
"I will tell you later, and you will



And I did, and she did.

long and short of a coat design



Other views, sizes and prices of Vogue Patterns on pages 64 and Vogue Design No. 5082. Coat; 10–18 (31–38); $1.00. Short version (below, right) requires 2⅜ yards of 54″ fabric without nap for coat and 2 yards of 39″ fabric without nap for lining. Three-quarter length requires 3¼ yards of 54″ fabric for coat and 2 yards of 54″ fabric with nap for lining. Long version requires 4 yards of 54″ fabric with nap for coat and 3 yards of 45″ fabric with nap for lining. All yardages size 14.

Vogue Design No. 9998. One-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38); 75c. Version shown requires 1⅞ yards of 54″ fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 9706. "Very Easy to Make" blouse; 10–16 (31–36); 60c. Version shown requires 1¼ yards of 45″ fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 9988. One-piece dress and tunic; 10–18 (31–38); 75c. Version shown requires 1⅞ yards of 54″ fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 95 Easy to Make" ski waist measure; 60c. shown requires 1 ya fabric with or without 26 waist.

WHAT YOUR DOCTOR LOOKS FOR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 32

vts has stayed close to the tenth percentile li, meaning that 10 per cent of children his a weighed less than he, 90 per cent of chil- dn more than he. Today's examination sws that in the six months since his last emination he has gained more than usual a is now at the twenty-fifth percentile line—2 per cent of children his age weigh less than h His mother states that life seems to be go- in particularly well for him. He is still a some- vat slender child on examination, but his nther and doctor have every reason to be ghted with the state of his health.

An extreme example at the other end of the s le would be a child whose physique looks pfect in today's examination; but his past rord shows that he was always overweight bore and his mother mentions that he has bn drinking and urinating more often than ual in recent weeks. This is a classical story f the onset of diabetes, which can be verified wh tests for sugar in the urine and blood.

Now let's run through the main parts of a pysical examination to see how much significe ce they have in the routine checkups of a by or of a child.

Since childhood means growth, the weight is n easy, factual way to keep rough tabs on pgress, as long as it is interpreted with good jgment. Length or height is always meas- ud, too, and provides a record of one aspect c body build and development. Usually it t es a serious chronic illness or family dis- tbance to throw a child's length off course.

Many doctors, including myself, don't take t temperature of babies or children who cne for routine checkups without symptoms cbhysical illness. It is seldom elevated under t se circumstances, and when it is elevated iusually indicates only the early stages of an cinary respiratory infection. Rectal temperate taking is felt to be an indignity by most yng children. However, other doctors prefer ttake temperatures routinely, thinking of t rare case in which an unsuspected fever pves to be a first sign of real trouble.

The first section in a doctor's examination iusually labeled "general appearance," and ts includes the child's build, state of nutrith, behavior, and whether he appears healthy cll. The doctor is gaining impressions about t se important aspects all the time he is with t child, without using his hands or any itrument, and is automatically comparing hn with other children of the same age. Te condition of the skin is seen in a glance. In infancy the head is measured and the fntanel (the soft spot) is felt, to rule out the pssibility of the rare diseases in which the hd enlarges too rapidly or slowly.

The lower eyelid is usually pulled down and ipected because pallor of the blood vessels he indicates the possibility of anemia (which ifairly common in the latter half of the first yr and in the second year), and the need for a blood count, in order to be sure. The "raightness" or co-ordination of the two es is also noted.

In the school-age child it is important that sneone give the vision-chart test at least nce a year, whether it's the school, the child's ngular doctor or the eye specialist. This is rticularly important in order to detect nrsightedness, which may develop fairly pidly at this age, especially if there is near- shtedness in the family, or astigmatism. (When there are severe defects of these two lds, the teacher or parent is likely to notice te unusual position in which the child holds a bok. But milder degrees may go unnoticed by others, and uncomplained of by the child.)

There are other parts of the eye examination hich the general doctor is able to perform: te size and roundness of the pupils; whether ey contract when light is shone into them or bught close to them; the appearance of the tina in the back of the eye when examined th the ophthalmoscope light. But these tests e often omitted in the routine periodic examinations of healthy children. They are made with great care when there are any symptoms pointing to disease of the nervous system or eyes. Examination of the retina requires considerable co-operation on the part of the patient, or drops to dilate the pupils.

The nose is briefly inspected with a flashlight, but this usually reveals something only when there is allergy, or a discharge from a cold, sinusitis, or an object which the child has stuffed up there.

The examination of the eardrums is very important in young children when there is or has recently been a cold or sore throat with fever, because they acquire ear infections much more readily than older children and adults. Some doctors, including myself, prefer not to anger or frighten, with an ear examination, the older baby or very young child who is too young to co-operate, when he has been well since the last examination.

The testing of hearing is usually not attempted routinely in the early years because it is very uncertain unless done by an expert. But if there is any doubt, or if a child has had serious ear infections or is slow in developing clear speech, he should be tested by an expert. The child over four or five who is in for a semiannual general checkup may be tested with a watch tick or the whispered voice.

The mouth and throat are always examined to keep track of teeth and tonsils, and to detect mild infections such as thrush, which is fairly common in infancy and intereferes with nursing. When there is acute illnesses with fever, the throat is, of course, the place where the seat of the infection is most often found. On the first examination after birth the roof of the mouth is inspected for cleft palate.

In the early months it is noted whether the head is held straight on the neck and can be rotated freely to both sides. In acute illness the doctor flexes the neck to rule out meningeal irritation. The lymph glands in the neck, armpits, groin are felt briefly. The commonest

What every baby dreams of—

going "bye-bye"!

Planes, trains, Daddy's car . . .
Grandma's house, the beach—
babies thrive on new sights,
new sounds, ask nothing
but to be comfortable.

Mommy, make going "bye-bye" easier with

Chux Disposable Diapers

The take-away, throw-away diaper—
complete in itself...no panty needed!

Water-proof back . . . soft, comfortable facing.
Quilted for absorbency, medicated
against diaper rash.
No wonder more mothers buy Chux
than any other disposable!

Made by a Johnson & Johnson Company

At baby departments and drug stores

Copyright C. M. Inc. '60

conditions in which they are enlarged are throat, tonsil, skin infections. Occasionally they point to more serious diseases.

The lungs are often percussed (tapped) and listened to, briefly, but when a child is healthy this is mainly a doctor's habit. He would be quite surprised if he heard anything unusual. It's a very different matter when there is a serious cough, which raises questions of bronchitis, pneumonia, asthma; then the lungs are examined painstakingly in all parts.

The heart also may be percussed and listened to briefly. There is little chance that it could have become diseased from one visit to another unless the child has had at least mild symptoms of ill health, such as pallor and fatigability. A good percentage of children have a mild "accidental" heart murmur in the early years, which is of no health significance and which will fade away as they grow older. But the physician wants to keep track of these in his records, in case a question about the heart comes up later.

Blood pressure is taken infrequently in early childhood unless there are symptoms pointing to one of the rare conditions that elevate it. It is difficult to determine blood pressure without co-operation, and the effort bothers young children.

There are several aspects of the abdomen that are routinely checked in infancy. Is there more than the usual amount of gas? How far along toward closing is the umbilical ring? (This is of more importance to the mother than to the doctor.) What's the size of the liver? Is the spleen large enough to be felt below the ribs? Are there any unusual masses?

During the rest of childhood the abdomen is felt briefly, but there is rarely anything to be found except when there are symptoms of local disease such as appendicitis.

In infancy the genitals are examined to see that they are correctly formed—that the boy's testicles are descended and the urinary opening is in the right place. There is no need to go on checking these particular facts—unless, of course, there are symptoms such as burning, discharge, difficulty in urinating.

The baby's arms and legs are observed to see that he uses them freely and that there is good muscle tone. The doctor is on the sharp lookout for signs of orthopedic defects such as dislocation of the hip and any tendency to clubfoot, because early treatment of these is important. In the second year the child is watched for bowlegs, knock-knees, weak ankles, excessive toeing out or in. In later childhood almost any trouble with the legs will be announced by symptoms which the child or parent will report.

The doctor will test a few reflexes during infancy such as the knee jerks, the ankle jerks, the Babinski (the way the toes respond when the sole of the foot is scratched). There is considerable variation in these among healthy babies who are developing normally, so these observations are little more than a formality. The reflexes are more important, and are tested more intensively when there is any question about neurological (brain or nerve) disease. A complete neurological examination could easily take a half hour or more.

Men do not stumble over mountains, but over molehills.

CONFUCIUS

I think I have said enough to give you a rough idea that there is no one definite performance which constitutes "a good physical examination." Its focus varies at successive age periods. The first examination by a new doctor, whether in infancy or later in childhood, has more ground to cover than subsequent routine re-examinations. Any one part of the examination becomes much more intensive when there are symptoms of acute or chronic trouble in that part of the body. In a sense, in most visits, the examination is mainly a check on the history.

To be sure, the examination is also intended to assure the patient and the physician that all the major areas of the body have been surveyed, in case there is trouble brewing which has given no signal yet. To a degree this works out. But the degree is very limited. If a doctor were to attempt the ultimate in ruling out any possibility of lurking disturbance at each visit, he would have to take a two-hour history, do a one-hour physical examination, and order several hundred dollars' worth of laboratory tests. If the patient and he could afford this they would still have to make other appointments to go over the findings and then discuss the matters which were actually bothering the patient or parent.

A beginning medical student takes over an hour to perform and write up a routine physical examination on a healthy baby. First he has to stop and think what he is going to do next. Let's say it's the lungs. He recalls the correct order of observations: inspection of the extent, rate and symmetry of chest expansion; palpation for vocal fremitus (the buzz that is felt by the hand when the patient makes sounds); percussion for resonance; auscultation (with the stethoscope) for the character of the breath sounds and voice sounds, and also for the clicks or wheezes which would denote bronchitis. He then repeats each procedure on every area of the lungs, very deliberately, focusing intently. The baby's vigorous movements frequently interrupt his progress. The insignificant little noises that babies are always making—coos, snorts, gurgles, burps—sound like a violent thunderstorm through the stethoscope, and raise all kinds of questions in the student's mind. If the baby gets crying, the uproar seems to blot out the sound of the percussion notes, and everything else that might be heard through the stethoscope. He has to pause after each step of the examination to write it down before he forgets.

The experienced physician taps several selected areas, which assures him that the lungs are clear (just as the history suggested) and that the heart is not enlarged. If the baby's screams obliterate the sound, he gets the same message of hollowness through the finger of his left hand which is being tapped. He shifts the stethoscope bell unhesitantly ove the same spots and instantly recognizes the ar- acteristic sounds of healthy lungs every re, He isn't bothered by—in fact, hardly not s— the much louder sounds of saliva and sn ing coming down from nose and throat. Whi le' listening he automatically observes the or- mality of the rate and depth and ea of breathing. The examination of this sma nal of lungs has probably taken less than a m ute.

The essentials of a monthly examinat of a baby who is prospering in all respects uld probably be done within five minutes in ost cases if the doctors didn't stop to tal und demonstrate to the mother. The before-s oo examination of an older child, which in de testing of blood pressure, vision and he ng would take longer. The examination of a ild who was sick with an obvious or pl ure disease would take longer still.

So the competency of a physician, a hi value to a family, has only a small rel on ship to the elaborateness or duration his average physical examination. It de ds, rather, on a balance of skills: attentivene nd understandingness in hearing the vario as- pects of the history, relating the sympto m his own mind to probable and possibl lis- orders (psychological as well as phy al, paying particular attention to those a ct of the physical examination that wou ds most apt to throw light on the diagnosi ut without ignoring other parts of the body ng ing enough time to discuss conclusions

Since the use of the time of any m ca visit involves judicious compromises nd since I believe that mothers are confi ce with psychological and developmental es- tions in their children a hundred times on often than with unsuspected physical d se I'll express my personal opinion that periodic office visit of a child who ap an physically healthy the examination shou be as brief as is sensible, to allow attention be given to the real concerns of the parent

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to re letters personally. However, he is delighted to gi suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—E

Active, eager, captivating...that's The Protein Age

Baby eats like an eager beaver when they're Swift's Meats!

...time to trust Swift...the meat specialist!

That "busy little beaver" at your house, Mom, has a 24-hour-a-day job. All around the clock, your baby's busy growing! Development in the first 12 months is so rapid, it demands a plentiful supply of the complete, high-quality protein meat provides. That's why we call baby's first year The Protein Age. It's the time to trust Swift, the meat specialist, for the very best in this vital growth food. We make 6 hearty High Meat Dinners—all carefully formulated for maximum nutrition and enjoyment. Also 9 lean, delicious 100% Meats.

Swift's Premium

The two most trus words in meat. Our 105th year

WHAT IS LOVE?

If we are to make a mature adjustment to life, we must be able to give and receive love. By ANNA TREGO HUNTER

God intended life to grow as surely as He planted the seed of life upon this earth. To grow is our work—and hard work it is, as our restless frustrations show us almost daily. It seems to be an inexorable law of God that the real things we want most—pride and purpose and a sense of well-being—are reached only by pushing ardently on the outer limits of our capacities.

Is it really God who exacts this work of us? How do we know? In the last analysis, we know because we feel it is so; strength of feeling is the beginning and end of belief. But like all good things, this feeling is one that needs work to discover.

Life unfolds itself in a bewildering variety of impressions, but all of us are apt to have a pretty good idea within ourselves whether, for us, it is unfolding well or badly. It is unfolding well if we feel love every day of our lives; it is unfolding badly if we do not.

The hard part is to pin down that word "love." Christ spoke of it two thousand years ago; psychologists today are still reaffirming its power on every hand. We know assuredly now the remarkable fact that the infant requires it biologically, that he can scarcely grow straight without it. We know that we must be able to give and receive it if we are to make a "mature adjustment" to the world. We know that the destructive criminal is the unloving man, walking the bitter halls of loneliness. What is this magic thing, so vital to us all, which no amount of talking about can tarnish?

Love is separated from the experience of personal growth, it becomes the give and take of a dead fish in the hands. Love has its immense social implications, of course, just as every individual bit of life does. But we do not love merely because we want others to love us in return. If we fix our eye too hard on the social returns of loving, we are apt to go down pathetically wrong roads in search of it. People laugh at the politician, the social climber, the clown.

The man in search of constant public approval remains forever unsatisfied. Happiness is a stubbornly private phenomenon, not a public one. A man grows happy during the slow, delightful, intimate process of growing to love someone. He grows happy when he is struck with a sudden insight that is new to him. He grows happy at the moment that he catches himself—not when others catch him—doing something well that he was not sure he could do. He can be alone in a room with all the doors shut and be flooded with happiness.

These are the moments when we are stretching our sympathies, our perceptions, our abilities to new thresholds—the moments when we are growing. They are moments of creative adventure, requiring exertion on our part. But they come to us with the power and sweetness of love. And the whole import of this love, the message that it sings in our ears, is that we are progressing according to a plan greater than ourselves. We are feeling right, being right, doing right, by some unassailable and absolute standard of rightness. Our happiness is like a cry of recognition. Can anyone truly think that man invented love?

The rewards of love are great. Part of the miracle is that love enhances our relations with others in an infinite number of ways; it is the source of all our social order. Part of the miracle is the security and refreshment we gain from seeing meaning in life—a meaning to which we can contribute. And part of the miracle, ultimately, is our reverence for the fact that life should be endowed with love at all, for the Will beyond our will that decreed it so.

END

Great Idea! Do it with

ARM & HAMMER SODA

(BAKING SODA)

BICARBONATE

MEETS ALL REQUIREMENTS OF U.S. PHARMACOPOEIA

AS A HEALTH-AID . . . TRY THIS FRESH-UP SODA BATH—You feel you are enjoying a luxurious alkaline bath at a health spa . . . yet all you do is dissolve one cup of Arm & Hammer soda bicarbonate (commonly called baking soda) in a tub of warm water . . . lie back and relax. Soda baths are so soothing doctors recommend them to relieve itching skin, sunburn and other skin irritations. Keep Arm & Hammer soda in your bathroom.

SOOTHE BABY'S PRICKLY HEAT—Add 2 tablespoons of Arm & Hammer soda to baby's bath for gentle, soothing skin comfort. Soda baths are recommended by doctors to help relieve diaper rash.

RELIEVE BITES, HIVES, POISON IVY—Take a soda bath, then apply a paste of soda and water to badly affected areas. Cover with wet cloths. Remember to buy Arm & Hammer soda at food stores.

FREE:

How to Live Better and Save Money

Illustrated booklet describes accepted ways to use soda bicarbonate for good health, baking, cleansing. Mail coupon now.

Church & Dwight Co., Inc., Dept. LH-8
P. O. Box 2266, Grand Central Station,
New York 17, N. Y.

Please send free booklet "How to Live Better and Save Money."

PRINT YOUR NAME .....

STREET .....

CITY ZONE STATE .....

THE WEDDING

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 66

teakettle screeched, and with unseeing eyes she moved toward the sound and turned off the gas.

"What did you buy, darling?" crooned mamma, gripping the edge of the tablecloth so that the tears bursting her warm heart would not come.

Ruth stared at the girl with odd pale hair reflected in the shiny teakettle. (Oh, mamma, it's good I didn't buy the stupid nightgown with those stupid violet ribbons!) Then she turned to say, working carefully around her mother's pain, "Let's first have the tea and then we'll clear away the table and you and Aunt Minna can open the packages."

It was one of those March mornings when a perceptive sun shone on icy streets. Ruth opened the rough-textured draperies, the color of white sand, and adjusted the blinds in the lovely warm-colored room that was Nathan Grant's private office. She straightened his desk, brought in his mail, watered the plants in front of the long wide window, did the hundred little things she had done each morning for the past eleven years. Then she did one thing she had never done. She sat down in her customary place where she took her dictation and stared hard at the empty chair behind the desk. Why couldn't she see him? She tried harder—closing her eyes ——

The door opened silently. "Good morning, Ruth." Nathan Grant stood before her, smiling awkwardly, unused to the task.

"Good morning, Nathan." The name clung timorously to her tongue and had to be peeled off. He was removing his finely tailored black coat and placing it, along with his hat, scarf and gloves, in the wood-paneled closet cleverly concealed in the wall.

Ruth Harris had come to work for Nathan Grant as a young woman of twenty-three. She had been the first secretary he was able to afford. He had served in the war for four years and returned to his native New York to resume his studies under the G.I. Bill of Rights, attending school at night and studying for his degree as he ladled out clam chowder in a cafeteria on Seventh Avenue. As a result, he was thirty-two when he began the practice of law, a quiet, shy man with an enormous capacity for work. Never having taken time out just for being young had made him uncommunicative and humorless.

Together they had worked while Ruth cherished the dream that soon . . . soon . . . a young, laughing stranger with twinkling eyes —— Mr. Grant hired a lawyer to help him, and Ruth had her own stenographer. Two years ago they moved into these larger offices, acquired a law clerk, and a disdainful platinum blonde who ushered in clients in a hush lush voice to match the office.

The office was their home, hers and Nathan Grant's. Here they worked. Here they lived their lives. Here one night Nathan Grant found her crying on her typewriter celebrating her thirty-fourth birthday—and they clung like frightened children to each other for comfort, and warmth, and things without names.

Now she was marrying him. This quiet big man with short-cropped gray-speckled crisp hair and eyes that slumbered under black brows and rarely surprised you by their brilliant lightness. This man she had worked with for eleven years, and never saw. Whose soft voice had spoken words for eight hours a day for eleven years and was never heard. A man who rarely smiled and never laughed, who wasn't gay, wasn't shining—whose eyes would never flash or twinkle.

She watched him from where she sat, quiet hands folded, belying an unfolding uneasiness. She noticed for the first time how neat he was, how pleasant the odor of tobacco and after-shave lotion. He moved lightly and quickly for a large man and soon he had seated himself before the wide window, tilted his massive chair, folded his arms behind his head in a curiously young gesture, tried another smile at her, and sighed—"So-o-o"—as if facing a most pleasant duty.

"You look very nice today, Ruth, with your lemon blouse and your lemon hair."

Surprised, she hesitated a moment. "Thank you, Nathan." Shyly, then, and in spite of herself, a little smile formed, for she was secretly vain of her silken hair. Then the unfolding uneasiness spread wide within her. Drawing a shaky breath, she began: "Mr. Peterson was yelling like crazy this morning. He doesn't want any more adjournments."

"He doesn't, eh? And did you tell him the reason?" Something stirred, flickered, under the heavy brows.

She reddened suddenly. "I—I . . . well, if you must know, I didn't. I was embarrassed. I mean . . . he's been in and out of this office for years—oh, I don't know—anyway, I want to talk to you about that, if you're not too busy this morning."

Unfolding his arms, he pushed aside the mail in a queerly flamboyant gesture of freedom. "Busy! Busy! I've been busy all my life! Now I'd like to talk to you."

The lost years had come at last to Nathan Grant.

She moved restlessly to the edge of the chair. She hardly understood him lately. These peculiar outbursts startled her. She clasped her hands together primly high on her chest, unconsciously assuming a prayerful attitude; and when she realized this, she dropped her hands quickly to her lap.

"It's not only Peterson," she began hesitantly, feeling her way carefully through a fruit stall of words, discarding this one, retaining that. "There's Simpkins versus Simpkins . . . and the Atlantic Seafare Union contract coming up . . . oh, so much that really can't wait. I was thinking—we really shouldn't stay away too long. I mean, a three-day weekend, starting on a Friday—and we can both be back at the office on Monday." (Why, hardly anybody would know we were gone at all, she thought, hope rising like a fountain.)

The odd bright eyes were wakeful now and piercing. They watched her steadily and she was caught in their brilliance. She raised her eyes to the view behind him of their neighbor skyscraper and pushed on . . . now . . . now.

"Also, about the wedding ——"

He sat too quietly. Lowering her eyes, she caught the unblinking gaze full upon her and hastily looked across to the skyscraper again.

"I—I . . . don't want a—a—gown . . . and the hullabaloo of a big wedding. Besides, it will be an awful financial strain on everyone on my side of the family . . . two weddings within two months—my Cousin Rebecca and me." Strange her voice should strangle her. It was such a simple matter she was speaking of. "What do you think, Nathan?" Without waiting, she hurried on, eager to say it all and have it done with. "I think it would be much more sensible for us to be married without fuss and take my parents to a nice restaurant ——"

There was a great deal of heartiness in her summation. She felt clammy, thick-tongued, almost sick. The large and lovely room was silent except for the little sounds that take over when the human clatter disappears. His desk clock ticked quickly and the young morning winds rattled the windows as they blew up and down the city streets.

"Much more sensible," Nathan Grant said quietly. The brilliant eyes clung. "After all, you're not as pretty, nor as young, as your Cousin Rebecca."

"Nathan!" Her fists clutched the sides of her white face. She could feel pain in her flesh where her teeth cut in. Dazed, she stood up, and put her hands out in a weak futile gesture of warding off the black steel pellets coming at her, encased in a soft velvet voice.

"Well, that's it, isn't it? You had your chances, ten, twelve years ago, and you were passed by. What right have you now, a woman of thirty-four, to demand your white wedding gown, your veil, your music and your flowers?" The pellets followed as she fled across the endless ocean of gold carpeting. "Haven't you the courage to want them any more?"

She stopped and looked down at her hand trembling on the doorknob. Her head mutely twisting side to side. And weary and sad as a sigh, she answered him: "No, I haven't." Then she went home.

The next morning, on her way to the office, she saw the smart dark suit in the store window. Yes. Oh, yes. That was just what she had in mind. The evening before she had told her parents there would be no wedding. That she and Nathan would probably take just a weekend off for a honeymoon, they were that busy down at the office these days. She gazed long at the suit in the window, seeing herself in it. White gloves. Small white hat. A tiny corsage of violets. Why violets? She'd never had violets before. Strange.

Oh, yes, she thought, walking briskly down the windy streets of lower Broadway, holding her hat and her skirts, this was so much the wiser way. Each thing in its proper place. She turned into the narrow street opposite Trinity Church.

Trudy, her young assistant, hurried [to] her as she entered the office. "Miss [Ha]
Mr. Grant wants to see you right aw[ay]

She wondered what Trudy though[t] they all thought—of the two old maids [to] married. She passed through the lovely [re] soft with thick carpeting and indirect [li]
It always gave her such a nice feeli[ng]
Grant had given her a free hand wh[en] moved here and she remembered how [he] silently stood in the middle of the re[st] room with its wood paneling the c[olor] honey, its pale beige furniture, its gold [ac]
ing, and what he had said:

"My dreams are all alive, Ruth."

She never thought how many tim[es] pleased him. Soon she would have [a] house to do herself. A whole house! [No]
Why would the two of them need a h[ouse] rattle around in? A nice apartment, [or] Hills, perhaps. Not too far from the o[ld]

She opened the door to his office. [He] waiting, standing at his desk.

"Sit down, Ruth."

She was startled. His voice, alway[s] was loud and vibrant. She sat down as [if] that voice had physically thrust her [in] Slowly he walked around his desk and [he] took both her hands in his large stron[g]
She was disturbed and frightened. Th[is] she had known so long had suddenly [be] acquiring vitality and sound. It was as [if] a rough pencil sketch of a man were [be] given color and depth, and sounds and [mo] tions added.

He took one of his hands away fro[m] and lifted her chin to look at her. [He] Ashamed, she averted her eyes.

"You are a fine person," he started, [in]
"A good, kind, sensible girl. I respect [so] things in you." Dropping her hand, he [st] away from her, over to the big windo[w] shivered. Suddenly she was cold. Co[ld] tired. "I have something that must be s[aid]

The big clock at Trinity Church boo[med] hour. It hurt her head. Nathan Grant [looked] off into the bright, broken skies.

"I've worked hard all my life. I neve[r] had time to make friends. Now, sudd[enly] feel cheated. Now, suddenly, I want [all] He turned to look at her, so small and h[ard] like a tired fighter, able now only to w[ait] the blows. Softly, he went on: "We're [all] ent, after all, you see. You're ashamed [of] happiness before us." It was true. It w[as]
And the tears gathered. "I look forwar[d] eagerly, hungrily. They will be my h[ome] years. I have a good and fine woman t[o] with me what I, Nathan Grant, alone [can] never have. A home of my own, a wo[man] care for, children, friends we'll ma[ke] gether—everything that makes life wo[rth] thing."

Then the tears came. The wonderfu[l] tears of release. Alarmed, he took a fe[w] toward her, but she nodded furious[ly] helplessly he backed away. Then she r[an] came to him and through all the [sob] beautiful smile came shining through [and] derly he wiped her wet face with hi[s] white handkerchief, and gently said:

"I had nothing until I found you cr[ying] your typewriter that night. Nothing. [I] want it all. All that's mine. All I thou[ght] never have. Do you now understand? [I] the big hullabaloo wedding. I want the [ush] maids, the little girl who throws the flo[wers]
She looked into his dear face, and his b[lack] eyes glittered as he said, "I want my b[ride] walk down the aisle all in white and [be] me. I want it all. It's mine. It always be[long] to me!"

And oh, what a wedding that was! [The] choir, that food, the decorations—ju[st]
Hollywood!—not one, but two orc[hestras] that played until the stars disappeared [in] morning skies . . . and punch that flowe[d] marble fountains, and statues of ices . [. .]
flowers! Whoever saw so many flow[ers]?
regular Botanical Gardens! And eve[ry] had such a glorious time that nobody [knew] when the miracle happened.

For as Ruth Harris walked, very t[all] very proud, down the candlelit path to [her] Grant's side, to dwell there forever til [the] did them part, she looked into his tw[in] eyes . . . and they fell in love.

THE 2nd BEST* THING
YOU CAN DO
FOR YOUR TEETH

*FIRST visit your dentist regularly

Second, use the best toothbrush you can buy. Ask your dentist about ORAL B. Let him explain how it protects gums as well as teeth. ORAL B has three times as many smooth-top, flexible fibers—to massage gums gently, clean teeth well.

This double action of ORAL B is the best mouth care you can have between dental check-ups. Try ORAL B today. See how pleasant it feels!

ORAL B—The toothbrush selected for exclusive distribution at the 1960 OLYMPIC WINTER GAMES.

ORAL B COMPANY
San Jose, California
Toronto, Canada

OU CAN'T GET HEAD TODAY NLESS YOU READ

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 41

nistrators do not feel justified in providg classroom and dormitory space to lagr. There are too many young men and n knocking at the door—students who e ger to make full use of this educational rtunity.

S the problem does not end with gaining r tance to a college or university. To keep e grades at a high enough level to stay in l e and to qualify for a degree requires a g order of scholastic ability.

W at has this to do with reading?

A well-established fact is that students who ss verbal facility tend to score the highest llege-entrance examinations. And verbal ty is gained almost entirely through ex- e reading.

Clege students today complain loudly c the great amount of supplementary g assigned them by their professors. The s eaders cover the ground easily; the slow e just don't have the necessary time. The st eaders quite obviously get higher marks

Some children have difficulty in rning to read effectively—difficulty ich cannot be resolved simply by couragement. The estimated per- ntage of these children varies from per cent to 15 per cent—depending the interpretation of the term eading problem."

Poor instruction, emotional block- g, limited background, slowness of tellectual responses, physical ill- ss cause reading difficulties. Other- se bright, healthy and well-adjusted ildren may fail to learn to read, ough the family living room is wded with fine books, because of a mily history of mixed left- and right- ndedness or ambidexterity. In such ildren the language areas of the ain are slow to mature, so that they e not ready to read at six or seven ars. These children need special lp and training from teachers or erapists.

Parents concerned about progress in ading and writing will do well to nsult a language-disorders clinic for agnostic testing, and to follow its commendations in obtaining further lp.

THE EDITORS

ese assignments. The slow readers stand g d chance of being flunked out.

Iportant to many parents who haven't the ncial resources to provide a college educa- n for their children is the opportunity to r cholarships. The cost of a college educa- n anges generally between $6000 and $10,- 00 And if present trends continue, the cost a well be 50 per cent higher than this ten a from now.

The Government has instituted a lending r am, and most colleges make some provi- n or helping needy students through loans. v with this help, many also require scholar- u And scholarships, with rare exceptions, a to be placed on a strictly competitive as Sdents who pass scholastic-achievement st with the highest scores have a great ad- r ge. Invariably the students who win h rships are the ones who have read most t ir younger days.

Many of the best professional colleges, h er they be law, medicine or engineer- g ow require students to have had two or o years of liberal-arts courses as a prereq- si for admittance. Some, indeed, are in- u g courses in the humanities in their pro- s nal curricula. Verbal skills are essential t student wishes to pass these courses.

Why is so much emphasis placed on verbal c y? One reason is that words are the tools of thought. Abstract thinking is carried on by word concepts. The more extensive, the more precise one's vocabulary, the more exact one's thinking.

Undoubtedly this explains why there is such a high correlation between the results of a vocabulary and intelligence or "I.Q." test. Often a simple vocabulary test can be substituted for an intelligence test when circumstances make it impossible to administer a long test.

A simple vocabulary test can also reveal to a surprising extent one's educational attainment. This statement, of course, applies to the typical person, and not to that rare individual who without benefit of college education has managed to do a great deal of reading and who has, consequently, given himself the equivalent of a college education.

To see for yourself the high degree of relationship between educational attainment and vocabulary, try out the list of words given below.

These words have been carefully selected from general-magazine articles and from newspaper editorials. They are all useful words; not one can be properly described as a "trick" word.

Go over the list carefully and check the words that you think you know. Then look up the doubtful ones in the dictionary to be sure you are right before you credit yourself.

Here is the list:

elite	plebeian	enervate
obese	inane	laconic
ostracize	sagacious	nepotism
nostalgia	plebiscite	soporific
omnipotent	surfeit	recondite
avocation	banal	panegyric

If you are a high-school graduate you should know the correct meaning of two of these words. If you attended college, but left before graduation, you should be able to define five of these words. And if you are a college

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS.
LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 380 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Business & Secretarial

SHORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS

Famous SPEEDWRITING shorthand. 120 words per minute. No symbols; no machines; uses ABC's. Learn at home or through classroom instruction. Lowest cost. For business and Civil Service. Over 500,000 graduates. Typing available. 37th year. Write for FREE booklet. © 1959

Speedwriting
Dept. 9908, 55 W. 42 St., New York 36 ®

Katharine Gibbs Secretarial. Outstanding training. Three practical courses: One-Year Secretarial, Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years), Special Course for College Women. Residences. Personal placement service. For catalog write: Admissions Dean, Boston 16, 21 Marlborough St.; New York 17, 230 Park Ave.; Montclair, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.; Providence 6, 155 Angell St.

Spencerian College Coeducational. Est. 1863. Small classes. Work-study plan. College life; social, athletic activities. In residential area. Earn B.B.A. degree in 2 yrs., 8 mos. in Accounting, General Business, Sales Management. A.A. in executive, medical, legal, secretarial; court reporting. G.I. approved. Catalog. Registrar J, Milwaukee 10, Wisconsin

Medical Technology

College of Medical Technology
Medical Technician Training. Also X-Ray. Graduates in demand, excellent pay. Free nation-wide placement. Nationally approved school. Dorms. Athletics. Coed. Courses 3 to 15 months. Write for Catalog giving year of high school graduation. 1900-L La Salle Avenue, Minneapolis 3, Minn.

Home Study Schools

ARE YOU A BORE?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of everyday conversation which can pay you real dividends in both social and business advancement and works like magic to give you added poise, self confidence and greater popularity.

According to this publisher, many people do not realize how much they could influence others simply by what they say and how they say it. Whether in business, at social functions, or even in casual conversations with new acquaintances, there are ways in which you can make a good impression every time you talk.

To acquaint the readers of this book with the easy-to-follow rules for developing skill in everyday conversation, the publishers have printed full details of their interesting self-training method in a 24-page booklet, "Adventures in Conversation," which will be mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Simply send your request to: Conversation Studies, 835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 137C, Chicago 14, Ill. A postcard will do.

Dramatic Arts

Goodman Memorial Theatre School of Drama Acting, Directing, Scene and Costume Design. Acting Company. Two Theatres, 200 Performances Annually. B.F.A. and M.F.A. Degrees. Write Dept. L, Goodman Memorial Theatre, The Art Institute of Chicago 3.

Fine & Applied Arts

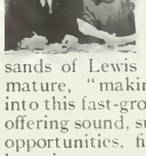
Ray-Vogue Schools
Commercial Art, Photography, Interior Decoration, Dress Design, Fashion Merchandising with Modeling, Fashion Illustration. Coed. Attractive residence for out of town girls. Enter Sept. 7. Write Registrar, Rm. 706. Specify course. Ray-Vogue Schools, 750 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

Home Study Schools

National School of Dress Design
Approved supervised home study training. Fine starting point for career. No classes. No wasted time. Text and work kit furnished. Diploma awarded. Low tuition and payments. Send for free booklet.
835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 137C, Chicago 14, Ill.

High School Course at Home Many Finish in 2 Years
Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Course equivalent to resident school work — prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H. S. texts supplied. Diploma. Credit for H. S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. High school education is very important for advancement in business and industry and socially. Don't be handicapped all your life. Be a High School graduate. Start your training now. Free Bulletin on request. No obligation.
American School, Dept. HC3, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

Chicago School of Interior Decoration
Home study training. Approved and supervised. Fine starting point for career. No classes. No wasted time. Text and work kit furnished. Diploma awarded. Send for free booklet.
Chicago School of Interior Decoration, 835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept. 137C, Chicago 14



PROFITABLE Millinery LEARN AT HOME
NOW—A Creative Way to Earn Extra Money—Fast!

You make beautiful Designer Hats new each fashion season while training—yours to sell or wear. Easy professional course includes: luxurious materials, trimmings, hat shapes, special design lessons FREE. Illustrated Book "The Art of Custom Millinery" shows how you can quickly earn extra money at home selling lesson hats. Write today—no obligation
ACADEMY OF MILLINERY DESIGN
Dept. MH-61, 150 Park Avenue, East Rutherford, New Jersey

Hotel Training

Hotels Call for Trained Women

You can qualify at home or through resident classes in Washington for a well-paid position in the hotel, motel and hospitality field. Thousands of Lewis graduates, both young and mature, "making good" everywhere. Get into this fast-growing field offering sound, substantial opportunities, fine living, luxurious surroundings. Previous experience proved unnecessary. Registration in Lewis Nationwide Placement Service FREE. Send today for FREE Book.

BECOMES HOTEL HOSTESS

"I am now Hostess-Assistant Director of a Resident Hotel, thanks to Lewis."—Helen V. Roberts.

NOW APARTMENT HOUSE MANAGER

"Thanks to Lewis, I am Manager of a 55 unit, modern apartment building."—Kathryn Whelan.

Accredited by NHSC.
44th SUCCESSFUL YEAR Course Approved for All Veteran Training
LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL
Room FM-546 Washington 7, D.C.

Boys' Schools

New York Military Academy
Develops today's Youth for tomorrow's world by building mind, body, character, leadership. R.O.T.C. Graduates all colleges. Infantry, Aeronautics, Artillery, Band scholarships. Grades 5–12 and P.G. Catalog. Est. 1889.
67 Academy Ave., Cornwall-on-Hudson, N.Y

Manlius
Founded 1869. For boys. Accredited. Grades 7–12. Complete college preparation. ROTC. Highest U.S. Army rating for over 55 Years. 126-acre campus. Developmental reading. Individual attention. Sports. Band. Summer session. Catalog.
Robert A. Weekes, The Manlius School, Manlius, N.Y.

Admiral Farragut Academy
Fully accredited college preparatory. Toms River, New Jersey; St. Petersburg, Florida. Naval training. Separate Junior Schools. Testing, guidance for college and career. Sports, boats; bands. Summer camp and school. Catalog.
Adm. Farragut Academy, Box AB, Toms River, New Jersey

Augusta Military Academy
"The Friendly School." Distinguished ROTC school in Shenandoah Valley. Jr. & Sr. Divisions. Boys 8–20. Accredited; graduates in leading colleges. All sports—pool, gym. 1400 acres. Family owned since 1742. Rate $1275. Catalog. Gen. Charles S. Roller, Box J, Ft. Defiance, Va.

Miami Military Academy NDCC Honor School. Develops leadership and character. Fully accredited. College preparatory. Grades 5–12. Small classes. Boys learn to study. Sports, sailing; pool. 30 acres on Biscayne Bay. Moderate fee. 35th year. Also Summer School and Camp. Catalog.
Col. F. R. Williams, 10603 Biscayne Blvd., Miami 38H, Fla.

Fork Union Military Academy
Our One Subject Plan in Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration. Accredited. ROTC highest rating. Modern bldgs. 2 gyms, 2 indoor pools. Separate Jr. School, grades 5–8. 62nd year. Catalog.
Dr. J. C. Wicker, Box 868, Fork Union, Va.

Missouri Military Academy And Separate Junior School. 71st yr. Grades 5–12. Fully accredited. Sr. ROTC. Friendly, inspiring teachers. Essentially college prep. Small classes. Strong guidance program. All sports. 30 acre lake. 5 athletic fields. 226-acre campus. Catalog
Col. C.R. Stribling, 180 Main St., Mexico, Mo.

St. John's Military Academy Where boys become self-confident men. Accredited college preparation under the famous St. John's System. Grades 7–12. Inspired teaching. Small classes, individual attention. Reading Clinic. ROTC. Fireproof dorms. All sports. Summer Camp. 76th year. Catalog. Dir. of Admissions, Box 380, Delafield, Wis.

Wentworth Military Academy
Thousands of business and professional leaders started here. 4-yr. High School: separate 2-yr. College. Accred. Sr. ROTC. CAA flying. Modern bldgs., country club. Sports for all; pool. Summer school; also younger boys' camp, 81st yr. Catalog.
Col. J. M. Sellers, 1880 Washington Place, Lexington, Mo.

Coeducational School

Judson School In Arizona. A coed ranch school. Grades 1 to 12. College Preparatory. Accredited. Beautiful location in Paradise Valley near Phoenix. Healthful, warm climate. Small classes. Riding included in tuition. Tennis, swimming, pack trips, fishing, rodeos, riflery, roping, music. 32nd year. Catalog.
David J. Wick, Headmaster, Scottsdale, Arizona

ARE you looking for the right school? Each one of the listings on this page is packed with important, interesting information to help you select the right school or camp. Read the advertisements carefully, then write for complete information and catalogs from those that interest you.

"How I use
Murine
to soothe my eyes and so relax tension"

TED ATKINSON
Hall of Fame Jockey, now with the New York Racing Association

"Anyone who's familiar with horse racing knows what dust and wind can do to the eyes. That's why I use Murine regularly to cleanse and comfort my eyes. When my eyes feel better, I seem to feel better all over." Keep Murine handy—at home, office, in the car—to soothe your eyes and so relax tension whenever you feel the need.

Murine is also available in the familiar glass bottle with separate eye dropper.

MURINE
for your eyes*

THE MURINE CO., INC., CHICAGO, U.S.A.
*TRADEMARKS REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

graduate, you should know eight of these words to equal the college average.

When this test was given to a national sample of high-school graduates it was found that one in every three could not define a single word correctly! And indicative of the lessened attention given to reading today, the most recent graduates tested had the lowest scores of all. On the average they knew only one word in the list, and fully half of those tested were unable to define correctly a single word!

Many parents are concerned about the lack of interest in reading displayed by their children. But they have found no easy way to induce these youngsters to read more. Only thirty years ago reading was one of the chief sources of entertainment—but that was before radio and television became so widely available.

Part of the blame for today's situation must be placed on parents. In far too many homes there is a tendency for the parents to urge young Johnny or Mary to "Run off to your room and read a good book" while papa and mamma sit glued to the TV set looking at an exciting Western or mystery.

If mothers and fathers have little time to give to reading—whether it be newspapers, magazines or books—they can be absolutely certain that their example will have a powerful impact on their children.

There is mounting evidence of a decline in reading interest in America, especially on the part of high-school and college graduates. In fact, some studies have brought to light the cases of college graduates who have not read a single book in at least a year. And in one survey it was found that more than half of those who were graduated from high school had not read a book during the previous twelve months.

It is a matter of national shame that new houses are being built without any provision for books. This lack of concern for a home library would have shocked earlier generations who prided themselves on the number and quality of books available in their own homes.

Each generation, of course, has its own special likes and dislikes. Books which were exciting to parents and to their parents can be frightfully dull to young people today—a fact which should be kept in mind in trying to induce the upcoming generation to spend more time reading

Too often the reading lists recommended by our public schools include books which are boring and unpalatable to present-day students. Requiring children to read these books is self-defeating. Often the result of forcing a child to read a book for which he is not properly prepared or psychologically attuned is to develop in him a distaste for all books.

Reading is a habit and parents should not be too much concerned as to whether critics or authorities have recommended a given book. The prime objective is to get young people to read, and obviously it is easier to get them to read what they like than to get them to read what they don't like. In the latter case it will be only a short time until they read nothing at all.

For this reason, I believe that teachers, parents and school librarians should co-operate in making up book lists, and these lists should be constantly revised. Books which students like, and books which they dislike, should be carefully identified. Equipped with this information, librarians can be reasonably certain that the book which they put into the hands of a student is one which he will enjoy, and having read it, he will be back next week for another book.

I would make it a regular order of business in parent-teachers meetings to discuss the success which those parents present are having with this problem of reading in their own homes. This exchange of ideas could be most valuable in discovering interesting books and the most effective measures for getting students to read them. And of equal importance is the regular reading of magazines and newspapers.

Many years ago I taught a course in freshman English at the University of Iowa. My students, I discovered, had read rather few books before they entered the university to start their college careers, a situation which is common throughout the country. The English Department at that time required these freshmen to read many books which were beyond their comprehension and appreciation. The result of this forced feeding was inevitable: literary indigestion. Most of these students, I am certain, came to think of "good" books as "dull" books, a fact which may account for the generally low interest in book reading displayed today by many of our college graduates.

I am certainly not opposed to "good" books. In fact, I am so desirous that such books be read in America that I do not want the interest in all books—both good and bad—killed by policies pursued for the right ends but by the wrong methods. The only certain way to get young people to spend more time reading is to make certain that the reading they do is both interesting and rewarding. The constant reader slowly but surely cultivates a taste for the "good" books.

A few years ago I enlisted the aid of teachers in some thirty high schools in various parts of the country in a study dealing with this problem. I suggested that they ask their students to list the most interesting and rewarding books they had ever read, and the age at which they had read each of these books. The results of this study were most revealing. Some books found on the recommended lists were mentioned, but most were books not on these standard lists. On the other hand, the books the students had liked best were not "cheap" or "trashy" books. They reflected the tastes and interests of a new generation brought up in entirely different circumstances from their elders, who had made up the lists.

Why all this fuss about reading? The answer has already been given. If students increase the amount of their reading of books, magazines, newspapers, then more of them will pass the college-board examinations, more will win scholarships, more will earn degrees.

Stated another way, persons who read more write better, speak better, think better. And it goes without saying that they know more. As a result of a knowledge of the past they can think better about the present and future.

Parents who despair of the quality of education their children are receiving can take new hope. It is in their province to do something about it. They need not reform the lo system, or move to a community wl better one. All they have to do is finc get their own children to read a g more. The deficiencies of almost a can be remedied by a carefully plan ing program.

If reading is all-important today dren, it is equally important for thei Reading is the one certain way to oneself. In a world which grows m plex, it is almost inconceivable that son who wishes to keep himself well on matters vital to himself and his and who wishes to improve his lot ca these goals without spending at least each day in reading.

Some years ago I seriously conside ing what I called the hour-for-hour c sons who joined this organization wc to spend one hour in serious reading for each hour they spent being ente still think the idea is a good one. And if this country wishes to keep ahead in the future, then it will have to much time as the Russians do in rea study. We are not so much smarter Russians that we can spend less t they do in these pursuits and still n keep ahead.

One of the great mistakes we in A often make is to think of educatio entirely in terms of formal or scho tion. This view is not held in most countries where school education is end at an early age but self-educa tinues for many years. We need alw member that learning is a process gins at birth and ends only with dea is no better way to spend some of o hours—which grow in number cor than to devote a regular part of the reading of newspapers, magazines ar

And this is not too much to ask. forget is that there is great excit learning, excitement which someti lost in our modern-day schools. We ways of bringing this excitement ba learning process. We must recapture of Erasmus, who said, "When I g money, I buy books; and if any is l food and clothes."

LADIES' HOME

THE MAGAZINE WOMEN BELIEVE IN

Journal

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

SEPTEMBER, 1960 35c

THE ROYAL HONEYMOON OF TONY AND - PRINCESS MARGARET

Operation Terror— New Serial

OUR PRACTICAL DREAM HOUSE-11 PAGES OF BEAUTIFUL AND USEFUL PICTURES

A Child Screams in The Night

FALL PATTERNS 6 MILLION TEEN AGERS WILL WEAR 4 PAGES IN COLOR

The Man Who Saves Marriages

SIMONETTA, NORELL FASHIONS AND FORECAST OF AMERICAN FASHION TRENDS 8 PAGES IN COLOR

My Life in a

Command Performance, about $4. Others, about $2, $3

Created to show with pride, to use with deep pleasure...

Cannon creates a new towel texture. Command Performance, the only towel with loops of precious combed pima cotton. Exquisitely soft, creamy-thick—you've never held a towel so beautiful. Shown in fairest white, superb in colors, too. This gentle beauty is from the new Cannon Royal Family of Towels, a collection that will delight you with its originality, fascinating designs, magnificent colors, hushed or vibrant. A joy to live with, to give. Royal Family all-cotton towels are enhanced by Cannon's Beauti-Fluff process.

The Cannon Royal Family of Towels

CANNON

CANNON MILLS, INC., 70 WORTH ST. NEW YORK 13, N. Y.

Even on a cool autumn day, nervous tension can trigger embarrassing perspiration.

ary Brown's mother succumbs to "nervous" perspiration

How "nervous" perspiration—the most offensive, and hardest to control—can be checked with an amazing new deodorant called Ban.®

ACCUSTOMED as she is to public speaking, Mrs. Brown stands up to deliver a short to the PTA—and suddenly finds herself with perspiration.

"Nervous" perspiration. It's a perfectly normal human reaction. It happens to everyone. It can be triggered by any little tension or anxiety—getting the kids off to school, meeting new people, making a train, even making a little speech to friendly neighbors.

The trouble is that "nervous" perspiration is the worst kind, because it is hardest to control, and because it creates the most offensive odor. Far more offensive than odor created by heat or physical exercise.

Which explains the sweeping success of a new deodorant called Ban. New Ban protects against even "nervous" perspiration because Ban contains 22% more protective ingredients than the average leading deodorant.

Ban's lotion formula is gentle to skin—yet one application of Ban stops odor all day. Even the odor of "nervous" perspiration.

No wonder, in a world where every day brings some kind of nervous tension, millions protect themselves every day against nervous perspiration—with Ban.

Wonderfully new!

Kotex is softness

Kotex napkins now give you protection in its softest form. These tapered napkins have a new, incredibly soft covering. Inside is the Kimlon center, a special center of safety that assures complete and lasting protection.

KOTEX and KIMLON are trademarks of Kimberly-Clark

Ladies' Home JOURNAL September, 1960

VOL. LXXVII NO. 9

Journalities

Mildred Gordon

Gordon Gordon

ed Gordon, speaking
he writing team of
RED and GORDON GOR-(Operation Terror, page 46):
ryone thinks husband-and-wife borators must have some bat-royal. We hate to disillusion de, but we don't. Neither of us s his words are sacred. Usually ke those episodes in which en predominate and Gordon the men. Every few days we ange pages and cut everything the other has written, so no-ever sees our best writing. We both graduated from the Unity of Arizona in Tucson and collaborated since our mar-shortly thereafter. Gordon did terespionage work with the FBI ng the war years, but I don't w how. He's as blind as a mole nd the house. He couldn't find lephant in a telephone booth.
be looking for spies isn't as ult as looking for cuff links.
ive in an ancient Spanish-style se in Sherman Oaks, Calif. We it 'Columbus Slept Here.'"

Lucile Vaughan Payne

'll find The Boy Up- s (page 52) a little rent from the boy
door, but times have changed.
LE VAUGHAN PAYNE says, "I've n writing stories for and about agers since 1946, but this is the one I've written for an adult azine. Six years ago we moved n Indiana to Oregon, where we ten wonderful acres, one horse, dog, one cat. My husband is a her and former newspaperman;
have two young daughters to crit-
e and inspire us in our old age."

CONDENSED NOVEL COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE

ECHO ANSWERS	Margaret Culkin Banning	18

STORIES

OPERATION TERROR (First part of three)	The Gordons	46
THE BOY UPSTAIRS	Lucile Vaughan Payne	52

SPECIAL FEATURES

THE "EDUCATORS" NEED RE-EDUCATION	Dorothy Thompson	11
ARE WE BRINGING UP OUR CHILDREN TOO SOFT FOR THE STERN REALITIES THEY MUST FACE?	Benjamin Spock, M.D.	20
IT'S SMART TO BE SMART	Pat Boone	26
TELL ME, DOCTOR	Goodrich C. Schauffler, M.D.	36
ON A ROYAL HONEYMOON	Laura Riley	50
MY LIFE IN A WHITE WORLD	Marian Anderson, as told to Emily Kimbrough	54
THE MAN WHO SAVES MARRIAGES	Betty Hannah Hoffman	70
CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?	Dorothy Cameron Disney	72
HOW AMERICA LIVES: Scream in the Night	Neal Gilkyson Stuart	162

GENERAL FEATURES

LETTERS OUR READERS WRITE US		4
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE	Harlan Miller	32
MAKING MARRIAGE WORK	Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D.	34
UNDER COVER	Bernardine Kielty	42
FIFTY YEARS AGO • JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN		45
ASK ANY WOMAN	Marcelene Cox	156
THIS IS A FOOLISH CLIMBER	Munro Leaf	178

FASHION AND BEAUTY

THE JOURNAL'S 5-STAR WARDROBE DESIGNED BY SIMONETTA OF ROME	Wilhela Cushman	56
AMERICA'S NOTED DESIGNER—NORMAN NORELL FALL COLLECTION	Wilhela Cushman	58
6 MILLION TEEN AGERS LOVE TO SEW	Nora O'Leary	60
GLAMOROUS HAIRDOS . . . SMOOTH AND FULL	Dawn Crowell Norman	64
HOW DOES SHE LOOK SO PRETTY?	Bet Hart	66
LOOK TO THE JOURNAL	Wilhela Cushman	68

FOOD

BOUNTY FROM OUR KITCHEN	Elsie Masterton	84
INFORMAL FORMALITY	John Prince	86
LUSCIOUS FALL FRUIT DESSERTS		88

ARCHITECTURE, HOMEMAKING, INTERIOR DECORATION

JOURNAL'S PORTFOLIO HOUSE NO. 12 OUR PRACTICAL DREAM HOUSE		73
PRACTICAL PLANNING MAKES THE DREAM HOUSE COME TRUE DAY AND NIGHT		77
A DREAM OF LIVING AND DINING CAN STILL BE PRACTICAL		78
THE DREAMY KITCHEN IS DURABLE AS A WOODEN SHOE		80
ALL THROUGH THE HOUSE, MORE EASY-CARE IDEAS		82

POEMS

AGE OF UNCHIVALRY	Patricia Duff McGinley	17
THE KISS	Melora Hobbs Pond	39
IDLE IDOL	Pegasus Buchanan	106
THE NAMES OF HORSES	Minnie Hite Moody	110
I SAW AN ARMY	George Abbe	119
RHYMES FROM YOUNG MOTHER GOOSE	C. S. Jennison	128
END OF SUMMER	Katherine Garrison Chapin	143
SEPTEMBER ORCHARD	Florence B. Jacobs	146
MARKS OF EXTINCTION	Jean Conder Soule	177

COVER PHOTOGRAPH BY JIM POND AND ABBOT MILLS

NGE OF ADDRESS. At leost 30 doys before o chonge is to toke effect pleose send your complete nome, new address ond o moiling lobel from o recent issue. If is not possible, write out your old oddress ond send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journol, Independence Squore, Philadelphio 5, Po. The post office will not forword copies unless you provide necessory postoge. Duplicole copies connot be sent. • Ladies' Home Journol, © 1960 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on lost Thursday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Second-class postage paid at Philadelphia, Pa., and at additional mailing offices. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada. The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence. Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $10. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr. $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice. Unconditional Guaranty. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed. The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mory Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cory W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; E. Huber Ulrich, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Ford F. Robinson, Sr. Vice Pres. and Manager, Business Department; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Maurice S. Gould, Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, Holiday and The American Home.

Printed in U.S.A.

"How I use Murine to soothe my eyes and so relax tension"

NANCIE RIDEOUT
World Champion Woman Water Skier

"Water skiing keeps me in a world of glaring sun, spray, wind and tension—really hard on the eyes. Murine soothes and rests my eyes when they're tired, and the comfort helps me to relax." Outdoor people, business people, entertainers—millions of people use Murine regularly. Try it yourself, to soothe your eyes . . . and so relax tension.

NEW!
SQUEEZE BOTTLE HANDY TO CARRY WITH YOU

Murine is also available in familiar glass bottle with separate eye dropper.

MURINE *for your eyes

THE MURINE CO., INC., CHICAGO, U.S.A.
*TRADEMARKS REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

.. she's wearing new
"Moisture Base" by Pond's

New greaseless foundation! Moisturizes for hours right under your make-up!

While you dine, while you dance, while you shop, New Pond's Moisture Base works invisibly right under your make-up! Creates a lasting "moisture reserve" that keeps the moisture level of your skin in perfect balance.

Protects against weather, the drying effects of make-up . . . keeps your skin soft, your make-up lovely all day.

Greaseless, so make-up never cakes. Transparent, to wear under any shade. Smooth on Pond's Moisture Base before you apply make-up. Use for overnight moisturizing, too. 60¢ and $1.00 plus tax.

THE MODERN GREASELESS
UNDER-MAKE-UP MOISTURIZER

LETTERS our reade write us

NORTH CAROLINA

SHOULD A DYING PERSON BE TOLD?

Dear Editors: Last night my husband and I got into a discussion with a friend who is also a doctor. I became so upset that I'm afraid I wasn't very rational, and perhaps you or your readers can help me straighten out my thoughts.

Recently my youngest and most dearly loved sister died of cancer. She had always been a vital, gay person who fully expected to live a hundred years, and her death only six months after her first symptom was a shock to all of us. What shocked me most, however, was that no one, not even Lucille herself, knew that she was going to die. The doctor took it upon himself to keep the fact that she had cancer to himself—so that she would, as he put it, "be happy during those last months."

Now maybe Lucille was happier not knowing she was going to die at thirty-three, but maybe she wasn't. Maybe she had lots of things to do and say before she died; I know I had lots I wish I had said to her! Even beyond that, should one person—be it doctor, husband, wife, child or friend—ever decide such questions for another? Sincerely,

Raleigh Name Withheld

U. N. FORCES IN KOREA

HORSE SENSE?

Gentlemen: Husbands die early because they are run to death.

In my early days we had horses to do the work now done by machines. At the end of the day the horses were put in shelter, groomed, fed and protected from disturbance. If modern wives would get some old books and study up on the care of work animals and then apply similar treatment to their husbands, they would have them for many years longer.

Sincerely yours,
ALLAN CUNNINGHAM

FLORIDA

NEIGHBORHOOD DIET LUNCH

Dear Editors: We are a group of five neighbors with young children. We usually spend our afternoons together, but until a few weeks ago we all had the pre-school-mother blues.

Then one day we decided to do something about our favorite topic of conversation: bulging hips, expanding waists and flabby thighs. We agreed to meet at one another's house from twelve to one o'clock Monday through Friday. Each hostess would serve a lunch of not more than 300 calories. (The children would be fed in their own homes and a play area would be available in the h where our lunch was served.) It was decided that all of us would eat two l or soft-boiled eggs and one piece o toast for breakfast, and all the mea vegetables we wanted for dinner.

Before our Diet Lunch began, I us ate two sandwiches and a glass of I discovered the total calorie count nearly 800, yet I didn't enjoy it, or as comfortably full as on the 300-ca lunch. Our five luncheS:

	CALOR
MONDAY
Tomato juice (4 oz.)
Tuna casserole (small serving)	2
Fresh fruit cup (½ cup)
Coffee with sugar substitute
	3
TUESDAY
Consommé
Loin pork chop (small, lean meat)	2
Asparagus (6 stalks, green, canned) Dietetic pineapple (2 slices)
Coffee with sugar substitute
	3
WEDNESDAY
Grapefruit juice (4 oz., unsweetened)
Sliced chicken with celery—2 large lettuce leaves	1
Radishes (2)
Diet ice cream (¼ pint)	1
Coffee with sugar substitute
	3
THURSDAY
Apple juice (4 oz.)
Deviled crab	17
Lettuce with low-calorie dressing	1
Ladyfingers (2 small)	4
Lemonade with sugar substitute	1
	2
FRIDAY
Vegetable juice (4 oz.)	2
Oven-barbecued chicken (low-calorie sauce)	12
Mixed greens with low-calorie dressing	2
Peach upside-down cake (made with low-calorie spongecake mix and dietetic peaches)	13
Coffee with sugar substitute
	3

On Saturday and Sunday we c tinued the Diet Lunch in our o homes. A few even persuaded their h bands to join them!

Along the way we picked up point on foods to buy and how to serve th For instance, each ounce of fat in h burger contains 250 calories, so watch to be sure there is none in round steak before the butcher grinds We discovered we dislike skim-m cottage cheese, and since it has only f calories less per ounce, we use the re lar. We found that certain cakes (an

CONTINUED ON PAGE 8

Lather hairdo shaped by Enrico Caruso Drench your hair in luxury with Liquid Prell...
the extra-rich shampoo!
Prell

© 1960, MAX FACTOR &

How MAX FACTOR Pan-Cake* Make-Up covers so naturally only your beauty shines through

1 PAN-CAKE glides on your skin like a second complexion. Pick up a little with a moistened natural silk sponge and apply with light strokes.

2 Like magic, freckles, lines, blemishes seem to disappear. But after you've covered your whole face, your natural beauty shines through.

3 Softly blot away excess moisture and you're set for day or night. It's easy to be sure with PAN-CAKE Make-Up—made only by MAX FACTOR.

*PAN-CAKE (TRADEMARK) MEANS MAX FACTOR PAN-CAKE MAKE-UP

PAN-CAKE Make-Up is a miracle you can see happen. Right before your eyes it covers flaws but lets your natural beauty show through. Your complexion comes up silky smooth, flawless but always natural. Feels natural, too. Because PAN-CAKE is blessed with lanolin—positively guaranteed never to dry your skin. In 13 complexion matched shades. $1.75

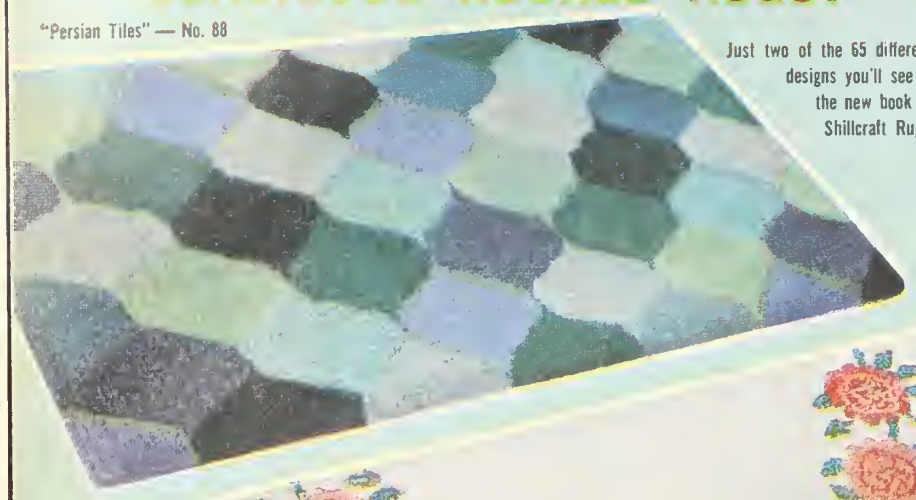
DESIGNED FOR TODAY'S AMERICAN LIVING

EL DORADO

Socialites
a red cross shoe

COUTURIER



MONTE CARLO

The new slender silhouette, dramatically detailed.
Young and dashing pumps . . . with toes pointed to perfection . . . so-slim heels . . . detailing that plays up their undeniable femininity. Cushioned-soft . . . lithe and light . . . eloquent flatterers with a penchant for dramatizing autumn's fashion silhouettes. Socialites 12.99 to 14.99

THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO • THIS PRODUCT HAS NO CONNECTION WHATEVER WITH THE AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS

Now you can easily make these LUXURIOUS HOOKED RUGS!

"Persian Tiles" — No. 88

Just two of the 65 different designs you'll see in the new book of Shillcraft Rugs.

No frames . . .

No yarn-cutting . . .

No experience needed . . .

Thousands are enjoying this fascinating, rewarding hobby in their own homes.

"Ring of Roses" — No. 79

SEND TODAY FOR NEW FULL-COLOR 24-PAGE BOOK. SHOWS YOU 65 DESIGNS AND HOW TO MAKE THEM. PLUS ACTUAL 100% WOOL SAMPLES

- See 65 exquisite "Shillcraft" designs, including contemporary. Choose from oval, rectangular, circular, and semi-circular shapes (available in 146 different sizes).
- Learn how to create a perfect heirloom-quality rug your very first try. No frames. No yarn-winding or cutting thanks to "Readicut" Rug Yarn. Do it at a table, even while watching TV.
- See how to order by mail at direct-from-importer savings. Not available in stores.

Get everything you need by mail . . . direct from importer

• "READICUT" MOTH-PROOFED 100% WOOL 6-PLY RUG YARN IMPORTED FROM ENGLAND. Only Shillcraft offers rug yarn cut to size. No winding or cutting. Guarantees evenly rich, extra thick, deep and luxurious rug pile.

• STURDY ENGLISH CANVAS PATTERN STENCILLED IN COLOR. Match "Readicut" rug yarn to colors on the canvas. You can't make an error.

• SHILLCRAFT PATENTED LATCHET-HOOK. Ties wool to canvas easily, quickly and so rightly it cannot pull out, even in vacuuming. Full instructions in 24-page book.

MAKE A COMPLETE RUG FOR AS LITTLE AS $11. Use our pay-as-you-go plan, if you wish. As little as $5 gets you started. (See Rug Book for details.)

SHILLCRAFT RUG KITS BACKED BY UNCONDITIONAL MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE. To get book, send 25¢ in coin to: Shillcraft, Dept. L-3, 106 Hopkins Place, Balto. 1, Md.

USE-TESTED by McCalls

ATTENTION CANADIANS: Now, Shillcraft Rug Kits are shipped direct to Canada from England, and stocked in our Montreal office for immediate delivery. Send 25¢ in coin today to "Shillcraft," Dept. L-3, 2485 St. Patrick St., Montreal 22, P.Q. and get brand new 24-page full-color Rug Book with complete information.

MAIL COUPON NOW . . . get new 24-page book in full color plus wool color card immediately.

"SHILLCRAFT" Dept. L-3, 106 Hopkins Place, Baltimore 1, Md.

I'd like to know more about making a rug. Please send me your new 24-page Shillcraft Readicut Rug Book, showing 65 distinctive rugs in full color, plus actual samples of 100% Wool Rug Yarn in every color and complete information. I enclose 25¢ in coin to cover handling cost, but otherwise there is no cost or obligation.

NAME .....

PLEASE PRINT

ADDRESS .....

CITY ..... ZONE ..... STATE .....

In Canada, send to "SHILLCRAFT," Dept. L-3, 2485 St. Patrick St., Montreal 22, P. Q.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

food, sponge) have fewer calories than other types. If we must nibble, we eat raw, crisp vegetables.

By the middle of the second week, we started exercising before the diet lunch. We arrived fifteen minutes early, used our own towels for mats and wore shorts.

At the end of three weeks we had all lost weight, felt younger, stronger, more able to accomplish necessary household chores. We recommend the same neighborhood fun for anyone else who needs her morale boosted!

Sincerely,
DOROTHY MARSHALL
Indian Rocks Beach

WASH., D.C.

DEFENSE OF FERTILIZERS

Gentlemen: In the June Ladies' Home Journal, Dorothy Thompson states: "Our bodies, we are warned, are being chemicalized by poisonous sprays applied to fruits and commercial fertilizers to soil."

There is no basis in fact for the allegation that chemical fertilizers "poison" the soil or the produce therefrom. The plant-nutrient content of commercial fertilizers consists of minerals only, on which plants have always subsisted. This can be substantiated by soil scientists, agronomists, and Federal and state government officials.

The Curtis Publishing Company traditionally has been staffed with competent, well-informed editors and writers with a pronounced sense of responsibility. It would be helpful if you would print a retraction.

Sincerely yours,
PAUL T. TRUITT, President
National Plant Food Institute

YOUNG MARRIAGES
TEN YEARS AFTER

Would You Advise
Others to Marry Equally Young?

Were you or your husband—or both of you—under eighteen when you were married? Have you been married at least ten but not more than fifteen years?

We would like to hear some real-life stories of early marriages, and how they have worked out. Letters should be typewritten and should not exceed 1000 words. We will pay $200, on publication, for all rights to any letters which we choose to print.

We will try to return unpublishable manuscripts as promptly as possible, though we cannot be responsible for them. Stamps should be enclosed for return. ED.

CALIFORNIA

THAT MAN ON PAGE 70

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: One of the subjects we discuss here at the American Institute of Family Relations from time to time is the ignorance of our clients, and of the public in general, on everything pertaining to the job of making a success in marriage! As I look back over our 30 years in this work, however, I have been impressed by the fact that people are better informed than used to be, particularly in the mentally important area of sex a production. Without adequate edge of these subjects, it is not create a happy marriage.

To verify my conclusion, I ask of our counselors, "Do you fee husbands and wives are going int riage today with a better general standing of sex than was the case twenty years ago?" I was interes find that 43 of them replied "Yes" out any qualifications; two mor "Yes" with some reservations; onl replied "No."

As we discussed this improveme naturally asked ourselves where th lic has gained this needed inform The colleges have been slow to dea it; the high schools even more so almost unanimous opinion of our selors was that the public is getti information from magazines, and of them mentioned the Ladies' Journal in this connection, comme on the readability as well as the s scientific value of the articles you published. They felt that these have a contribution of the highest valu creating sound attitudes toward riage and family life in North Am

Cordially y
PAUL POPENOE, Pres
American Institute of Family Rela
Los Angeles

NEW YORK

BEST MEDICINE

Dear Editor: It has suddenly da on me that I haven't heard the sou real laughter for the longest time.

I turn on television and all the co ans do is disparage their wives mothers-in-law. I had a party for el year-olds and I practically had to them to play some games. I substitut a nursery school and the director said I exhilarated the children too muc cause they were having a good laughing and yelling!

Is it just me, or has the atom b disintegrated laughter?

Since
Brooklyn BELLE EISEN

NEW JERSEY

IT BURNS ME UP!

Dear Sirs: Why, oh, why do appli companies use plastics on their produ I have been in a new house just months and already have had to rep the temperature-control knob on my o three times. The heat simply melts it

This morning I used my new grill the first time, and the control knob, plastic, either expands with the hea the metal contracts. The only way I turn the grill off is to unplug it.

I have also had a refrigerator w plastic shelves. The cold makes the p tic brittle and the shelves crack.

There is a never-ending list of produ that have been ruined by the use plastics, toys being top on the list.

I love all the modern conveniences we have today. I just wish they'd m them so they'd work.

Sincere
Medford Lakes HONORE K. KE

only convertible that gives you a sofa designed to look like a sofa, plus a bed that sleeps like a bed. dern, traditional, contemporary styles, custom covered through your dealer. Style shown, only $249.50.

Sleep here—beautifully!

Simmons comfort on the one-and-only

HIDE-A-BED

HIDE-A-BED® by SIMMONS ... Maker of the World Famous BEAUTYREST Mattress

© by Simmons Co., Mdse. Mart, Chicago, Ill.

A Great New Cake Mix From Betty Crocker

White as fresh snow. Rich-tasting as country cream. A soft cloud of a cake—tenderly moist, meltingly delicious. Only one mix could make it—our new Country Kitchen Cake Mix. The flavor secret is ours alone, discovered by searching the hundreds of white cake recipes we've gathered in our Betty Crocker Kitchens. Bake up our new Betty Crocker Country Kitchen White Cake Mix. Look for the prettiest package on the shelf.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

VASE OF FLOWERS. Katerina Wilczynski, illustrator of several books, has been exhibited in the world's important cities. Some of her best work has been of Grecian gods and temples.

EXECUTIVE EDITOR:
Mary Bass

ASSOCIATE EDITORS:
Wilhela Cushman
William E. Fink
Louella G. Shouer
Mary Lea Page
Dawn Crowell Norman
Margaret Davidson
Nora O'Leary
Glenn Matthew White
Donald Stuart
Helen Everitt
Peter Briggs
Anne Einselen
Margaret Parton
Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland
Geraldine Rhoads
Nancy Crawford Wood
William McCleery
John H. Brenneman
Jean Todd Freeman
Nelle Keys Bell
Betty Coe Spicer
Neal Gilkyson Stuart
Stanley Freeman
Hal T. Williams

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS:
Richard Pratt
Laura Lou Brookman
Hugh MacNair Kahler
Bernardine Kielty
Margaret Hickey
Gladys Denny Shultz
Barbara Benson
Elizabeth McFarland

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES:
John Werner
Ruth Mary Packard
Ruth Shapley Matthews
Joseph Di Pietro
Elizabeth Goetsch
Eileen Sharpe
Virginia Price
Joyce Posson
Elizabeth Hart
Dorothy Anne Robinson
Albert Serwazi
Liane Waite
Abbot Mills
Conrad Brown
Anne Fuller

ASSISTANT EDITORS:
Victoria Harris
Alice Kastberg
Dorothy Markinko
Jean Anderson
Grant Harris
Jean McClory
Ann Blackmar
Lee Stowell Cullen
Elaine Ward-Hanna
Mary Lee Jones
Carole O'Brien

EDITORIAL ASSISTANTS:
Hazel Owen
Helen Olchvary
Sally Platt
Mary Jane Engel
Janet M. Boe
Kathleen McDonald
Judith Harkison
Dorothy Shuler
Natalie Schram

The "Educators" need Re-Education

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

For the first time in my lifetime, which has been long, the United States of America is not only hated but held in contempt by much of the world, including countries and peoples who have accepted unprecedentedly generous economic benefits and who are allied with us. Its domestic and to some extent its foreign policy has been marked by blunder after blunder; actions have produced results foreseeable by any informed and intelligent mind; its domestic policies (as the present presidential campaign demonstrates) have been, and are, determined by organized pressure groups, economic and ethnic, each ruthlessly pursuing its own interests regardless of the effect on the nation as a whole.

Corruption is rampant in public and private life. What was once called "graft" is now, euphemistically and mellifluously, called "payola." A disc jockey, testifying before a congressional investigation committee, said that payola is "romance"; "It's the American way of life." That, at least, was a testimony to truth.

Our export markets are shrinking as our commercially manufactured products become costlier and costlier, glossier and glossier, and shoddier and shoddier.

In attempting to outline and write an autobiography of myself and my times, which embrace more than the whole of this century, I have constantly been reminded of the danger of sentimental nostalgia. I came of age in the days of the "muckrakers" and radical reformers, when writers and others of great industry and ability were exposing, in a fighting press, The Shame of the Cities (Lincoln Steffens), the appalling collusions between wardheeling politicians, commercial prostitution and gambling saloons (Jane Addams), the unconscionable means, legal and illegal, by which many of the great fortunes of America had been amassed (Ida Tarbell), and the horrors prevailing in the slums of our great cities (Walter Rauschenbusch).

None of these has a comparable counterpart today.

In my lifetime great social advances have been made in America, and many of the dreams of the reformers of my youth have been more than fulfilled. Yet these reformers (were they still alive) would be sunk in deepest melancholy should they now be able to review the results of their fulfilled efforts. These men and women, almost without exception, were driven (against their own interests) by intense dedication to freedom and democracy—both in a sense that no longer vigorously exists. They were genuinely devoted to promoting "the dignity of the individual." They fought evil with eloquence, organization, CONTINUED ON PAGE 17

A SPECTACULAR 30TH ANNIVERSARY OFFI

Choose from 34 Most-Wanted Titles! New Fiction, Illustrated Books, Even 2-Volume Sets

ANY 4 OF THESE N FOR

$3.95 IN PUB EDITION

THE DARKNESS AND THE DAWN

THOMAS B. COSTAIN

Costain's Most Colorful Hit Since "The Black Rose"!

The fate of Rome and all civilization hangs in the balance the night Attila the Conqueror takes his lovely blonde bride to the royal chamber!

$5.95 IN PUB EDITION

HAMMOND'S Family Reference WORLD ATLAS

New Revised Edition

$3.95 IN PUB EDITION

The Saturday Evening POST READER OF WESTERN STORIES by Favorite Authors

$7.50 IN PUB. EDITION

MORE STORIES TO REMEMBER 2 VOLUMES COUNT AS ONE

Thomas B. Costain

Electroft

$10.00 IN PUB. ORIG. ED.

Pictorial History of American Presidents

SEAL OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

JOHN and ALICE BURANT

NEW THE Modern Family Cook Book

$4.95 IN PUB EDITION

THE Family Book OF BEST LOVED POEMS

INDEXED BY TITLE, AUTHOR, FIRST LINES

More Than 400 Poems for Young and Old

$2.95 IN PUB. EDITION

$2.50 IN PUB EDITION

Answers to Today's Etiquette Questions

Amy Vanderbilt's Everyday Etiquette

$3.95 IN PUB. EDITION

BENNETT CERF'S THE LAUGH ON ME

$3.95 IN PUB EDITION

MY BROTHER MICHAEL

Mary Stewart

NEW 2-VOLUME EDITION

2-VOLUME SET COUNTS AS ONE BOOK

THORNDIKE BARNHART DICTIONARY

$10.00 IN PUB. EDITION

JARRETT'S JADE by FRANK YERBY

$3.95 IN PUB. EDITION

Frank Yerby's Newest Romance!

Meet audacious James Jarrett, who fought his way across two continents—and the Savannah beauty who tamed him! Packed with action!

CIVIL WAR IN PICTURES

$6.50 IN PUB EDITION

Life of Christ Fulton J. Sheen

THE WONDERFUL WORLD

by James Fisher

ILLUSTRATED IN FULL COLOR

$2.95 IN PUB. EDITION

$5.95 IN PUB EDITION

Round the W... WITH Famous Aut...

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY LOWELL T...

THE FAMILY BOOK OF Home Entertaining

by Florence Brubeck

$4.95 IN PUB EDITION

SEWING MADE EASY

all about dressmaking and sewing for the home

1000 EASY STEP-BY-STEP PICTURES

$3.95 IN PUB. ORIG. ED.

MARY LYNCH

TAYLOR'S GARDEN GUIDE

by NORMAN TAYLOR

$5.95 IN PUB EDITION

Send No Money— Just Mail the Attached Post Card (no postage needed)

ROM DOUBLEDAY'S FAMOUS DOLLAR BOOK CLUB

RI-BOUND BEST-SELLERS ONLY 99¢

when you join and agree to take as few as 6 best-selling novels out of 24 to be offered in a year

VALUE $11.35 TO $46.25

in publishers' editions

NOTE: The Book Club editions shown are sometimes reduced in size, but texts are full-length — not a word is cut!

ACCEPT the most generous offer in thirty years to new members of Doubleday's famous money-saving Dollar Book Club!

- Select any 4 books shown for only 99 cents. Choose from best-selling novels... big illustrated books... even 2-volume sets — a total value of $11.35 to $46.25 in the publishers' original editions. This is your introductory package when you join the Club.
- Thereafter, as a member, you will be offered new best-seller selections, costing up to $3.95 each in publishers' editions, for only $1. Big hits by authors like Ernest Hemingway, Thomas B. Costain, Daphne du Maurier, Frank Yerby and others have come to members for $1 — a saving of up to 75%.
- Occasional extra-big books also are offered at prices slightly above $1. An attractive bonus plan offers other big savings, too.
- All selections are new, complete, full-length, hard-bound editions for Club members.
- You don't have to take a book every month. You may take as few as six $1 selections a year, and cancel membership any time after you take six books if you wish.

Send no money now—just mail the attached card, which requires no stamp. You will receive at once your 4 introductory books, and will be billed only 99 cents, plus shipping.

Doubleday One Dollar Book Club
Garden City, New York

Send No Money— Just Mail the Attached Post Card (no postage needed)

Sauce in a minute with the Chef's touch in t

Pour Chef Boy-Ar-Dee® Spaghetti Sauce with Meat over thin spaghetti. Toss with garlic croutons.

Pour Spaghetti Sauce with Mu-rooms on noodles. Add grated ch

For a meatless dish, pour Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Marinara Sauce over elbow macaroni mixed with cooked shrimp.

For a nourishing dinner, pour Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Spa-ghetti Sauce with Meat Balls over spiral spaghetti.

The Sauce makes the meal. And it takes a chef to make the sauce. Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Spaghetti Sauces are made from the finest ingredients according to an old Italian recipe, carefully blended and slowly simmered. Pennies a serving.

CHEF BOY-AR-DEE®
spaghetti sauces

NT UED FROM PAGE 11

mp and sacrifice. They sought to lift the el the poor, the stupid and the lazy to nev ere near that of the comfortably sited. ne intelligent and the industrious.
Ma of them were forerunners of the New al (w an Old Deal) and the welfare state.
ey vocated and supported trade-unions t th right to strike when to do so was as ch s one's life was worth. But they cernly id not foresee the day when unions
e t teamsters') would be practically un-sec able rackets, when strikes would be rely nd simply tests of power and holdups
the ublic, and be settled, neither on the sis justice, reason nor the condition of y ble economy, but on the balance of liti and economic power.
No ould many of them foresee that a radiar universal improvement in the physical vir ment (the standard of living) might t r lt in making people better, more in-str is and self-reliant, but in making them ug elf-satisfied and indolent.
The are, of course, exceptions (and many
the) to every rule. But the generality sets e to and goal of society, and in general day producers are interested almost en-ely n emoluments, benefits and privileges he han in perfor ance. Feeling little or ple in work or in competition for exlenc, they are, of course, unhappy.
Th old radicals believed in the extension
ed ation, and by "education" they knew

AGE OF UNCHIVALRY

y PATRICIA DUFF McGINLEY

hen it comes to sharing, most tots are the same:
enerously unsparing with measles and blame.

at ey meant. They meant that every child d uth should, according to his ability, have i rmed mind, a developed intelligence d developed character, enabling him to e nd overcome the shocks and hazards li and assume and perform its normal ti and responsibilities, public and private.
Though the reforms they advocated, they d ith and confidence that out of the re-ir s of this richly endowed continental id , with personal and political freedom, ity of opportunity according to ability,
d cultivated sense of justice going far deeper r nere legality, there would arise, within s entury, the most beautiful and comely il ation that the sun had ever shone upon.
T key was education.
T first nation in the world that had ever
c elementary public education compul-y or all children was this one, beginning N w England.
T day we hear much nonsense talked about difficulties of educating all children in he elementary fundamentals of reading,
g, arithmetic, simple geography, Ameristory, physical education and (what used called) "deportment."
y and more years ago when I was in ntary schools in Western New York vilevery child from the township had eight s of schooling, unless he was a village and unteachable.
r teachers were normal-school gradu-
-I am sure there was not a college degree
g them. But they were fully in possession bject matter, knew what to teach, how to it, and how to keep discipline in a oom.
me of my classmates from the second e seventh grade—and even one of my ers—are living (those of us who survived cy and early childhood were a hardy ration) and I have been able to renew check with them on school memories.
e are also my younger sister and brother who went to school in the same places. None of them can recall a single case of a child who could not, at the end of the first grade, read simple primers easily, write (not print) legibly and correctly, and accurately add and subtract simple sums. Some children, from township farms, were sometimes truant, kept at home for reasons of inescapable family need, but even these passed and graduated. Grading was strict and 75 per cent of accuracy required for passing a course.

A child's competence in a subject was discerned by oral recitations and written essays that were judged not only for content but for spelling, punctuation and grammar, and the marks of even superiorly intelligent pupils could be brought down by unruly classroom behavior.

I have lately had letters from old friends who never went beyond high school. They are legibly written, well presented, and rarely contain even a minor grammatical error. Today thousands of graduates, even from colleges (especially state colleges), cannot write an intelligible paragraph in English, do not command a vocabulary even on the newspaper level, are incapable of making a précis of any book, and cannot quickly and accurately do a problem in compound fractions. This in a country that spends more per capita on the education of its children and youth and houses them more luxuriously than any other in the world. And the reply to all criticisms is always that we need to spend more money.

There is, nevertheless, a great underground swell, among responsible and intelligent parents, teachers and citizens, for an improvement in basic public-school education (now called by another jargon word, "upgrading").

In the spring of this year the San Francisco Board of Education, headed by Mr. Elmer Skinner, president, asked eight eminent professors from the University of California and Stanford University (equally represented) to make a study of public-school curriculum and present recommendations. One from each of the two universities was a professor of English (one a distinguished writer as well) or a professor of mathematics. One was a professor of economics, one of biological sciences, one of chemistry and one of history. All of them hold doctorates.

The first step of courage in setting up this committee was that no professor of education was included. For the plain fact is that the "educators" have had, for years, a strangle hold on public-school education. They have usurped the name. They are no more (and usually less) "educators" than the graduates of other faculties. They are pedagogues. But they have been determining for years what should be taught and how it should be done. They are chiefly responsible for the virtual abolition of the phonic method in teaching reading in favor of the look-guess method; for the preparation of readers, boring, repetitive and without any relation to literature; for the notion that for psychological and social reasons a child must be kept with his age group, no matter what his capacities may be; for the abolition of geography, history and civics in favor of "social science"; for the proliferation of "life adjustment" courses; and for all the other substitutes for systematic study and real learning that develop brains and character. They are also responsible for the fact that the teaching profession has come to rank intellectually below that of any other. On every campus with which I am familiar, the Department of Education's courses and degree rank as the easiest to complete and obtain.

The "educators" have a vested interest in maintaining the system as it is. Their interest and support of the status quo is not universal, especially among classroom teachers. But dissenters are in a minority and disinclined (or unable) to oppose what has been the prevailing trend and practice since William Heard Kilpatrick sold it to a generation of American teachers back in the '20's and early '30's.

So the San Francisco report and its recommendations came out without the collaboration of the educationists—but not, I have heard, without their subsequent squeals and protests.

What do the eight scholars, whose survey was thorough and minute, recommend?

All Rubbermaid, of course. And what a wonderful way to dress up your kitchen. New style, new color, new cleaning ease. Drainer Tray cushions counter-top, keeps counter-top dry. Sink Divider Mat and Sink Mat keep valuable china chip-free. Dish Drainer air-dries dishes safely. All these bright new Rubbermaid helpers are yours for as little as $7.96. Rubbermaid Inc., Wooster, Ohio • Cooksville, Ontario.

Rubbermaid® means better made

The report is a pamphlet of fifty-six printed pages, impossible to be digested adequately in this article.*

They recommend greater provision for differences of ability while offering every student the greatest challenges and holding him to the highest standards which his abilities warrant, and make specific suggestions about ability groups in different grades.

They recommend that in all solid subjects from elementary through high school content should be much more precisely defined and that the subject matter should determine the textbooks, not the textbooks the subject matter.

In the elementary schools, they assert that the fundamental skills of reading, writing and arithmetic should be much more thoroughly and intensively studied, and that two thirds of the school day be devoted to these.

They recommend that reading be taught by a systematic phonetic method from the beginning.

They recommend that beginning with the sixth grade, and ultimately with the third, foreign languages be required, with emphasis on continuity and thoroughness, so that by the time of high-school graduation the student should have at least a fair knowledge of two foreign languages.

Also that science courses be eliminated in the first three grades and social-science courses in the first two. These can become really meaningful only to a child well advanced in reading. A greater variety of subjects should, however, be introduced in reading and arithmetic.

(Apropos the importance of reading, incompetence in this makes most of the I.Q. tests taken of school children unrevealing of natural intelligence. They are predominantly verbal and a child who cannot read rapidly and accurately will rate far too low. Children who at preschool have I.Q.'s of 80 can learn to read competently if they are properly taught, as many private and public schools have demonstrated.)

The committee further recommends that science not involving the experimental method be taught as "natural history," and that social studies be called (and taught) under their proper names: geography, history and civics.

On this matter I have something to say myself. In talking with youngsters and their highly intelligent parents I have found it impossible to define or understand what "social studies" are from the viewpoint of any systematic learning. An eighth-grade scholarship pupil in a nationally known (and applauded) private day school told me that she had been required one week to prepare a theme on South Africa (geography and history), and the next to prepare one on the history of Communism. She sought my views about the latter. I said that Communism had developed in Europe and Western Russia out of nineteenth-century revolutionary theories, and went into a short exegesis of some of them. She said she guessed the teacher only wanted Russian Communism. Again I asked where she should begin. The Bolshevik revolution didn't automatically spring into being out of the minds of Lenin and Trotsky! The girl herself commented, "We seem to get a little of everything and nothing of anything."

For light on this elusive study there is the following statement issued by the U.S. Office of Education, Bulletin 5, by Miss Wilhelmina Hill, who is the office's "Specialist for Social Science":

"The motivation for mastering the skills should come from the child's desire to use them in carrying on group and social activities. Teachers should not think of social studies as a subject-matter field but rather as a broad area of experience which serves to help children relate skills [what "skills"?], arts, social sciences, and physical and biological sciences into one universal learning experience which has meaning for them." **

I have attempted to translate this gobbledygook into English and this is what I get:

"The motive for study should be the child's desire to apply what he learns in group and social activities. Teachers should ignore subject and help develop in children such a unit perience of skills, art and social, physic biological sciences as they are capable of standing."

Thus translated (in so far as it can b statement is balderdash. How in the wo a child (or an adult) relate the facts of ge raphy, history and civics (the last diffe every country) to his immediate grou social activities? Geography and histo though knowledge of them is cons changing and enlarging) deal with fact. T teaching of geography includes knowle the topography, climate and soil of the tries and regions being studied, their pr resources and communications. Histo cords, essentially, the growth (and decli nations and civilizations; the changing position and movement of their popul their culture as it has developed in v times, and the ideas and personalities have influenced their development. If the ies are to result in the acquisition of edge, without which any application is i sible, the teacher cannot conceivably f "think of subject matter." Children may out an experience" of another time, bu can actually experience it only through k edge, which they must acquire by being t it. And elementary and high schools, even universities, cannot turn out enc pedic minds. These are so rare as to be orable from any age. Certainly teachers leges do not produce them. And how can one teach another what he himself doe intellectually possess?

To go back to the report of the San Fr cisco Board of Education:

The study group recommends tha granting of academic credit for menial

> A man may learn from his Bible t be a more thorough gentleman than if he had been brought up in all the drawing rooms in London.
> CHARLES KINGSLEY

other nonacademic tasks be abolished, t rallies, community affairs, games, pageants and so on, and their preparation should take place after classroom hours, and that a mo more careful and systematic introductio the idea of homework be given the stud The professors also recommend that the cl room interruptions, so common in m schools, many of which they specifically be eliminated.

"Academic achievement should be g much more recognition, in the form of ho rolls, publicity and special privileges"—as are presently given to the more accomplis school athletes.

All students should receive report cards, in determining a student's grade the teac should have final authority, subject at request of the principal to review and poss revision, by a committee elected by teach from among themselves.

Students should never be automatically p moted.

Nothing in the report deals with charac building. But it is implicit. If children learn work from the moment they enter sch to think and act systematically, to respo to challenges, to desire excellence, they will everything in their future life more respons This, of course, has been known since, beginning of civilization.

There are always, in every society and cl of it, children who are mentally retard congenitally tainted, psychically unsta through myriads of early experiences. Th children are special problems and must specially educated and helped. But what t San Francisco study group recommends is m beyond the capacities of average normal ch dren, unless we are to assume that Americ children are biologically and intellectually ferior to those of other countries advanced civilization.

If they are, in another generation or t democracy will be insupportable.

Which God forbid. E

* It can be obtained from Mr. Elmer Skinner, 135 Van Ness Avenue, San Francisco, California.

 Quoted in the June Bulletin of the Council for Basic Education, 725 Fifteenth St., Washington, D.C. Issued monthly to subscribers.

3 cheers for Pure-Pak

Send up a cheer, give out a shout!
This milk container with pouring spout—

Will never break . . . ends messy spills
Bottle washing and refills

Use it once and toss away
Pure-Pak really saves the day

For delivery to your home
Use the coupon . . . (end of poem)

Home Delivered !

CLIP THIS COUPON AND LEAVE IT FOR YOUR MILKMAN

Dear Milkman:

Please start delivering our milk in modern Pure-Pak cartons.

IT POURS LIKE A PITCHER"

Signed _____

At your store or at your door

Pure-Pak
EX-CELL-O CORP. DETROIT, MICH.
YOUR PERSONAL MILK CONTAINER

RE-PAK DIVISION, EX-CELL-O CORPORATION

Twinkle Twins end spotting, end filming!

Only FINISH has 2 new ingredients to improve electric dishwashing

FINISH now contains the new "Twinkle Twins"—two effective cleansing agents to end spotting and filming of glasses and silverware. Only FINISH has both. Try advanced formula FINISH. You'll be delighted.

EL

Another famous product of Economics Laboratory, Inc. New York, N.Y.

Copyright, 1960

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS "Are unusually permissive, indulgent parents more numerous today—and are they weakening the character of their children?"

ARE WE BRINGING UP OUR CHILDREN TOO "SOFT" FOR THE STERN REALITIES THEY MUST FACE?

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

Are American youth underdisciplined, overcoddled? The question has been asked frequently in the last few years. People have been worried by such matters as the rising figures on delinquency, and the criticism that our schools are "soft." I think there may now be a new wave of doubt as a result of discussion of the behavior of American soldiers taken prisoner in the Korean war.

Recently, in one of the regular weekly meetings of the staff of our children's hospital, we listened to a tape recording of a talk by an Army psychiatrist about the demoralization of many of these prisoners of war. We were shocked, as all people are who hear the story. Not shocked at what the Communists did, but at how easily these Americans went to pieces. After hearing the tape we went on, as planned, to discuss among ourselves whether the kind of upbringing American children are getting these days played a part in the poor discipline.

The tape was a recording of a talk given before the American Psychiatric Association in 1958 by Dr. William Mayer, who had been on one of the Army teams of psychiatrists and intelligence officers who interviewed the returning prisoners in 1953 and analyzed the data.

The same story can be read at length in the book In Every War But One, by Eugene Kinkead, published in 1959.*

One in seven of our men became an active collaborator with the Chinese Communists in one or more of the following ways: he worked, side by side with the captors, to indoctrinate fellow Americans about the superiority of Communism and the rightness of the Communist cause in the Korean war; or he made broadcasts on the enemy radio, or wrote articles for them, defaming the American nation (declaring, for instance, that American capitalists instigated the war for profit); or he informed on fellow prisoners; or he agreed to become a Communist organizer or spy in America after the war.

Only 13 per cent of the Americans stood on their rights as prisoners of war and flatly refused to tell anything except their names, ranks and serial numbers, refused to take part in Communist-indoctrination sessions. The captors soon segregated these men, whom they called "reactionaries," into separate areas and didn't bother them any more. All the rest responded to CONTINUED ON PAGE 23

* W. W. Morton and Co., Inc. N. Y. C. $3.95.

"You can find lots of young people with good character and high motivation if you are looking for them in the right places. And you can find—or at least read about in the papers—some deplorable specimens."

SUZANNE SZASZ

Fragile...handle with Johnson's

You give your love in many ways... with cradling warmth ... unhurried care... and the gentleness of your touch.

You give it by surrounding every bath and change time with fragrance and softness... by cleansing your baby with pure, comforting oil ... by soothing your baby with the silkiest, softest powder.

You give it, always, in the happy moments of "Johnson's time."

Johnson & Johnson

ohnson & Johnson

There's no other dog in the world like yours:

Available in 1 pound and economy size 26 oz. cans.

For 8" x 10" print of picture alone, send 25¢ in coin to Dog Picture 40, Box 7366, Chicago 77,

There's no other dog food like Ken-L-Ratio

with Lean Red Meat*

More dogs, old and young, large and small, eat Ken-L-Ration than any other dog food in the world. Reason? Ken-L-Ration provides exactly the kind of diet every dog is known to need to stay fit and fun. High protein Lean Red Meat! Delicious steaks, roasts and chops of *Gov't. Inspected Horsemeat plus other essential ingredients. So wholesome every can receives the Dept. of Agriculture Seal of Approval—one of few dog foods that do! Your dog is one of a kind. So is the quality of Ken-L-Ration.

Packed
Conti
Inspec
U.
Dept.

PUT YOUR TRUST IN KEN-L-RATION...MORE PEOPLE

TI JED FROM PAGE 20

bleness" or threats by co-operating—r passively—in the Communists' in-ion program.

of American officers were defied. s of sanitation and health were often Some of the strong prisoners stole possessions from the weak. The in-diseased were often neglected. No soldier managed to escape from a nt enemy prison camp to the safety es, as in every other war.

ath rate among the prisoners reached ing figure of 38 per cent. Our military s consider this only partly explain-e basis of the severe climate, the in-food, the poor medical facilities by the Communists. Some Amer-ecially at first, said they couldn't or eat the basic prisoner diet of boiled millet, as if they expected that food would then be provided in-Army doctor described how some from "give-up-itis." They would be-pondent, lie all day curled up under t, cut down their diet to water alone, ead within three weeks.

lid the Communists do to bring about oralization? There have been lots of erences in America to "brainwashing," any to assume that some mysterious hypnotic method was used. There uch thing. In fact, even brutality and were used relatively little, and these tirely with Air Force prisoners, from e Communists tried to extract false ns of germ warfare.

ommunists threw our prisoners off the start by welcoming them with Discussion: a method of confirming others in their errors.

AMBROSE BIERCE

andshakes, cigarettes. They congrat-em on having escaped from the bond-imperialist army, into a country de-peace. "Aren't you for peace?" they Won't you sign a peace appeal?"

hours of indoctrination class a day instructors, who were well educated, a Marxist picture of the exploitation ican workers by their bosses, of the tic ambitions of American capitalist of the noble aims of the Communist Few prisoners apparently knew enough o refute these statements. American ators assisted in the lectures. Marxist ad to be read, memorized, recited. oners were required to write their life . Excerpts from these were used to e lecturers' points and to get some of talking against their country and g fellow prisoners.

who lagged in their co-operation dered to headquarters for repeated scoldings and threats. Individuals ued in class were humiliated by teach-low prisoners. In increasing numbers ners came around to confessing their vious "wrong thinking" and con-those who were less compliant. In-was rewarded. These methods led to a wn of any sense of cohesion and loyalty among the Americans.

king contrast to the behavior of many n prisoners was the high morale main-y the Turkish soldiers who were cap-The Turks were also part of the U. N. Korea.) They stuck together, obeyed cers, refused to criticize their country form on one another, laughed at Com-efforts to indoctrinate them, adhered h regulations, co-operated in the care sick. They are said to have lost no men se or starvation.

possible explanation can be given for collapse of the morale and discipline many. American prisoners? Eugene d in his book quotes an Army officer med primarily the Army's revision of ary procedures following World War h, he felt, decreased the authority of company commanders and noncommissioned officers, made privates less respectful and obedient. This officer spoke critically of the poor discipline in many units from the time they landed in Korea.

I suspect that an extremely potent factor in the lowered morale in the Korean war was the natural letdown, after World War II, in the American people's spirit of devotion to the common cause and readiness to sacrifice for it. For the time being they wanted to be let alone to follow their individual pursuits. When the North Korean Communists suddenly invaded South Korea it was impossible for many Americans to see that this was their fight. In fact, our participation in the war became a partisan political issue. It must have been disheartening for a young man to be exposed to death on the other side of the world if his family or some of his friends and leaders at home doubted the necessity for his being there.

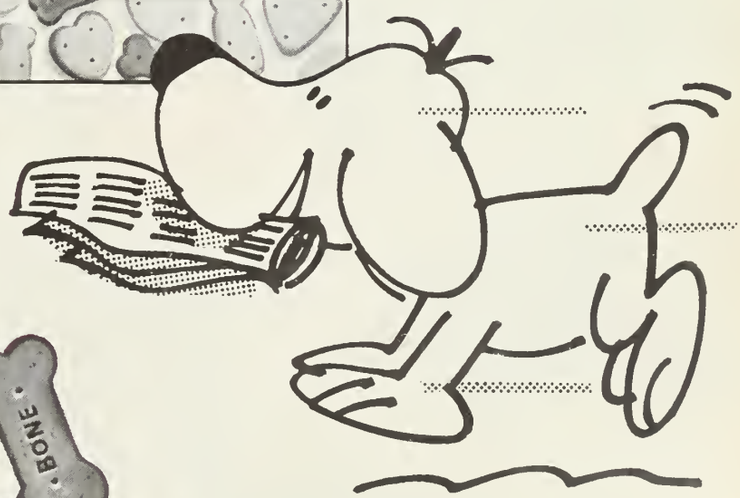
But what about the influence of the way in which the soldier was reared, before he put on a uniform? Dr. Mayer in his talk to the psychiatrists specifically suggested that a basic remedy for this poor military discipline might lie in a stricter discipline in civilian life—in the factory and in the home, "at the parent's knee and over the parent's knee." It's a reasonable-sounding assumption. But if lack of discipline in childhood was the main source of poor morale in the Korean war, why did it not have a similar effect in World War II? The discipline and morale of the great majority of men in our armed forces during World War II were considered satisfactory, when they had proper leadership and training, and when the country was united behind them. Yet there were only five years between the two wars. I know of no sudden shift in child-rearing practices that would have affected differently these two groups.

It's always difficult to come to conclusions about whether one generation of children is being brought up with less discipline than earlier generations. At any period you can find young people with good character and high motivation, if you are looking for them and look in the right places. At the same time you can see—or at least read regularly in the papers about—deplorable specimens.

Now it is true that there has been a disturbing rise in the number of juvenile delinquents in America. However, there are many sociological factors, separate from matters of basic character and family relationships, which contribute to the delinquency figures. But all the disturbed personalities and delinquents added together do not constitute more than a small minority of the youthful population, and do not explain to me the large-scale demoralization in Korea. The Army reports confirm this point. Their psychological tests and psychiatric interviews did not reveal any significant differences in family background between the "reactionaries" who held out, the co-operators who gave in, and the active collaborators. It was not just the bad characters from broken homes who were responsible for the poor record.

What about the influence of those parents we have all seen who are unusually indulgent or permissive? Aren't they more numerous today, and aren't they weakening the character of their children? I think such families have to be divided into two opposite types, which I'll oversimplify to make my point clear. On the one hand, there are a few parents who have little deep affection for their children and show no real standards or consistency of control in raising them. Out of a dim sense of guilt they offer excessive privileges or possessions instead. There's a small number of these in every generation, in every income bracket, and their children may turn out delinquent or otherwise impaired.

Then there are other parents who are highly conscientious and devoted to their children but very hesitant about interfering with their wishes. I believe, from my own experience, that the number of these has increased moderately over the past ten to twenty years, especially among the college-educated group. I feel guilty about them because I think that I and other professional people have—without



CONTINUED ON PAGE 25

Training trouble?

Treats do the trick!

- Always have a handful on hand for tricks, training and good behavior.
- Nourishing KEN-L-TREATS are healthy for him. Reward him all you want.
- Not a candy, not sweet. Low in fat. Excellent for developing teeth and gums.
- Contain all the proteins, vitamins and minerals a dog is known to need. An exclusive formula for nutritional balance.
- Bite size! 6 delicious flavors. 6 fun-to-feed shapes.

By the makers of KEN-L-RATION
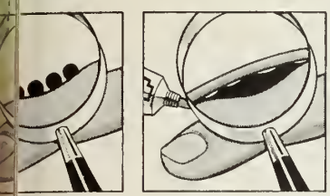
KEN-L-MEAL
KEN-L-BISKIT

JACQUARD KNIT CREEPER. Plastic-lined pants. Blue, nutmeg. 6 mos.-2 yrs. $4.00

How to teach a new creeper an old trick.

TODDLER'S POLO SHIRT. Blue, brown, navy, red. 1-4 yrs. $2.00. "STUFFED ANIMAL" 3-PIECE PLAY PAJAMA. Blue, pink or yellow on white. S-M-L. $3.00. SMOCKED PANTI-DRESS SET. Plastic-lined pant. Azure, pink. 6 mos.-2 yrs. $3.00.



Oops! First steps are easier when you have a soft cotton knit Carter's creeper to fall back on. (Very handsome, too, for just plain creeping!) Carter's giftable knits are also famous for washing without losing their shape, forgetting their size or ever needing ironing—and mothers think that's a neat trick indeed!

Carter's

THE WILLIAM CARTER CO., NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS.

NGUENTINE® BOOSTS NATURE'S ALING POWER

plain antiseptic can!

ends its healing the surface of a y. But tension serum droplets erms get through, ws down!

2. Unguentine instantly spreads this healing serum, creates a protective blanket to lock out germs and to promote healing more effectively than nature itself!

nstant aid to everyday cuts, scrapes, es, as well as burns— Relieves pain, germs, promotes healing and forms ective antiseptic dressing as no or liquid can! Nothing's safer for ds of everyday skin injuries, painful rn, too!

safe—
guentine take over!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

ANTISEPTIC FIRST AID DRESSING
UNGUENTINE
WITH DIAMESTOL

VARICOSE VEINS

Tired Legs, Leg Cramps Relieved

Dr. Scholl's
Super-Sheer

AUGE ELASTIC STOCKINGS

ll-footed, full-fashioned. So sheer, they look lar nylons—yet give comfortable uniform No overhose needed. In French Nude, lack. At Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops, ept., Surgical Supply Stores, $12.95 pair. let—Dr. Scholl's, Dept. 13E3, Chicago 10, Ill.

20. Second Way To A

EETER BREATH EANER MOUTH

ally true . . . now you can have a refreshed mouth and throat—eter breath—in just 20 seconds Astring-o-sol Mouth Wash. Yes, fter heavy smoking or indulging ds or beverages with lingering eloped by a practicing dentist, g-o-sol is far superior to any paste in sweetening breath. For g-o-sol also helps remove odor-ing mucous from mouth and . So get Astring-o-sol, the concen- mouth wash, at any drug or y counter.

EE! For free sample, write your and address on a postcard and to: Astring-o-sol, 945 Prospect , Trenton 8, N. J.

string-o-sol®
MOUTH WASH

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 23

meaning to—contributed to their uncertainty. Great advances have been made in this century in the understanding of child development, by psychiatrists, beginning with Freud, by educators, such as Dewey and Kilpatrick by psychologists, nutritionists and pediatricians. The new concepts have been passed on to parents and students by writers, lecturers, physicians (like myself) in a steady stream. It's unfortunate that the different fragments of knowledge have often sounded contradictory and have sometimes left the unjustified impression that it's always the parents' fault if a child is not perfect. Most parents have taken this new knowledge in their stride and made good use of it. But others, who have grown up with too little basic self-assurance, have been intimidated by what they've read and heard. They've been afraid to guide their children firmly, or to ask sufficient respect from them.

My own conclusion is that though there has been an increase in the number of delinquents, and an increase in the number of parents who give their children too little firm guidance, there is no convincing evidence, from the Korean war or other situations, that the basic caliber of any large proportion of our youth has deteriorated seriously. Most American parents have always had enough devotion to their children to foster in them a sense of security and a desire to do right by others, enough parental control so that their children reach adulthood with control of themselves and an ability to accept the authority of leaders, enough freedom so that they develop their own independence and initiative. If these qualities are present in young people, then armed services (and schools, colleges, industries) can get reasonably good performance out of them—provided their training methods and leadership are good, and provided the morale of the country is strongly supportive.

> It ain't no disgrace for a man to fall, but to lay there and grunt is.
>
> JOSH BILLINGS

However, I don't feel complacent about the present or the future. It seems to me that the unprecedented prosperity the past fifteen years, combined with the absence of any vigorous sense of common purpose, has left us—as individuals and as a nation—somewhat self-centered and complacent. I think this helps to explain the low morale of the prisoners in Korea and is a factor in the rise of delinquency.

In past generations America has been inspired by a number of visions: pushing back the frontier, founding a free nation, welcoming all comers, producing plenty for all through industrialization, providing the optimal education for each child, setting an example for the rest of the world. Now we are rudely challenged by Russia and China. Their rate of increase in productivity is greater than ours. They are winning allies and admirers more successfully than we in vast, restless, underdeveloped regions of the world. They are calling the tunes, taking the initiative. We end up on the defensive most of the time.

We seem to be timid about the future. Though we are still the richest country in the world by far, we aren't adequately expanding our schools and colleges, our housing, our health services; our care of neglected children, the handicapped, the aged. We are behind other Western countries in the quality and quantity of many of these services.

I think that before we can expect our young soldiers to take pride in serving all over the world, before we can build into our potential delinquents a better motivation, before we can even give young parents an idea of what qualities the nation may need from their children when they are grown up, all of us together must dedicate ourselves, with the help of inspired leaders, to causes that are nobler than our purely personal ambitions.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

SHINING EXAMPLE...

The new school Stride Rites are everything a children's shoe should be. As much a part of opening day as books and bells. Style-plus-stamina for boys, fashion-without-fuss for girls . . . lasting good fit for all. New leathers, colors, textures . . . including nylon velvets, now at your nearby Stride Rite store, priced $5.50 to $9.98, according to size.

GREEN SHOE MFG. COMPANY • BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

Pat Boone talks to teen-agers

AND IT CAN BE FUN TOO! Well, what d'ya know! The very latest thing I've heard in Teen Time slogans is one I brought back with me recently from a Southern swing. Down yonder the high-school set is saying, "It's smart to be smart!"

To which I say, on weekdays, "You'd better believe it!" and on Sundays, "Amen!"

You don't have to be from Parentsville these days to get the news, and every teenager knows right well what's going on in space, not to mention what's doing on our own personal planet, Earth. It adds up to a competition between ideologies a sight less friendly than the World Series—and obviously the smartest side is going to win!

And the smartest side is going to be the one with the most education.

And you are the only ones who are, right this minute, at the real source stream of this valuable commodity.

So it looks as if whether you're smart enough to be smart is of world-shaking importance.

But, if by being smart you mean what my Southern friends meant, being educated, it's also fun to be smart. I don't remember a time when I didn't have as a battle cry for life, "Get your education no matter what the cost," not only because it's of world and personal concern, but because it's one sure way to increase your joy in living—as I hope to prove to you before we wind up this session.

THE NEW NEW LOOK, BRAINS BEFORE BRAWN. When the Mid Time Group 'twixt thirty-five and fifty ask me (and they do ask me!) if I don't think you Teen Timers 'twixt twelve and twenty have things softer than they did, I just ask them a three-word question back: "What about education?" And if they don't dig the connection, I spell it out.

It's Smart To Be Smart

I point out that with every passing year it takes more and more education to get a good job or make a good living. I use statistics (they love statistics) gleaned from a national business magazine stating that 10 per cent of you young people today finish college, as against 2 per cent fifty years ago. That the business and industrial demand for educated employees is growing even faster, and many fields that previously required a high-school diploma now want two years of college at least, and prefer four. And that the stepped-up demand has stiffened the requirements necessary to gain this pearl of great reward.

Harvard College, which first started grinding out the three R's sixteen years after the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock, had very clear-cut entrance requirements back in 1636: to read and speak Latin and Greek. That would have been ideal for any of you who, like me, can handle English and language but have a wrestling problem with math in any form. But generation by generation things have got tougher. In fact, the recent reunion survey of the Harvard class of 1945 shows how times change. It proves that college grads certainly do better today on the score of income, number and make of cars, houses, professions and such than the nongraduate. It listed the best inheritance the individual parents thought they could leave their children as—in this order—"the principles of self-reliance, the Golden Rule, the Ten Commandments, and good schooling." It indicated the change in the status of you girls when a majority said they were for giving their daughters a college education no matter if their intended occupation was housewife—and almost all of them agreed they'd like to send their sons to the old Alma Mater. But then they made the big admission! They didn't know how many of them would have been able to be "Harvard men" in the class of '60 because "roughly the bottom half of our class wouldn't be admitted today!"

And as Harvard has gone, so have gone the other colleges and universities across our nation. It's got rougher and rougher since mom and dad's day, not softer and softer. In other words, you need an education more than they did—both for personal progress and for world security. But it's got harder and harder to get one because, with the increasing demand, it's become too crowded at the top of the educational ladder for any but the hardest workers and top scholastic competitors.

That's why it's of tremendous importance for you to meet the challenge as a crowd by making learnin' lovable. It's nice to get praise from the teachers. It's nice to be able to tell mom and dad that one of them said in public print, "'Today's kids do more schoolwork and do it more willingly than their parents did." But when the crowd decrees that It's Smart to Be Smart, you and I know it's the most effective method to release a new atomic power on the waiting world—the power of all your young minds and high I.Q.'s functioning in high gear.

Believe me, there's world magic in this mass attitude of yours that the A is not for the creep, and burning midnight oil isn't for squares. Of course I'd be bound to see it that way since I was an oil burner and an A boy. But I'll admit there was a large fashionable segment that would rather have stood on the football field. However, today you guys and gals with the most are doing a great job by making Education the big star on the teenage horizon, to be followed for popularity as well as self-interest and world concern. Why, down in Dallas they're giving high-school letters for academic excellence as big as football letters, and the basic idea is carrying right over into college, where the better fraternities are demanding Brains Before Brawn.

JOHN LEWIS STAGE

Nobody wants to feel out of it, and smart teeners know that you've got to keep up with the world.

But let's admit that for lots of you it's quite a switch; and I've not only talked to you personally on this score, but I've a stack of letters on my desk admitting that, while learnin' isn't a drag, it isn't a cinch either. Also that carrying this new idea—making scholarship fun and popular—to the very summit needs a lot of salesmanship. So suppose we look at the major problems and pressures of gettin' through school today, as well as put together some ammunition for making more converts to the cause.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 30

GOLDEN LIGHT CORN OIL

your golden guarantee of special nutritional benefits

Serve a salad every day! It's a delicious way to eat more garden-fresh vegetables!

...and of all leading brands

ONLY MAZOLA® IS CORN OIL

...unsaturated, not hydrogenated

ealth depends on the nutritional value of the ou eat. That's why you should use Mazola rn oil. Mazola is unsaturated . . . not hy- ated. No other oil is more digestible.

brings out the zesty flavoring of your own ade dressings. And in frying, Mazola makes foods crispy and golden outside, tender and juicy inside.

Mazola adds its own nutritional goodness to all your family's meals because of all leading brands, only Mazola is corn oil—the lightest of all cooking oils! Wonderful Mazola!

MAKE YOUR OWN GOLDEN FRENCH DRESSING

2 teaspoons prepared mustard	1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce
1 tablespoon salt	½ cup vinegar
1½ teaspoons sugar	1½ cups MAZOLA Corn Oil
Few grains pepper	1 clove garlic

Measure all ingredients into bottle or jar. Cover tightly and shake well. Chill. Shake thoroughly before serving. Makes 2 cups.

Your doctor will tell you about the special nutritional benefits of corn oil in your daily meals.

What French's does to sandwiches

Great new idea! Choose the sandwich that balances with the other foods on your day's menu!

Proteins
Each sandwich here is high in body-building proteins

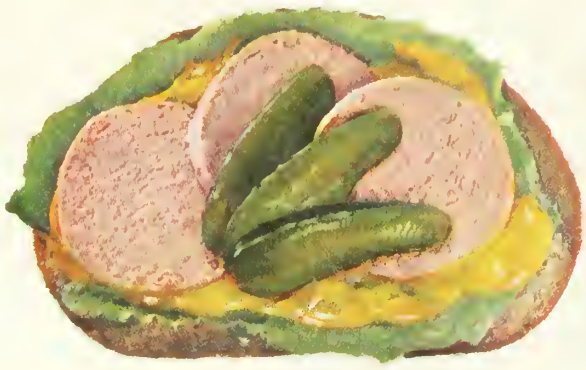
Beefeater: Buttered white bread; mustard; lettuce; rare roast beef; pimiento strips; sweet pickle rounds.

Country Club: Buttered Vienna bread; lettuce; jellied cranberry slices; sliced turkey or chicken; mixed mustard-mayonnaise.

Urbanette: Buttered whole wheat l… mustard; chicory; baked ham; c… cheese; green pepper slice.

Minerals
Each sandwich here is sparked with muscle-building minerals

Tuna Topper: Buttered white bread; mustard; lettuce; tuna salad; sliced tomato; sliced stuffed olives.



Maine Liner: Buttered dark rye bread; mustard; sliced tomato; canned sardines; endive; mayonnaise dab.

Shrimp-Ho: Buttered pumpernickel bread; Swiss cheese; lettuce; shrimp; mixed mustard-mayonnaise.

Fats
Each sandwich here provides energy-giving fats

Sunday Stand-By: Buttered dark rye bread; lettuce; mustard; sliced liverwurst; sliced sweet pickle fan.

West Coast: Buttered sesame seed bread; cream cheese; avocado slices; apple or orange slices; chopped nuts; watercress.

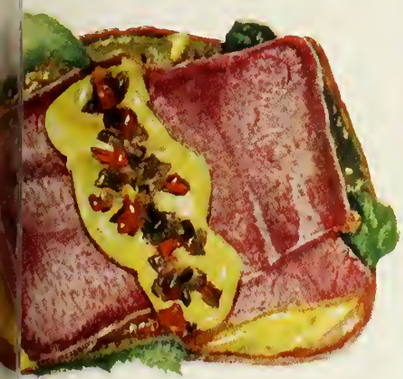
Stage Door: Buttered dark rye; lett… mustard-mayonnaise; seasoned chopp… cooked chicken livers; sliced hard boiled …

Carbohydrates
Each sandwich here is rich in high-energy carbohydrates

Golden Disk: Buttered white bread; chicory; cottage cheese; round orange slices; pitted cooked prunes; drizzle of honey.

Pete's Special: Buttered dark rye bread; canned baked beans; mustard; fresh onion rings; crisp bacon.

Californian: Buttered white bread … mashed soft dates and butter; ro… crisp red apple; chopped nuts.



. should happen to yours!

th e pages you'll find some of the most io sandwiches ever prepared. They're on quick and easy to fix—but each was planned by our test kitchens to help provide a day's share of a specific nutritional requirement. Here's the idea . . . if your dinner menu is spaghetti and salad, serve a high-protein sandwich to your family for lunch. If you're having meat for dinner, balance out the day's meals with a luncheon sandwich of either fruit, eggs or cheese.

The sandwich "catalog" below is the perfect way to make sure the sandwiches you serve your family balance with the other foods on your day's menu.

And when the sandwich calls for mustard, you'll want to use French's. Because French's is the only mustard made with the goodness of seven lively spices. This complement of fine seasonings is the secret of French's golden touch . . . the deliciously different touch French's gives to all kinds of sandwiches, plain or fancy!

To complete each sandwich, just add the top slice of bread.

idwest Special: Buttered light rye ead; lettuce; sliced tongue; mixed ustard-mayonnaise; pickle relish.

Double-Right: Buttered whole wheat bread; lettuce; triangles of sliced cheese and cold cuts; mustard; pickle slice.

almon-Cucumber: Buttered white read; lettuce; salmon salad; sliced ucumbers; mustard-mayonnaise.

Campers' Special: Buttered dark rye bread; mustard; lettuce; French fried onions (canned) ; corned beef; pickle.

Farmer Jones: Buttered Vienna bread; lettuce; mustard; sliced pork roast loin; pickled beet slices.

Southern Ham: Buttered white bread; deviled ham; shredded lettuce; sweet pickle; peanut butter; mustard-mayonnaise.

aptain's Choice: Buttered whole wheat ead; Roquefort or Blue Cheese; mixed ustard-mayonnaise; green pepper strips.

Tropical Treat: Buttered raisin bread; peanut butter; sliced banana; orange or apricot marmalade; watercress topping.

7 lively spices in every jar —
that's the secret of French's Golden Touch!

To make mustard-mayonnaise, blend ½ cup mayonnaise and 2 tablespoons French's Mustard. Refrigerate.

Kraft DeLuxe Slices
give you extra goodness

Sure you can buy cheaper cheese slices than Kraft's. But not with the extra rich cheese flavor that comes from the truly fine natural cheeses Kraft uses.

And Kraft's are big, full-ounce slices that pack important protein power into every sandwich you make. What's more, only Kraft can use the exclusive method that makes these slices taste so extra good and separate so beautifully. That's why they're called Kraft DeLuxe Slices.

KRAFT AMERICAN
OLD ENGLISH Brand
SWISS • BRICK
Pasteurized
Process
Cheese

IT'S SMART TO BE SMART

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 26

TOO MUCH TOO SOON. The biggest problem from the pressure point is the number of gifted, hard-working students used to making high marks who are now being asked to take on accelerated courses—to do a year and a half's work in one, to submit to academic experiments testing new methods and their actual capacity—and the poor lugs aren't "getting the grades" any more. They're victims of the "hurry-hurry-rush-rush" this tense world competition has called for.

"I'm not complaining about the added work," one of the Southern belles told me. "That's a grind—but a challenge. It's the fact that your grades automatically go down when they pile it on so fast you can hardly handle it."

"I used to get all A's without knocking myself out," a burly seventeen-year-old "gifted one," said. "Now I'm panting after a B. It's frustrating—'When you win, you lose!'"

It's frustrating for sure. But not fatal. And here's some reassuring scuttlebutt I've picked up. First, I am reliably informed that your talents and accomplishments will show strongly on the college entrance exams, which take precedence with many educators over school grades. Second, the educators themselves are very aware of your problems and are working hard for a unified, just solution. Two solutions, so far, have gained approval. First, that the report card of the student following an accelerated program will be so marked and the final grades judged in relation to the added challenge. Second, that you would be automatically advanced one grade point to compensate for the added load you struggle under.

Whatever works out, you transition kids who are academic guinea pigs are actually not competing for school grades. You are competing against your own best. And there should be compensation already in the fact that you are the First Team that Uncle Sam counts on entering in the world competition we talked about, plus the fact that some of your accomplishments to date are outstanding.

"You can have Big Stoop," someone heard a teen queen tell a girl who was swooning over a basketball hero. "I'll take Eddie. He just won a big scholarship for putting together some new electronic gadget out of old hardware. He's got a future! It said in the paper that he plans to apply the principles of atomic fission to the propulsion of space ships. Isn't that terrific?" I have a hunch that Eddie was no slouch in the looks department, either, and I'm sure that our honey-blond gal didn't know any more than I do about atomic fission. But for teeners of today even to be able to pronounce these words is a step forward.

TOO LITTLE TOO LATE. On the other side of the pressure coin, whence come the biggest bleats and hollers, are the surprised souls who have discovered that the learning process is no snap.

"It just didn't rub off on me," a surprised athlete who'd been trying to get into college after four years at high school told me.

This Joe belongs to a problem group known as the Underachievers, a very polite academic word for students of high mental capacity who "don't measure up to their potential." Their I.Q. exceeds their performance; or, in some lingo, they won't, don't or can't work. They got what it takes, but they ain't givin'!

Now this is more than just being lazy. It's different from the bird brain with the "So what?" or "Let George do it!" attitude. It doesn't include that large segment who have no desire for scholarship and are, fortunately for us, adaptable to technical training and skills (good men and true!). The Underachiever is the gifted guy or gal who dawdles through junior high, arrives in senior high with poor work habits plus a bad case of daydreams and comes to life only when he finds himself unable to make college.

The National Education Association and War Manpower Board estimate "conservatively" that there are 400,000 such exceptionally gifted gems going to waste every year (boys outnumbering girls two to one!) and many more who are bright, capable, [illegible] don't make the grade.

Whatta revoltin' development this [illegible] at a time like this!

I passed a story along to a pal of m[illegible] is now trying like crazy to catch up i[illegible] college for all the work he didn't do [illegible] school and is now real worried a[illegible] younger brother who is sleep-walking [illegible] junior high.

The story is about three horsemen w[illegible] riding across a desert at night. A[illegible] came to a dry river bed, a mysterio[illegible] called "Halt!" They were told to ge[illegible] pick up some pebbles and put them [illegible] pockets, then to climb back into the sac[illegible] this they did, whereupon the voice sai[illegible] have done as commanded. Tomorrow a[illegible] you'll be both glad and sorry." Puzz[illegible] horsemen rode on, but with the dav[illegible] took out their pebbles for a look. [illegible] lously, every one of them had turnec[illegible] precious gem, a diamond, ruby, e[illegible] pearl, and then they remembered the w[illegible] "You will be both glad and sorry." F[illegible] were. Glad they had taken some. Sor[illegible] hadn't taken more.

And that, to me, is the story of edu[illegible] The moral? Take all you can get wh[illegible] can get it!

IT'S FUN TO BE SMART. Just w[illegible] education?

Education is a jewel, an ornament [illegible] tool, a way to make the most of life [illegible] star to follow that illuminates all the [illegible] ners of your mind, bringing to light sk[illegible] potentials you never dreamed were [illegible] away.

But it isn't a "thing" to be bought [illegible] And it won't, as my athletic friend disc[illegible] "rub off on you." I like the definition [illegible]

A sensible girl should have t[illegible] sense not to look sensible.

Yutang: "An educated man is one w[illegible] the right loves and hates."

A good education does not necessaril[illegible] a college degree.

For those who feel the inclination and [illegible] talents lie along academic or profes[illegible] scientific and technological lines, it's [illegible] for the most. There are some (a very l[illegible] whom it would be a waste of time. Yo[illegible] choose the end that best fits your potent[illegible] then never let up. This goes for girls e[illegible] with boys—if you want to enjoy life and [illegible] most attractive, happiest person possibl[illegible] are what seem to me to be the main obj[illegible] to choose from.

First, acquiring skills. There's as m[illegible] learn about running a house and rai[illegible] family (ask my frau), about plumbir[illegible] laying tiles (ask me! I tried it once!) a[illegible] is about differential calculus. It's just as [illegible] sary, too, and the day of unskilled la[illegible] past. Develop the skills that make l[illegible] smoothly.

Second is the chance to acquire know[illegible] All the professions, the sciences require [illegible] edge as a springboard to new and better t[illegible] But acquiring knowledge isn't build[illegible] stockpile of facts. It's a never-ending, [illegible] process with disappearing horizons. Le[illegible] is the spice of life. People who are "still [illegible] ing" never grow old, bored, dull or st[illegible]

Third, an education should teach [illegible] think. It isn't any good to know a lot of [illegible] if you don't know what to do with 'en[illegible] object of education is to find out ho[illegible] others have got—digest it—and take of[illegible] there.

Fourth, the object of education is t[illegible] creasing enjoyment of life. It should an[illegible] make you more appreciative of ever[illegible] around you, from nature, animals, peo[illegible] art and music and literature. I think th[illegible] college education equipped me to be a [illegible] singer and made me enjoy my career [illegible] And it's made me enjoy life more.

Learning never has an ending—once it [illegible] a beginning. It's Smart to Be Smart—an[illegible] some advice from papa Pat: It's Fun [illegible] Smart too.

truly tomato-rich!

TASTES SO GOOD BECAUSE IT'S TRULY TOMATO-RICH.

know how some brands of tomato juice just trickle out of the tin like water? And taste watery, But not Libby's–ever! Libby's flows out in a velvety stream. The RICHEST-POURING of all! And it TASTES SO MUCH RICHER in ripe, tomato-y flavor than any other kind. Libby's CH IN VITAMINS, too–both vitamins A and C. Yet there are only 25 calories to the 4-ounce glass less than in sweet or sweetened juices).

Look for the new 6-pak of single serving tins.

*y's is 44% richer in consistency, ng to viscosity tests on 11 different . This figure is reported by the lab- es of a leading University. Libby, ll & Libby, Chicago, Ill.

Enjoy your Libby's every day...get your vitamins C plus A

Your all day

veil of fragrance

scents, smooths, clings more lovingly, more lastingly than costly cologne

No cologne prolongs and protects your daintiness like Cashmere Bouquet Talc. Never evaporates. Never dries your skin. Leaves you silken-smooth, flower-fresh all over. Make Cashmere Bouquet ... pure, imported Italian Talc... your all day Veil of Fragrance.

Cashmere Bouquet Talc

the fragrance men love

"Two a day, and eat out until your wife gets back."

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

If I do my chores on a legal holiday they seem to reduce the guilt I feel after a legal three-day weekend. My most enjoyable Labor Days are the ones I spend with a ladder in one hand and a screw driver in the o

Male outdoor cooks are a strange breed: they're triumphant if they serve the meat raw, apologetic if it's well done; any stage in between they deem shamefully sissy.

"My husband isn't too old to learn," confides Betty Comfort, mobilizing nine leftovers for a weekend snack. "This year he realized that if he drives six hundred miles a day it isn't a vacation."

No sooner had I taken off 20 pounds on a torturing 1000-caloric diet than a friendly ex-fattie tells me I can lose 12 pounds a month on a giddy 3000-calorie protein diet of meat, fish and eggs. (My best two-word diet scheme: eat less.)

We visited three new one-level mansions in the suburbs (one with a Pompeiian atrium!). Envious? Yes! But by the time we got home we were happy as ever with our cellar-to-attic old homestead, thirty-one times remodeled.

So many of our town's Middle Enchanted families are split up geographically— one married child on the West Coast, a second 1000 miles away in another direction, all scheming for a family reunion at some central triangulation.

Twice a year, on V-E Day and on November 11 (and maybe on Decoration Day or the Fourth of July) I aim for lunch or a family picnic with an overseas war buddy. Yet how scattered they are, the friends you encountered overseas in the faraway campaigns of long ago!

The plucky wife of our stingiest millionaire refuses to darn his socks; she still has in a box some he gave her to darn twelve years ago. "All right!" he thunders, "I'll wear 'em with the holes and show our friends what kind of a wife you are!"

To our daily lunch quintet it begins to look as if Khrushchev will never, never see Disneyland, unless he thinks it's worth while to capture North America for a peek.

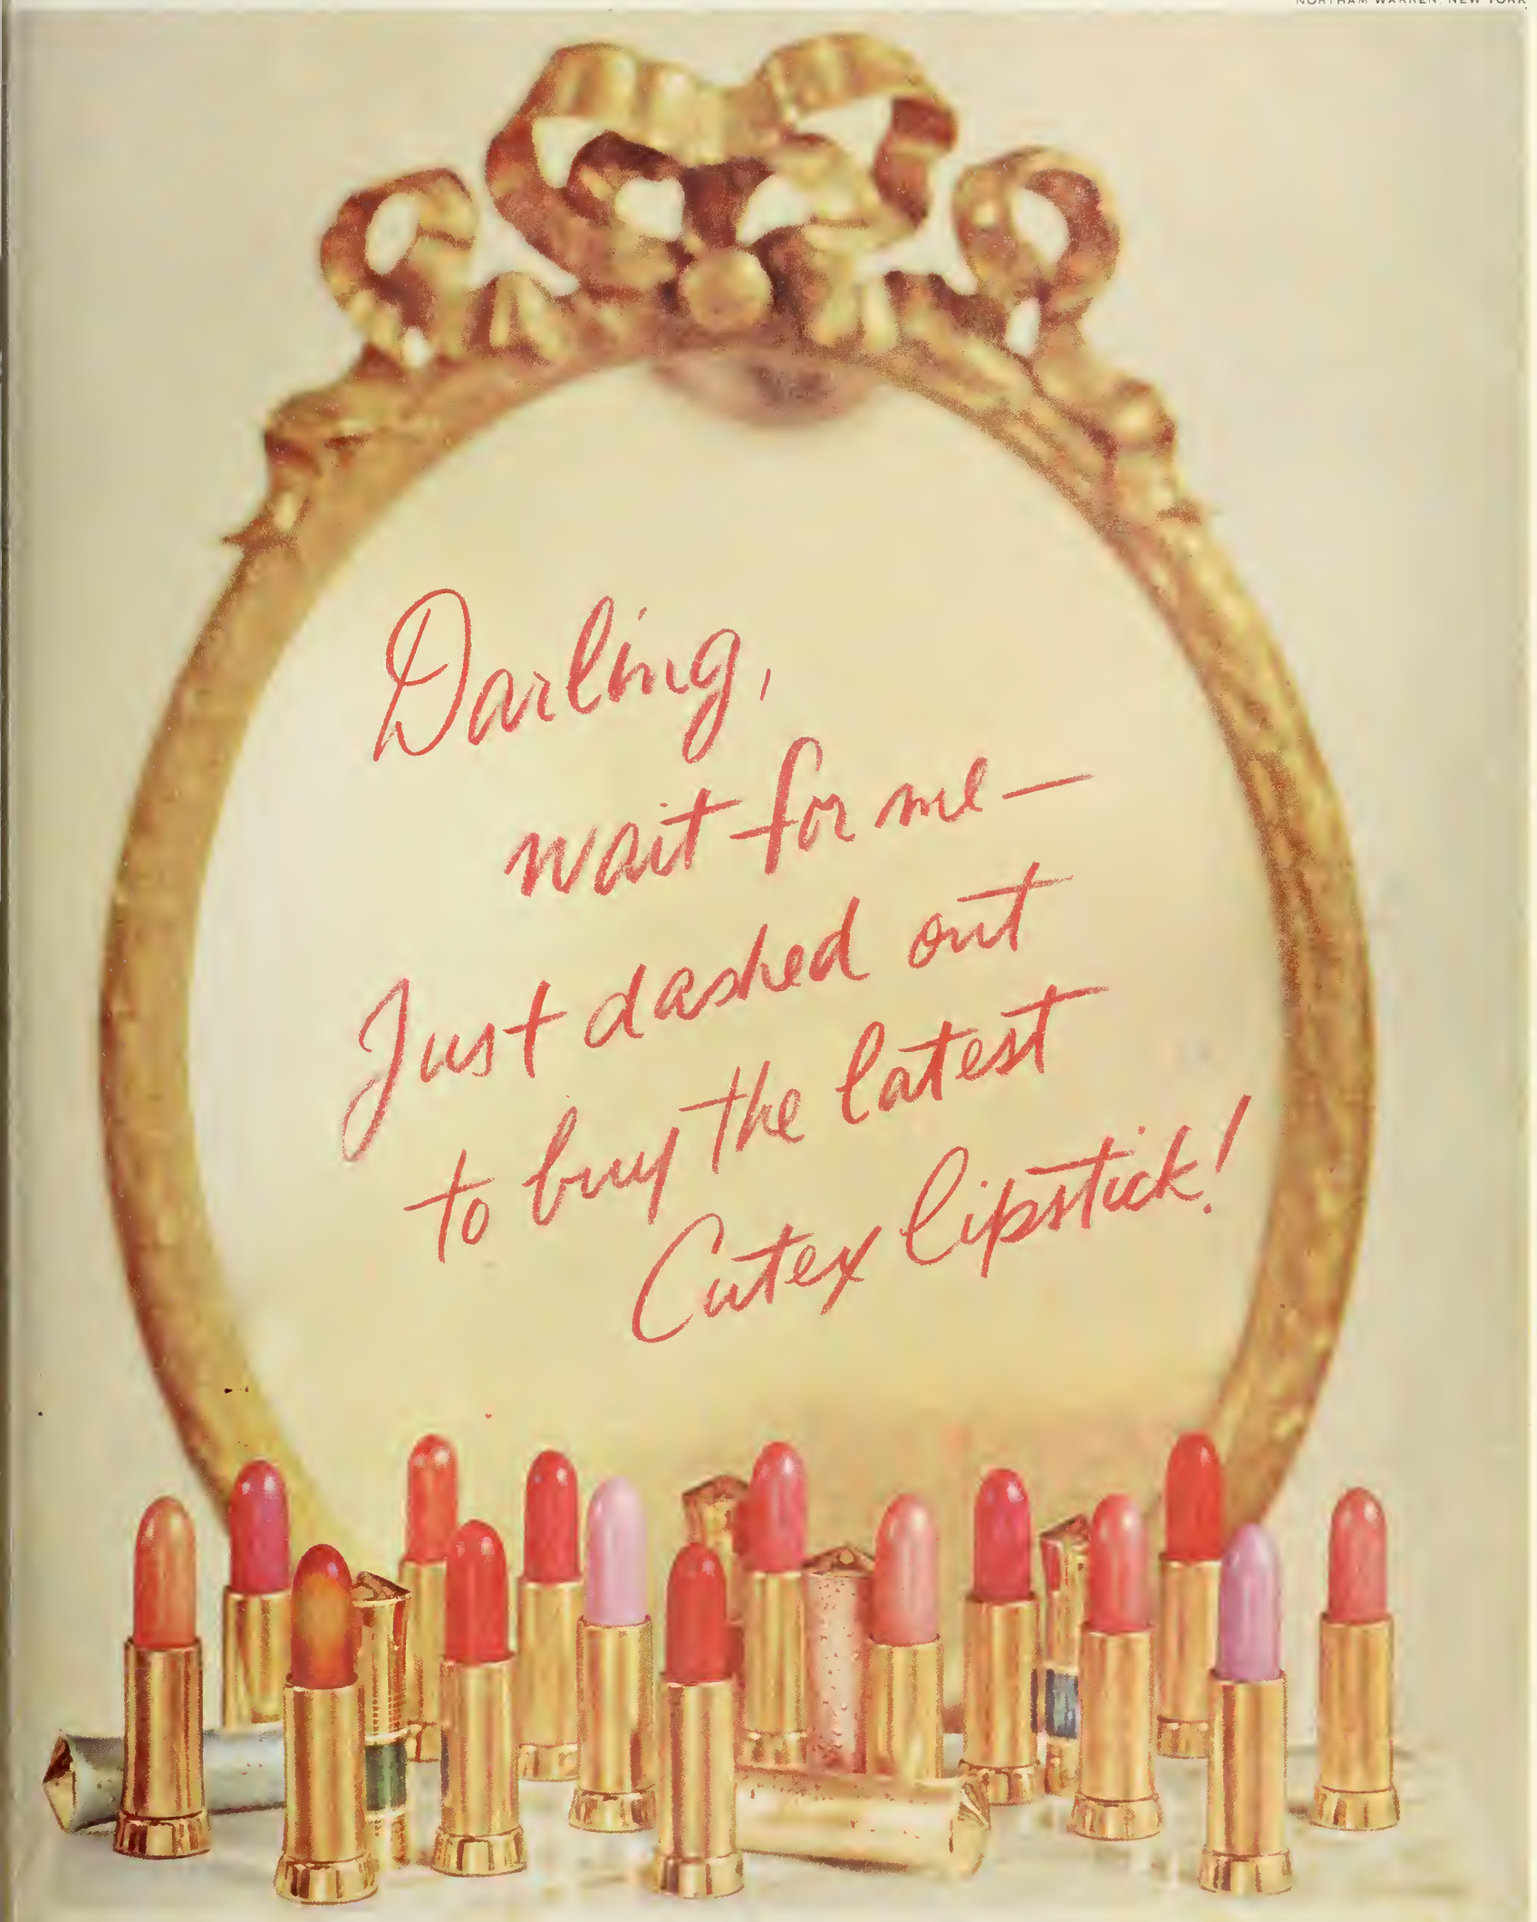
We've now hoisted our forty-eight-state flag on five or six holidays since Alaska became our fort ninth; so far no gendarme has knocked at our door to warn us it's out of date.

I wish we could grow grass with our heroic efforts in certain spots as we grow all sorts of volunteer plants in the cracks of our driveway and tennis court. Nature's a pixy.

Across the woods westward came yells from a Little League ball park. We sauntered over in time to witness an American tragedy: attempting to catch a long fly, a small athlete muffed the ball, maybe because his mother was yelling at him so shrilly.

I hope in this 1960 election to save the republic, the voters will elect the best candidates; and at least a few congressmen who can be intentionally funny.

My good-driver citation of the month goes to novelist MacKinlay Kantor, who puts on a safety b to drive to the drugstore. (He used to go on bombing missions.) "I wouldn't drive across a parking lot," he growls, "without fastening my seat belt."



We drive to the airport for brunch or dinner; it gives me a Marseilles or Naples water-front illusion as we gaze into the ocean-sky. I'd rather have a mediocre meal there than a good one sans view. (Luckily, the food's good.)

I don't expect genius in movies or TV. But I'm irritated when a silly tale conveys to a youthful audience that any life problem can be solved by punching somebody in the n

For Mrs. Universe I nominate the tactful wife who, amid loud peals of triumph from her husband who'd just landed a five-pound fish, demurely caught one which weighed exactly two ounces less.

. . . When Harlan III at 3 rips his nail and explains "I've got a bleed on my finger,"
. . . Or Suzi, an animal lover at 4, whinnies like a horse and screams when deprived of ha[illegible]t lizard,
. . . And Pat at 6 insists on taking his newly captured Cecropia moth to kindergarten,
. . . Or Tracy appears at 1½ with her blond hair in a pony tail,
. . . And Eric at 1 thinks anything his brother can do he can do better,
Then I try vainly to remember if bachelor days offered more ceaseless excitements and an[illegible] ents than family

NORTHAM WARREN, NEW YORK

. He was glad he waited...she looked so fetching in "Clear Red," one of the gayest fashion-n colors by Cutex® in long-lasting Sheer Lanolin and creamy new Delicate lipsticks!

"How long must we wait to marry?

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

DO YOU AGREE?

My husband's take-home pay is $548 a month. We have two children. How large a mortgage payment can we afford?

About $95–$115.

ASK YOURSELF:

Does Our First-Year Budget Work?

Almost invariably, the first problem newly married couples face is that of budgeting their income. Listed below are the typical expenditures of young couples whose take-home pay from the husband's job ranges from $425 to $575 a month. (If you don't know, start now to keep records.)

	Per Month
1. Food, including meals away from home	$80–100
2. Rent or mortgage payments	75–100
3. Transportation and automobile	40–55
4. Clothing, plus cleaning and repairs	30–40
5. Personal insurance and taxes	30–35
6. House furnishings and payments	25–30
7. Education, hobbies, recreation	20–25
8. House operation, supplies, utilities	20–25
9. Personal care (barber, beauty shop)	20–25
10. Contributions (church, charity)	15–35
11. Medical and dental care, drugs	15–20
12 "Special" (tobacco, alcohol, etc.)	15–20
13. Savings for vacation and Christmas	15–20
14. Savings (or debt payment)	25–45

If you aren't making ends meet, these figures can help you determine where adjustments should be made. If the wife works, net proceeds (after job expenses) from her job should be used to build up a reserve for starting a family or buying a home, rather than raising the standard of living.

WHEN PARENTS ARE UNREASONABLE, WHAT SHOULD YOUNG PEOPLE DO?

Just after Harry graduated and Joan finished her junior year they asked to take our marriage tests, including the Marriage Happiness Prediction test. When the results were available, they came in for a conference.

Tests do not measure the depth or genuineness of love. Their purpose is to find out whether a couple have the characteristics, attitudes and traits of personality associated with happy marriage. On the basis of our research with thousands of college couples, we would expect Joan and Harry to be happier in marriage than four out of five. Naturally they were gratified by this report, but they had a serious problem, in that Joan's father steadfastly opposed their engagement.

Joan and Harry started dating fairly regularly early in her freshman year, and during the summer he visited her home and met her parents. By the following Christmas they were going steady, and Joan spent part of the holiday at Harry's home. In the spring they became informally engaged, and asked their parents' permission to announce the engagement and be married the next year, after Harry's graduation. Since he would be commissioned a naval officer on graduation, he would be financially able to marry.

Harry's parents agreed, but Joan's father objected. When Harry asked why, Mr. S. replied that they were too young, that talk of marriage should wait till both had completed their education, and that as an attorney he has seen so much married unhappiness that he wanted Joan to be very sure of her future before committing herself.

Disappointed as Harry was, he saw some justification for Mr. S.'s attitude, so they dropped the subject for another semester. Harry then suggested that the engagement be announced right after graduation, and that they be married either in late summer or at Christmas. Joan would complete her college work and then join him.

Joan's mother reported the plan to her husband, who again flatly refused, implying that Harry was not the right husband for Joan. Harry, an outstanding student and a respected young man, again asked for an explanation. Mr. S. said, "I want Joan to finish her education and I don't want her to marry a military man with no permanent roots. You are considering a Navy career. If you change your mind after your tour of duty, we can talk about it then."

Harry managed to hold his temper, but both he and Joan were indignant and resentful. At this point they decided to take marriage tests to see if impartial evidence supported their faith in their suitability for each other. The fact that they had never had a serious disagreement in a courtship of more than two and a half years did not impress Mr. S.

At our conference, various possibilities were discussed, ranging from the father's plan (no marriage and no public engagement for at least three years) to Harry's plan and wish—immediate engagement and marriage late in the summer, with Joan returning to school at the risk of substantial indebtedness.

After discussion, Harry and Joan finally agreed to the advantages of the alternative proposed by the counselor: unannounced engagement in early fall, marriage at Christmas, with Joan returning to college for her final semester, at Harry's expense and on borrowed funds if Mr. S. refused to co-operate. Joan's degree would be assured; the couple would be able to assume the finances without going dangerously into debt; Harry's basic training would be complete and their domestic arrangements more predictable: and there was at least a chance that with time and Joan's mother's persuasion, Mr. S. would modify his position.

Obviously, parents want the best for their children in marriage, but the parents' ideas of what is best may be colored by personal, even selfish, considerations. In any event, the relationship between Harry and Joan has triumphantly withstood the test of time—and there is not much Mr. S. can do about it. Joan's mother has done her best to be fair to both her husband and her daughter. Harry's tolerance has exceeded that of most young men in love. But the father has never evaluated the situation from any viewpoint but his own.

He would be well advised to co-operate. The marriage may work out better than he expects. My prediction is that it will.

STANDARDS TO LIVE BY

"Articles about juvenile delinquency frighten me, especially since the children of respected friends of ours have got into serious trouble. The seventeen-year-old daughter of one of my best friends became pregnant; the son of another was arrested for stealing. Our two daughters and our son are in their teens. They have a good home, plenty of affection, we all go to church regularly, and my husband and I try to set them a good example, as the experts advise. But our friends did the same for their children! Won't you please write a down-to-earth article about ways parents can help their children develop standards and ideals to guide them through the difficult years?"

This mother needs to develop more confidence in herself and in her children. Occasionally a child brought up by loving and understanding parents in a good home does become a delinquent, but such cases are rare. Though juvenile delinquency occurs at all levels of our society, it is far more common among children who are economically underprivileged or emotionally deprived, or both.

Nevertheless, every mother and father should be anxious to help their child develop a set of standards, an acceptable personal code to evaluate the behavior and attitudes of others and regulate his own. The child who has learned at home to respect truth and admire honesty is not likely to deceive his parents in important matters or to tolerate deceitfulness in others.

What are some of the forces outside the home that shape the personal philosophy of the maturing individual?

School usually gives the child his first continuing experience of life outside the home, and provides an opportunity to acquire a sense of responsibility. The wise parent fosters the child's independence and self-reliance by refraining from undue interference or overprotection, at the same time exhibiting an active interest in his progress.

Religious training. Attendance at Sunday school or church is valuable not only because it provides religious education, but also because it enhances a child's sense of belonging, and extends his acquaintances among other children whose parents have high standards and values. Religious observance within the home, such as family prayers or grace at the table, can pave the way for informal discussion of such concepts as honesty, justice and kindness.

Community standards. Since most people tend to adapt their behavior and beliefs to those of their associates, children and parents alike are influenced by the standards of their community. But in diversified communities where social and economic differences are extreme, different groups develop different standards. The individual, particularly the young person who is exposed to several conflicting behavior patterns, may find it difficult to develop a consistent philosophy. In such a situation, the father and mother must set a consistent example in their own behavior, and actively promote those values that they believe in.

Friends and contemporaries probably influence behavior away from home at least as much as parents. Parents should know and welcome their children's friends as individuals. The mother and father who can take part in a game or carry on a lively conversation with their children's friends are in a position to make constructive comments and suggestions. But if a child's feelings and values are basically sound and acceptable to the parents, behavior deviations rarely cause serious difficulties.

Ask yourself these questions: Does my child confide in me? Do I really listen with undivided attention to these confidences? Do we (not I) make decisions and reach conclusions? If your answers are all yes, you can confidently expect your child to behave like a responsible member of society.

"TECNIQUE Color-Tone"

ll the ease and gentleness of a fine color rinse...but look, it lasts up to 8 weeks! Blends naturally...no drastic change, no artificial look!

ER BEFORE, a hair color with inse mildness plus long-lasting nience; it conditions, too! Tecnique touches your hair with high- and accents its natural color no drastic change, only new y. Always your own color is But unlike a rinse, Tecnique penetrates hair to last up to ks, often longer.

OUCH-UP PROBLEM, won't sham- ut, streak or rub off. Tecnique, ordinary rinses, tints and never looks less than beauti- fully natural. Exclusive ACTOGEN, a mild creaming agent, works color into individual hair strands instead of just coating the surface. Tecnique also blends in with new hair growth —never a tell-tale "dye line."

TECNIQUE WILL:	TECNIQUE WON'T:
• Highlight, accent natural hair color.	• Need touch-ups (never a "dye line").
• Last up to 8 weeks, often longer.	• Harm hair or add unnatural color.
• Condition hair with fine oils.	• Wash out, streak or rub off.

CONDITIONS, TOO . . . fine oils add luster, make your hair soft to the touch and easy to manage. Apply Tecnique any time . . . even right after a permanent . . . use it for years and never see hair go harsh.

ADDS THE ACCENT your hair needs for true natural beauty—the just-right dash of auburn, spicy brown or glowing gold. Shampoo-simple, you can't make a mistake, color action stops automatically. 12 shades to choose from . . . at all leading drug and department stores (also available as a moderately-priced salon service). Satisfaction guaranteed. SHULTON, 630 5th Ave., NYC. Price 2.00 plus tax.

"TECNIQUE Color-Tone"

. . . a glimmer . . . a gleam . . . soft color glows in your hair

There are many questions which w would like to ask a trusted physicia there is not always the opportuni
this series, Tell Me, Doctor, I Schauffler discusses some of the pro which have been sent to him by re
The situations are all real, but a names which are used are fict

TELL ME, DOCTOR

By GOODRICH C. SCHAUFFLER, M.D.

"Many babies that were lost after the third month of pregnancy—as yours were, Mrs. Clarkson—we can save now. By those very 'newfangled methods' Old Doctor Pierce so mistrusted."

ABBO

The doctor was just putting down his telephon
Mrs. Clarkson entered the consulting room. She was wearing a beco maternity costume, and the doctor placed her immediately as a ma and intelligent person.

"This is quite a coincidence, Mrs. Clarkson," the doctor
"That was your doctor I was just talking to. He gave me a pretty briefing on you. Suppose I review it quickly before getting your s as you see it. I believe that will save us time and energy."

Mrs. Clarkson, smiling her assent, composed herself to listen.

The doctor began: "According to Doctor Pierce, you are th
onc. You have miscarried three times—aborted spontaneously, we do call it—roughly at two-year intervals. The first time was at three a half months; the second was at about four months. You were then u the care of Doctor Pierce, Senior. Is all that correct?"

"Yes. The 'Old Doctor'—that's what we all called Doctor Pi Senior, after his son joined him in his practice—didn't seem very n upset by the miscarriages. He said this sort of thing occurred quite o and that there was a tendency to carry the baby longer with each p nancy. He thought that if we would just wait it out patiently, eventu we would have a live baby."

The doctor glanced at the notes he had made during his pl conversation. "Young Doctor Pierce tells me you did carry the next to five and a half months."

"Yes, Doctor. It was pretty hard to lose that one; my husband
I had been counting on saving it."

"We'll hope for a happier ending with your present pregnan the doctor said sympathetically. "Mrs. Clarkson, have you any idea to why you lost those three babies?"

"Doctor Pierce, Senior, said it was just something that seem happen with a good many women—that doctors themselves don't k the reason. He said that I'm healthy, and normal in every way. But y ago he operated on my cervix, removed part of it, because of an infect
He may have forgotten about it. My husband and I have wondered whe that could have had anything to do with the miscarriages."

"It's possible. A good many of these mysterious cases Do Pierce, Senior, referred to do involve previous operations, or injur the cervix, as from childbirth. Can you think of anything else?"

"The first time I don't think I took very good care of myse went right on doing my heavy housework. I even went bowling a num of times. But in the next two pregnancies, I was as careful as I knew to be. The last time, in fact, Old Doctor Pierce kept me flat in bed more than six weeks, and it didn't do the least bit of good."

"Were you given any medication?" CONTINUED ON PAG

Advertisement

Drug

How tension taxes your body

"A woman's work is never done." She's never able to relax completely from her responsibilities to her home and family. She's never completely free from the unending series of little crises that, when added to her jam-packed schedule, brings on a lot of tension.

Tension is an insidious thing. You have one of those bad days and suddenly tension erupts. You're the victim of a miserable headache, taut nerves and muscles, queasy stomach.

When you're in the throes of such tension, you need more than a simple headache remedy to ease your pain, tight nerves and stomach jitters. So take Bufferin® to relieve not just one—but all three—of your symptoms.

The quick and potent action of Bufferin in relieving the pain of headache, tension's most nagging and painful symptom, has been known for many years. And clinical studies prove that Bufferin works twice as fast as aspirin for millions—even faster for many others.

Equally important, stomach jitters are calmed by Bufferin with Di-Alminate*, the exclusive stomach-soothing agent which only Bufferin adds to aspirin.

And, as Bufferin circulates through the bloodstream, it exerts an over-all calming effect on your body by relaxing tight nerves.

Whenever you have one of those bad days and feel tension building up, take Bufferin—to relieve your headache, relax your nerves and soothe your stomach.

*Bristol-Myers Registered Trademark for aluminum glycinate and magnesium carbonate

And what stirred up this lovely storm? SWEET MUSIC*, the bra with the spoke-stitched cups for fashion's newest "rounded look". A, B, C cups, 2.50. Also in the SWEET MUSIC family tree: SWEET MUSIC CONTOUR, A, B cups, 3.95; SWEET MUSIC LACE CONTOUR, A, B cups, 3.95; SWEET MUSIC ELASTIC, A, B, C cups, 3.00.

*REG. U. S. PAT. OFF. ©1960 MAIDENFORM, INC. NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

ED FROM PAGE 36

inly was. Hypodermics of different , till I began to feel like a pincush-didn't do any good either."
prings us up to your present prege doctor said. "You are five months ht? Since his father's stroke—let's months ago—Doctor Pierce, Junior,
His ideas about handling your case different from those of his father,

he stopped the hormones his father giving me. And he has examined me nally. He told me his father strongly ed a vaginal examination after the th of pregnancy—said he called it a ed notion that might induce mis-–but the Young Doctor asked my n and I gave it. The second time he me, he asked me to see you right

THE KISS

MELORA HOBBS POND

h dies between our lips and sorrow sings.
iss for the world's woe, our private grief,
reen leaves turning, falling,
seesaw days
ping like chestnuts, and our mperfect selves;
iss as prisoners asking a repricve.

iss for midnights with the sky
in motion,
n and clouds, and pulsing seas
of grass,
oniddays long and level as a plain,
n parks are still with life, like primitives;
iss as children playing
make-believe.

iss for Everyman, and make this moment immortality, an Indian summer of our losses, a harvest of the grave,
lance against time, a stay of sentence;
iss for all we love and cannot save.

got the impression that he wanted to hing else his father would disapprove, ed to have another opinion first."
g Doctor Pierce told me he holds a nion of your intelligence," the doctor ee he is right. But I'll need to examine elf before we talk any further. Won't n down the hall? Mary Ann will give e progesterone and then we will check fully."
Clarkson, who had started toward the ng room, stopped short. "Young Doc-e gave me progesterone, too, before ined me. I'm curious about that. I a magazine article—something about rone having a bad effect on the baby en in pregnancy."
esterone in its natural form is an hormone which relaxes the uterus and ff or softens dangerous contractions.
einforces the lining of the womb so holds the roots of a pregnancy more here is a new synthetic, progesterone-stance which has been given to a good -called 'habitual aborters.' These are who have lost three or more early cies. The synthetic substance probably retain the pregnancy. But it may have linizing tendency in girl babies.

"Natural progesterone has no such dangers. Anyway, there is no chance of masculinizing a female fetus after the first three months of pregnancy, and you are well past that. If there is any risk at all in vaginal examination at your stage of the game, the progesterone should protect against it. But we'll be very careful."

The examination was so gentle, in fact, that Mrs. Clarkson declared she barely felt it. Back in the consulting room, the doctor told her:

"You have estimated the situation very shrewdly, Mrs. Clarkson. I am going to say to you frankly, because I think you already understand, that young Doctor Pierce finds himself in an embarrassing position. You were his father's patient, and he inherited you after his father became disabled. The young doctor disagrees with his father, but he hesitated to go ahead with more 'newfangled procedures' because his father feels so strongly about them.

"I am going to confess that just a few years ago, I myself would have placed you, as Doctor Pierce, Senior, did, in the group of women who are habitual aborters for no cause that a doctor can discover. Pierce says there seems to be no emotional or nervous factor, and you certainly appear well adjusted to me. There is nothing wrong with you physically, in the usual sense."

"Oh, dear, that is exactly what Old Doctor Pierce used to say! I was hoping so much that you could help me!"

"That was a few years ago, Mrs. Clarkson. There have been some important developments since." The doctor leaned back in his chair, crossed his knees. "We doctors are frequently attacked for reversing our ideas and our treatments every so often. But it seems to me that sometimes we are too slow to accept new ideas, or to examine old theories to see if they hold good. The idea about no vaginal examinations after the third month of pregnancy is a case in point. Many babies have been lost as a result. Of course there must be strict antiseptic preparation, proper precautions. But if we had observed the actual condition of the cervix, during pregnancy, in women prone to miscarry for no discernible reason, we could have avoided many of these tragedies."

"Oh, Doctor, that is what I wanted to hear!"

"Yes, a few years ago doctors in different parts of the world—Calcutta, Melbourne and Brooklyn—decided more or less simultaneously to break the taboo, find out what was really happening in these 'inexplicable' abortion cases. What they found made the rest of us feel rather silly." He paused.

"Don't stop, Doctor! You can't imagine how interested I am!"

"I was just thinking how to make it clear. You must understand that in an ordinary pregnancy, up to the time of delivery the canal of the cervix is a short, straight tube no thicker than a slate pencil, or at most a lead pencil. But in the majority of the late aborters examined, the investigators discovered that it had assumed the shape and characteristics of a cervix at the beginning of labor. At the top, where it connects with the uterus, it had relaxed and opened up until it was cone-shaped. At the bottom, it had thinned out and the opening had dilated to the size of a dime or a quarter, maybe even larger. The sac of membranes, containing the amniotic fluid and the baby, had bulged into this thin-walled opening. The baby could often be felt through the membranes. Any slight jar could rupture the thin sac, the amniotic fluid would gush out and the baby would soon be expelled. This explains many, at least, of these late spontaneous abortions that doctors haven't been able to account for in the past."

"And is that what you found in my case, Doctor?"

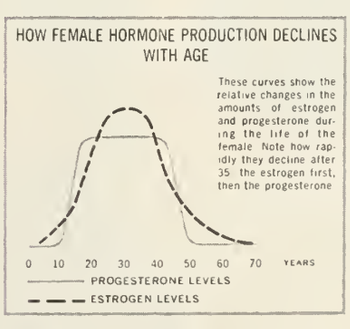
The doctor straightened in his chair, folded his hands on his desk. "Frankly, I could feel your baby's little nose quite plainly through the sac of fluid, where it bulges out into the widened cervix. The sac hasn't ruptured yet, but it is in real danger of rupturing. Doctor Pierce, Junior, was afraid that if you wait it out, you will lose this baby the way you did the others. I agree with him absolutely."

Advertisement

How New Wonder Drug Face Cream Restores Young Look to Skin

A Report by Helena Rubinstein

What makes young skin so firm, resilient, smooth? It is rich in the two vital female hormones, estrogen and progesterone. These are the very hormones that have helped shape every inch of every woman from Venus to you and me—the same hormones contained in my new Ultra Feminine® Face Cream.



HELENA RUBINSTEIN
First Lady of Beauty Science

Why does a maturing woman need a supplement of these hormones? As she gets older, her body does not produce estrogen and progesterone as lavishly as before (see chart below). We see the difference in the skin—the dryness, the age lines.

Almost every one of us, in an attempt to turn the tide, has tried many of the oils and moisture ingredients that are on sale everywhere. No surface additive of moisture, no man-made lubricant can duplicate the results of nature's own precious estrogen and progesterone.

Throughout my life, I have sought through scientific experimentation to recapture the female hormone benefits of young skin for the mature skin. Out of my exciting research with the celebrated Dr. Joseph Kapp of Vienna, some thirty years ago, came the first estrogenic hormone face cream. And it won half the battle against aging skin.

In recent years I have again been involved in a vast and exciting hormone research project, this time aided by doctors, research scientists, hospitals, universities, clinics all over the United States. The result is my Ultra Feminine Face Cream, the first face cream to contain both vital female hormones, estrogen and progesterone.

Now you can look young again! Medical tests show that Ultra Feminine actually reverses two of the aging processes of the skin!

With renewed estrogen, the cells deep within the skin layers can hold maximum moisture once again. These cells, plumped out once more, support the surface firmly. Lines smooth out. Wrinkles due to dryness are reduced. Young skin tone is restored. With the help of progesterone the oil glands are reactivated to produce at a younger rate again. The skin is soft, dewy, protected. The whole expression of the face looks more youthful!

And so many Ultra Feminine users have written to me, personally, to tell of their enthusiasm and delight with this wonder drug cosmetic! Ultra Feminine actually replenishes physiological substances within the skin. It comes to you with the highest recommendation, for it meets the same rigid testing as drugs in a doctor's prescription.

Because your skin cannot store up hormones, let me urge you to give your skin its daily hormone requirement, by using Ultra Feminine every night. Within one month, your skin will look—and act—young again, and continued use will maintain these results. Definitely, here is pleasant treatment with marvelous rewards—at a cost of just pennies a day—$3.50 for a 30-day supply, $5.50 for 60 days.

You will be fascinated to find out how the female hormones determine your womanliness—how they put lustre in the hair, softness in the voice as well as the personality. Write to me for my free booklet, "The Hormones That Make You Every Inch a Woman" which includes a special section of Vital Statistics of American Womanhood. Address your request to Helena Rubinstein, Department A, 655 Fifth Avenue, New York 22, New York.

© 1960, Helena Rubinstein, Inc.

Without previous training, you can add importantly to family income by acting as a STANLEY Dealer

Have you time you can spare from household duties, or from your present job, which you would like to turn into money? Money for new fall clothes for yourself or children? Money for school expenses? Money to help buy a new car, new furniture, a new home? Money to put aside for a rainy day? In brief, would you like to engage in pleasant, profitable work for a few hours a day? Or would you like to have a richly-rewarding, full time career in business for yourself?

No matter which of these opportunities you seek, a STANLEY Dealership offers above-average returns for the time you invest. You earn from the start. We show you how. Neither age nor sex is a bar. You supply housewives with STANLEY's famous Housekeeping and Personal Grooming Aids. Nationally advertised, they are in big demand throughout the U.S. and Canada. For confidential information about how you, too, can become one of STANLEY's many good-money-earning Dealers, phone your local STANLEY Branch Office, or just fill out and mail the coupon below.

STANHOME

ORIGINATORS OF THE FAMOUS STANLEY HOSTESS PARTY PLAN

Stanley Home Products, Inc., Westfield, Mass., Stanley Home Products of Canada Ltd., London, Ont., Stanhome de Mexico, S.A. de C.V., Mexico City, Mexico

Fill Out And Mail This Coupon Today

Sales Department, Stanley Home Products, Inc., Westfield, Mass.

Gentlemen: I am interested in learning more about how as a STANLEY Dealer I can make from $35.00 and up weekly in spare time, $100.00 and more weekly in full time.

MY NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

CITY ..... ZONE ..... STATE .....

PRESENT OCCUPATION .....

TELEPHONE NUMBER .....

(Copr. Stanley Home Products, Inc. 1960)

Mrs. Clarkson said quietly, "You and Young Doctor Pierce wouldn't have carried things this far unless there is some solution."

"There is. And it is about the most obvious one possible, though it took the investigators a while to figure it out, it was so simple! The problem, of course, is to keep the baby inside the uterus, and the sac of membranes from rupturing, until the baby is sufficiently developed to be able to survive in the outside world. Just for fun, Mrs. Clarkson, what solution would you suggest?"

Mrs. Clarkson thought for a moment. "Well, you might tie a string tightly around the top of the cervix to keep the baby back. I know that's crazy, though, because it couldn't possibly be that simple."

The doctor chuckled. "It isn't crazy at all. That's the best solution that has been found so far. Though it wasn't quite as simple as it sounds. A good deal of experimenting had to be done before the right kind of tie string was hit upon. Catgut isn't much good for various reasons. What seems to work best is a wide thong of some sort of nonirritating fiber. To date we have been using ox fascia mostly—the fascia is the sheet of fibrous tissue covering the muscles just under the skin. Sometimes a sheet of fibrous tissue is cut from the patient's own thigh. However, there is a new thong of woven Dacron that seems even better.

"After a usable material was found, the rest was simple. We weave the thong in and out of the outer tissues surrounding the cone-like upper section of the cervix. Then we pull it together, the way you close a tobacco pouch or an old-fashioned purse, and tie it snugly.

> To take refuge from life is to refuse it. Life generally offers due scope for the leading instinct in a man or a woman; and sometimes it offers the scope at a very low price, at no price at all.
> ARNOLD BENNETT

In fact, the process is called the 'purse-string' operation."

"And it works?"

"In about sixty-five to seventy per cent of cases, taking live babies that result as our measure. Of course there is a certain danger that the operation itself may cause the sac to rupture—especially if it's done after there are signs of impending labor, such as bleeding or cramps. But the percentage of success is good, when you realize that most of the babies now born alive would undoubtedly have been lost without the operation. I should think your chance is better than average, because everything else about you is so normal."

"How does the baby get out of the womb when the time comes for it to be born? Do you just cut the thong?"

"At first we did, and some doctors still do. But it is difficult to know the right time to cut it. There have been some unfortunate accidents. Nowadays most of us leave the thong in place and deliver the baby by Caesarean section. The general experience has been that if this method succeeds in the first pregnancy where it is tried, it is likely to succeed with subsequent babies, though not always. The thong is not irritating and may often be left in place for at least two later pregnancies. There are doctors who prefer to repair the cervix between pregnancies. That is somewhat a matter of opinion. But where a cervix proves to be 'incompetent' during a pregnancy—incompetent, that is, to hold the baby back until the right time comes for it to be born—the best time to operate is between the third and sixth months. I would say there is no time to lose in your case."

Mrs. Clarkson was operated on the next morning, was up and about four days later, led a quiet but normally active life for the next three or four months. The baby, an eight-pounder, was delivered at forty-one weeks by an uneventful Caesarean section. Perhaps best of all, the happy parents were promised an excellent chance of having further live, healthy babies.

Next month Dr. Schauffler discusses the "classes" of cancer.

SAFER, SURER

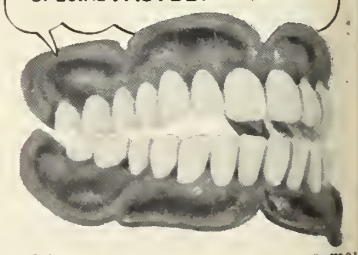
Seiberling

HOUSEHOLD GLOVES

Look for these SEIBERLING GLOVES at stores everywhere!

- COMFYS®...comfy-tex lined natural rubber
- TUFFIES®...two-tone neoprene latex
- FIRMGRIP®...natural and neoprene latex

SEIBERLING LATEX PRODUCTS
New Bremen, Ohio



CONSTIPATION Make You Weak?

No need to let constipation "get yo down." To get the kind of relief tha doesn't cause weakness, be sure to g Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets. Doesn cause cramps. Contains ingredien that act to soften waste, stimula intestines without causing upsettin digestive distress.

In clinical study Dr. Edwards' Oliv Tablets rated 71% better, on the ave age, than other laxatives tested. The included candy and chewing gum la atives, so-called "liver" pills, a wel known bulk laxative, milk of mag nesia and ordinary mineral oil.

So why look further? Get relief with out distressing weakness. Ask fo Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets today!

WHEN YOUR FALSE TEETH GET ON YOUR NERVES USE SPECIAL FASTEETH POWDER

When false teeth get on your nerves mak dentists give special FASTEETH powder. helps hold teeth in place—helps keep the from slipping or dropping down when yo talk—makes you feel more secure. FASTEET cushions tender gums so you can bite hard and eat easier, faster with greater comfor FASTEETH helps you laugh and speak mo clearly without embarrassment. FASTEETH alkaline (non-acid). Checks "plate odo (denture breath). At drug counters everywher

BROWN SHOE COMPANY

Quality at your feet

Butter-soft Funsters... easy walking, easy price

Everything to give your feet a good time has been put into this Funster collection. Butter-soft, flexible casuals that fit like Naturalizers always do. Yours for a happy-go-lucky footing at this budget-happy price.

11.99

Other styles, 8.99 to 14.99. Higher Denver West and Canada

Watch for National Funsters Week at your Naturalizer retailer

FUNSTERS by Naturalizer

THE SHOE WITH THE BEAUTIFUL FIT

Naturalizer Division, Brown Shoe Company, St. Louis, Missouri.
Also manufactured in Canada by Brown Shoe Company of Canada, Ltd., Perth, Ontario

Here's new relief from miseries of HAY FEVER

AND OTHER POLLEN ALLERGIES

Revolutionary 3-layer tablet acts directly on CRITICAL AREAS of POLLEN IRRITATION

Working through the bloodstream, DRISTAN: 1. DECONGESTS swollen nasal passages. Unblocks congestion deep in the nose-sinus area where sprays and mists may not reach. 2. RELIEVES watery, itchy eyes... cheeks sniffles, sneezing... restores free breathing. 3. PROTECTS against further pollen irritation. This season, you don't have to suffer the maddening miseries of hay fever and other pollen allergies. DRISTAN Decongestant Tablets ... remarkable medical achievement ... bring quick, long-lasting relief. Working through the bloodstream, DRISTAN's decongestant and anti-allergic actions reach all delicate pollen-irritated membranes. Shrink swollen tissues ... drain clogged passages. Breathing becomes free, deep and natural. Moreover, DRISTAN sets up a special protective barrier to curb further pollen irritation. This is DRISTAN's kind of relief ... swift, prolonged, effective. Millions already depend on DRISTAN for relief of hay fever miseries. Why don't you? This season, be ready for the pollen invasion. Get DRISTAN Decongestant Tablets. And ... important ... accept no substitutes!

THIS EXCLUSIVE DRISTAN TABLET FORMULA CANNOT BE DUPLICATED!

DRISTAN is the exclusive 3-layer tablet discovery which for the first time makes it possible to unite certain medically-proven ingredients into one fast-acting uncoated tablet. Accept no substitute.

BEFORE: With hay fever and other pollen irritations, sensitive nose and head membranes become irritated. Tissues swell, passages clog, breathing becomes difficult.

AFTER: Swollen membranes decongested, drained by DRISTAN. Swelling is reduced, free breathing restored. And a protective barrier guards against further pollen irritation.

There's Nothing Like

DRISTAN® Decongestant Tablets

"The state the world's in, Polly, all I'm planting is annuals."

STEVENSON

© 1960 THE NEW YORKER MAGAZINE, INC.

UNDER COVER

By BERNARDINE KIELTY

Nan Fairbrother, author of THE CHEERFUL DAY, is a beautiful young Englishwoman, tall, dark-haired and blue-eyed. She is the wife of a doctor and mother of two sons. They live in a house on Harley Street, where London doctors like to live, and where the houses all look alike except theirs, which has two big plants on either side of the front door. The lady has a green thumb. During the war while her husband was in the army she and her two little boys moved to comparative safety in Buckinghamshire, and lived in a sixteenth-century Tudor house, in sixteenth-century condition. The house was waterless, heatless and drafty. But the three got the smack of rural England into their bones and were blooming with hardy health when their time was up. An English Year tells this story. Now she writes about the return to London, and the two wide-eyed country boys growing up into offhand casual young Londoners. The Cheerful Day (Knopf) is a portrait of the sprawling big city of buses and bobbies, and a handbook of family living—good-fellowship, gourmet food eaten in the kitchen, wit and ideas tossed nonchalantly about.

Personality seems to shine through women's books more than through men's. You couldn't read THREE MEN ON THE LEFT HAND (Doubleday) without recognizing the author for a sophisticate. Ilka Chase is the true New York sophisticate—smart, friendly, openhearted, tolerant. You have to be tolerant if you live in New York's noise and dirt and torn-up streets, with its sassy taxi drivers and handsome policemen, delicatessen countermen and uniformed doormen, high-heeled gals, and the honky-tonk of Broadway. Ilka has boundless energy. She's on TV, she lectures across the country, she's a clever actress and a witty writer. Her wit makes her books; in this novel I defy anyone to find a cliché. She never lets her manager down, and she lives a contentedly happy existence with her doctor husband on New York's busiest cross street. When her book came out there was a cocktail party celebrating a triple birthday: Ilka's, her husband's and the book's.

CLEA brings to an end Lawrence Durrell's four-part novel—Justine, Balthazar, Mountolive (Dutton). Here is a novel in which the author is far removed and uninvolved, portraying a world seen from an Olympian distance. It is an outstanding work of art, rich, complex, subtle. It is also "contrived"—a fighting word to some readers, but not to those who relish Conrad, Henry James and James Gould Cozzens.

Larry, according to his brother Gerald, who is no mean writer himself (The Bafut Beagles, My Family and Other Animals), showed his power to rouse others at an early age. Single-handedly he persuaded the whole family to move out of England and on to Corfu—three boys, a girl and their widowed mother. When they packed to go, facing an indefinite length of time (they stayed five years!), it was characteristic of Larry that he carried two trunks of books and a briefcase containing his clothes; and that Gerald, aged ten, carried a butterfly net, a dog, and a jam jar full of caterpillars all in imminent danger of turning into chrysalises. Gerald became a biologist.

An excellent book for school administrators, boards of education, citizens, parents is SCHOOLS OF TOMORROW—TODAY, by Arthur D. Morse (Doubleday). . . . For little children there are LINEN BOOKS—durable, eight-paged books with pictures (Saalfield Pub. Co., Akron 1, Ohio, 59c). . . . And a good novel-mystery: THE GREEN-EYED MONSTER, by Patrick Quentin (Random).

A public statement concerning Metrecal, a new concept of weight control

Several months ago, Metrecal™ was introduced to the medical profession by Mead Johnson & Company, manufacturers of nutritional and pharmaceutical products. Many people have since learned of this product by word-of-mouth. To emphasize the role of the physician in problems of weight control and to provide accurate information on Metrecal, Mead Johnson & Company is publishing this factual report.

tember of 1959, a new product—Metrecal is introduced to the medical profession by Johnson & Company. It was developed to e physicians with a new technique for use icious weight reduction of overweight ts.

wish to stress the importance of the physi- problems of weight loss and control. This icularly the case for individuals who are idously overweight, patients with disease kidneys, and patients with various forms of nd blood vessel disease.

iew of the broad public and medical inter- weight control, many persons have learned recal by word-of-mouth; hence, this factual ent.

What is Metrecal?

cal, when properly used, is an effective control agent. It is not a panacea.

recal is a complete food in powder form is mixed with water to make beverage It is designed to provide a low calorie diet contains all basic nutrients required by a on a reducing program. Metrecal contains gs.

recal can be used as the total diet for the required to achieve the weight loss which for the individual. Thereafter, it can be used indefinitely for one or two meals a day, or as the total diet on selected days to maintain desired weight.

In other words, the concept is measured calories according to the needs of the individual.

What does Metrecal do?

Overweight persons are able to lose weight on a properly devised Metrecal program simply because they take in fewer calories than are required to maintain weight. In this manner they lose weight naturally, without resorting to fad diets, complex schedules, or artificial appetite depressants. And Metrecal users are remarkably free from hunger—the appetite is satisfied normally.

What Metrecal cannot do

Metrecal is not a miracle cure for overweight. It cannot provide the will power required for weight reduction. It has to be used properly. It is imperative that the person who desires to lose weight stay on the Metrecal diet. This is not difficult since little, if any, hunger occurs after a day or two.

Medical evidence of effectiveness

Extensive clinical studies, conducted under medical supervision, have shown an average weight loss by Metrecal users of approximately one-half pound per day for periods up to six weeks. Some lose even more.

Most patients in the studies report little, if any, hunger. Many report that they feel better than before. Almost all find it relatively easy to continue on Metrecal.

What is in Metrecal?

One-half pound of Metrecal powder (a frequently specified day's supply) provides 900 calories or energy units, 70 grams protein, 110 grams carbohydrate, 20 grams fat and all essential vitamins and minerals in quantities that meet or exceed minimum daily requirements established by the Food and Drug Administration. Metrecal is available in all drugstores.

How to undertake a reducing program

Your physician is the best source of counsel and guidance in problems of weight loss and control.

Mead Johnson
Symbol of service in medicine

Mead Johnson & Company • Nutritional and Pharmaceutical Products • Evansville 21, Indiana

Cook with Snider's, the chili pepper catsup
–it makes the flavor difference in these pork chops

SNIDERCHOPS

Here's a new way to barbecue pork chops –in a skillet–and get a flavor you've never tasted before.
It's a whisper of high-spirited chili pepper in Snider's Catsup that makes this so-happy difference. There's just enough chili pepper in Snider's to spice it just so–for cooking, and for the table, too.

6 pork chops, about ¾-inch thick
6 thin lemon slices
2 tablesp. brown sugar
⅔ cup Snider's Chili Pepper Catsup
⅓ cup water

Brown chops in skillet. Drain off excess fat. Place slice of lemon on each chop. Combine brown sugar, Snider's Chili Pepper Catsup and water; pour over chops. Cover; simmer 30 minutes. Remove cover, skim off excess fat, and simmer 10 minutes more, basting chops occasionally. Serves six.

Snider Foods, Inc., Fullerton, Ca

50 YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

In September, 1910, school children were busy memorizing a new poem, Rudyard Kipling's If. Only eight writers in America were paid as high as $1000 for a short story. Victor Herbert wrote Naughty Marietta with its wonderful songs, Ah, Sweet Mystery of Life! and I'm Falling in Love With Someone. Women's skirts began to grow shorter because (it was said) long skirts made driving cars too difficult.

In September, 1910, the JOURNAL, bursting with new fall fashions shown for the first time in full color, had two issues in the same month. Women's fall suits had jackets to the knees and pencil-straight skirts. Atop beehive hairdos were bushel-basket hats and chiffon-draped toques like the ones Queen Mary used to wear.

"Why I Stopped Working in a Beauty Parlor: The commonest way to remove hair is to put a powerful caustic like quicklime on the face for ten to fifteen minutes and then scrape it off with a flat bone knife." And "Filling out hollows and wrinkles in the face is done by hypodermic injections of paraffin." Adds this beauty operator: "The men in the beauty business are so profane that when I saw young, unchaperoned girls enter curtained booths to have their hair dressed by these men I trembled and wondered why mothers took such risks."

"All the girls in this town wear hats at luncheon parties. Is this custom general?" asks Maude. "Yes, a woman wears a hat at all daytime entertainments unless she is the hostess."

"How I Furnished my Entire Flat with $4.20 Worth of Wooden Crates and Boxes," was a Journal feature. Another suggestion: "Utilize old nightgowns as dust covers for your best suits and dresses."

"The right way to put on a waist: First fasten the boned waist belting and then hook the collar. Then begin hooking the bodice downward in the back and finally fasten the buttons at the ends of the sleeves."

Mrs. Bass addresses fashion-show luncheon.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY RIO STUDIOS

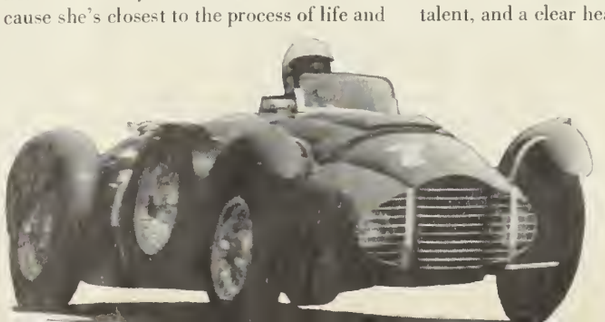
Dawn Norman: all "ayes" were on her hat.

Journal about town

WHAT WE DO . . . WHERE WE GO . . . WHOM WE MEET

At a gala fashion show recently, held in the famed Persian Room of New York's Hotel Plaza, over thirty-two senators, representatives and their wives were honored guests of the Journal. Clothes were Journal pages brought to life on congressmen's wives turned models. Among the models were New York's Mrs. Stuyvesant Wainwright and her two daughters, Mrs. Robert Barry, Mrs. Jacob Javits; and Tennessee's Mrs. Ross Bass—no relation to our executive editor. Mary Bass, emceeing the show, stated: "The Journal has an election every month—more than six million voters to represent on everything from schools to fashions." Said Representative Henry A. Dixon, of Utah, concluding the show: "I have always felt the Journal stood for everything decent in American life—maybe that's why so many of us brought our children here today."

No, you're not seeing things. Mary Bass and Dawn Norman are wearing the same "platform hat." Dawn accepted a "Masthead Award" from Theta Sigma Phi for Mrs. Gould, who was in Africa. Dawn's award-winning bonnet charmed two governors' wives: Mrs. Edmund G. Brown, of California, and Alaska's Mrs. William A. Egan; inspired a woman civic leader to comment: "When we women confer we take off our hats. But when we want to please congressmen we leave them on—the more feminine the better. All's fair in love and politics."



Our favorite subject—women—was the topic James Thurber and Bill McCleery were discussing the other day. Is woman intelligent? Affirmed the wry Mr. T.: "Oh, yes—she's becoming more perceptive and literate, has a basic sense of sympathy, humor and understanding. Ninety per cent of my mail comes from her—and she isn't afraid to sign her name." Why not? "She has less fear because she's closest to the process of life and death." Is there hope of developing her? "If she'll think less of hairdos and more of the brain under them." Then came the poser: is her logic ever logical? "Sometimes. When I think of the muddled political scene and the coming elections it reminds me what my mother (also a woman) said about candidates: 'It would serve them right if both got in!'"

Success story: Pretty Joyce Hayes (How America Lives, May '59, divorcee supporting 4 children on $100 a month) is now a columnist for a daily Oregon paper. "Once Around The Block" is an account of life in her town; prerequisites: a quick eye, wit and humor. "I decided to write it when letters poured in after the Journal feature, wanting to know more about us." To celebrate the Journal story, Joyce took her four children out to dinner—son Dennis prudently picked up tip because "the waitress might have kept it, mommy." Anyone wonder where Joyce gets her material?

Reporter Hayes and two of her critics.

How did top Journal illustrators first express their urge to paint? We "canvassed," found that Al Parker began painting clothespins to look like movie stars (no demand). Joe DeMers burned to draw scenes on bass drums, but flunked his high-school art course (had his revenge later when the school bought his paintings). Coby Whitmore sketched racing cars and Joe Bowler turned from engines to oils. Jon Whitcomb says everyone knew he was the family artist—he dyed water and his sisters drank it. And our own Bill Fink told ad agencies he'd start anywhere—began shipping paintings and wound up painting ships. His advice: "Footholds are where you find them—then it's imagination, talent, and a clear head fixed on what you want to do."

Pre-painter Coby races toward finish.

By THE GORDONS

It began with a voice in the dark,
a voice she had never heard before.
"I know all about you," the man said.
"You're twenty-six and you're sweet on the eserow guy in the bank where you work . . .
You're going to do exactly as I say, because you really have no choice."
Beginning a new serial about a girl on a tightrope.

Operation Terror

Cautiously Kelly Sherwood eased the car up the narrow driveway, careful not to rake it on the sharp thorns of the pyracantha hedge. The driveway and the inadequate old garage were a source of daily irritation to her. Hugged by the house on one side, and the thick hedge on the other, the driveway was a tunnel of blackness cut momentarily by the headlights. The warmth of early October hung heavily even at this hour, a few minutes past eleven.

Parking before the closed garage, she slid out. With some effort she pulled the heavy, old-fashioned sliding door back. Her close friend, Spot, a dog that lived directly behind, came awake, barking joyously. Every night after parking the car, she went to the back fence and fed Spot a couple of pieces of dog candy.

"O.K., O.K., keep your shirt on," she called as she returned to the car. She leaned far out the window to keep an eye on the front fender as she nosed it into the garage. Mechanically she locked the lever in "Park," silenced the motor and turned out the lights, as usual. Then a most unusual thing happened, and at first she was too surprised to be terrified. The garage door slid shut behind her.

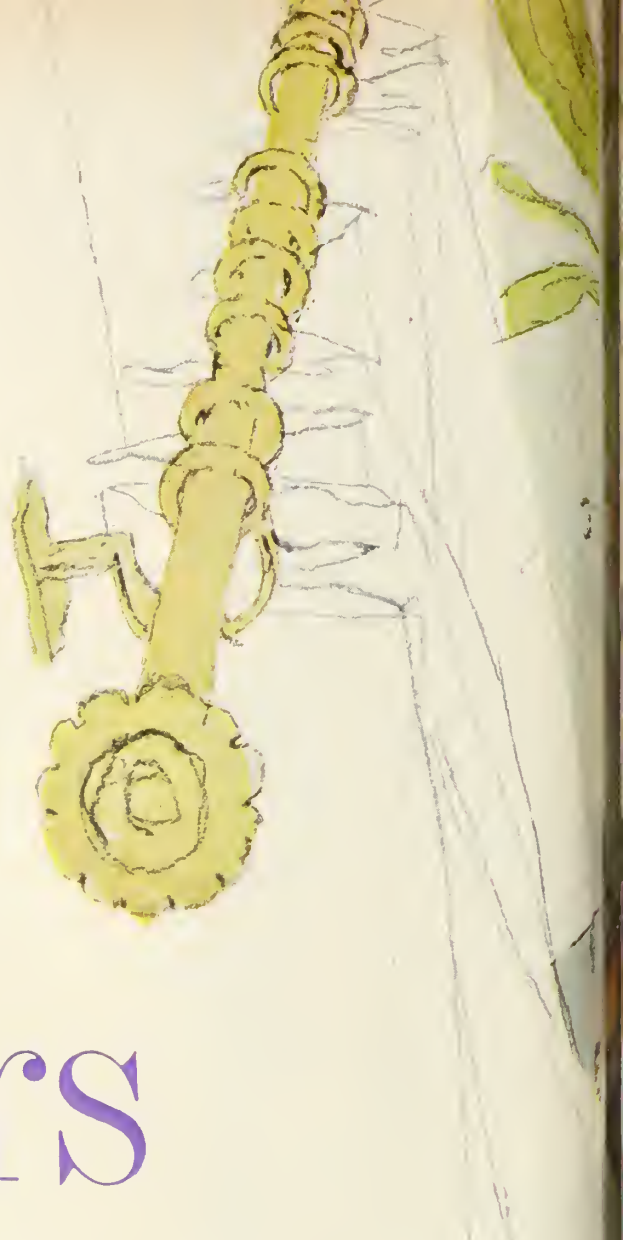
"Toby?" she cried out. "Toby!"

It couldn't be Toby. Not tonight.

As she switched the car lights on, a strong, gloved hand slipped about her neck. Fingers dug into her throat to strangle her outcry.

"Don't look around—and turn off the lights." It was a man's voice, low and guttural. "I'm not going to harm you. I just want to talk with you."

His fingers tightened as she delayed, then loosened as she pushed in the light switch.



Thoughts tumbled about in revolt and complete confusion. Scream? But no one would hear. She was conscious of his asthmatic, uneven breathing. Spot barked more insistently. The Voights would surely investigate. Spot never barked for a prolonged period except when a stranger was about. The next instant this thin hope sank. The Voights would turn on their floodlights, see no one in the yard, reprimand Spot and return to bed.

Toby. If only Toby were home. Toby was her seventeen-year-old sister, a long-legged, boy-happy girl filled with wild enthusiasms.

The man was saying. "Thank you, Miss Sherwood. Just sit where you are. And don't try anything. I've got a gun on you." He opened the door to the back CONTINUED ON PAGE 92

She stood uncertainly and the first sharp thrust of panic struck her. She had to walk—to do something!

Copyright © 1960 by Mildred and Gordon Gordon

A story to be read with compassion for all the mistakes and sorrow love,
outside of marriage, can cause.

Echo Answers

By MARGARET CULKIN BANNING

Grand Central Station was just as it used to be, thought Mrs. Jerome Tarrant, on her way to the suite of rooms which had been reserved for her in a Park Avenue hotel. She had left far more beautiful rooms in her own house in St. Ives, and they would be ready for her when and if she wanted to go back to them. She was slim, perfectly balanced on her tall heels, with curves of blond hair and an expertly rouged mouth showing between the touches of veil and her fur-coat collar.

She thought again, as she had done several times on the train, of what she was glad to be getting away from—her lawyers, her bankers, from people she liked and some that she loved. From visits of condolence and invitations to small dinners. Also from advice.

She would not have to feel, for a while, the constant pressure to adjust to a resigned and cheerful widowhood. She was escaping the hints that passionate grief at sixty-odd was unsuitable, almost ridiculous.

The taxi turned into Park Avenue. At the next intersection a light changed, but a girl kept on running swiftly from the island to the curb; the driver angrily yelled at her. The girl's head turned and Clare caught the smile she tossed back, as if conceding that she shouldn't have taken the risk but with no apology for it. For a second Clare thought the girl was Belinda.

Of course it almost certainly wasn't her granddaughter. Girls of that age looked so much alike in those hooded tweed coats. Belinda had been wearing her hair straight back from her forehead, like that girl in the street, when Clare had last seen her. It was nearly a year ago now. Belinda Rood had not been blood kin to Jerome, but with sorrow she had come to his funeral.

She had not been much help. Her mother said so at the time. It was Julia Rood who took hold and managed most of the painful details. Julia Rood was always competent, whether in Congress or in private life. She was Clare's only child, born of her first brief marriage to Tony Delchamp. Julia had come from Washington to St. Ives immediately when she heard of Jerome Tarrant's sudden death and taken over everything except the shock and grief.

Belinda had made no effort to be cordial to the people who called in sympathy and she had shuddered away from the flowers. She had worn a yellow sweater and skirt to the services. Her mother had wanted her to put on black, but Clare had said, "No—don't make her change: Jerome liked yellow."

I am not going to be a nuisance to Belinda while I'm in New York, thought Clare. I didn't come here to interfere with her life. Julia should stop worrying and leave the girl alone. I'll see Belinda when she wants to see me. If she wants to talk about her problems, or asks for help, that's

CONTINUED ON PAGE 136

THE Journal's COMPLETE IN ONE ISSUE CONDENSED NOVEL

© 1960 BY MARGARET CULKIN BANNING
ECHO ANSWERS IS SOON TO BE PUBLISHED IN BOOK FORM BY HARPER & BROS.

"By rights you should throw me out of your life," he said. "You'd soon find some man who was free." But he was waiting for her denial.

On A Royal

LEE LOCKWOOD

Margaret appeared in the West Indies as Londoners never have seen her—in a bare-shouldered peasant dress, tanned, tousled, happy and relaxed.

COMBINE

They arrived at dockside covered with confetti and rose petals. More than a million persons saw them off.

LEE LOCKWOOD

They walked side by side, not with Tony several paces behind as before.

CENTRAL PRESS

For the first and last time in her life, Margaret stood in front of her sister Elizabeth the queen. To an awed tiny bridesmaid, she appeared indeed a fairy-tale princess.

PARIS MATCH

For the first five days and evenings they strolled Britannia's decks in complete privacy.

Crew wear gym shoes to muffle sound of footsteps as they go about their

By LAURA RILEY

Honeymoon

ey picnicked. They swam.

They danced under tropical stars.

They even managed to be alone—

a yacht with 258 Royal Navy men.

LEE LOCKWOOD

For forty-three sunlit and idyllic days Britain's Princess Margaret and her new husband, former court photographer Antony Armstrong-Jones, lived a fairy-tale life in a honeymoon world. Theirs was the kind of honeymoon few newly married couples—even royal ones—experience, aboard a yacht half the length of the Queen Mary, on a tropical cruise tailored to their slightest whim. Not even the queen, Margaret's sister, knew where they necessarily would be on any given day.

But it was like many other honeymoons too.

They picnicked. They swam. They danced under the stars, dined alone by candlelight against a background of soft music. They held hands. They basked in the sun until, bored with sun-bathing, they jumped up to frolic with a huge beach ball in the surf. They snapped pictures of each other in lighthearted and pensive poses. They collected coral and seashells, went sight-seeing. They played little jokes on each other. Tony telephoned Margaret from another part of the ship and pretended he was a ship's officer, and Margaret kept up the pretense even after she recognized his voice.

They forgot they had ever called each other by their given

CONTINUED ON PAGE 128

At St. Johns, on Antigua in the British West Indies, three earthquakes greeted them but didn't spoil a barbecue supper.

It was an evening of new experiences. She could foresee—and dread—one, but the other was quite, quite different.

Upstairs

By LUCILE VAUGHAN PAYNE

When the phone rang Joanna March was dressed and ready for her date, looking, her mother told her several times, like a flower. Really like a flower. "Well, I feel like a cow," said Joanna. This was not entirely the truth. Joanna merely felt unsettled. The delicacy she seemed to have put on with her unfamiliar clothes—satin shoes and a bare-shouldered evening dress with a foam of white skirt—made her nervous. She was a girl who felt truly at home only in sneakers and tennis shorts. Dressed in party clothes and pinned with Jack Bayfield's corsage of red roses, she bloomed with an unexpected and rather startling beauty. She was just aware enough of this fact to feel annoyed by her mother's approval.

She moved to answer the phone. "I'll get it. It's probably Brandon."

"Brandon? What would Brandon want tonight?"

Joanna disregarded this question. She thought privately that it would take her mother about ten thousand years to mature enough to understand how she felt about Brandon Harper. All her mother was capable of understanding was a date with somebody like Jack Bayfield. Boy-friend stuff. The only thing grownups could think of was sex, when you got right down to it. Her voice was hopeful as she spoke into the phone. She felt a huge necessity to talk to Brandon.

"Hi," said Brandon. "Joanna?" His voice sounded remote and fainthearted, almost spectral. Probably he was alone. His mother went out a lot. She was a handsome divorcee who wore stunningly tailored black suits. She CONTINUED ON PAGE 115

Brandon pushed a button and the elevator grumbled upward. "Listen," he said feverishly, "did that guy kiss you?"

My Life in a White World

By MARIAN ANDERSON
as told to Emily Kimbrough

"The path has come a long way from where those of my generation started. It's wider, it's a bit clearer, so it's worth while to keep cutting down obstacles."

DI PIETRO

"Sometimes," Marian said, "it's like a hair across your cheek. You can't see it, you can't find it with your fingers, but you keep brushing at it because the feel of it is irritating."

Marian Anderson and I were sharing a more intimate conversation than had occurred before during our more than twenty-five years of friendship. For a long time we have called each other by our first names, since that is the milestone two people always pass on leaving acquaintanceship and moving on to familiarity. In the South, she said, most women meeting her for the first time called her Marian. That was when I invited myself past another milestone; I asked for confidences.

Men are of the opinion, I think, that every woman reveals to her thirty or so most intimate women friends every detail of her life that should be private. At the moment of inviting Marian's confidences I had cited this fallacy, asserting that no one of my friends, however intimate, had confided to me such privacies as the details of either her financial status or her sex life; nor had I imposed such revelations. But now I wanted to intrude on Marian's privacy. She had opened a gate to these confidences by mentioning that in the South she was called by her first name. I didn't have to ask her if this had happened because she was a Negro, I'd said, but I would like to ask some other things I had wondered about, that had to do with being brown-skinned.

"Go ahead," Marian had said, chuckled, and added, "or rather, come on in, the gate's open."

How we talked! All that afternoon, and at the end of it had so much more to say we lunched together the following day, and the day after. She was telling me things, she admitted, in astonished discovery, she had never said aloud before, and bringing to the surface incidents long buried. With her permission I have set them down under her own signature as well as mine.

I had asked her, to begin, "When did you first become aware of being a Negro? Did your mother have a private conversation with you? Do Ne children have an extra parental interview besi the one about the facts of life?"

Marian did not answer spontaneously. She evidently searching her memory.

"I can't remember any such conversation," said finally. "And I don't remember being c scious of any difference between me and wh children when I was a small child. I think this because there were white and Negro families in mingled on our block, and all the children pla together. We were in and out of one anoth houses all day long, though mostly they cam ours. We had a back yard. That was the meet place for the neighborhood, and my mother lik it that way. I think she liked, too, to keep an on us.

"There was one little girl, white, who stayed after the others had gone home to supper. S was there almost every night. I don't know wh the family circumstances were—I was too lit to pay much attention; but I do know that wh my sisters and I went up to bed she would still downstairs in the kitchen. My mother would h fixed up a bed for her in the seat of an old Mo chair. Some time later her father would cor pick her up and carry her home.

"When we went to school," Marian continu "we were colored and white in the same roo so there was nothing to make me notice anyth different about me. I might have thought abou when we went to Sunday school and church, eept the white people on our block were Catholics and we were Methodists, so I thou Catholics went to one church and Methodists w to another.

"I wasn't quite so stupid as not to realize skin and hair were different from those features my white friends; and I was conscious of so social implications these differences made." S paused. "But as for putting my finger on whe knew these things, it

CONTINUED ON PAGE

"I am so proud of my country
I hate to think of it stooping or bending to hold down some of its own people."

CAMERA PRESS PIX

The Journal's 5-Star Wardrobe

designed by Simonetta of Rom

PHOTOGRAPHS BY HENRY CLARKE

Her clothes philosophy as told t
Wilhela Cushman, Fashion Edi

"Frankly, designing this wardrob for the Ladies' Home Journ gives me a perfect opportunity illustrate my theories. The war robe is five pieces. Five pieces, wi accessories, are more than sufficie to be smartly attired all the tim

"Today's woman leads a bus varied life where organizatio of time, home, business, travel an clothes is necessary. Chicness an practicality should go hand in han No woman, rich or poor, can affor the luxury of impracticality in dres The wardrobe which I've designe isn't just a city wardrobe or a cou try wardrobe. It's not limited t married women with homes an families or to young businesswome It adapts itself equally well to th life of a wealthy woman as to th not so wealthy one. It is as chic an useful to the New York woman as t the woman living in California o Italy. This wardrobe can stay a home or travel. What with airplan and automobiles, traveling with trunk is about as popular as trave ing with five lions.

"After deciding on the conten of the wardrobe, I starte working on colors. CONTINUED ON PAGE 1

"The first outfit which I designed is a coat. It can be worn over everything. With a matching wool beret and leather gloves, for day. With variation of accessories, this is an afternoon, theater or country coat."

Five star costumes . . .

BY VANESSA

st, an integral part of any wardrobe, goes from day to n too. Marvelous with a green cloche or nutria beret."

"With a yellow sweater, the softly pleated suit skirt goes to the country."

COMPACT BY CARTIER

The white silk brocade, jacketed or not, "answers all what-shall-I-wear-tonight questions."

"If a woman has nothing else to wear, she must have a basic black dress." This for late day.

HANDBAG BY SYLVIA FIORENTINA; PIN BY MARC KOVEN

"The beige jersey knit is a live-in dress, morning, afternoon and at home."

PIN AND BRACELETS BY LUCIANA

i a deep pink silk blouse, the suit is for noon, dinner and theater evenings."

egrated, all-occasion wardrobe.

These fashions copied in similar fabrics for stores throughout the nation by Leonard Arkin.

America's noted designe

Norman Norell

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

DÉCOR BY PARZINGER PAINTING BY BERNARD CATHELIN, FINDLAY GALLERIES, N.Y.

Fall Collectio

Smart women all over the U.S.A. will wear these clothes, indicative of the trend of American high fashion. Of greatest significance are his slender, pared-down suits with wrist-length jackets and jersey overblouses, black or gray with contrast, or in two vibrant shades—a fashion of elegance but at the same time with a completely at-ease look for many occasions. Low-placed fullness and away-from-the-body silhouettes appear in coats and dresses.

For travel, country living and even for the changing pace of city life, his divided skirts present a practical—perhaps controversial—idea. The well-bred accessories: the alligator handbag with a gold chain handle, originated by Cartier, copied for years at many prices; alligator pumps, timeless gold jewelry.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor

The indicative suit in dark, dark brown with gold jersey tunic loosely tied. Bracelets by Seam Schepps; handbag by Henri Bétrix.

Important coat in gray, the silhouette completed with a matching deep cloche, banded in black.

PAINTING BY PIERRE LESIEUR, FINDLAY GALLERIES, N. Y.

The divided skirt in red tweed, for only the slim young figure.

Young, sophisticated, bound to be popular dress with low fullness.

BRACELETS BY MARC KOVEN AND CHESTER LAWRENCE

6 MILLION TEEN PLAIDS

An authentic Dress Stewart tartan makes this skirt with unpressed pleats topped by a red flannel jacket, white sharkskin blouse. Vogue Design No. 5080.

LEOMBRUNO-HODI

A pleated skirt with a matching bolero w combine with both blouses and sweaters. We s it with a boy's yellow oxford-cloth button-do shirt so popular with teenage Skirt and jacket, Vogue Design No. 50

A black braid-bound velveteen jacket combined with a bright Orlon-and-rayon plaid skirt and worn with a crisp white piqué blouse is classic and becoming. Vogue Design No. 5084.

AGERS LOVE TO SEW

Full of enthusiasm, teen agers all over the country will welcome a new season with thoughts of new clothes. About 6,000,000 will combine their efforts to make more than 17,000,000 garments. To stimulate their creative minds, we searched for the brightest plaids, the fuzziest fur fabrics, the gayest jumpers and the prettiest shades of velveteen. The sizing of these patterns ranges from subteen to junior miss; check the chart in your pattern book for accurate fitting. Original ideas are trend-setting and to be encouraged. Unusual combinations of colors and fabrics are individual and distinguished.

By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

JUMPERS

This charming blue corduroy-and-rayon-challis combination is really two dresses giving the effect of a jumper. Both the slim long-sleeved print dress and the corduroy can be worn separately. Vogue Design No. 5077.

The newest jumper length is just above the knee. This one in a fireman-red blanket cloth is surprisingly bound in yellow. Wear it with a matching yellow sweater. Vogue Design No. 5071.

This bold plaid jumper is bound in black aid and buttons down the back. The blouse is yellow wool jersey. For an informal party, wear it without the blouse. Vogue Design No. 5062.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 135. Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Calif. and Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 10c additional for each pattern ordered. © Vogue

THIS IS WHAT THEY

FUR FABRICS

This slim blue plaid wool dress is topped by a short fur-fabric jacket in the same color. We added a fringed piece of fabric for a scarf, and her hat is a 13" circle of fur fabric gathered. Vogue Design No. 5103.

A leopard fur-fabric overblouse has a wonderful new look. It tops a camel-color fleece skirt and can be worn with its own dickey or a turtle-neck sweater. Vogue Design No. 5092.

This white washable wool shirtwaist dr has a full pleated skirt. The sleeves fol back, neckline is convertible. Add a mo ogram. She wears it with a red fur-fab hat and muff. Vogue Design No. 5067

VILL MAKE THIS FALL

Fur fabrics stand out this fall because they look so "real." Also, deep pile fabrics in pale colors look like dyed rabbit. All these are fun for jackets, overblouses and accessories. A white washable wool dress looks new as a young fashion, and one might add a monogram. Party clothes are simple in design and depend on color and fabric for their very feminine "eye catching" appeal. Fashion-minded youngsters will find that a background of sewing and designing often develops into a career. Also, one can dress like a queen on a Cinderella budget.

VELVETEEN

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

This charming blue velveteen dips low in ack and is buttoned with self-covered buttons. We have edged the neckline, sleeves and with Irish lace. Vogue Design No. 5003.

Candy-pink velveteen makes this full-skirted, small-waisted party dress. Add a bunch of flowers and a velvet ribbon at the waistline. Wear pink shoes. Vogue Design No. 5004.

For variety, a black-and-white checked taffeta (you might make it in aqua velveteen) in two pieces plus an overskirt. A nice idea, inasmuch as the pieces are interchangeable with other separates. Vogue Design No. 5015.

Clear-browed, wide-waved, with fall's new look of smoothness. Model's hair length just clears her shoulders. (Thin or fine hair will need some back combing at underneath section of crown hair to achieve similar fullness.) Back is bouffant pageboy.

Short cut, 1960 style. For fullness, all hair is set on rollers with the exception of the sections over and behind the ears, which are wound in large pin curls in order to comb forward on the cheek. Bangs are optional. Either way the effect is sleek and youthful.

A classically pretty hairdo with modified fullness at the sides. Bows prettily accent a lovely forehead. Short hair in front (ends are tucked under bows) can convert to bangs, if desired. Back is semifull[ness], ends turning under. Easy to wear—easy to GLAMOROUS HAIRDOS...

SMOOTH AND FULL

Feminine and wearable, fall's new hairdos are pretty enough to turn anybody's head.
The newest length stops just below the ear. If you prefer to keep your hair long, there is a variety of ways to give it a freshly current smooth, full look.
Most of the arrangements shown here can be maintained between shampoos by putting up the ends during the week (how often depends on how well your hair holds curl).
Setting instructions for each hairdo appear on page 126.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ROGER PRIGENT

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor

Longish hair made to look short. Hair brushes across the crown from low side part, and clips in place with a bright velvet bow. (A pretty pin or barrette will do the trick too.) Ends of hair brush into soft waves at sides and turn under all the way around.

HAIRDO UPPER RIGHT BY MICHEL KAZAN.
OTHER HAIRDOS THIS PAGE BY ENRICO CARUSO

*Short, feminine, swirled to frame the fa[ce] tily. High, soft bangs can be more so depending on which does the most f[or] Ends of hair brush casually forward on

For really glamorous occasions this arrangement has a look of delicious femininity! Long hair is brushed across crown from side part, waved over ears, with ends wound into French twist in back. Top fullness is achieved by brushing back crown section of hair to loop over top of twist behind. It is more intricate than the others to comb out and arrange, so you may need the help of a clever friend or your hairdresser. But special-occasion results are worth the trouble. Hair design by Mr. Kenneth.

DRESS BY DAVID KLEIN

PRIGENT

"I like to start fall with a new suit. On still-warm days I can take off the jacket, wear a blouse." Avanell Bass chose beige tweed and it will be equally good for spring or fall. Two new accessories, both favorites: a scarf and a hat. The hat is fur felt and cost $25.00. Beige suit was $69.95.

How does she look so pretty?

when as the wife of a congressman her time and money spent on fashion are limited?

By BET HART

Avanell Bass's husband, Congressman Ross Bass, of Pulaski, Tennessee, was originally elected to the House six years ago. "Since that time," Mrs. Bass says, "I think I have learned a great deal about fashion. I had a closetful of clothes, but never the right costume for the right occasion. Still the most difficult of all costumes to find is one for in-between seasons."

Since being in Washington, Mrs. Bass has come to rely on the invaluable basic dress and for daytime she has collected several classic sheaths. For evening she has three "good little black dresses" and several in color. The fact that all these dresses were chosen primarily by fabric has solved the in-between-season problem for evening. "Crepe, chiffon or lace can be just as good spring, summer or winter, in Washington or Tennessee." For daytime, she feels she has not conquered the challenge so completely. However, her solution to date is to start the fall with a lightweight wool suit, add a suit or jacket dress in silk linen or similar fabric to begin the spring season.

Mrs. Bass works full time in her husband's office. She has been president of the 84th Congressional Wives Club, press chairman of the Congressional Club and is an active member of several other clubs. Mrs. Bass does most of her own household chores and marketing and "in my 'spare' time I like to paint."

Mrs. Bass's fashion investments are closely determined by these varied activities, as last year's purchases show: two identical wool-jersey dresses, one black, one taupe, each $29.00; a medium-blue lightweight wool suit for $85.00: black crepe dinner dress for $85.00; and an off-white brocade short evening dress for $95.00.

The jersey sheath dresses were earmarked for everyday office wear. "If I plan to go right out from work, I take along accessories to put on for the evening." The suit was to be worn on days when Mrs. Bass had luncheons or club meetings combined with the usual office routine. And for evenings when she had time to come home and change, she wore her very favorite—a dressy costume.

She did not need nor did she buy a coat (for which she generally pays only about $70.00) because of several already in her wardrobe ranging from two to ten years old. For an evening cover-up, "I always wear the same: a pale mink stole my husband gave me when he was first elected.

"Buying two identical basic dresses is not at all uncommon for me to do if I find one I like and it fits. This past summer I did the same. They are fun to accessorize and the [illegible] costume I can wear right out from the [illegible]

From this, one might suspect that M[illegible] spends a good deal on accessories. Suc[illegible] ever, is not the case. The pearls and gol[illegible] lace she wears are classic and need [illegible] replaced every season. "My shoes are [illegible] plain pumps and cost about $24.95. I [illegible] wear high heels although it makes me alm[illegible] same height as my husband—six fee[illegible] evening, again she buys only plain pur[illegible] buy white or pale shades, then as th[illegible] soiled have them dyed to a darker color M[illegible] Bass likes hats and these do add to her c[illegible] budget. Last season she bought three, [illegible] in price from $14.95 to $25.95.

Alterations are another expense. Mr[illegible] buys a size 12 for length and then has [illegible] it taken in. Since she does not sew, sh[illegible] pay $5.00 to $10.00 to have this done [illegible] cleaning also mounts up," she says, "an[illegible] about $1.50 for my dressier costumes, l[illegible] simpler ones." These, however, are ab[illegible] only extra fashion expenses she has. He[illegible] end wardrobes have cost her nothing fo[illegible] time. "I wear shirts and sweaters with [illegible] all of which have been in my wardrob[illegible] good long time." She generally does h[illegible]

s. Bass's new raspberry wool dress is typical of the d e depends on for everyday wear. A neckline filled th arls is one of her special trademarks. She fell in e th the bright velvet toque, $18.95. Dress, $24.95.

A favorite color of Mrs. Bass's is blue which she chose in jersey for her second daytime dress—this one with a full pleated skirt. For a dressier look, Mrs. Bass can wear the matching belt, pearls and her new white hat. $45.

Mrs. Bass's new silk jacket dress will help solve the question, "What shall I wear tonight?" The fabric, as in all Mrs. Bass's evening costumes, is seasonless: silk alpaca. $89.95.

ir nd nails. "Every now and then I think w wonderful it would be to go and have my ir lone and get a manicure. But I cannot fo the two hours it takes."

Ms. Bass has always organized her wardrobe r e year ahead in the fall while in Pulaski, d nakes her initial investments then. This as n she planned to buy a suit to wear alter- te with her blue one from last year, two e ensive basic wools for daytime and her v te type of costume, a glamorous dress for e ngs. With several black dresses already in r ardrobe, Mrs. Bass wanted to add color—o versatile for both city and suburban wear.

e are the choices she made:

aspberry wool dress	$24.95
right-blue jersey dress	45.00
ige tweed suit	69.95
eep-pink silk jacket dress . . .	89.95
ellow peau d'ange gown . . .	110.00
	$339.85

st year, with her important investments id her in the fall, Avanell Bass will have no o major fashion expenditures for some time. nly addition she would like is another suit stume in a lightweight fabric, but this she not buy until the spring season arrives. We ect, too, that about that time she will be le to resist buying another of her special ites: one more glamorous dress for evening!

e to get dressed up for evenings." For Mrs. Bass's ng gown in over six years and her most glamorous ion of all, she chose yellow peau d'ange. The skirt n with a flattering overskirt. Price was $110.00.

SUÈDE HANDBAG BY LEDERER

Gray and camel hair, the dress with pleats and an easy jacket by Bill Blass. The dress is basic, the jacket a smart separate for many changes.

LOOK TO TH

For Ta

There is ease in American clothes this fall, ease of line and ease of multiple use. Width of shoulder gives coats the capacity to go over suits or dresses . . . the loose jacket, waist-length or a little longer, is beautifully proportioned for many figures . . . the inrush of pleats, the very living in pleats from tweeds to chiffons, gives movement to skirts and great freedom in getting about.

In costume ideas, you have the total look of the new above-the-hemline coat, designed for a particular suit or dress, and at the same time fundamental enough for certain other clothes . . . or the dress with a Pink brightening black in a many-faceted jacket dress by Leonard Arkin. Turban by Emme.

GOLD BRACELET BY VICTORIA STONE

Turn to new dark green for color with your black coat. This costume by Philippe Tournaye has the new sash, easy bolero, and the pleats in fashion.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY HENRY CLARKE

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

JOURNAL

For Fall Fashion 1960

jcket that prepares it for many hours and paces. In color—the new dark brilliance of ethyst, garnet and deep pine green; the ht brilliance of geranium pink, lilac and me. Think of a coat in pink or lilac com-ned with purple, garnet, black or neutrals.
Furs give you a wealth of ideas—from collars and costume jackets to the be-ved fur-lined coat. Details you can adapt:
e bowed waistline and tied sash; a pastel rban to match an overblouse; stockings ned to your costume.

By Wilhela Cushman
Fashion Editor

eats to live in: a flame-colored suit that could be ur best casual for years, by Ben Reig.

Cape coat in a new length over a tweed skirt and jersey top, by David Kidd of Arthur Jablow.

SMOKY TOPAZ EARRINGS AND BRACELET BY SEAMAN SCHEPPS

Above: Dr. Popenoe and Betty Stankovitch in 1919, when he was an Army captain and she a dance instructor. A year later they were married. Right: the Popenoes at home in California today.

DON ORNITZ

THE MAN WHO SAVES MARRIAGES

Wise Dr. Popenoe says:

"For married happiness, it's not as important to pick the right person as to be the right partner."

By BETTY HANNAH HOFFMAN

Back in the 1890's, when Paul Popenoe was a small boy in Topeka, Kansas, his Victorian grandmother pointed out to him a large corner house on the street where he lived. "Over there," she remarked, in tones of horror and disapproval, "lives a divorced woman!"

Today, one in four marriages in this country is breaking up, but Dr. Popenoe believes, as his grandmother did, that the majority of divorces are unnecessary and undesirable for all concerned. Attitudes toward divorce have changed, but the ugliness of divorce remains the same. Says this marriage expert with crisp optimism: "Monogamy is so well adapted to human nature as a result of millions of years of evolution that it doesn't require supermen or superwomen to succeed in marriage. Success can be attained by almost anyone."

Dr. Paul Popenoe's forceful, plain-thinking, you-can-do-it-if-you-try approach to even the most hopeless-looking marital tangles has helped some 25,000 couples regain happiness in their marriages. Countless thousands more have been helped by his books, pamphlets, newspaper column, television program, and wonderful Ladies' Home Journal articles which are estimated to have been read by millions, as well as by the American Institute of Family Relations in Los Angeles, the world's largest and best-known marriage-counseling center, which he founded and still heads.

Dr. Popenoe, now in his seventies, is a spare man with quick birdlike movements and a step bounding as a boy's. He has a dry, crisp, staccato way of talking and a wide smile both bashful and kind. "I'm an introvert," he says candidly, "who taught himself to mingle." Although he favors dark gray suits of a conservative cut, the colors in his ties are as bright as the twinkle in his intelligent blue eyes.

A friend of fifty years' standing describes him as "the most successful man I know with the least self-conceit" and "infinitely wise." A fascinating conversationalist, he peppers his words with the spice of funny anecdotes, endless statistics and pertinent quotations from the Bible and Shakespeare. When thoroughly wound up in a subject, his nimble brain races far ahead of his ability to form words and then whole phrases spout out at once. At such times, his fingers drum nervously and impatiently.

"Dr. Popenoe is an immediate kind of person with a tremendous capacity for work," a colleague describes him. "Most of his twelve books he pounded out himself with two fingers on the typewriter. Call him about some matter and it's done—bang!—practically by the time you hang up the receiver. His desk never piles up. He arranges his work—and that includes a seven-days-a-week newspaper column—so he could leave for Europe tomorrow with no unfinished business."

The pronunciation of his name gives people lots of trouble. He is descended from one Jean Papineau, a French Huguenot who fled to this country in 1687 (among other things, Dr. Popenoe is a whiz on his family genealogy) and the right pronunciation is Pop (like pop)-en-oe. "All the Popenoes in the United States are related," he says positively, "no matter how they spell their names." He is sometimes tempted to spell his with two p's in the middle so that people will get it right. He was once cleverly introduced to a lecture audience as "Doctor Pop-en-oe. Since he's the father of four sons, his name can't be Pope-en-oe."

Except for this one vanity, he is unusually modest and retiring. If someone should come up to him at a gathering and ask respectfully, "Are you the Doctor Popenoe?" he fires right back, "There are seven Doctor Popenoes in the family. It depends upon whose wife you're talking to which is the Doctor Popenoe."

His younger brother, Dr. Wilson Popenoe, is a world-famous horticulturist who lives in Antigua, Guatemala; his other brother, Dr. Herbert Popenoe, is a psychologist with the Los Angeles school system. There are, besides, four other Popenoes in this brilliant clan who hold doctorate degrees. CONTINUED ON PAGE 120

DON ORNITZ

WHY THE GULF between a man and wife who were once so close? More than 70,000 people have come to Dr. Popenoe in an attempt to find the answer. Many of these cases are reported in the Journal series, Can This Marriage Be Saved?

Statistically speaking, the chance of succeeding in a second marriage after a divorce is 50 per cent less than the chance of succeeding in a first marriage. No one should go into such a marriage without identifying the causes of failure and removing them, so that they will not merely be repeated in the second venture. Buff and Donna could have saved themselves much misery if they had taken that precaution. Instead, Donna merely repeated the pattern with which she had previously tried and failed; namely, to run away. They finally learned at the American Institute of Family Relations how to face their difficulties and solve them instead of trying to run away from them. They also learned—an important part of every successful marriage—how to divide the responsibilities of their daily life in order to avoid conflict. . . . The counselor in this case was Mrs. Beth Foland. PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., President.

Can this marriage be saved?

SHE: "I guess I don't know how to choose a husband."

HE: "I guess I don't know how to choose a wife."

Donna tells her side: "I hate to be a two-time loser," said Donna, six months married to a second husband and already separated from him. Twenty-eight years old and a radiant beauty, Donna was the mother of a nine-year-old son. "I have too much pride. Furthermore, I still retain a fondness for Buff, my present husband.

"Buff regards himself as all masculine. At the time we met I'd been divorced from my first husband for several years, and I was thoroughly fed up with female independence. Indeed, I was talking marriage talk with the senior partner of the legal firm where I worked. Buff swept me off my feet.

"For six exciting weeks I followed his lead in everything. He picked the shows we saw. He chose the restaurants. He took me hunting, although I'm terrified of guns. He took me swimming. We hiked miles instead of riding. I was delighted to have it so. His decisiveness seemed wonderful to me.

"I'm afraid Buff received a false picture of me. Much as I admire strength and masculinity, I'm no door mat. I've supported my son and myself for years. From the beginning Buff treated me like a moron. The week before our wedding he shifted from the purchasing department in a big aircraft company to sales work—and he didn't say a word to me. I thought I should have been informed. To this day I don't know the size of his income, although we share our living expenses and I pay extra for Jimmy, my son.

"Maybe Buff doesn't realize it, but he is a household tyrant. He bullies and yells at me. He bullies Jimmy too. As soon as we were married he uncorked his temper. One time he got so mad he tore up a pair of perfectly good football tickets and fired a gun out our bedroom window.

"There is no denying that Buff and I have shared some real happy times. We dance together perfectly. We laugh at many of the same things. We agree wonderfully on sex. However, our honeymoon was not an unqualified success. We repeatedly lost our way on the road because Buff was too pigheaded to ask directions and wouldn't let me help by watching the signs. Near the end of the trip a woman driver cut in front of him and forced us in the ditch. When she stopped and tried to help us, he abused her until I had to apologize. He then abused me.

"At the hotel he told me how to comb my hair, how to apply my lipstick, what dress to wear. One evening I put on an expensive black lace gown with a huge gold pin at the neck. Buff insisted I remove the pin. When I refused, he wouldn't go down to dinner with me. So we didn't eat that night. Next day the dress disappeared. He gave it to the chambermaid.

"I had high hopes of Buff as a father to my son. He has sons of his own by a previous marriage—his ex-wife got the custody—and I knew he was fond of boys. Although he didn't meet Jimmy until our wedding—my boy had been away at camp—he made an immediate hit. He guessed that Jimmy might be lonesome with us off honeymooning and he bought the youngster a cocker named Princess.

"When we arrived home from our trip, Jimmy and Princess and my Aunt Mae were on hand to greet us. In the moment of our arrival, Buff destroyed the whole effect of his thoughtfulness. Because Jimmy had neglected to bathe and comb the dog, he jumped all over the poor kid. When Aunt Mae defended Jimmy, he jumped on her. In the midst of the commotion I hustled Princess to the basement, where I bathed and combed her myself. Buff wasn't one bit pleased. In fact, he carried on until Aunt Mae left the apartment in hysterics. Perhaps I should be ashamed to admit it, but about an hour later Jimmy and I left too. We scooted out the kitchen door while Buff was still roaring away in the living room. I couldn't take the turmoil a minute longer.

"My first husband was as undependable as a grasshopper, but unfailingly courteous. He and I almost never quarreled. Buff and I quarrel all the time. Sound and CONTINUED ON PAGE 177

DON ORNITZ

"He was insanely jealous of my boss, insisting I resign my job. He shouted denunciations until neighbors on both sides awoke and pounded the walls."

PORTFOLIO HOUSE #12

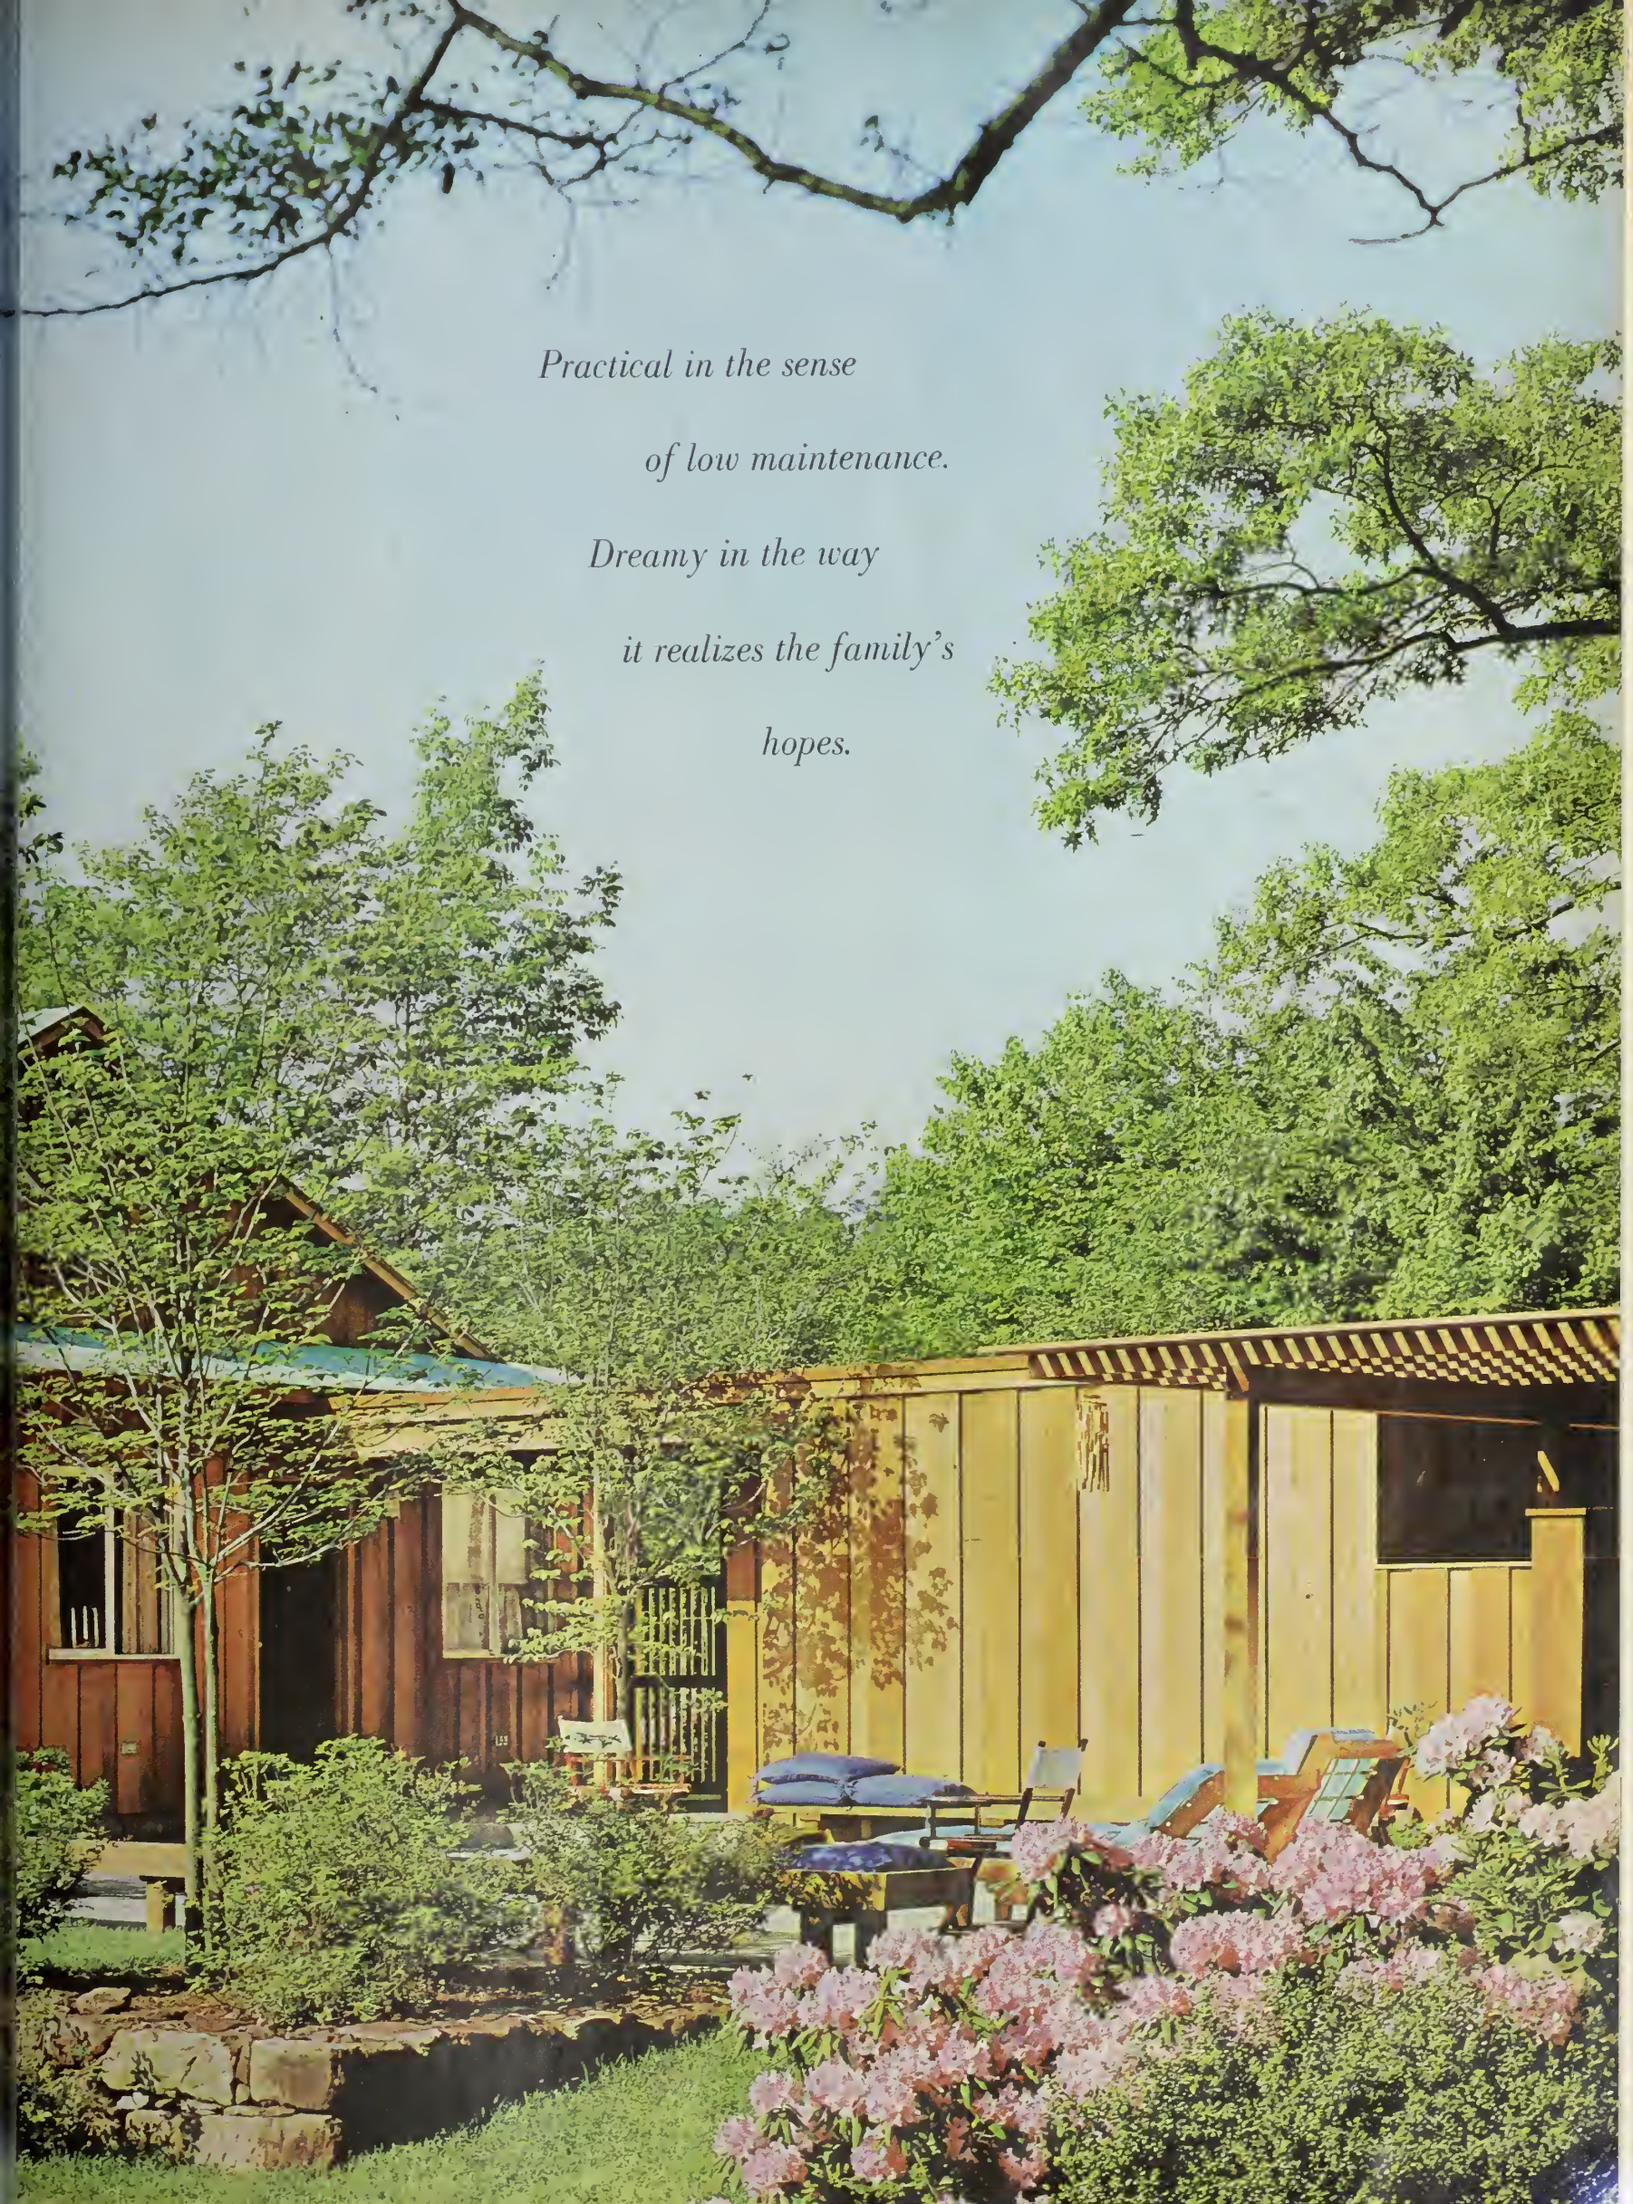
OUR PRACTICAL DREAM HOUSE

What a house costs to build or buy is only the beginning. The real cost comes after. The long-term upkeep price you pay in terms of cash, care and inconvenience is what counts. It affects the fun you have with your house. It affects the worth of the house when its money-worth is most wanted.

The clients for whom this house was designed knew these things. Into the dreaminess of this small house were designed the longest life, the leastest care, the lowest upkeep a house can have. The money that went into the walls, roof, windows, walk-around is almost the last money that will ever have to go into them. The highest degree of practicality has largely eliminated the nightmare of upkeep, care and maintenance to complement the beauty of the interior finishes, fabrics and flooring. There are tough, long-lasting exterior finishes on termite-resistant redwood siding, aluminum frames, and terne metal roof. This roof will last a lifetime; its turquoise acrylic-emulsion paint will need restoring about every fifteen years.

DESIGNERS – Williams & Wells

HOMEMAKING EDITOR – Margaret Davidson



CONTRIBUTING EDITOR – Richard Pratt

INTERIORS – H. T. Williams

ARCHITECTURAL EDITOR – John Brenneman

ARCHITECTURAL ASSISTANT – Anne Fuller

PHOTOGRAPHER – Ezra Stoller

Practical in the sense of low maintenance.
Dreamy in the way
it realizes the family's hopes.

PRACTICAL PLANNING MAKES THE DREAM HOUSE COME TRUE DAY AND NIGHT

SETTING DESIGNED BY RICHARD PRATT; DEVELOPED BY ETHELBERT E. FURLONG, LANDSCAPE ARCHITECT

Branches of a dogwood tree overhang this shady retreat at the front of the house. At far left in picture is the garage, linked to house by a covered breezeway; in center is the sheltered entrance. Long, low bench in foreground is of sturdy, all-weather redwood, decked out in bright blue sailcloth cushions. The house stands on a level plateau created by the excavation from the basement, held in by a low stone wall laid up dry, and paved right up to the house with a walk-around of concrete poured into squares of redwood dividers. Pleasant to look at, easy to live with, costless to keep up. Trees are dogwoods that like to be let alone. Shrubs are Japanese hollies, azaleas and rhododendron, which, planted properly, can then pretty well fend for themselves. The little pool is a practical piece of pure delight.

By night the little sheltered porch, seen across the reflecting pool, is a cozy, welcoming adjunct to dining room (at right, through sliding doors). It has its own raised fireplace for barbecues or for warming cheer. During the day, wide eaves give protection from too much sun; bugs are kept at bay by inconspicuous roll-up screens which can be left on all year round. Frostproof tile paving needs a minimum of care. The same can be said for rattan and cane chairs and stools.

PLANS ARE AVAILABLE FROM S. B. WELLS, ARCHITECT, 137 E. 57TH STREET, NEW YORK 22, AT $10 A SET.

A DREAM OF LIVING AND DINING can still be practical

The living room purposely gives an airy, pastel feeling with its tray ceiling, tall lamps, curtains hung high against the pale sea-green walls. But everywhere lurks practicality to make this house and its furniture easy to take care of. The linen curtains have been made in panels that snap together and the fabric preshrunk, so they can be kept in their pristine white state with little trouble. The sofa is slip-covered in a cotton print that has been treated for soil and stain resistance, as have other materials (ottoman covering, pink chair seat, turquoise upholstery). Some other "easy" features: coffee table with milk-glass top; stained-oak floor in herringbone design; ottoman on casters for extra, movable seating. Antique Japanese pine chest provides storage as well as interest and beauty. The furniture is small in scale for a small room, thereby making it seem larger, uncrowded. All-wool rug with minuscule blue-and-white pattern shows wear and soil with reluctance and is mothproof for life. Sliding door of translucent plastic closes off the dining room to make living room more cozy in winter or to shut out clearing activities.

The dining room (below) is small, but oh, so practical. Tile flooring is just about the easiest to care for; this continues out on to covered porch—at left behind the bamboo curtains. The blue-and-green wallpaper has been given a finish that resists spots and dirt, can be washed. A simple buffet has linen- and flatware-storage trays and space for serving pieces. The table seats six in comfort when it is turned lengthwise, and for larger groups the porch and living room are but a step away.

FURNITURE STYLES

tea
Sugar

THE DREAMY KITCHEN IS DURABLE AS A WOODEN SHOE

To the right of the sink a salad-mixing center where sliding-door cabinets (shallow and hung reachably low) hold within arm's reach spices and small utensils. The slim-lined refrigerator has a zero-temperature section below for frozen food.

Practical kitchen, 13' x 12', has master storage plan for keeping supplies where they are used. Wide cabinets under cooktop hold pans; cupboards near dishwasher have everyday dishes; ventilated drawer beside sink is for potatoes and onions, and sliding shelves near refrigerator hold bowls and baking pans.

his gay, lighthearted kitchen s a rare achievement, a one-wo an unit that welcomes com-pay. Its secret: a room divided n separate and complete zones a und the appliances) but con-ected by a sweep of counter sur-fa s—with worlds of elbow room. T fun kind of kitchen, this, w re cooking becomes more cr tion than craft because new de ices carry their share of the ch res: the cooktop has a unit w ch never burns food; the dish-w her does the dishes; the refrig-er or-freezer won't frost up, n one oven has a rotisserie.

The kitchen sparkles with basic bl es, greens and yellows—won-de ful surfaces both pretty and pr ctical; steel cabinets with their su tle color fired on; blue vinyl fl r flecked with white, and tur-qu ise counters of laminated pl tic. Even the glass-fiber ceiling, so nd-absorbent, and tweedy wall fa ric are washable. Added accents ar gay, can be changed at will.

With cutting board in place, trimmings go directly into disposer in smaller of two stainless sink bowls. Drain in larger bowl is button-operated; entire unit is seamless.

RIGHT: Two ovens in one unit cope w menus with baked and broiled fo ds. Wheeled table, garaged under co ter, rolls to dining room or porch.

LEFT: Convenient for cooks short or to a 3"-lower-than-average cooktop e into ceramic tile. The sleek stainless hd designed to draw steam (and cook-in odors), push-button unit controls re ssed in wall make cleaning easy.

Bedroom. Sliding windows here and elsewhere are aluminum with long-lasting epoxy finish. The marble sills resist damaging effects of sun, rain, heat and cold, are quick to clean.

Basement. Modern utilities are modest in space demands, leaving the best of the basement free for hobbies and games. There is an around-the-chimney grouping of appliances to make maintenance easy: an incinerator to reduce burnables to ash; air conditioner monitors heat and cold winter and summer, has new air-purifier attachment to control humidity and filter fine dust and pollen; a thirty-gallon gas water heater with device to increase capacity when more hot water is wanted and a clever gadget in the plumbing to pipe hotter water to the kitchen and laundry than to bathrooms; a water conditioner to remove hardness operates on an automatic timer which can be set to suit the local water conditions.

Closets. Floor-to-ceiling doors fold back to open entire closet, no cul-de-sacs here. Under jackets and skirts are storage drawers of seamless plastic. Handsome, durable oak flooring needs little care.

Roof. Made of metal with stylish standing seams, terne roof is grounded for lightning protection. Metal lasts a lifetime, special turquoise-colored paint for 15 years.

Walk-In Storage. Near kitchen, closet features a wall with movable hooks for cleaning gear plus tiers of shelves.

Terrace. A dry wall confines manicured lawn; terraces of concrete are easy to keep neat.

ALL THROUGH THE HOUSE, MORE EASY CARE IDEAS

Qualities of good living and easy care, designed into this little home at the blueprint stage, are so well co-ordinated that its atmosphere becomes one of relaxation rather than routine. Four essentials add up to LIVABILITY: (1) space planned to serve activities and provide ample storage; (2) easy-to-maintain materials; (3) the ultimate in utility equipment; (4) furnishings chosen with upkeep in mind.

Putter Room (right).
Shut the door here and any unfinished activity stays untouched, ready to tackle again when time permits. In the meantime, it's hidden so there's no reproachful reminder. It's in small houses like this such a room is appreciated. The 9′ x 11′ space is laundry, office, mending and hobby room. The sunny yellow walls (washable fabric) make the room cheerful and gay.

Bathroom. For guests, bath is small but complete (tile shower is behind door). In both baths, water closets are hung to wall; washbasin cabinets built to the floor make cleaning easier.

Typewriter is kept on shelf in storage cabinet which slides out at easy-to-use height.

Adjustable Ironing Table has fold-up flaps at side and end to make more room for large flatwork. Storage slot is beside sink (not shown).

Laundry Center has blue ceramic-tiled counter around sink. In new model, washer has ten preset cycles and push-button controls for suiting washing to load. Dryer also handles all types of fabrics.

Ceramic-Tile Floor, white with dark flecks, sweeps from putter room through dining room and out to little porch. In storage unit, molded seamless plastic drawers are three sizes, all with dividers.

BOUNTY FROM OUR KITCHEN

By ELSIE MASTERTON

Moist, succulent meat balls served under a smooth sour-cream gravy aromatic of dill.

STUART

Lightly flavored with lemon, this rich and savory ragout. Its secret: luscious lamb cubes simmered until tender and tantalizing in an herbed gravy. To garnish, tiny carrots and pearly onions, crisp sprigs of cress.

Our kitchen has eight doors Leading from the side porch, the front hall, the living room, the milk room, the wood room, and so on. I can look out and see my three young daughters playing. A big old-fashioned New England kind of kitchen, it is the heart of the house. Almost any time of day you'll find me there and I'll be cooking.

After all the cooking I've done I'm convinced that the talk one hears about being a "born cook" is nonsense. Cooking is fundamentally an attitude—of respect toward food and the people for whom you are cooking. Of love, really. We do love to eat. It is a joy to tell about it. It is a joy to remember.

One of my mother's recipes—and a good one too—is Creole Cod Fillets. I had a hard time getting her to teach me how to cook. "Have fun," she would say. "You have plenty of time to be in the kitchen." Which was quite a prophecy!

Creole Cod Fillets

- 2 small onions, peeled and chopped
- 1 clove garlic, peeled and crushed
- ¼ cup butter
- ¼ cup white wine vinegar
- 2 tablespoons lemon juice
- 1 tablespoon brown sugar
- 2 tablespoons soy sauce
- ¼ teaspoon monosodium glutamate
- ¼ teaspoon pepper
- ½ teaspoon salt
- 1 cup catchup
- 1 tablespoon Worcestershire sauce
- ½ teaspoon dry mustard
- 2 tablespoons cornstarch dissolved in 2⅔ cups cold water
- 1 cod fillets

First comes the sauce. Brown onions and garlic in the butter. Add vinegar, lemon juice, brown sugar, soy sauce, monosodium glutamate, pepper, salt, catchup, Worcestershire sauce, mustard and cornstarch-water mixture. Bring to a boil, stirring. Cool to room temperature. This sauce makes enough for 10–12 people, so the amount you don't need can be stored in a covered jar in the refrigerator for a later day. Place cod fillets in a large shallow container, cover with barbecue sauce and marinate for 2 hours, turning at least three times. Now lay fillets on a broiler pan and broil, basting with more sauce, for about 5–8 minutes. Meanwhile, heat 1½–2 cups more sauce. When fish begins to sizzle, carefully turn with a spatula, baste again. Now broil the fillets for about 3–5 minutes longer, carefully remove to a warm platter and top with the hot barbecue sauce—bring any extra sauce to the table in a bowl. Makes about 6 servings (the fillets are large).

This recipe is the most delectable, simple (and therefore astounding) way of fixing chopped beef. A friend of mine got engaged as a direct result of making these meat balls for the man she loved. She served the meat balls with fluffy hot rice, and a crisp salad of lettuce and cooked green beans!

Elsie's Meat Balls in Sour Cream

MEAT BALLS

- 1½ pounds ground chuck
- ½ cup commercial sour cream
- 2 teaspoons salt
- ¼ teaspoon pepper
- ½ teaspoon garlic powder
- 1 tablespoon butter for browning meat balls

GRAVY

- 1 cup commercial sour cream
- ¼ teaspoon garlic powder
- ½ teaspoon sugar
- 2 teaspoons dried dill

Thoroughly mix together all ingredients for the meat balls. Mixture should be quite soft, but should hold its shape. Shape into small balls (this amount should make about 35). Place them on a tray and chill for 15 minutes. Heat the butter in a large skillet until sizzling. Brown the meat balls quickly. If fat accumulates in the skillet, pour it off. Transfer meat balls to a baking dish or pan and place in a very slow oven, 275° F., for about 10 minutes. To the skillet add 1 cup sour cream. Season with garlic powder, sugar and dill. Heat, stirring until just bubbly. Pour any juices from the baking pan into the skillet and blend in. Serve meat balls topped with the sour-cream gravy and garnish with paprika and parsley fluffs. Makes six servings.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 114

Beautiful and bountiful: tenderest fillets cod marinated in a tomatoey Cre sauce, then broiled until flav create a pungent, aromatic blen

FROM "THE BLUEBERRY HILL COOKBOOK" BY ELSIE MASTERTON, PUBLISHED BY THE THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY, NEW YORK, N.Y., COPYRIGHT 1959.

MENU

Parmesan Cheese Spread
Pea and Curry Soup *
Hot Sesame Seed Crackers *
Chicken Breasts Flambées
Rice Pilaf French Beans Amandine
Belgian Endive and Cress Salad
Lemon Pie
Coffee
(Planned for 8)

* Optional

ken Breasts Flambées blends its triumphant light those of the candles. Ladle the sauce gently over o that its flavors merge with those of the chicken.

Dinner with the John Princes is simple but elegant. In contrast to the large and often lavish diplomatic functions which he "does," or they attend, in Washington, these home parties look uncomplicated and plain, like the tailoring of a good dress.

informal formality

By JOHN PRINCE

Nothing, not even what we keep calling changed conditions, has yet altered the fact that it is fun to give a dinner party. Not a dinner, mind you, but a dinner party. Here we want no steak and potato on a checkered cloth, but something sparkling and ever so discreetly grand.

How can you get away with it if you, like my wife and myself, have a kitchen that does not contain your grandmother's wardrobe, and only a twice-a-week maid?

You must have what the military call good staff work. Think more than you cook, and do the thinking first. And the first thing to think about is this: No matter what on earth the menu is, its sweetest ingredient is the calm of the hostess (and host). To see a new bride slam the oven door on the skirt of her evening gown, to watch the groom pouring cocktails with a dab of cream sauce on his lapel, may be cute once. It is a bore a second time. Better a dinner with herbs of calm than a stalled ox withal and confusion, fatigue and secret bad temper. The best way to have a calm dinner is to proceed by plan, a plan so rehearsed, so thought out in the least of its minute details that, on the important evening, it clicks down like a row of dominoes.

With us there are two preliminary questions.

First, how many persons are to be present? We say eight including ourselves. That number is enough to give a festive note, and we find it as easy to cook for eight as for six. Beyond that number the task gets out of hand. Second, are we to have a serving maid in for the evening or not? If so, we may have the soup course. If not, we skip the soup and also such extras as hot bread. A rice dish will do away with the need of bread of any sort.

Meanwhile, the main problem is the kind of menu. If the hosts' composure is the goal, obviously we must have a menu that may be prepared in large part ahead of time. In the one given above, both the soup and the dessert are to be done a full day before the party. The salad greens are washed, torn and returned to the refrigerator to chill and crisp, and the beans are Frenched and stored in a cool place the afternoon of the party. Then the beans and pilaf are cooked about an hour before dinner. Only the chicken remains to do after the guests arrive—and, at that, this method of cooking chicken gives the hostess time to greet her guests in peace.

Now shall we say that you are giving a party on a Wednesday night—and that you wish to take the thing in steps?

STEP 1

On Tuesday morning or afternoon you will make the soup and the pie.

PEA-AND-CURRY SOUP

¼ cup butter
2 tablespoons flour
5 cups rich chicken stock
3 cups purée of peas
1 tablespoon curry powder
1 cup milk
Salt to taste

Melt butter in a saucepan. Add the flour. Stir over low heat until the flour is cooked, but do not let it take color. Add the chicken stock. It can either be fresh or canned, and if not strong enough in flavor add 1 or 2 chicken-bouillon cubes. If you use the bouillon cubes, taste before adding salt, as they are very salty. Simmer a moment and then add the purée of

CONTINUED ON PAGE 161

STUART

For dessert we like this inverted lemon pie (the meringue is the crust). It looks like the crown jewels, but goes down like milk and crackers.

Fall's most unforgettable fruits: freshest honey-sweet plums, goldenly plump peaches and russet pears slowly simmered to a fragrant perfection in a syrup just tart enough of lemon to heighten their natural bouquet. Serve hot under a zabaglione drift.

luscious fall

How golden summer's last days, how welcome their harvest: sun-burnished apples, pears and plums ambrosial to the core. Though not so lauded as berries plucked earlier, autumn's fruit array does promise a whole new range of flavor affinities.

For a bit of perfection, gently warm red plums and pears and peaches in a vanilla-lemon syrup so their magic juices mingle, then bring forth the exquisite compote with a froth of zabaglione. Ruddy apples we like broiled whole under a buttery pineapple glaze, or sliced and baked into a crispy pudding with almonds under a whipped-cream cloud.

Unexpected and beautiful, watermelon freezes into a delicate ice. For off-season elegance, mound it high and pink in sparkling crystal, made more decorative and delicious

STUART POWLER

New excitement for an old favorite: freeze the rosy bouquet of watermelon into a shimmering ice, pile it gloriously high in sparkling crystal and lace with cool honeydew-melon balls and a sprinkling of misty blueberries. A magnificent medley, this.

fruit desserts

with honeydew-melon balls and a sprinkling of blueberries. Capture the bouquet of apricots, heighten it with honey, then freeze all into a creamy golden taste sensation. De luxe and perfect for a party: fresh peach halves, cream-filled and set on meringue pedestals with a ruby ladling of raspberry Melba sauce; or Moorish pears lightly blushed with pink, which merge eloquently with banana crescents, rich chocolaty sauce and crunch of pistachio nuts. . . . We rank with the best the satisfaction of ripe fall fruits served with cheese, their perfect complement.

Luscious fall fruit desserts, these, each a grand finale to linger in your memory. Imaginative, intriguing and always elegant. Recipes on the next page.

Luscious Fall Fruit Desserts

PEACHES ON MERINGUE PEDESTALS

8 ripe peaches
2 cups water
1 cup sugar
2 packages (12-ounce) frozen raspberries
½ cup sweetened almond-flavored whipped cream

MERINGUE

2 egg whites
Pinch salt
6 tablespoons sugar
¼ teaspoon almond flavoring

Place water and 1 cup sugar in a saucepan. Bring to a boil and cook 5 minutes. Meanwhile, peel the peaches, cut in half and remove pits. Simmer peach halves in the syrup until tender, about 10 minutes. This time will vary, depending on how ripe the peaches are. Drain and chill.

Meringue: Beat the egg whites with the salt until frothy. Add the sugar a tablespoonful at a time, beating well after each addition. Add the almond flavoring and continue beating until sugar is completely dissolved and meringue is glossy. Using a pastry bag, shape into 8 rings, about 2½″ in diameter, on greased brown paper over a baking sheet. Bake in a very slow oven, 250° F., for 30 to 40 minutes until crisp. Remove meringues from paper carefully.

Thaw raspberries. Crush or buzz in a blender and press through a sieve to remove seeds. To serve, arrange meringue pedestals on serving dish. Put two peach halves together with about 1 tablespoon whipped cream and place on top of each meringue. Pour the raspberry purée over and around the peaches. Makes 8 servings.

MOORISH PEARS

4 pears, peeled and cored
2 cups water
1⅓ cups sugar
¼ teaspoon vanilla
3 egg yolks
1 cup scalded milk
1″ strip lemon peel
3 ounces semisweet choco
1 ounce unsweetened choc
4 small bananas
1 cup heavy cream, whipp
⅓ cup minced blanched pistachio nuts

Cut pears in half lengthwise. Place water, 1 cup sugar and in a saucepan. Bring to a boil and cook for 5 minutes. Ad and simmer 5 to 10 minutes, until pears are tender. This will on the ripeness of the fruit. Drain pears, reserving syrup, an Beat egg yolks and ⅓ cup sugar until thick and lemon-c Blend in the milk, add lemon peel and pour into a saucepan over very low heat, stirring constantly, until mixture co spoon. Do not boil. Melt the chocolate and add to the eg ture. Discard lemon peel and cool chocolate mixture, constantly. Arrange pears on a large serving dish, cored side Pour the chocolate mixture over them and chill. Peel and the bananas and simmer in the pear syrup for 3 or 4 m Drain and chill. When ready to serve, arrange bananas am pear halves. Pile whipped cream in the center and sprink pistachio nuts. Makes 8 servings.

WATERMELON ICE

¼ of a 25-pound watermelon or
1 (6–7-pound) midget watermelon
1 can (6-ounce) frozen lemonade concentrate ¼ teaspoon salt
Sugar or lemon juice
2 envelopes unflavored gelatin
½ cup cold water
Few drops red food coloring (optional)
2 cups sweetened blueberries
2 cups honeydew-melon balls

Remove seeds and rind from watermelon. Chop fine and put through a coarse sieve, or buzz in a blender. You should have about 6 cups purée. Add the lemonade concentrate and salt. Mix well and taste, adding sugar or lemon juice to taste. Soften the gelatin in the water and dissolve over hot water. Add to watermelon mixture and mix well. Pour into two refrigerator trays and place in freezer until frozen ½″ around the edges. Scrape into a well-chilled bowl and break up with a spoon. Beat quickly with a rotary or electric beater, adding food coloring if you wish. Return to freezer until firm. Serve with sweetened blueberries and honeydew-melon balls. Makes 8 servings.

CRISPY APPLE-LEMON PUDDING

2½ cups apples, peeled, sliced and cored
2 tablespoons butter
½ cup plus ⅓ cup sugar
¼ cup commercial sour cream
4 eggs
1 tablespoon flour
1 tablespoon grated lemon rind
1½ tablespoons lemon juice
¼ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon cinnamon
½ cup crushed corn flakes
½ cup finely grated blanched almonds
Sweetened whipped cream or ice cream

Place apples and butter in a covered skillet and cook over low heat until apples are tender. With rotary or electric beater, beat together until well blended ½ cup sugar, the sour cream, egg yolks, flour and lemon rind and juice. Pour over apples and cook over very low heat, stirring constantly, until mixture thickens. Remove from heat and cool. Beat the egg whites with the salt until stiff but not dry. Fold into apple mixture. Combine ⅓ cup sugar, cinnamon, corn flakes and almonds. Spread about ⅔ of this mixture in the bottom of a greased 8″ x 8″ x 2″ pan. Pour in apple mixture and sprinkle remaining crumbs over the top. Bake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for about 45 minutes. Serve warm with sweetened whipped cream or ice cream. Makes about 6 servings.

STUART

HOT FRUIT COMPOTE

8 red plums
8 peaches
8 pears
7–8 cups sugar
6 cups water
1 (3″) piece vanilla bean
2 teaspoons grated lemon rind

Prepare fruits for stewing. Peel peaches and pears, keeping them whole, and leaving pear stems on. Place in large bowl and sprinkle well with lemon juice to prevent them from darkening. Wash and prick plums to prevent skins from bursting. In a large heavy kettle mix together the sugar, water, vanilla bean and lemon rind. The amount of the sugar depends on the ripeness of the fruit used. Cook mixture to a thin syrup, about 10 minutes. Add the pears and peaches and cook gently, turning them often, until they start getting glossy-looking, about 20 minutes. Cooking time will depend on size and degree of ripeness of the fruits. Then add the plums, and cook all fruits just until fork-tender. Remove the fruits with a slotted spoon when they are tender. They will not all be done at the same time. Arrange fruits in a large bowl. Bring syrup to a boil and pour all or part of it over the fruits. Serve hot with zabaglione sauce. Fruits may be served cold also. Makes 8 servings.

ZABAGLIONE SAUCE

6 egg yolks
¾ cup confectioners' sugar
¾ cup orange juice (or Marsala)
1 teaspoon grated orange rind

Beat egg yolks until thick and light in color. Continue to beat while adding the sugar gradually, and next the orange juice (or Marsala) and rind. Transfer to double boiler over very little boiling water and beat rapidly until mixture foams up and becomes quite thick, about 7 minutes. Be sure the water in the lower part of the double boiler does not touch the bottom of the upper pan. Cool, then refrigerate. Makes about 3 cups sauce.

APRICOT-HONEY ICE CREAM

6 egg yolks
⅔ cup honey
3 cups apricot purée
Juice of 2 lemons
2 cups heavy cream

Use stewed fresh, canned or dried apricots. Drain before puréeing. Beat egg yolks until thick and lemon-colored. Add honey gradually, beating the mixture until very thick. Fold apricots into mixture along with lemon juice. Fold in cream, stiffly beaten. Pour into 3 refrigerator trays. Freeze without stirring until firm. Serve in wedges of honeydew melon. Makes about 2 quarts ice cream.

RUBY GLAZED APPLES

8 large Rome Beauty baking apples
3 cups pineapple juice
¾ cup butter
½ cup sugar
Few drops red food coloring

Wash and core the apples. About a third to halfway down, score the skin with a sharp knife all the way around—cutting through the skin but cutting into the apples as little as possible. Place in a steamer and steam long enough to enable you to peel the skin off the top of the apples gently, being careful not to overcook them. Arrange the apples in a shallow baking dish. Mix the pineapple juice, butter and sugar, bring to a boil and tint pink with the food coloring. Boil this mixture for about 5 minutes, and pour over the apples. Broil as far from the heat as possible until the apples are glazed, basting frequently Makes 8 servings.

FRUIT-AND-CHEESE FINALE

Classically Continental are fruit and cheese, which Europeans consider the perfect finis to an exciting meal. Bring to the table an exquisite compote of apples, pears, mangoes and cascading grapes, an artistic array of cheeses: zesty Cheddar; the creamy Camembert and Brie (whose season, like that of oysters, extends from September, the best of all, through the "R" months); Roquefort, the queen of the bleus, Gorgonzola or lordly Stiltons. King Christian, fragrant of caraway seeds; Grapillon, which is slowly cured in wine squeezings. The rule to remember in serving fruit and cheese: team bland cheeses with tart fruits, piquant cheeses with mild fruits. Excellent accompaniments: crusty Italian bread, exciting cracker combinations; and for those of you who wish it, red wines like Burgundy, Bordeaux or Claret. Make the presentation as beautiful as an Old Master still life and your enjoyment will be infinite.

GOOD THINGS BEGIN TO HAPPEN... when...

Mm! Mm! Good! Nourishing good!

..you have soup for Sunday supper

ne crowd come to your house on y night? Does the family gather ? Give them something quick and like a Campbell's Soup buffet. Hot n Noodle Soup, with plenty for
s. Crispy bread. An apple salad.
ner of milk.

things begin to happen when you nat golden soup. Happy, friendly
. For soup makes folks who eat warm and good all over.

And it isn't any trouble to serve a lot of soup – you just keep opening extra cans of Campbell's. So just relax and let the crowd come.

They'll like it, too. There's real nourishment in big bowls of good hot soup.

Good nourishment in the country chicken, and old-fashioned egg noodles, and chicken broth you get in Campbell's Chicken Noodle Soup. Along with the good flavor that makes folks ask for more.

Have a Campbell's Soup buffet this Sunday night. And every Sunday night. Or why wait for Sunday? Make soup the main dish of all your easygoing meals. There are 21 kinds of Campbell's to choose from.

Lunchtime, dinnertime—just about any time's a good time for soup. And you can have some, hot and ready, in just 4 minutes – with Campbell's. So get the happy habit – once a day . . . every day – Soup!

Have you had your soup today? Campbell's, of course!

OPERATION TERROR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 47

seat and stumbled getting in. "I wouldn't hesitate to kill you, Miss Sherwood. I've killed three times—and I'm not squeamish about the next one. They can hang me only once."

She fixed on the rear-view mirror, but it reflected only blackness. Faint, soft spots of light found every crack in the old garage, particularly where a snoutlike extension had been added to accommodate the longer cars. Finally she was able to say, "Why don't we go in the house? Nobody's home tonight."

He said, "I know. Your kid sister's with a friend, Louella Hendricks, 14814 Tustin. She went there at seven-twenty-three and you left for your party at seven-thirty-two."

He was pleased with himself. "You see, Miss Sherwood, I know all about you. You're twenty-six. Your parents died six years ago in an accident. You're sweet on the escrow guy in the bank where you work, and you went to a party in North Hollywood tonight ——"

Now her thoughts for escape raced up dead alleys. She couldn't move, couldn't wrench away and run. The car was a cell, as though it had bars, and the garage the prison proper.

"What do you want?" she asked, stalling.

"You, Miss Sherwood. You."

The ticking of the car clock was suddenly loud, as was the purring of the freezer in the corner. She said quietly, "You can't get away with it. I'll fight you and somebody'll hear the ruckus. It's a dead-end street."

No one would hear, of course.

He flared up. "I know what kind of a street it is."

"May I get my cigarettes, please—from the glove compartment?"

She didn't smoke and he might know it.

"One move—just one move ——"

A mockingbird sang with all the stops pulled out. A twig from the Chinese elm fell explosively on the garage roof. A car screeched along Valley Vista Boulevard a block away, taking the curves too fast. And in the closed garage, the heat mounted until she thought she would suffocate.

She said, "You must know I don't have any money."

He hardened. "You've got a bank full of it—and we're going to get about a hundred thousand." He repeated, letting the words roll off his tongue, "A hundred thousand. You and I."

A transcontinental plane roared overhead, absorbing their words. When the stillness was again with them she said, "I'm only a teller. I'm not permitted to keep much money at my window. They've got a rule — a strict rule ——"

He was amused. "Mind if I call you Kelly? I feel I know you, I've followed you so long."

"I couldn't care less what you call me," she retorted angrily.

"You leave home at seven-fifty-five each morning, take the Hollywood freeway and arrive at the bank at eight-twenty-five. You get a coffee break for ten minutes at nine-fifty, then check out for a forty-five-minute lunch at eleven-fifteen. You get another coffee break at three, and quit work at five. You're home at five-thirty unless you stop at Ralph's to shop."

She said, "You've got me pretty well cased—if that's the word."

"You speak my language." He paused. "Your kid sister, Toby, goes to Van Nuys High School. Leaves here a few minutes before you do, catches the school bus up on Valley Vista. She eats lunch at school, only sometimes she goes to the Hangout with the other kids for a hamburger. She gets out at three-fifteen, takes the school bus home except when she stops for a malt with her boy friend. But she's always home by four." He added, "That's an hour and a half she's by herself. All by herself."

She waited until she was sure she could control her voice "You want me to do what?" she asked.

"I've got a plan—a perfectly perfect plan." She could sense the animation in his voice. "Why hold up a bank and get yourself shot—when there's a simple, quiet way?" He paused, timing his words. "So I'm not going to hold up the bank. You are."

"If you think for one minute I'm ——"

"I think you're going to, Kelly. Because you really have no choice. But if you play along and don't give me any trouble, I'll cut you in for twenty per cent. How does that sound—twenty thousand dollars? It's a lot of money. You'd work at the bank a long time to make that much."

"It is a lot of money," she repeated.

"You bet it is. It's this way. I need you to work in the open, and you need me to handle the job. And we don't get caught and there won't be any violence—unless you cause it. Remember that. If anyone gets killed, it'll be on your head."

"I'd have to know what I have to do."

His breathing was labored. "If you're thinking you'll go to the cops, well, I've worked that out too. You squeal and I'll know about it. I won't tell you how, but I'll know." He added, "I'll tell you this much. Somebody else is watching you besides me."

She said, "You can't just come barging up and toss something like this into my lap. I'm not used to making decisions. I can't even pick out a new dress on the first trip. I ——"

"What do I care how you pick a dress? I'll tell you what to do when the time comes."

"I could use the cut," she said slowly. "I'm making so many payments the loan sharks are breathing down my neck."

He was opening the car door. He was standing directly behind her. She felt the gun metal on her shoulder.

Softly he said, "You're giving me a snow job—and I can spot a snow job a mile off. I haven't hurt you and I wanted to. I'd like to hurt you."

For a moment there was neither sound nor movement behind her. Then, "I just wanted to talk to you tonight, size you up." He added, "Twenty thousand bucks. It's a lot of money. Think what you can do with that—you and your kid sister."

He was talking far out, and she was hearing him through a wall.

"But I'll have to kill you both if I hear you've gone to the police. It's one or the other. A bullet or twenty thousand bucks."

With that, she heard him backing out of the tight space between the car and the garage wall, brushing a hammer off the shelf as he did so. The garage door slid back; his footsteps melted into stillness.

Her head felt light and dizzy with relief. She sat for minutes, too frightened to move, thinking he would be waiting outside. She took a long, deep breath, felt her muscles loosen. She discovered her fists clenched and forced them apart.

Sliding out of the seat, she groped her way toward the door, past the stacked-up paint cans, the lawn mower. The air revived her. She stood staring into the dark, searching for a blob that might move. She crossed to the back door, and as she fumbled with the key, hysteria clawed at her. It was so ridiculous, now that the danger had passed.

In the kitchen she turned on the light, then hurried through the house, switching on every light. She checked the front door to assure herself it was locked.

She never had the least doubt what to do. Her father had worked as a court reporter all his life. The best in Los Angeles County, they said. Hurriedly she riffled through the pages of the telephone directory on the kitchen table, then started to dial HUbbard 3-3551. Halfway through, her finger slipped, and she began over.

A girl's voice answered, "FBI ——"

Rip was so buried in a case report he was roughing out that he jumped when the phone rang. The switchboard girl said, "I've got a call, Mr. Ripley. She sounds far out. Will you take it?"

"Sure," he said, "if it isn't a drunk."

Rip was bushed. He had started the day at 8:30 A.M. on the complaint desk, a tall, hard-packed man who sat his chair like a saddle, a little forward, the reins loose but firm in his hand. It was the way he had sat as a boy on a cattle ranch in Arizona.

A few minutes later Peg looked in on him. She was the receptionist, an ash blonde with a turned-up pixy nose. "Hi," she said, standing very straight in a white sheath dress. Her blue pendant earrings danced.

He smiled up at her. "Hello, Peg." She was a bright spot in a business always serious, often grim.

"Well, did you or didn't you?" she asked.

He'd been on a stake-out for a killer the night before. He shook his head. "He didn't show."

She said, "I couldn't sleep." Her mood changed abruptly. "Nat King Cole's singing at the Philharmonic Saturday night."

"Interesting."

She added, "I know you don't get time to read the papers."

As she started out, he called after her, "Seven o'clock Saturday be O.K.?"

She whirled about. "You mean it?"

"You don't have to hit me over the head ——"

"I do too."

She laughed and was gone, leaving her scent behind her, soft and refreshing, like her. He thought a man could tell a lot about a girl by her perfume.

A short time later a ten-year-old boy came in. He had lost his dog, Meatball, and wanted the FBI to find him. They came steadily all day to the complaint desk, which was not what the name implied. It was a desk set aside to receive people who wanted to talk with an agent, people who usually had information. A landlady who thought she knew the whereabouts of a fugitive. A union official with a tip on a highjacking. A bank examiner to discuss a possible embezzlement.

Each call, the amusing as well as the serious, was evaluated. The most inconsequential today could prove the most vital tomorrow.

At 3:53 P.M., Peg ushered in a striking-looking brunette who wore heavy make-up to conceal the wear and tear of her thirty-odd years.

"Outside of the fact that you and your wife are not speaking, what else stands out about your two weeks in the fallout shelter?"

"Thank you for seeing me," she said ... antly. She held his hand a little too lon... sat. She crossed long, slender legs and ... one gently. From the doorway, Peg til... eyebrow.

"I shouldn't be taking up your t... know," the woman gushed, "but I've ... very dear friend who's in trouble and ... her I'd stop by. It's the least I could d...

"May I have your name, please?" ... asked.

"Of course. Nancy Ashton." Peg s... out.

"Your address?"

"Ten-fifteen Roxdale Avenue, Apa... Three-B."

"What do you do, Miss Ashton?"

"Do you mind?" She indicated a cig... Rip moved in easy, swift steps to light it... an entertainer," she said.

"An actress?"

"You might call me that."

He didn't press. She was a call gi... remembered one of his old professors ... FBI Academy at Quantico, Virginia, say... a lecture, "A woman is a woman. She's ... treated like one, even if she is a prost...

"Now about your friend ——"

She sat as though she were about t... "I won't beat around, Mr. Ripley. She's ... herself mixed up in something with ... who's no good. Not through any fault ... own, you understand. But she's had ... along on some things. And now she d... know where to turn. I told her if she ... down here and talked with you . . . ... mean, would she be prosecuted for som... she couldn't help?"

"What kind of crime, Miss Ashton?"

She hesitated. "It's—it's a serious on...

He pressed. "A holdup? An embezzle... An extortion?"

"Something like that."

"Is it a Federal matter? Perhaps th... lice ——"

"No—it's—it's ——" She stopped, ... loss for words.

He rose and leaned against the wall ... name and address were fictitious. And sh... the one who wanted the information. H... positive, even though he was guessing. H... was guessing. He couldn't hold her.

He said slowly, "We're an investi... agency only, Miss Ashton. We turn our... over to the United States attorney a... decides whether they warrant institutin... action."

"You mean—you couldn't ——"

"No—but I think you should advise ... friend to come in on her own volition ... give us the facts. The longer these m... go ——"

His phone rang. It was Peg. "Nega... she said. She had asked the chief clerk's ... to run the indices for a Nancy Ashton.

"Thanks." He hung up slowly, wond... what he could say further that might ... about in her mind after she was gone.

"You're checking on me," she said.

"Should we?" he asked bluntly.

"I wouldn't be here if I had anythi... hide."

He chose his words carefully. "If ... friend wants to make a break with this ... inal, she should do it now before she bec... even more involved. If she has commit... crime, she will be prosecuted, of course ... at that time a judge or jury will take ... consideration her personal relationship ... the criminal, whether she was intimidat... him, and that kind of thing. But whatev... outcome, she will be in a position whe... can start over again."

She rose abruptly. "Thank you. Y... been very kind, Mr. Ripley, and I'll te... friend." She paused at the doorway. He ... suddenly conscious of the tremendous phy... vigor of the woman. She said, "I'd like to ... you a drink some evening."

He smiled. "Sorry—I don't have much ... for things like that."

"I suppose not. Well, good-by again."

She left her scent behind, heavy and clo... Nancy Ashton. He would remember the n... alias or not.

CONTINUED ON PAG...

Wesson® Drumsticks for Dunkin'

Wesson glorifies chicken as only pure vegetable oil can

RECIPE FOR DRUMSTICKS . . made with poly-unsaturated Wesson, the pure vegetable oil

Coat 12 fryer drumsticks with seasoned flour. Fry in 1 inch of Wesson heated to 350° (moderately hot). Remove chicken, keep warm.

Sauce: Drain off all but 2 tablesp. drippings. Add a chopped onion, cook slowly 3 min. Add 1 can (8 oz.) tomato sauce, such as Hunt's, ¼ cup each lemon juice and brown sugar, 1 tablesp. Worcestershire, 1 teasp. mustard, 1 teasp. salt, dash pepper. Stir well, simmer 15 min. Delicious dip for drumsticks. 6 servings at about 485 calories each.

Free recipes "101 Glorious Ways to Cook Chicken." Write The Wesson People, New Orleans 12, La.

hat fun to dunk a drumstick! And how pleasant to cut wn on saturated fat in your skillet by using Wesson stead of shortening. You see, shortening is hydrogenated make it solid. But Wesson is never hydrogenated and so it is poly-unsaturated as only pure vegetable oil can be. So clear, so fresh, so pretty as it pours, Wesson brightens flavors — never adds taste of its own as some other oils do. How nice that Wesson costs so little, too.

hen your physician recommends modifying your diet and specifies pure vegetable oil to replace solid fats, Wesson is unexcelled among all leading brands.

"The shine is the sign it's really clean!

says PRUDENCE POTTS, the Pan Inspector

Only Brillo Soap Pads

contain special soap with Jeweler's Polish to get pans shining clear

Nothing else cleans so fast... shines so bright... your best buy too!

Firmer, sturdier pads

A Brillo Soap Pad just has to clean more pots. The only pad that's tightly knit with firm "hemmed" edges—to stay in shape longer—give extra cleaning surface for crusty scouring jobs.

Richer, livelier lather

"Lavish" is the word for Brillo lather. Foams up faster because each pad is packed with soap clear through. Brillo with its exclusive polishing soap cleans faster, shines brighter!

Thriftier, more pads

Count the extra pads you get in the 5, 12 and 20 pad boxes. No other product gives you so many pads—such long-lasting pads—plus special soap with Jeweler's Polish. Your best buy!

Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N and Toronto, Canada

GUARANTEED! A NEW UTENSIL FREE IF BRILLO FAILS TO CLEAN!

Nothing shines aluminum like BRILL

NED FROM PAGE 92

e left the long, low, modern building lack facing about the doors and its of palms and tropical shrubs. A y he pushed through a door into the el coffeeshop. He ordered a steak, ouldn't afford on his salary, and the aid, "That kind of a day, huh?"
id of a day, he thought.
n he was back in his office, assems on a bank-robbery case he was The rule was: A written report on at least every thirty days and con-oftener if there were developments His case load was heavy. He was eventeen.
e took the 11:44 P.M. call, he had no assume that the visit that afternoon
Ashton could be related in any way.
speaking," he said into the phone.
man's voice seemed far away. "I've e someone—right away—about a
"
rrupted. "May I have your name, get the name, the address at the very ood." She spelled it out. "S-h-e-rd ——"
d thumped his eardrum, deafening had dropped the phone, or it had cked out of her hand and struck metallic. He switched the receiver er ear. "Hello," he said repeatedly.
rd a faint groan, the sibilance of eathing, then he heard nothing until who cannot forgive others

s the bridge over which he pass himself, for every man eed to be forgiven.
HERBERT

was replaced almost stealthily, it nd the connection went dead.
had only a last name and a voice, ng more. The name was definite, but was only a sound track in his mem-ad been a steady, well-disciplined edged with fear.
ed a pencil along the desk. Somet there, in a city of 2,000,000, a ad put in a call for help. She might ted, or gone into such a state of could no longer talk. She might knocked unconscious.
ne else had been about, for the phone hung up. It was that someone he bout. A member of the family surely ve come on with an explanation.
ded his eyes in thought against the lighted room. Frustration was a e business, but he had never become d to it: the knowledge that someone perate straits, perhaps grave danger, ould do nothing but sit and search hts for some way out. Some way feeling that you could figure a way ferreted deeply enough in your own ou were smart and clever enough.
a detective had to prowl his own er than the streets.
ed the help of three other agents ate, and passed out sections of the les telephone directory to them. He fellow the Northwestern section, an-Southern, and he took the Central.
egan dialing Sherwoods. In the Cen-there were ninety-four, and in the tern, which covered sprawling San Valley, seventy. As he called, each d, "Say, I was talking with Miss and got cut off." He never mene FBI.
the reaction was a sleepy, "You've rong number." Sometimes it was losive.
man answered, and waited a long before replying. "Who're you?" he ally.
ohn Ripley."
know you."
n old friend of Miss Sherwood."
n Miss Sherwood?"

Rip remembered his war days. Always take the offensive if cornered. "Say, who is this?"

The man bristled. "You wasn't talking with any Miss Sherwood here. They've all gone East. What's your game, Joe?"

Rip was putting the receiver down when an agent called, "I think I've got something." Holding his hand over the mouthpiece, he continued, "She took the bait when I gave my little speech, called me Pete and said I shouldn't be calling at this hour."

He handed Rip the phone. "You called me, Miss Sherwood?" Rip asked.

Her voice was strong. "Pete, this is the third time you've gotten me out of bed. I'll bet you're half swacked in some bar. I work for a living. You've heard of people like me, haven't you?"

A good feeling washed over him. He didn't know the woman, had no idea whether she was young or old, and yet he felt good.

"You O.K.?" he asked.

"I think so."

The agent handed him a memo with an address scratched across it, 14712 Tustin Street, Sherman Oaks, and a map. He indicated the street. It was only two blocks long at this point and dead-ended.

Rip said to her, "Is anybody listening in?"

"No."

"You don't have an extension?"

"No."

"But somebody may be listening to you?"

"Could be, Pete."

"Somebody in the house?"

"No."

"Somebody outside?"

"Yes."

"You're by yourself?"

"Yes, tonight. You remember my kid sister, Toby, don't you? Well, she's with friends."

"O.K.—I'll carry the ball. You just say yes and no." He talked swiftly, fearing if she stayed on the telephone too long the "someone" might grow suspicious.

"Is it a man?"

"Yes."

"Did he talk with you?"

"That's right."

"And he threatened you—wanted you to do something?"

"Yes."

"Did you know him?"

"No."

"Never saw him before?"

"I didn't tonight. It's so dark outside, you know, Pete. I think I lost the package when I parked."

"You had to hang up because he was listening?"

"No."

"He forced you to."

"I can't put it into words, Pete."

"Hit you?"

"Yes."

"Is it about a murder case?"

"No."

"A bank holdup, an embezzlement ——"

"Something like that."

"Can I come out?"

"No, Pete, it wouldn't look right at this time of the night—and anyway, you couldn't find it. It's just a little dead-end street tucked away off ——" She underscored "dead-end street." He glanced at the agent.

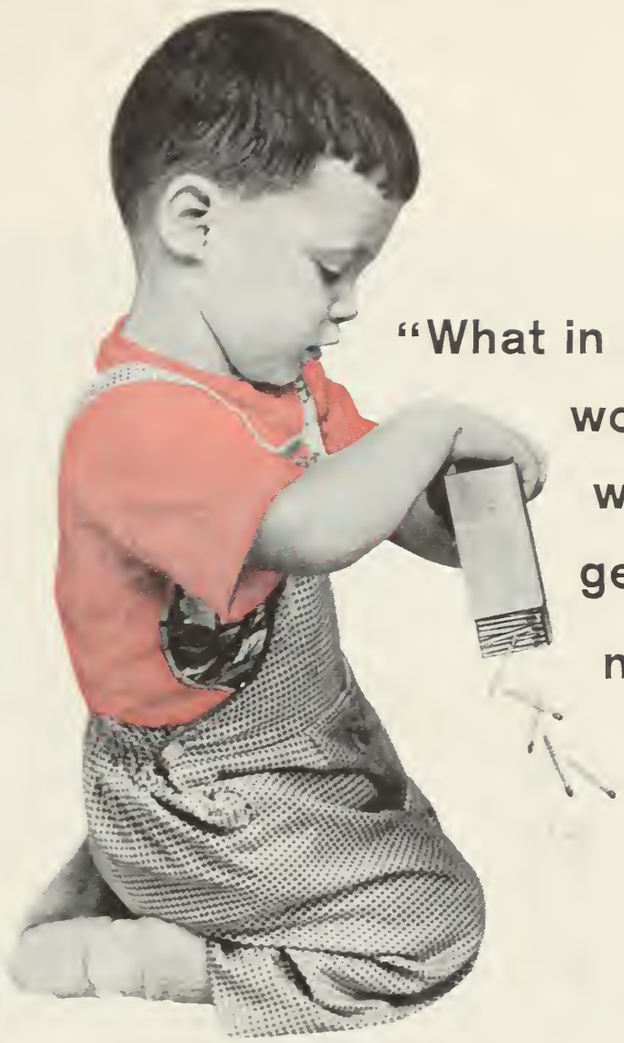
She continued, "I tell you what. If you find the package, why don't you drop it off at the bank tomorrow? You go by the corner of Hollywood and Cherokee anyway, don't you?"

"Will anything happen at the bank tonight, or in the morning before we see you?"

"I don't think so."

"We'd like to come out. We'd post a man tonight ——"

He caught the strong undertow of fear. "Please, Pete, don't. Think what the neighbors might say tomorrow or even next week if they saw you."



"You mean we'd be putting you in some kind of danger in the future?"

"I knew you'd understand."

He thought he'd talked as long as he dared. "You're sure you'll be all right?"

"Yes."

"If you want to, leave the phone off the cradle. I'll keep the connection open tonight—and if you stay close by ——"

(Facts about childhood's greatest enemy—accidents)

To a little boy or girl, everything is interesting. But in finding out "the way of things," a great many youngsters are hurt or crippled or killed.

It's a mistaken belief, that children are bound to have accidents—and that it's useless to try to prevent them. Studies have proved that most childhood accidents need never happen.

For example, deaths from accidental poisoning could be drastically cut by observing these simple precautions:

Store all drugs—especially flavored or brightly colored medicines—in a locked closet or cabinet.

Destroy all left-over medicines prescribed for temporary use. Don't throw them into a wastebasket where a child might find them.

Put all household products—disinfectants, insecticides, furniture polishes, bleaches, metal cleaners, lye, ammonia and acids—out of the reach and out of the sight of children. Replace covers or stoppers tightly.

Keep all potentially harmful substances in their original containers. Don't transfer them to unlabeled containers, particularly those that are meant to hold food or beverages.

Read all labels carefully, and follow warning directions to the letter whether it's a label on a bottle of medicine or a container of paint solvent.

Find out if there's a Poison Control Center near you. These centers are ever ready to provide your physician with quick identification of poisonous ingredients, and directions for emergency, life-saving treatment.

THE LIGHT THAT NEVER FAILS

Metropolitan Life

INSURANCE COMPANY

A MUTUAL COMPANY

COUPON MAY BE PASTED ON POSTAL CARD

Metropoliton Life (Dept. A)
1 Madison Ave., New York 10, N.Y.
Please send me the free booklet, "Formula for Child Safety." 9-60-J

CHILD SAFETY

Name
(PLEASE PRINT)
Street
City & Zone State

"That'd be swell, Pete. See you tomorrow."

He waited, hearing the faint touch of the phone as it was placed on a wooden surface. Swiftly he walked to the switchboard. "Be sure to hold that line open," he told the girl. "I'll arrange for someone to monitor it."

Kelly had been sitting by the small, black Chinese desk in the so-called "family room" where she and Toby watched television. As she waited for the switchboard girl to put her through to an agent, she had been conscious, and yet not conscious, of a floor board faintly complaining. But it was an old Spanish house and she had become so accustomed to its arthritic grumblings she scarcely heard them.

She had said no more than a dozen words when almost simultaneously the room went dark and a blow caught her on the jaw. Knuckles cracked hard against the bone, as though there were no protective flesh. She slid in slow motion, or so she imagined, to the floor.

She never quite lost consciousness. She struggled to roll over, but a foot stepped heavily on her shoulder.

He had said quite coolly, "I was waiting for you to phone the cops—and the next time you try a trick like that I'll kill you."

She had lain stock-still, barely breathing, hearing his footsteps receding, across the kitchen linoleum, and then the back door slamming. She felt the heat, the pain, but most of all a thrust of fear, such as she had never known.

Spot growled low, the way when a stranger was about. was staying close to the hous Vesta or Luke Voight or th Roger, would investigate— awakened. At last she sat waited, straining so tensely that the process itself hurt. W heard nothing, she rose, strai her dress. Her shoulder pai and her jaw, and her face w had struck her cheekbone.

She forced her feet to the and locked the back doo walked with her to a bedroo High up on a shelf, she found ther's .45 where he had hi many years ago, so Toby, the would not chance on it. Sh had never fired it—nor, for th ter, any gun. By sheer will pc stilled her fingers as she slip shells into the chamber.

Afterward she checked eve dow, and at the back of the h noticed a small square of glas large enough for a man's h reach through, cut neatly o pane. The killer had simply u the window, raised it and through.

And all the time she could nothing but Toby. A con which refused to be quieted de to hear Toby's voice. Toby right. She knew she was. It wa lous. She would only frighten Besides, she dared not teleph

Time was when Toby had b another troublesome kid sist rowing her clothes when she looking. Then had come th when the Los Angeles E called. There had been an aut accident north of San Fra Their parents had been killed, ing from a vacation.

Their grief and a feeling of ness had welded the two, and own devotion to her fath mother had transferred to this ing, beautiful creature who w woman, half girl. One minut would say, "I'm getting a job. ing to help with the expenses next she would burst out, "Say an outsider, what do you think human race?"

She loved life so much tha feared for her. It always h deeply when the first illusion shattered, or the first enth were crushed by thoughtless pe the whim of events.

Eventually the compulsion Toby won out. She sat by the with its receiver out of the cradl time she faced the door, and the .45 at hand's reach.

She whispered into the ope "Hello."

A man's voice answered. "Y

"I want to call my sister, hanging up. I'll call you back ward."

"You're O.K.?"

"Yes."

Hanging up, then lifting the again, she dialed the Hendr number. When Mr. Hendricks on the line she started to w then reconsidered and spoke in mal voice. Might she speak Toby? She had forgotten to t something important.

Toby said, "Sis, what's w What's happened?"

Kelly managed a calm "Nothing's happened, silly. I r bered I had some business i Nuys tomorrow. So I'll come you and Louella. It'll save you the bus."

"Something's wrong. I know

"Please don't dramatize."

"You mean you woke up the place over here just to tell me down. "O.K., Toby, let's nted to see if you were all a nightmare ——"

must've been a gorilla."
y at seven-fifteen. Good

Kel." o'clock in the living room it was one o'clock. For l years even, life flowed lreamlike way, in the old erns, and then within two is ——

Terror, as it was to ben, began smoothly, effi-
:32 A.M. when two agents or the Tustin Street area.
park a few blocks away,
reached by radio if Kelly
ndicated over the open
ne that she needed help.
departed at the same
e Hollywood First Nato place it under sur-

Rip was dialing the SAC, gent in charge of the Los l division. So accustomed AC to having his sleep that he answered on the Rip said, "Harry, this is o get you up."
d him about the call. "She
'd put her in greater dan-
's in already if we saw her

ithout some of the ou want is an indis-
e part of happiness.

BERTRAND RUSSELL

urveillance. It's a tricky l-end street; but still——" inking that if Kelly Sherfound dead in the morn-ld have to live with it the ears.
along with you on it," the le would ride with this guy most anything. Ripley
a straight line, cutting bric-a-brac. It was sur-few men could do that.
nued, "I've got a call in for bank detail and the bank said, "Call me if anything nd let me know what she ow."

fterward Rip talked with nanager, and arranged to agents inside the bank.
witchboard girl connected apt. Frank Moreno, of the s police department's rob-
n.
the captain well. Moreno ican descent, in his thirties, of durability about him illusion.
o get you out of bed,
ip said.
O.K. I'm trying to shake and with you and a few ls to help ——"
him the setup and asked ation. In any case in which or Federally insured bank tim, the FBI held primary but worked closely with thorities.
said he would send a cou-
over to the bank.

me Rip pulled up in front
rtment building, his car it was 2:30. He walked the creaky, tattletale hall
-a-month bachelor apart-
ed the key in quietly.
ip found a letter from his t the landlady had left on lis mother never addressed him at the FBI office. Years back one of her letters had gone astray, and she had suspected the FBI ever since.

She wrote she was fine and hoping he could spend Christmas with her on the ranch near Tucson, Arizona. As always she asked when he was marrying Peg. Rip grinned. His mother was a firm believer in the efficacy of gentle pressure regularly applied. He had taken Peg to the ranch for a weekend trip at Easter, and his mother had fallen in love with the slender, radiant girl. "She knows how to laugh," his mother had said. "And she'll see to it you don't forget how."

He had never known anyone who could enjoy life as fully as his mother. He wished he had inherited more of her spirit. He blamed the anxieties of the era he lived in, but suspected he was rationalizing. Every generation had its anxieties.

Undressing swiftly, he stretched out on the bed, pulled the phone to the edge of the night table and switched off the light. He was too exhausted to sleep readily. He wondered if he had called the play right. Sometimes it seemed that no matter which path a man walked in this business, he placed a life in jeopardy.

Kelly dragged and pushed the divan to within a foot of the telephone, whose receiver lay by its cradle, a thin, tenuous line to the outside world. She stretched out in her clothes. Shortly after two she heard a car start up in the distance. After that she slept fitfully, though she heard the cuckoo clock strike each hour.

Welcome new freedom! Whirl, twirl…you're set for a carefree evening—with longer, softer-than-ever Fems feminine napkins!

New, and exclusive with Fems, is a dainty pink covering, softer than ever! Yet, even though it's so much softer, it's stronger, with more give… more flexibility… because of its bias-weave.

Both covering and pad are long enough to allow you to position Fems exactly right for you… long enough to fit securely without a worry about shifting or binding. Yet there's not an ounce of extra bulk.

You can wear your nicest things—forget about stains—because there's a protective safety-cushion in each Fems napkin to prevent accidents, whether you're sitting or moving about. New softer Fems with the dainty pink, bias covering are in your store right now. Try them next time… and welcome new freedom!

FEMININE NAPKINS

Fems

Soon after five, her restlessness routed her out and she changed into her blue dotted cotton print. After downing two cups of black coffee, she picked up the phone. "I'm leaving for the bank now."

"Thanks for letting us know," a man's voice said. He had sat up with her all night, a man she might never see, never know.

At the garage door she hesitated. The killer had said he would see her again, set up the details. Quickly, before she lost courage, she pulled the sliding door back. The old, cluttered garage looked the same. In the daylight, it seemed impossible that she could have sat there in the car talking with a murderer.

Toby and Louella were having a French exam that morning, and they hacked away about it as Kelly drove. Toby knew she would flunk it. Toby was not studious, and was fiercely proud of the fact. Still, she was perceptive, amazingly so. She could feel another person's feel, almost know what the other one was thinking. Kelly caught the swift sidewise glances.

Toby said, "Gad, were you way out last night."

"Uh-huh. I had a corker of a nightmare."

"Is that how you got hit?"

Kelly had thought the bruise on her cheek completely hidden under the make-up. "Oh, that," she said deprecatingly. "I dashed out to hang up the wash after I got home and ran head-on into the apricot tree."

Toby stared skeptically. "Honestly, sis ——"

"Don't worry; I didn't hurt the tree."

"Comedians." Toby said to Louella. "Everybody's a comedian."

As Toby and Louella left the car at Van Nuys High School, Kelly called Toby back. Toby turned swiftly, and Kelly saw in her a younger edition of her own self, a long girl, narrow-hipped with large gay eyes, who moved as though she were gliding on ice.

Kelly asked, "What're you doing after school?"

Toby looked at her questioningly. "Why? Something you want me to do?"

"No. I just wanted to know."

"Jack wanted to drop into the Hi-Fi and listen to some records."

"He'll bring you home?" Kelly asked.

"Isn't that O.K.?" Toby was taking the defensive.

"Sure, you know I like Jack." She took a deep breath. "Listen, Toby, I don't want you to be by yourself today at any time, understand? If Jack brings you home before I get there, sit out in the car with him. O.K.?"

"Something's happened and you're not telling me. We said we'd tell each other everything."

"I will tonight. I'm late now."

In the rear-view mirror, she saw Toby standing quite straight, looking after her. Oh, God, please, she whispered.

Hollywood Boulevard lay virtually deserted at this hour, a few minutes after eight. Already the sun lay hot on the brick and concrete as Kelly parked her car. She passed a drugstore, a leather-goods place, a novelty shop. She saw none of these, nor Grauman's Chinese Theater up the street.

The bank guard turned a key in the glass doors. "You're early, Miss Sherwood."

"Hi, Mike. Miracles will happen." She hurried on.

Pete Morrow was already behind his long polished desk at Escrow. "Hello, beautiful," he said, rising and coming to the railing. "You look ——" He caught himself and grinned. He wasn't handsome, but he had a vitality and a way about him that warmed her.

She forced a smile. "I know. Death warmed over. I didn't sleep much."

"Better watch it. They'll think you're playing the horses on the bank's money. How about dinner and a movie tonight?"

"Thanks, Pete. Not tonight." She searched for an excuse. "Toby. I've got to take her to ——"

"Tomorrow night?"

"Can I let you know later?"

He gave her an odd look. She had never stalled him before.

As they talked, some of the night rolled away. Pete was easy to be around. They differed in many ways, and yet they always fell comfortably into conversation. Everyone thought they were in love, but she doubted if she could ever love a man who had been married once and divorced.

As she joined the girls and the lone male teller at the vault, it was the same as every morning. The girls chattered as they waited for the time device, set for 8:30, to permit the vault to open. "Yeah, I got a baby sitter, but Edna, you've never seen one like this girl. I told the youngsters if the house caught on fire to be sure they got her out." . . . "He still loves me—got me coffee in bed this morning." . . . "Wait till you've been married a month ——"

The daily chitchat. Everything normal. It was normal even to the hush that settled when Frank Welk walked up at exactly 8:29. He was the chief clerk, a dark little man, extremely efficient, like a fine precision instrument. He said a pleasant "Good morning" as though it were another of his many duties.

At 8:30 he turned the combination to open the vault, and each teller went into her own private vault, which was not unlike a huge safety-deposit box. It held her cash tray. The loan people came to get their papers, and Pete for the escrow documents. Everything except the furniture was locked up each night.

The daily familiar routine began. The checks from the clearinghouse arrived at 9 o'clock. Along with the other tellers, Kelly sorted the checks into alphabetical order, then took a batch to compare each signature with the depositor's file card. It was usually boring work, though occasionally one of the tellers would spot a forgery.

At 9:15 the armored truck pulled up outside. Most days she scarcely noticed it. This morning, though, she watched apprehensively. The usual two guards, guns jammed into holsters belted tightly to their sides, walked through the doors. Their eyes swept the bank, going to the mezzanine offices. The men continued to the vault, walking swiftly. Mr. Welk counted the money and signed receipts.

She noted that Penny, who worked at the window next to hers, was studying her curiously. Kelly said quickly, "You missed a real fun party last night."

Penny nodded. "I wanted to come, honest I did, but ——"

She had a hush-puppy voice that went with her personality. She was dating a man secretly, meeting him in bars and on street corners so her parents would not know. All her friends were worried about her. One had met the man and reported he was a "creep."

Soon afterward Mr. Welk delivered to each teller the cash that had been requested the night before. Kelly signed for $300 in ones, $200 in fives and $100 in tens, which brought her cash on hand up to the $2500 limit.

Promptly at 10 the guard opened the bank doors. A score of waiting customers entered, mostly businessmen who headed for her window which bore the legend COMMERCIAL. In spite of the small sign, which was intended to designate merchants only, many of her old customers continued to come to her window. The bank didn't care. It preferred that accounts went wherever they were the happiest.

She thought she couldn't possibly stand at this window all day. Every time a face moved up —— She doubted if she could control her hands as she counted out money.

Her fingers explored beneath the counter to locate two buttons. One, when pressed, automatically photographed the customer from a high-up, concealed camera to her rear. The other notified the Hollywood police substation she was being held up. Her fingers barely touched them by way of reassurance.

At 10:10 a tall man, a little older than she, dressed in a dark suit and tie and a white shirt, presented a check. "Good morning," she said pleasantly.

"Sure a hot one," he commented.

As she stamped the check, she saw only a scarcely readable scrawl across it: "When can I see you?" It was signed "Ripley."

She pretended to initial a deposit receipt, writing in a small, fine hand, "11:45. Conference room."

Rip had started the day early, receiving reports and drawing up leads to work in Operation Terror. The surveillance car that had sat out the night in the Tustin Street area had shadowed Kelly Sherwood to the Van Nuys High School and to the bank. The agents had checked out for home then, and two others had taken over their assignment. Three heavily armed agents in the bank's offices on the mezzanine were relieved by others, and a new shift of four detectives under Captain Moreno continued the vigilance outside the bank.

Rip conferred at length with the SAC. "Let's put a surveillance on the sister at the high school," the SAC said. "If he's threatening the older one, or trying to get her to do something, he may use the younger as a lever."

They had before them a brief report which established through the Tustin Street postman, Chester Held, that the two sisters, Kelly and Toby Sherwood, lived alone and bore excellent reputations.

"What kind of a tail?" Rip asked.

"Keep it loose on both."

A "loose tail" meant that the agents working the surveillances would shadow the Sherwood sisters at a distance, and with the calculated risk of losing them.

The SAC said, "We can't take a chance on running a tight tail and having the subject spot us. What's the manager like?"

"Very co-operative. I had a case there five, six months ago and we checked him out at that time."

"All right, let's take him into our confidence on the entire setup. But no one else in the bank."

The implication was evident. The subject might have an inside man in the bank.

Soon after Rip returned to his desk the switchboard operator rang and said, "I've a Nancy Ashton on the line. Says she has to talk with you at once, Mr. Ripley."

"Tell her I'll be right with her."

Rip took the call. "I was in yesterday," Nancy Ashton said by way of identification.

"Yes, Miss Ashton."

"You remember me?"

"Of course."

"That's sweet." Her voice held a caress. She continued, "About that matter—my friend —— I must see you. I can't come to the office. It's—well—I think I'm being followed."

"Who would follow you, Miss

"I can't —— Well, I mean . . . phone."

"How about meeting you som

She brightened. "Would you?"

"Where?"

"My apartment. Seven o'clock where to find me."

"That's the correct address?"

Accusingly, "You thought it w

He could have sworn she w fictitious address. It only went t the Bureau repeated constantly. I "feelings" could not be relied on

He sat a moment, lost in thou be a trap, a setup. An agent ran every time he knocked on a door. about calling her back, to chang place, but discarded the idea. To in the balance—a very delicate b Peg passed by. She had overhe the girl friend?"

She walked on before he could had the nicest boyish back, shee down.

Rip found the bank's confe without making inquiry. He had would be on the mezzanine, and waited only a minute or two, about on hearing the door open.

She stood for a moment looking whose voice had come to her in t a nightmare. She had tried to thi would say to a man, a stranger, hands you had placed your lif might yield his to save yours.

"I just can't believe this," she There were strength and reality e firm handclasp. "I can't adjust, I Is the man crazy? Is he just a cra Rip motioned her to a chair. " little more than human if you normally, Miss Sherwood. I'm sur if I were in your position. As f anybody's guess right now."

She liked this face opposite h were danger, or cause for hope or felt he would tell her. He was serio she read the pattern of lines abo and knew he had a sense of humo

She dropped into a chair, nud shoes and doubled her feet under h never know what a night I sper happened, I couldn't wait to get t to call the FBI. Nothing else entere And then—then ——"

"You regretted it."

"I couldn't believe he'd do anyt thing violent—until he grabbed n the phone. Do you suppose he d tried to call you? Because if he That's what I've got to know. T I'm afraid of, I guess."

Rip nodded. "I know. That's v hesitate to call the authorities in t But I assure you we'll take eve precaution, and we've had a lot of He may or may not know you ca wanted an excuse anyway to stri you'd know what real physical fea you'd be terrified of him, and d tells you."

He hesitated. "These cases all fo tern. He wants to break you down tells you about his plan—break y point you'll do anything he says knows it'll take a little time. Now b beginning, and tell me everything it happened."

He listened to how she said the well as to the words themselves. well, honestly, and he experience was difficult enough to work a cas even with a victim who was forth many had reason to hide facts in t ground, or simply by nature were Others were unable to express then were utterly unobservant.

When she had finished, he rose his legs. "Now I want you to dig d and recall any impressions you may anything you may have felt rather served."

She nodded. "I was trying to elim thing I wasn't positive of."

CONTINUED ON

PLEASE USE YOUR POSTAL ZONE NUMBER!

To improve service and speed delivery of mail, the Post Office asks that you always include your postal zone number in your address.

We want to co-operate in every way we can—but we need your help. By giving us your zone number, you'll be assuring speedy delivery of your magazines.

Help yourself to better service. Use your Postal Zone Number—always!

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA 5, PENNSYLVANIA

ARE YOU FEEDING THEIR HUNGER FOR KNOWING?

The age of learning is a wonderful time. A time you can't bring back. A time when it is almost impossible to satisfy the need to know. This need for knowledge is as important to your children's future as love, moral standards, a comfortable, happy home.

And the time to satisfy this need is now.

There is no better source for knowledge... for learning together... than the Encyclopaedia Britannica. In its more than 27,000 pages is gathered the living knowledge of our whole civilization. It has a place in every home where parents are concerned about the ever-growing demands of the world upon their young. It is truth. It is unquestionable fact. And it is the beginning, the support, and the constant touchstone of education.

If your children are at the age of hungering to know, isn't this a time you should think about the Britannica? They are at the brink of a demanding age in the history of the world, and what you give them now can be infinitely important the rest of their lives.

New edition

NCYCLOPAEDIA BRITANNICA

available direct from the publisher on

Book a Month Payment Plan

you get all 24 volumes now... pay later!

latest edition of Britannica—the greatest sure of knowledge ever published—is the test in our almost 200-year publishing his-. An enormous printing materially reduces costs and under an unusual direct-from-the-lisher plan, we pass these savings on to . All 24 handsome volumes of this world-owned reference library will be delivered to r home NOW direct from the publisher. You later at a cost so low it is as easy as buying ok a month!

Equivalent to a library of 1,000 books

Encyclopaedia Britannica is the most valu-gift you can give yourself and your family—priceless gift of knowledge. Information on ry subject significant to mankind is con-ed in its new edition. It is equivalent to a ary of 1,000 books, bringing you the knowl-e and authority of world-recognized leaders very field.

ust think of a subject—and you'll find it in Encyclopaedia Britannica—whether it is information on the rules of a sport, the background of a religion, how to build a brick arch in a fireplace, or the science of launching a guided missile.

The new Britannica almost "televises" information to you, with 25,042 magnificent photographs, maps, and drawings. In every respect, Britannica is the largest and most complete reference set published in America, containing 27,357 pages and over 38,000,000 words.

Symbol of a good home

Encyclopaedia Britannica cannot help but have a lasting effect on you as well as on the growth and development of your children in school and in later life. Benjamin Franklin said: "An investment in knowledge pays the best interest," and Britannica gives you the accumulated knowledge of the world in clear, easy-to-read language and superb illustrations. It is essential in every home where education is valued and respected.

Preview Booklet Offered FREE

Simply fill in and mail the attached card today, and we will send you... without cost or obligation... a copy of our beautiful, new booklet which contains an exciting preview of the latest edition of Encyclopaedia Britannica. Send no money. It's yours, absolutely free! However, to avoid disappointment, mail your certificate today—before it slips your mind.

Mail the attached card now for FREE BOOKLET

Just tear out card at left, fill in and mail for your free Preview Booklet of the new edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. Or write to Encyclopaedia Britannica, Dept. 135-J, 425 North Michigan Avenue, Chicago 11, Illinois.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 98

Rip smiled. "I noticed you were. But I'll accept any impressions as just that."

She had already mentioned the various odors about the killer, the asthmatic way he breathed, and his statement that he was already wanted for murder. She thought for a moment. "He talked a little odd. I mean, there was something about the way he pronounced words. Not a lisp, nothing as obvious as that. I'm sorry, I just can't peg it. Maybe it will come to me."

Rip went on to another point. "Now you say he said someone else was watching you?"

"Yes."

"Any ideas who it could be?"

"I'm afraid not." She shook her head. "It's just that I can't put anyone in the bank into the role of an accomplice. And besides, it seems so petty—to repeat little things ——"

He sat back down in the chair, studying her. "You can't afford to feel that way, Miss Sherwood. Too much depends on details. If the party's innocent, he or she will never know. Nobody will. The Bureau stakes its integrity on it."

She nodded. "The girl who works at the window next to mine—Penny Townsend—she has a boy friend ——" She interrupted herself. "I hate gossip. And that's all this is—gossip. I like Penny and I don't even know this man. But one of the girls who does says Penny's been meeting him in bars and out-of-the-way places, and that he is no earthly good, and when you asked if I knew anyone, I thought of him. I don't know why."

He glanced at his notes. "About your sister . . . Toby, is it?"

She nodded, and he continued, "Toby. Is that a nickname?"

"Yes. Her real name's Eloise, but she'd murder anybody who called her that."

He went on, "I've got to depend a lot on your judgment of her. She should be told that she's in danger, that you both are, so she can help protect herself. But if she likes to talk, if this should ever reach the newspapers ——"

"I'd trust her with anything," Kelly said. "Will she panic?"

She hesitated. "I don't think so, but she's terribly intense and dramatic." She hastened to add, "Not about herself. She wouldn't get hysterics. But about me. You see, Mr. Ripley, we're all we've got now. Not even a cousin anywhere."

It was a frightening decision to make, whether to tell this seventeen-year-old girl. If she didn't know, she might be killed when she could have saved herself. If she did know, she might talk sometime in the most innocent way.

He said slowly, "I'll call the prinicpal and arrange to talk with her at the school. I'd like you there, but you'd better finish your day out and go home as you always do."

She asked, businesslike, "What're Toby and I going to do tonight? Even the two of us together, we're not much protection."

He thought aloud. They could go to a friend's home or a hotel. But they would be no safer. The man would follow them wherever they went, and if he thought she was running out on him ——

"I'm sorry I can't advise you on this. The decision will have to be your own. But if you stay, we'll put a couple of men in the home next door, the one on the corner, and we'll work it out so we'll know if you're in trouble."

She had said that the neighbors, Juanita and Raymond Williams, had relatives who dropped in evenings occasionally. Two men might be suspect, she thought, but a lone man wouldn't.

She told him about Pete Morrow, the escrow officer, and he thought she should accept the dinner date. "That is," he added hastily, "if you would have anyway if this hadn't come up."

She nodded. "We've been dating for several months." She saw him write Pete Morrow's name down.

He continued, "We want you to do everything exactly as you've been doing it. Both you and your sister. We'll have agents shadowing both of you, but you must never look back. I want you to forget they're there."

She rose to go. "It's a hard thing to face up to," she said, shuddering a little. "Why—why ——"

"—— did he choose you? I don't know, but he probably went down the list of the tellers in your bank, and perhaps in several other banks. He found you particularly vulnerable. You have no husband and no parents who might prove a problem, but you do have a teen-age sister."

She said, "I never thought I could kill anyone—for any reason."

He raised his voice slightly. "I'm briefing you so you'll know what to expect. He'll keep working on you and your sister, figuring that eventually you'll decide it's better to play along with him than with the FBI. But if you should ——"

"I called you, didn't I? I'm not going to ——"

"Just remember he has no intention of cutting you in on the money. In the end he must kill you."

Their eyes met briefly. "I was brought up on an Arizona ranch, Miss Sherwood. I broke my first horse at twelve. Some were more spirited than others—but they all broke."

Kelly took the mezzanine steps with the infirmity of the aged. Someone passed and said hello. A second later she heard the hello, and turned and answered.

At her window, a drugstore wanted $500 in large bills changed it. She had to count the money three ti

Mr. Welk startled her, stepping u her and whispering, "There's a phon you, Miss Sherwood. A police lieute says it's important."

"Thanks." She turned to two wai tomers. "The next window, please." T discouraged telephone calls, since could take over at a window. The strict: no teller was permitted to e other's cage.

Mr. Welk's curious gaze followed would expect an explanation. If she some kind of trouble, he had to know had to be careful about its employee

She went to a vacant desk in the partment, took a deep breath, ste self, then picked up the receiver Sherwood speaking," she said.

"Hello, Kelly," answered the ma night before.

She tightened her grasp about the "Yes," she managed.

"You know who it is?"

"I know."

"Where were you at noon? I waited at the drugstore."

As she groped for words, he conti cusingly, "You always eat lunch at t store, but today you didn't. Why didn

She thought quickly. "I brought lu me today."

"No, Kelly, you didn't. I'll tell y you did. You were talking with the You were telling them about last nig

Every genuine work of art ha much reason for being as the ea and the sun.

RALPH WALDO EMER

She raised her voice. "I wasn't you ——"

"Shut up." The trigger had snap said angrily, "I'm going to punish through your kid sister. She'd like a r me, an older man. The kids all do."

"Please," she said, "please ——"

She realized she was talking to hers continued holding the receiver as if sh bring him back on the line.

Rip headed out Highland Avenue, the Hollywood Bowl and took the f He felt an urgency pressing him and, s into the fast lane, pushed the speed to

The radio sputtered, and he picked mike to report in. "We've got a mess you," the voice said. "Subject telepho tim at one-six P.M. Said he knew she with police during her lunch hour. ened to harm sister. Do you want a r

"Thanks—I've got it."

He sat more tensely now. This u killer, this unknown face, couldn' learned he had seen Kelly Sherwoo man was guessing, and probing deep scalpel.

He took the off ramp marked Va Boulevard, drove north through the b district and turned left. The high buildings sprawled over an area of p grounds, shaded by huge old trees. He in the nearby residential district and back. As he entered, he glanced abou surveillance team, but saw no one.

The assistant principal turned o office and Rip waited, standing by a-w looking out into a recreation area. Th had a school smell that was univers seemingly never changed. It was the s papers, books and ink, thorough s and warm bodies.

Toby Sherwood entered warily. S been told only that she had a caller. S been in the midst of the French exa knew the assistant principal would n broken into it if the caller were not imp Rip crossed swiftly to close the d hind her. He talked rapidly to allay he

Checked Pajama / Toddlers $3, Girls $4*

Lounge Topper / Toddlers $3, Girls $4 and $5* fashioned with flair...fashioned with care...

fashioned for young girls everywhere!

*Both Sanforized® 100% cotton

Her Majesty Underwear Co., Mauldin, S. C.

ie's Ripley—John Ripley—and I'm FBI."
hing's happened," she began, barely g.
oped her. "Your sister's at the bank and she's fine. I left her only a few go. Won't you sit down, please."
ntinued standing. "I knew when she is morning ——" ot lying to you, Miss Sherwood. If to, phone her."
hed the phone across to her. She head. "Why are you here, then, if happened?"
sister's been threatened and you Now wait till I finish, please."
led up a chair for her. "Let's sit talk this over. Nothing's happened othing's going to if we can help it,
'll work with us. So much depends very straight. "You can tell me. I'm I look." She added, "I'm almost You don't have to treat me like a t."

her defiant gaze. After a moment Toby, I had a big decision to make ame here. And now that I've seen lad I decided the way I did. Because going to tell you I wouldn't tell to ople three times your age."
pped into the swivel chair and re-story in detail, leaving nothing out.
of being stunned, she was relieved,
words came tumbling out. "Golly, so worried, Mr. Ripley. I thought had already happened. She's all and she's so wonderful, and she hard. I try to help her, but I guess I
h. I'll do anything you want me to."
eed she would never be by herself.
nt to the Hangout for a hamburger at noon, she would go in a crowd.
ool, she would either stay with Jack, friend, or spend the time with Lou-ricks at the Hendrickses' home. Her uld drive her to school each morning.
d, "Two agents will be following times. In fact, they're already on the e there now."
his usual instructions: that she was k back, not to try to spot them.
d, "Please give them a break. Don't ast, don't leave by any back doors."
I could tell Jack," she said.
utely not." He was firm about it.
him, of course, but there must be ons."
ou."
ed and rose. "I'm glad you dig me,

s waiting when classes broke at 3:15.
g and had shoulders that jutted out pt-wing car. His physique, though, quietness and gentleness.
l comfortably into his pace. He You get kicked out of school or
;?"
ugged. "Big deal. I didn't fill out my papers right." She hated herself, ly-k.
nissed an exam for that?"
ghed. "How lucky can you get? I ow half of those last questions."

owded into his sports car, which re-with a satisfying roar. He asked, out a swim in the park? The crowd's ver there."
sitated. She didn't feel like swim-didn't feel like doing anything ex-ng for Kelly.
have to run me by home for my

g south on Van Nuys, they reached sta, turned right and snaked along He waited in the living room while ed into her swim suit, then tied a over it. He was looking at television returned. "I like a man who makes ute count," she said.
hers were already at the pool, and o them as though they hadn't seen a month. As she dropped her skirt a d, "You look good for a change," irl friend said, "What a brat. Don't , Toby."

Somebody else said, "Doesn't that girl look like Grace Kelly?"

Shouts went up. "Where? Where?"

A young woman was walking a little boy through the park on a leash. It was the same old crazy talk.

Toby forgot the day, the FBI man, the French exam. "I think I'm dying," she said. "I've got to have a soda."

"I'm broke," Jack told her.

"I'm not. I got my allowance today."

She swam to the corner of the pool where she had left her skirt with a purse in the pocket. She pulled herself up and sat, shaking a hand to dry it. Jack hopped up beside her.

As she reached for the purse, she saw the note folded under the skirt. Opening it, she read: "Kelly: Take Angel's Flight seven tomorrow night."

"What's that?" Jack asked.

She tucked it quickly in the coin purse. "Grocery list. Kelly said that ——"

He broke in. "Look, if you don't want to level with me, O.K., don't. But don't lie."

He watched her angrily a moment, then his tone changed. "Say, what gives, anyway?"

"Nothing. Can't we just skip it?"

The old helpless feeling surged back as Rip took Kelly Sherwood's call from the bank. The agents shadowing Toby Sherwood might even have seen the subject, and not known it. The maddening, frustrating part was that they had no idea whom they hunted.

And all that Rip could do was to sit and think. He couldn't question the other students, or conduct the usual, routine investigation without revealing too much, arousing too much speculation.

"I'll meet him," Kelly said. "I've got to. I want to get it over." She added, "I've reached a decision about staying at the house. I'm staying."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 106

HELP RINSE WASH 'N' WEARS WRINKLE-FREE

SMOOTH AND SOFT! NuSoft Fabric Softener rinses wash 'n' wears so smooth some need no ironing at all... all ironing is speeded! And your laundry's so fluffy-soft!

CONCENTRATED TO GO 4 TIMES AS FAR AS SOME DILUTED PRODUCTS!

One bottle capful (1 ounce) of NuSoft® softens a whole washload.

Other brands take up to a full ½ cup—(4 ounces)!

NuSoft is concentrated by a special, scientific process. With some diluted products you pay more because you use more! Thrifty NuSoft costs about 3¢ a washload. You pay up to 6¢ a washload for diluted rinses.

SAVE WITH BLUE NuSOFT—IT'S CONCENTRATED!

REPLACEMENT OR A REFUND OF MONEY Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

NOW IN TWO THRIFTY SIZES!
Pint—softens 16 washloads.
New Quart—does 32 washloads.

Aunt Jemima Buttermilk Pancake Mix for the kind of tender, golden buttermilks that you can eat and eat! Use the easy Aunt Jemima Shaker Method that's on every package, and you'll serve perfect buttermilk pancakes in just ten shakes!

Aunt Jemima Coffee Cake Easy-Mix. Real homemade coffee cake with a luscious texture and its own fragrant cinnamon topping. Add only egg and milk, blend in mixing bag, and bake it in its own pan to spicy-sweet perfection. Not a bowl or pan to wash!

Aunt Jemima Oatmeal Bread. Mix it in seconds with egg and milk for spicy, moist oatmeal bread that slices perfectly. Or for variety, add fruits or nuts, and bake in its own non-stick pan that comes in every package. Great eating any time!

Aunt Jemima Buckwh Pancake Mix. On a chi morning, you just ca beat a stack of tangy, t der and terrific Au Jemima Buckwheats wi hot applesauce and cri brown sausages. And i so easy to make 'em wh you shake 'em!

Aunt Jemima Pancake and Waffle Mix. Aunt Jemima waffles always come out crisp, tender and golden brown—just the way you like them every time. Wonderful topped off with hot cherry sauce, or other fruit or preserves for a Sunday supper treat.

Aunt Jemima Corn Bread Easy-Mix—for golden perfect corn bread that's never dry or crumbly. And there's no bowl or pan to wash, because you blend it with egg and milk in seconds in a throw-away mixing bag, and bake it in its own special pan.

Now 6 Great Mixes!

HOW MANY HAVE YOU TRIED?

Just try 4*...and get

$1.00

from Aunt Jemima

 Buy 1 package of your favorite Aunt Jemima Pancake Mix—Regular, Buttermilk or Buckwheat—and 3 Aunt Jemima Easy-Mixes (or 3 of one kind, if you prefer).

Send the Pancake Mix boxtop or bag bottom, and the front panels of the labels from the three Easy-Mixes with your name and address to: Redemptions, Box 6015, Dept. 321, Chicago 80, Illinois. The Quaker Oats Company will send you a check for $1.00. Offer expires November 1, 1960. Void where prohibited, taxed or restricted by law. Limit: one $1 check per family.

Here's your chance to treat your family to some really great eating—and get $1.00 to boot from Aunt Jemima!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 103

Rip marveled at the fortitude of people in crises who drew from a hitherto untapped inner strength. He said, "I'll need to see you tomorrow—to set it up." Angel's Flight was a one-block-long cable-car "railroad." It ran up the side of an extremely steep incline from Hill Street to the old Bunker Hill area which would be demolished soon to make way for skyscrapers. Take Angel's Flight. Seven o'clock. Tomorrow night.

At the General desk, Rip scanned the report the supervisor handed him on Nancy Ashton: "Arrested 5-22-51 for lewd conduct: namely, dancing in the nude at a stag party. Pleaded guilty 6-14-51 and fined $100. Arrested 7-14-56, charged with soliciting. Charge dismissed 7-16-56."

Rip said, "I'm seeing her at seven tonight. I'll need another man." The rule was: Never talk with a prostitute alone.

"How about Bradley?" the supervisor asked, and Rip agreed. He liked Bradley, who had a passion for his wife, their three children, law and foreign cars, in that order. He was three years new in the Bureau, a former Ohio State fullback.

Soon afterward Rip crowded along with other agents into the SAC's office. Most were in their thirties, a couple younger, a few older. Some had practiced law before entering the Bureau, while others had come straight from law school.

There was the expectancy that comes with the germinating of a major case. The SAC tapped his knuckles gently on the well-kept desk. He was a big-chested, robust man of fifty-two.

He looked at Rip, who began by reviewing the leads pursued to date. The rear seat of the victim's car had been dusted for finger and palm prints. Negative. Washington had checked the Bureau's "Most Wanted" and other files on the basis of the meager description supplied by the victim. Negative. The note, printed with a ball-point pen on a five-by-three sheet of paper torn from an ordinary gummed scratch pad, had been forwarded to the crime lab in Washington for comparison with thousands of other printed messages in major crime cases.

Rip said, "We don't have any lead yet on where the subject got his rundown on the victims. We're investigating the possibility he has an accomplice inside the bank. We've set up a line of communication with the victims so that we'll know immediately if the subject should manage to get inside their home."

He had given Kelly Sherwood a radio sending device which she would secrete in the house. It was not unlike the intercoms used in some businesses and homes.

"We talked with the next-door neighbors, the Williamses, and they've given us permission to use a small photographic darkroom in their garage. They were most co-operative. We'll post one man in the darkroom to monitor the radio in the Sherwood home."

As he talked they listened intently, memorizing the area and fixing the key spots in mind.

"That's our first line of defense," Rip continued. "We've got another. At this point, up here on Valley Vista, you can see over the entire Tustin area. We're posting an agent in this home"—he indicated with the pencil—"and he'll keep the Sherwood house under observation. There's only one street light on Tustin, but I don't think any person could move about unseen."

An agent asked, "What about the phone?"

Rip shook his head. "We decided it'd be too risky if we kept the line open again. If the subject tried to phone the Sherwoods and was told repeatedly the line was out of order, he'd become suspicious."

What he didn't say was that they wanted the line of communication open to the subject. The more anyone talked, the more he revealed of himself.

Nancy Ashton lived in a four-story apartment building near MacArthur Park. At 6:55 Rip and Bradley walked down a dark street, back-lighted just enough for the trees and bushes to assume fanciful shapes. Every window was up and the babble of music and low conversation hung overhead.

The foyer was dimly lit and no one was about, everyone being at dinner at this hour. They took a self-operating elevator to the third floor, turned left down a wide, luxurious hallway, deeply carpeted. They found 3-B at the far end. Nancy Ashton's name was stamped on a plate on the door.

Rip tapped with the brass knocker a couple of times. They waited, hearing soft, dinnertime music playing on the other side of the door. Then Rip pushed the bell and the music of chimes came over.

After another wait, they exchanged glances. Rip pushed the chimes again, then knocked loudly. He had a feeling, too acute to be disregarded, that someone stood inches away, on the other side of the door, listening. He could almost hear the person breathing, so strong was his impression.

They tensed suddenly, startled for an instant, when the telephone rang inside. The shrill clamor continued for a minute, then abruptly stilled itself.

They waited. They said nothing. A building, any building, had big, curious ears.

At 7:25 they called it quits. They took the stairs when they discovered the elevator in use. In the foyer a mother was wheeling a baby out. Rip stepped into a pay booth and dialed Nancy Ashton's number. He let the phone ring a long time before hanging up.

As he emerged he saw Bradley standing outside the entrance. Rip stepped to Apartment 1-A, which bore a sign, MANAGER, and knocked. The door was opened shortly by a tall, thin woman in her forties.

Rip said, "I was up looking for Miss Ashton, but she doesn't seem to be home. Thought you might know where I could find her."

The smile vanished. "You a bill collector?"

"No—a friend."

IDLE IDOL

By PEGASUS BUCHANAN

Because she was fair,
  And because he was glad.
He named her with virtues
  He wished that she had.

And when she emerged
  As mere woman and wife,
Not angel, he blamed her
  The rest of his life.

"Oh." She was unconvinced. "Leave me your name and I'll tell her you were here."

"I was meeting her at seven."

"Leave me your name."

"Thanks. I'll phone her later."

As she closed the door, she grunted, "A friend!"

He joined Bradley outside. "Learn anything?" Bradley asked.

"Yeah—I'm a bill collector. I think of myself as the FBI type—and I'm a bill collector."

"Let's go," Bradley said. He had three children he wanted to romp with before bedtime.

As they left, their glance went the same moment to the third floor, to the small, iron-railed balcony that marked Apartment 3-B. Thinly outlined in the dark was a woman looking down on them. They barely caught a glimpse of her before she backed away and was lost.

"Think we should go back up?" Bradley asked.

Rip shook his head. "She's got a reason. Something's happened since she phoned."

"If it's Nancy Ashton," Bradley added.

Bradley drove and Rip sat strangely silent beside him. He was rerunning Nancy Ashton's voice over the telephone, groping for something in or behind the words.

Bradley said good night at the garage and checked out. Going up the stairs, Rip discovered he was exhausted. Eventually the long hours told. He had a fear of sitting down to talk with someone, possibly on an interview, and falling asleep before him.

In his workbox he found a note from Peg. She had been able to get reserved seats for Saturday night for Nat King Cole. Usually they sat in the second balcony, but this time they had decided to splurge. Back in Chicago, where they had met, it was always the gallery for them. At that time both had worked in the Chicago field office. Then in '56 he was assigned to the Phoenix office, and a year later to Los Angeles. Shortly after he arr Los Angeles, she requested a transfe Chicago, and the Bureau unwittingly Cupid.

Thinking of Peg revived him, and about to phone her when an agent cam meticulous, older man who had ex Kelly Sherwood's car. He had found arette butt, and vacuumed the carpet a on the possibility a chance hair, or so the killer's shoes, might provide inform From the cigarette butt, the crime Washington might learn the subject's type, through an examination of the saliva.

Next Rip talked with the agent wh recorded the telephone conversatio afternoon between Miss Sherwood a subject. Previously, Rip had obtain bank's and Miss Sherwood's permis listen in and tape any calls made to he

The agent said, "I replayed it several He's got an odd way of saying certain Just some of them. I haven't got an ear but maybe Washington can figure ou he's doing."

The tape, too, had been dispatched to Washington.

Rip scanned several log reports fr agents on stake-out about the ban phoned the agents in the Williamses' next to the Sherwoods. They reported a light out on Tustin. They had called t and been told an emergency crew wo out shortly. In the meantime the neighb was almost blacked out.

Worried, Rip noted it was 9:35. Th might have burned out, although that s too much a happen-so. Yet stranger dences marked many cases.

Once again he dialed Nancy Ashton ber, and listened to the measured bu was hanging up when unexpectedly s swered.

"This is Ripley, Miss Ashton." H nothing more. Someone might be listen

She was instantly apologetic. "I'm te terribly sorry I couldn't keep our date, b traffic was so awful ——"

"Some other time?"

"No. I've thought it over, and I to friend she should get in touch with you than going through me. I don't think it of my business really, and you know involved these matters can become."

"You were quite disturbed when phoned."

"Oh, that," she said deprecatingly. in one of my moods. Women have ther know. But I'll still buy you that drink evening. I'd like to, very much."

"If there's anything we can do ——"

"Thanks. You're a doll. Good nigh happy dreams."

He was smiling to himself as he hu He fell serious then, walking step b back over the Ashton matter. He wou tate a memo: "Nancy Ashton advised s instructed her friend to contact this directly." The memo would report th correctly, but not the tone of her voice.

Before he left for the night, at 10: called the Sherwood home. Kelly's voi husky as she answered.

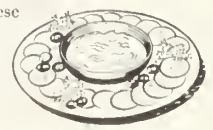
"This is Ripley, Miss Sherwood. I thing O.K.?"

He felt her relief. "How nice of you t Pete. I'm fine. Toby's home tonight. W just getting ready to turn in."

Rip said, "I wanted you to know thing's O.K. at this end, and there's n to worry about."

Nothing to worry about. He was a pl telling a desperately ill patient she was to be all right, and for the same reas physician did. The patient needed a h strength she had to pull through.

Kelly sat a moment with her hand stil ing on the phone. His words had br comfort. He was a human being feeli another human being.



She returned to the bedroom. Tob moved in with her and was undressing long, slender body, growing into a w month by month, was so young; and lo

CONTINUED ON PAG

WIN $50 for NEW RECIPES ...using famous G. WASHINGTON'S® SEASONING and BROTH

We'll pay $50 for every recipe we publish using famous all-purpose G. Washington's Seasoning and Broth. This month's award goes to Mrs. Elizabeth Earl, East 70th St., New York City, for her delicious party dip.

GLORIFIED HAM AND CHEESE PARTY DIP

- 1 cup cottage cheese
- 1 cup sour cream
- 1 2¼ oz. can deviled ham
- 2 tablespoonfuls chili sauce
- 2 envelopes G Washington's Seasoning and Broth.

Blend all the above ingredients together in a bowl until mixture is smooth and creamy. Makes 2½ cups. Serve with potato chips or crackers.

You, too, may win $50. Simply buy a package of G. Washington's Seasoning at any food store. Have fun experimenting with new recipes. See the magic difference this great flavor booster makes in almost every food you prepare such as:

- CASSEROLES • EGGS ANY STYLE
- VEGETABLES • GRAVY • STEW
- INSTANT NO-FAT BROTH: Simply add hot water to G. Washington's.

Contains only 6 calories

Here's How to Win $50

Every Entry Receives Free Recipe Booklet

Send your recipe (old or new) using G. Washington's Seasoning and Broth, together with a box top to American Home Foods, Dept. G, 22 E. 40th St., New York, N. Y. You may be a lucky winner! All recipes become the property of American Home Foods. And every participant will receive an exciting new recipe booklet containing delicious new low-caloric recipes.

2 Varieties

- "Rich Brown" with beef-like flavor
- "Golden" with chicken-y.

Green Beans Napoli... simple topping

plus flavorful Del Monte Green Beans is gourmet fare

Be prepared to say goodbye to all your old ideas about green beans when you taste DEL MONTE Blue Lakes. These green beans set a new mark in flavor, texture and quality—and you'll be just as proud to serve them plain as you will this chef-style dish with its continental accent. They're delicately rich in flavor, never "flat-tasting." No strings. Firm yet tender and never limp. Perfect for salads as well as for serving hot. In a word, good green bean news all over! The sooner you try DEL MONTE, the better your family will like green beans. Why not today?

GREEN BEANS NAPOLI

- 1 tablespoon butter or margarine
- ¼ cup coarsely ground or crumbled dry bread crumbs
- ½ teaspoon paprika
- 2 to 4 tablespoons grated Parmesan cheese
- 1 No. 303 (1 lb.) can DEL MONTE Blue Lake Green Beans (Whole or Cut)
- 1 tablespoon olive oil or salad oil
- ¼ teaspoon garlic salt

Prepare the topping as follows: Melt butter in a small frying pan, add crumbs and stir over moderate heat until crumbs are light golden in color. Blend in paprika. Remove from heat, add Parmesan cheese and toss lightly till blended. Heat DEL MONTE Brand Green Beans as directed on the label. Drain off liquid. Add oil and garlic salt to beans; toss lightly. Serve topped with crumb mixture. Serves 4.

Del Monte® Green Beans
Cut—Whole—French Style

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 106

at her, Kelly felt old far beyond her twenty-six years.

Kelly dropped to the bed. "Sit down a minute, Toby. You remember Frieda Wellscott?"

Toby nodded. She was Kelly's college friend who lived in Albuquerque. Toby said, "What about her?"

"There's a plane leaving at ten-seventeen in the morning. I want you to stay with her until this is over. There's no use ——"

Toby rose in anger. "I'm staying right here. If you think for a minute ——"

"Now, listen ——"

"The subject's fini, fini, fini, fini."

Kelly said slowly, "You've got to listen to me, Toby. I'm older and I know better."

"You're older all right."

"Toby—I don't want to hear another word."

"I don't either. You're being icky. Just plain icky. I never thought you'd be like this."

Kelly rose to leave. At the door she said, "We'll discuss it in the morning."

"Go on, talk to yourself. I said I was fini—and I am fini."

Kelly walked through the house, rechecking the windows and doors. After switching off the light in the living room, she stood a long time by the window. This had been her home as long as she remembered. She had been four when they moved here. And now she was a prisoner in this house, in her own home.

Returning to the bedroom, she saw Toby in the twin bed on the far side, her face to the wall. She sat down by her, saw the tears.

Toby turned over quickly, and threw her arms about Kelly. "I won't get in the way, I promise, and you need me. You've got to have somebody to look after you when you forget things ——"

The telephone brought them up short. Toby said, "I'll get it," and sprang out of bed.

Kelly grabbed her. "No, I'd better."

She hurried, afraid the party would hang up and afraid he wouldn't.

"Hello," she said. She could hear someone breathing.

She said again, "Hello . . . hello there."

The click of a receiver going down at the other end came over. She continued holding the phone, staring at it as though it were some monstrous thing.

Toby startled her, standing not two feet away. "Who was it?"

"I don't know. They didn't answer."

The cuckoo clock sounded eleven times.

Rip picked up the receiver to still the clamoring phone and turned on the table light in case he needed to make notes.

He said "Yeah?" and rubbed his neck cords.

It was Captain Moreno. "I was getting ready to come over and see if you were alive."

"Barely, Pancho. Just barely."

"My mamacita always says, 'Camarón que se duerme se lo lleva la corriente.' That means, my friend, 'Don't go to sleep or you're liable to miss the boat.'"

His mother had more sayings than Bartlett had quotations.

Moreno continued, "You still got an interest in the Ashton woman?"

"Yeah."

"You can close the case."

"What happened?"

"She either jumped or was pushed from her third-floor apartment about twelve-forty-five this morning."

Rip noted it was now 1:30.

Moreno continued, "I just heard about it. I was checking out and stopped by Homicide. They wanted me to ask what your interest is—if it's no secret between you and Washington."

"No, no secret. I'll be down in fifteen minutes, Pancho. O.K.?"

"I'll be in Homicide."

Jarred fully awake, Rip dressed hurriedly, dropped his electric shaver in a coat pocket, and on his way down buttoned his shirt and fixed his tie. The night was cool and clear, and the stars bright. Always at this hour he was conscious of the colored night mist that lay over the city, an aurora borealis cast up by street lights and neon signs and all the other million lights of a big city.

Soon he was pulling up alongside a new, slender eight-story building which was mostly glass. The flags of the United States, California and the city of Los Angeles flew impressively overhead.

Walking swiftly, he entered an expansive first floor with a colorful mural in tile on one side and information desks across the other. It looked more like a swank modern bank than police headquarters.

Moreno was waiting upstairs. "Come on in. They've got a woman in there."

As they entered an inner office, the Homicide lieutenant looked up and nodded. He was a slight, thin, tired-looking man who was impatiently patting the arm of his swivel chair.

A woman sitting by the desk turned and Rip saw the apartment-building manager he had talked with a few hours before.

She rose excitedly. "That's him. He asked me, 'Where's Miss Ashton?' That's what he said. 'I was meeting her at seven,' he says."

Moreno broke in. "Madam, please, this is ——"

She didn't hear him. "He wasn't getting anything out of me. I knew he was up to no good the minute I put eyes on him."

Moreno shrugged helplessly and the Homicide lieutenant smiled. "Thanks for coming in," he told the woman.

"If you want me to testify against him, all you have to do is phone me and I'll come right down."

"Thanks so much," said the lieutenant.

As the door closed behind her, Moreno studied Rip. "You do look kind of suspicious."

> There is not a self-made man in the world. The so-called self-made man is the man who has seized his opportunities, and those given him by circumstances, and has made use of them.
>
> LUCIUS TUTTLE

They drew up chairs about the desk and began exchanging information. Rip reported the little he knew, and Moreno and the lieutenant went over their findings.

The apartment manager, who said she was in bed but unable to sleep, heard the body strike outside her window and called the police. When they arrived, the lights were on and a record player going. The apartment held no sign of a struggle, and no one had been seen to enter or leave. The body revealed no cuts or gun wounds.

The dead woman apparently had taken a bath an hour or so before, since the shower curtain was still quite wet. Either before or after the bath, she probably had painted her toenails a blood red. A bottle of nail polish stood on the washbasin. She had spilled powder on the bathroom floor, and her damp feet had tracked it into the living room.

If it was murder, she might have been shoved off the balcony and killed in the fall, or slain before she was pushed, by strangling or poisoning.

The lieutenant handed Rip a police photograph of her body as it lay on the ground. She was on her back, her arms flung out by the rush through space, her legs wrapped in a tight wool skirt. She was wearing a simple white blouse.

"That's all she had on," the lieutenant reported. "No slip, no pants, no bra." He picked up a slip of paper. "This was in her purse."

The names of two men and a woman were written in pencil, together with their telephone numbers, and at the bottom Rip's own initials, J.R., together with the field-office number.

"Turn it over," Moreno said.

In one corner, written very small, were the name K. Sherwood; the address, 14712 Tustin Street; and the number SP 4-2852.

Rip said slowly, "She was in on the deal, or somebody told her, or she overheard something."

Moreno nodded. "I've got something else for you. May have something to do with her, may not."

He settled back. "We've got an informant. His name's Jim Durga, but everybody calls him Popcorn 'cause he's always eating it. This guy's no stool pigeon. He thinks of himself as being in the newspaper business. Like the Los Angeles Times. He circulates around the crumbum joints nights, picks up a little news here and there. Makes his living that way."

"You mean he sells news." Rip italicized "news."

"That's right. If he hears some police officers talking about raiding a bookie, he peddles the info to the bookie. Or maybe he learns about a heist and sells it to us for ten bucks. If we don't want it, he'll try to hawk it to a newspaper."

Rip sat straighter. "He knows about the Sherwood case?"

Moreno nodded. "He hit up one of our men tonight, said he had some dope on a bank job. He said, 'It's the Sherwood case.' Just like that."

"You're going to talk with him?"

"If you want me to."

"Could I come along? I know he's your man, but ——"

"You can talk with anybody I got. You know that." He added, "You're too dressed up. Here"—he picked up a beaten old jacket from a chair—"get into this."

"Hey," the lieutenant said, "what do you mean giving away my clothes?"

Moreno walked toward the door. "The Salvation Army wouldn't have that as a gift."

They sauntered down Main Street, past the Follies burlesque, the Midnight Mission with Onward Christian Soldiers marching forth, a tired clothing shop with out-of-pawn suits in the window for $8.50. They passed shabby men; few walked straight, and most had been dead a long time. It was not so much a street of sin as a street of desperation, a street one block from the graveyard. Eventually they came upon Popcorn. He was sitting on the sidewalk in a canvas lawn chair, under a street light, by a big waste receptacle. He was settled back comfortably reading.

Moreno whispered to Rip, "Keep going."

Popcorn was older than Rip had expected, possibly seventy judging by his soft, wrinkled face. He had quick, amiable eyes and a pious personality.

They passed him, and Moreno led the way to an all-night movie house which advertised three films for 35 cents. Moreno smiled at a battered female face in the booth and she gave him a sleepy, bored nod. They stepped into almost total darkness. The customers liked it that way. They would have liked it better if there had been no movie.

Moreno quickened his pace, turning right and entering a cubbyhole room where girl photos papered the walls.

"My Main Street office," said Moreno, resting himself on a desk minus one leg. He continued, "You'll like this guy. Everybody does. That's how he gets his dope."

A few minutes later Popcorn came along, carrying the lawn chair, now folded up, and his book, Effects of Nuclear Fission.

"Care for a drink?" Moreno asked, taking a whisky bottle from the bottom drawer.

"Don't mind if I do," Popcorn said.

Handing him the drink, Moreno said, "I've got a new partner. Name's Ripley. He's O.K."

Rip offered his hand. "Glad to know you."

Popcorn's hand was a child's. "Same here, sir. New, are you?"

Moreno put in, "No, he's been at it for years. Just looks young."

Popcorn nodded. "I was like him. Never did show my age."

Moreno said, "Hear you haven't been feeling so good."

"Not so good, captain." He chuckled. "The doc says if I was a building he'd condemn me."

Moreno laughed, then turned sober. "What've you got on this bank deal?"

Popcorn shifted uneasily. "Bailey told you?"

Bailey was a Homicide detective. "Yeah," Moreno said.

Popcorn unfolded the chair, sat down. "It's a pretty fair story, captain."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 110

Here are som
of the fine products creat for your enjoyment b

GENERAL FOODS
KITCHENS

Kool-Aid Soft Drink M
Log Cabin Syrup
S.O.S. Soap Pads
Minute Rice
Swans Down Cake Mi
General Foods Kitchen
Cookbook
Post Cereals
Maxwell House Coffee
Birds Eye Frozen Food
Jell-O Desserts
Tang Breakfast Drink
Yuban Coffee
Baker's Coconut
Baker's Chocolate Prod
Minute Tapioca
Dream Whip Dessert Topping
Minute Potatoes
La France Instant Bluir
D-Zerta Dietary Dessert

LOVE STORY AT 250 ELM

Five p.m., and you're fresh and waiting to hear what's new in your husband's life. ■ These days a woman's world doesn't stop at the kitchen door. Even the busiest schedule must leave time for him. ■ General Foods Kitchens is on your side. That's why we try to bring you foods that are long on pride, short on work. ■ New Instant Maxwell House Coffee is an example. Specially selected coffee beans are taken, warm from the roaster, at the moment of perfect freshness and made into fragrant flavor buds. You get the freshest taste in coffee yet—instant coffee equal to any coffee, made in any way. ■ So it is with all time-saving products from General Foods Kitchens. We make sure you'll be proud to serve them.

GENERAL FOODS KITCHENS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 108

"Page one?"

Popcorn squirmed.

Moreno asked, "Not back in the classified?"

"No, sir. Maybe page three or four."

"Ten bucks O.K.?" Moreno asked.

"I was figuring on fifteen."

"It's hard-musele money."

Moreno counted out ten silver dollars, stacking them on the desk. He added two more.

"I didn't get a name," Popcorn said.

"I didn't figure you did."

"I'll give it to you the way it came to me, captain."

"O.K."

"The hood who's pulling this—he asked the other party to go out to the Sherwood home. Seems that the other party was to park and walk up and down the street, and go up to the Sherwood house, stand a couple minutes, and then decide not to go in but to leave. The hood figured if the police were around, they'd pick the other party up for questioning, and if they did, it wouldn't matter because they couldn't hold the other party."

Rip asked, "What'd the other party say to that?"

"He asked if anybody was marked for a killing and the hood said might be. The other party didn't like it."

"That all?" Moreno asked.

"Just about, except the hood asked how the passport was coming along the other party was getting for him." He hesitated. "I couldn't say how that came out."

Moreno broke in. "You know where they might get a tricked-up passport?"

"I'll ask around."

Rip asked, "You saw the hood?" He didn't like this business of playing games.

"I'd rather not say, sir."

Moreno said, "I know, I know." He turned to Rip. "He's nearsighted. Can't see three feet past his nose. I've offered to get him glasses, but ——"

Popcorn shrugged. "I bought some at the dime store once and they bothered me so much ——"

Rip persisted. "So you talked with the other party?"

"Begging your pardon, sir, but I'm not in a position to say."

That clinched it. He had overheard a telephone conversation. He might possibly have listened in to both sides through a hotel switchboard, but that was highly unlikely. More probably he had pieced the account together from what he had overheard one side say. But was it the hood, as Popcorn called him, or the "other party"?

Moreno said, "If you hear anything more, call me."

"I'll do that."

"Do you think you will?" Rip asked.

"I'm sure of it, sir."

Moreno glanced up in surprise. He said with the barest warning, "Be sure you call me."

Popcorn smiled. "I never let a subscriber down."

When he was gone, Rip asked, "How about it?"

Moreno shook his head. "You never know, do you? I'd like to think he'll call me—but quien sabe?"

The situation was the same as with every informant. They had no right to put pressure on Popcorn, although if they did they might learn the location of the telephone and stake it out. If they did that, Popcorn might peddle his news to the criminal if he saw him. And yet if they played along, Popcorn might cross them anyway.

It was the same old business of figuring the odds.

At midnight the phone call was repeated, and Kelly, half dozing, ran for it, and once again the party hung up. She answered the ringing at 1 o'clock, but at 2 she lay in bed, never stirring. She heard the groaning of the old house. The creaking began in the living room by the door and approached board by board, the weight of a man walking slowly and stopping every other step to listen. She raised up on one arm, tense. "Toby," she whispered, but Toby didn't awaken.

The night was listening, too, strangely still. She switched on the bed light, walked resolutely to the bedroom door. For years she had intended to putty-up the keyholes in the old-fashioned house. She closed the door and found with relief that the key still worked.

He telephoned at 3, and 4, and 5. He was wearing her down, she knew. He was wearing her down for the ordeal coming up that night at Angel's Flight.

Sometime after 5 she fell into a dead sleep, awakening slowly at 6 when the phone shrilled persistently. At 6:05 it sounded again, and at 6:10. At 6:15 she struggled out of bed, thinking it might be some friend or Mr. Ripley. But it was the killer. He said, "You haven't been answering the phone. You should, you know, because we've got to keep in touch."

He was being insolent, and with effort she restrained herself. "What do you want?"

"I don't like the way you're talking. For the kind of cut you're getting, you can talk nicer."

She lowered her voice, fearful Toby would arouse. "I'm not awake yet."

"That's better. I'm reconfirming, as the airlines say. Seven o'clock tonight."

THE NAMES OF HORSES

By MINNIE HITE MOODY

Once in a while, in certain blends of weather,
Trapped in deep traffic's throbbing
wilderness,
Past fins and chrome, the soft sweet sound of leather
Whispers to me, and names like
Bill or Bess
Rise to the lips and flutter in the brain,
And I am safe and young, and home again.

"I said I'd be there."

"I hope you are. If you need any proof that I mean business—think of your sister. I can have some fun with her. You know what I mean?"

Before she could answer, he hung up. She sat stunned, then noted the time and, by rote, showered and put on her make-up. She stood a moment at the kitchen window. It was a glorious morning, but she felt as she had when her mother and father died. You walked into the sunshine, heard the birds, saw the flowers, and wondered how it could be that life could go on so radiantly when life had ended for someone you loved.

Her hands reflected her thoughts as she broke the eggs. She dropped a salt shaker in the skillet, and the spraying grease burned deeply into her wrists. She sat down quickly, thinking she was going to cry.

Toby breezed in, clad in a slip. "I haven't a thing to wear," she said; then, seeing Kelly, she squeezed her. "I'm going with you tonight."

Kelly spoke brusquely. "No, you're not. If he sees you ——" She broke off. "Look, be sensible. I'll have the whole FBI watching out for me. Nothing can happen, you know that."

Toby brightened with effort. "Sure, you'll be all right. I won't worry. I couldn't go tonight anyway. I've got a date with Jack."

"You won't go up on Mulholland?" Mulholland was a road that snaked along the crest of the Santa Monica Mountains. It was dark and isolated in some areas, and there were numerous parking places gouged out ostensibly for the view of both San Fernando Valley and the Pacific Ocean.

"What does it matter, sis? Mr. Ripley said the FBI would ——"

Kelly stopped her with a look.

Toby was so warmly frank. Kelly didn't know another girl who would tell her folks she went up to Mulholland. Toby always had been like that. She had floated in on a cloud one night to announce, "Jack kissed me tonight."

She had no secrets, and sometimes her questions were appalling. "This girl in my algebra, sis, she and her boy friend wanted to get married but it would have broken her mother's heart, so they're having an affair. What do you think, sis? Should you break your mother's heart or have an affair?"

Kelly said she thought they should wait until they were eighteen and then marry. Toby was not convinced. "What does it matter if they have an affair after they're married or before—if they're honest-to-goodness in love?"

Kelly was shaken. "But you and Jack ——"

"Jack's entirely different. You don't know him, you just don't know him."

"I wasn't saying ——"

"Yes, you were. You think Jack might try that. I don't care what you think about me, but you can't say things like that about Jack."

As Kelly dropped Toby at the school, Toby took a deep breath and threw her shoulders back. "You'll call me the minute it's over? I mean the very minute."

Kelly nodded and hugged Toby hard. As Kelly rounded the corner, she turned for one fleeting glance and Toby waved.

Pete Morrow waylaid her as she passed Escrow. "Hi. Say, why don't we explode the atom—take in the Moulin Rouge to celebrate my raise."

"Pete, I'd have to get all dressed up and pull in my stomach and —— Why don't we go to a movie?" He couldn't afford the Moulin Rouge. He'd have to go without lunch for a month.

"Yeah, why don't we? I was just talking big."

As she started on, he called her back. "You all right, Kel?"

She stopped quite still. "What makes you think I'm not?"

"You don't look like you had any sleep. Thought maybe something's got hold of you."

She smiled. "You're sweet. I'm all right, except for payments on my car, my teeth and my insides."

His laugh lifted the weight from her. It gave her the old feeling that everything would be all right. The girls said "Good morning" at the vault, and she was swept into their orbit.

She took the cash drawer to her window. It was then that she noticed the memo under the glass weight. She opened the note. Raymond Burkhardt, the bank's manager, asked her to meet him in the conference room at 9:30. She scarcely knew him, a big tall man, possibly in his fifties, with a broad white streak through his hair.

She arrived in the conference room first and waited, looking out the window, down into the customer parking area. It was almost deserted at this hour.

Burkhardt walked in briskly. "Good morning, Miss Sherwood. I wanted to catch you before you left last evening, but I got tied up. I had a long talk with Mr. Ripley, and I want you to know the bank appreciates what you're doing. We'll be with you all the way."

"Thank you," she said. "I was anxious, of course."

"Of course." He hurried on. "I don't know what instructions Mr. Ripley gave you, but on our part, we don't want you to take any chances."

For a second he dropped out of the executive pattern. "Please be very careful, Miss Sherwood, and don't take any risk for any money involved. You come first, and the money second."

He smiled. "I have a daughter about your age. Couple years younger maybe. Now if you want my help, if you've got anything to talk over, I want you to feel free to come to me, or call me at home. Here, I'll give you my home phone."

That day she felt she had split into two beings. Her real self stood off to watch her double working at Window 5. The double moved slowly, and counted uncert double said the same old inanities were without life. "It's a warm day chilly day. . . . How are you? . . .
you again. . . . Where have you b long? . . . I didn't know you'd bee

They were mostly old custome went to the same window because seeing the same face, talking with teller. If they wanted a favor son information, they knew someone t

Shortly after she balanced for th took the mezzanine steps toward room. At the door, she turned pushed into the conference room
Ripley waited by the window.

"Hello, Miss Sherwood," he wished she could feel as confident control" as Mr. Ripley. And sud relevantly, she thought how nice it to have a man about the house, comfortable and lovable. For a flash
the most important thing in her life

She said quickly, "I had anothe morning."

He nodded. "I know."

"Would he try anything with—wi

"I'd like to tell you he wouldn can't. Until we know the man, kn thing about him ——"

"But when she's in class ——"

"We've taken her teachers into dence." He continued, "She went t shop after school with her boy fri there now. Has she known him lon

"Since junior high." She adde
"He's a swell fellow. I know, bec around the house a lot."

He offered no comment, but pull out for her, and took one alongsi didn't have lunch today."

"I couldn't. I couldn't possibly ea

"You've got to, and get all the can. He's figuring you won't."

He spread out a map of the Bu area, and she was conscious of his a ing hers, of his closeness.

He said, "We've had to make t for tonight because of the two elevat subject said he would meet you at t Angel's Flight, but he may not. He you here at the start of the cable ca on the cable car. So we'll post agen sight at the foot of the hill and up or and on the cars."

He studied the map. "Now don't if you run into the unexpected. He m newspaper boy or hire someone to g message, and maybe the message wil to meet him somewhere else, or it forth the plan for getting the money a never see him at all.

"Now—one more thing: we won't to apprehend him until after you've assuming that you do meet him. It' dangerous otherwise. If you were ab we moved in, he might use you as a h try something else."

He asked then, "What're your tonight? Will you be going home fro

"I hadn't intended to. There isn't time. I thought—if it's all right wit I'd work late and then drive into the have dinner." Hollywood was appro seven miles by the freeway from d
Los Angeles.

He nodded in approval. He talk quietly. He knew what an ordeal experiencing, but the more relaxed the better fit she would be to cope situation. "Remember, he wants you terror when you take Angel's Flight t

He felt the minutes passing, time him headlong toward the rendezvous.
keyed up, driven by excitement.

At the office, he glanced hurriedly
the surveillance logs turned in by th running shadow jobs on Kelly an Sherwood and the house at 14712
Street.

Moreno came by. He reported t autopsy disclosed no poison, no drug alcohol in Nancy Ashton's body. She from multiple fractures, caused by ei

CONTINUED ON P

Another treat with America's top-selling pudding

CHOCOLATE RIBBON PARFAIT

Mix contents of package with two cups milk in saucepan. Cook and stir over medium heat until mixture comes to a full boil. Chill. Prepare one envelope new Dream Whip or whip one cup whipping cream. Slowly beat pudding. Make alternate layers of pudding and topping in 6 parfait glasses. GOSH, look at what mother just made. (This package makes impressive pies, too.)

GENERAL FOODS KITCHENS

Jell-O is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corp.

You did it...

(so easy, too!)

New! Shades you've never seen in a paper napkin before!

Now...Scotkins in Color

Give a party look to every meal with new pastel-pretty Scotkins! Pick a shade to match your table settings...or mix two or three colors for a fresh effect. Only Scotkins® give you such linen-soft colors with linen-like strength. Scotkins don't shred, don't fall apart... just one sees you through the juiciest hamburger, th sizzliest steak. Look for new colored Scotkins in luncheon siz Traditional white, too, in luncheon and dinner sizes. You'll fir them all in the brand-new Scotkins boxes

Scotkins also made and sold in Canada

SCOTKINS YELLOW...soft as candle-glow. Try it as a new accent with orange and lavender.

SCOTKINS PINK... linen-lovely subtle tint. A daring touch with red, adds flair to green.

SANDALWOOD...yours in Scotkins exclusive. Blends with all pastels, highlights white.

U) FROM PAGE 110

a l nt, flat instrument wielded with fo . A crime-scene search of the ent ad developed no evidence of foul d i erviews with neighbors and others ve negative.
h had gone, Peg stopped by. "Re-
n?"
h didn't retort, she caught his eyes er ips. "Does it show that much?"
d.
t?
e a pound I put on."
nil . "Do you always zip your skirt eft de?"
wa owed under his look. "Don't get , ase."
se usly. Don't skirts ever zip up the e?
n't make skirts for left-handed U he back or up the front, maybe, up he right side."
're ure?"
a l, Mr. Ripley—or have you been t notice?"
al d away, conscious of the zipper ot ng out the ridge.

ri g began at straight-up four. Not co ds early, not thirty seconds late.
en gents and ten detectives assigned an l's Flight operation crowded the

A stood with Rip before a diagram no d the post position of every man be and the starting location of ten an six police cars. As Rip began the s hands dangled easy by his t ere was cold in the fingers. No no many times a man went on a t raid, he felt the cold.
l ose in fast once she's away from e, he said. "We'll issue thirty-thirty so e strategic spots, and the cars will p with Tommy guns and tear gas.
d warning. Think before you move.
un you're not moving into cross
co hing someone else in it."
A spoke up: "I'd suggest each of k ver the area about five o'clock, ne ush hour, and get acquainted with ts
w e dead end, and others narrowed he sharply. The nature of the area ne cales in favor of a killer.
sl be armed?" a police officer asked.
sl s never used a gun." Rip looked A y other questions?"
di ed out with the quiet of men who e hy respect for fear. In a time like th held his thoughts within himself.
cu tioning himself: *Use your head
o make a move, think before firing.
W the weapon. Make sure it's the ge e you squeeze the trigger. Breathe ce calm.*

s remembering other nights like this.
re lling the instructions and rigorous dured at the FBI Academy at Virginia. A man held the pressure e noked, he talked about the coming r or about what his youngster did t about the Dodgers or the Rams.
l he fear back but not all of it. A r as good for a man.

g still held the bastions against the e deep canyons of the city, though,
as stealing in.
c away from Angel's Flight Kelly p king space, and backed the car in t ally, scraping the curb. A man a ng the sidewalk bent low to stare p continued. An older man limped s street diagonally toward her. Her l ed in mid-air as it reached for the sw itch. The motor kept on purring.
hi his head down, reading the pave-ca ically, she wondered if the FBI were w r this far from Angel's Flight. She c d in the rear-view mirror, and no fo llowed her into this gust-swept, ar lor between blackened and aging
bu ings, many deserted.
h almost walked into the car before
e tires and veered. She glanced at him expectantly, but he made no overtures and headed away from Angel's Flight.

She let herself go. She was limp and sweating. She still had ten minutes, according to the car clock.

She continued sitting, though she was conspicuous in this neighborhood. No one sat in a parked car, especially not a lone woman in the growing dusk. People were passing, and looking at her. She tensed a little every time a pair came within range, and waited in a tight knot as they passed.

Toby would be at the Hendrickses by now. Louella would be chattering, and Toby would be trying to respond and at the same time waiting for the ring of the phone.

Five to seven. She stepped out of the car and stood uncertainly. She straightened her skirt and flounced out her hair. She touched her fingers to the little silver cross her mother had given her when she was fourteen.

She walked resolutely, passing a woman carrying a sack of groceries, a young fellow dressed for a date, and two small boys scuffing along, engrossed in their three-foot-high world.

Angel's Flight loomed up ahead, dimly lit. It sat at such a steep elevation that it seemed a whim of nonsensical engineering. But it had operated its 315 feet of track without mishap since 1901, and boasted it had carried more passengers per mile, 100,000,000 in fifty years, than any railroad in the world. It had two cars. One ascended as the other descended, counterbalancing each other.

She crossed the street, walking fast, but the car was rising by the time she reached the turnstile. As she waited, she kept turning about. She wanted to see the man as he approached. She trembled as a fluttering newspaper unexpectedly brushed her ankle.

> In nine cases out of ten, a woman had better show more affection than she feels.
>
> JANE AUSTEN

When the descending car came to a stop, a few passengers left single-file. Then she was on the car, which was a series of stair-step seats, two on each step, facing each other, so that the passengers sat on even keel during the ride. She took the nearest seat.

Others came out of nowhere, it seemed, and within a moment the car was filled, mostly with men. She hopped from one face to another, and stopped twice, first on a man in the garb of a service-station attendant whose eyes held hers for a moment before she looked away. The next time around he was devoted to a newspaper.

The second was when her hands went to check her skirt line and she caught a man about her age sizing up her legs. He was thin and quite pale. He wore a neat but inexpensive dark suit, a white shirt and a conservative tie. He might have been an accountant or a shoe clerk.

Her gaze drew his eyes and they loitered on her. His lips pursed slightly.

She moved on to the next face, and the next, but his lingering scrutiny was the brush of a man against her body that she could feel without seeing.

The car began its ascent with a jolt and much grumbling of machinery.

In an old-fashioned bedroom, in a mansion that clung to the past of Lillian Russell and Diamond Jim Brady, the SAC and two agents sat about a two-way radio tuned in to Bureau cars and to agents hidden out along the course the victim was taking.

They sat in the dark, the radio on a marble-top table by an iron bedstead where a gray cat slept peacefully. A spry, twinkling-eyed woman, older than the mansion, had offered the room without charge when an agent that morning had identified himself.

"Just don't bother Sylvester," she said. "He sleeps up there. Oh," she said, seeing the agent's puzzlement, "Sylvester's my cat."

So now Sylvester slept soundly, undisturbed by the man hunt in progress.

"Control, this is Two. . . . Victim boarding car. . . . Agent Cronin following, taking seat next to victim. . . . Fourteen aboard, eleven men, three women, including victim. . . . No contact yet with subject."

The reports from Two came from agents concealed in a dark, vacant office room on the second of an eight-story building which flanked Angel's Flight at its lower level.

"Three in. . . . Car starting . . . climbing at usual rate . . . Cronin reports all O.K."

Cronin was carrying a small transistor transmitter concealed in his coat pocket. If he tapped a pencil twice to the mike, it indicated no developments. If he tapped it repeatedly, it indicated the subject had made contact with the victim aboard the car.

The SAC said, "Come in, Five." Five was a post in a hotel room that overlooked the upper level of Angel's Flight.

"Five in. . . . Three men, one woman waiting to take car down . . . only four people on street in immediate vicinity . . . automobile approaching at normal speed, passing . . . no contact apparent at this end yet."

"Three in. . . . Car nearing upper station . . . no developments . . . Cronin reports in negative . . . car pulling in ——"

The SAC spoke quickly: "All units stand by. Victim about to disembark on Bunker Hill."

The car jarred to a stop. Already everyone was standing. She continued sitting, purposely waiting so she would be the last.

The thin one, who had risen, lingered, too, looking back and taking inventory. She felt him strip her naked, and knew she had reddened.

At last she had no choice but to leave. Her feet climbed the stair-stepped car as though partially paralyzed. Passing the little station, she dropped her nickel in the pay container. She crossed a small paved patio with a drinking fountain in the center. By the time she reached the sidewalk, everyone had vanished.

She stood uncertainly. A car approached and she waited, but it passed without slowing, and then another, and still another. The first sharp thrust of panic struck her. She had to walk, to do something. If she stood here alone with her imagination, she would be lost.

She turned to the right, and it was then he came up behind her so swiftly she scarcely heard his footsteps. "Looking for someone?" he asked.

She swung about naturally. His small eyes had an odd, glazed cast and were fixed intently on her. His left hand was dropped in his coat pocket, and the fingers on his right hand rubbed each other nervously.

She nodded and looked at him speculatively. Her nails sank into the plastic of her purse.

He said softly, "I could be that someone." He was standing so closely she felt his breath.

"Well, are you?" Her voice sounded unnatural.

"Yeah," he said slowly, and then, "Come on. I've got a car across the street."

She stood unmoving. "Couldn't we talk here?"

"Here? On the sidewalk?" His thin, tight lips relaxed into the faintest smile. "Nothing doing. Come on."

He took a firm grip on her arm. Her first reaction was to jerk away, but she stifled it. He held her so closely that his hip touched hers with every step. His left hand remained in his coat pocket.

She asked, "Where're we going?"

"Down to the ocean. I know a good fish place." She held back, walking slowly. "What's the matter?" he asked petulantly.

"I've got a bad foot."

He steered her across the street toward a white car and helped her in, releasing her arm only as he closed the door and pushed the red button locking it. He hurried around to the driver's seat.

"Please," she said, "let's talk here."

The time was with her again, when she was eight and squirming through a crevice toward a cave, and before she knew it, no matter how much she struggled and fought, the earth held her in a vise.

(To Be Continued)

PY-O-MY BLUEBERRY Muffin Mix?

It's the original blueberry muffin mix—with the unmatched flavor. Peps up any meal! Contains canned wild blueberries, muffin mix—even paper baking cups. Enjoy them this week. Most grocers have Py-O-My.

As vintage is to champagne

VIRGIN

is to olive oil

The natural flavor of the fruit—that's POMPEIAN Virgin Olive Oil. First press only of the choicest olives. Far tastier salads, meat, fish, fowl. Specify Pompeian!

Mealtime?

Nothing quite like this has ever happened before. Marvelous new MIRRO, with its sleek "Jet-Stream" styling and so-sensible "Easy-Over" covers, has jumped a whole generation ahead in morning-noon-and-night utility. Every single set-matched piece is perfectly practical, practically perfect, and pretty as a picture. Try it yourself and see . . . today. Just ask for MIRRO, the finest, friendly-to-food aluminum, by name.

Prices range from $1.15 for ⅝-qt. saucepan to $7.95 for 16-qt. covered saucepot. (Slightly higher in West.)

MIRRO Foil
PURE ALUMINUM WRAP
Finest for cooking, wrapping, freezing.

COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

MIRRO ALUMINUM COMPANY, MANITOWOC, WIS. • World's Largest Manufacturer of Aluminum Cooking Utensils

BOUNTY FROM OUR KITCHEN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 84

We use a lot of fish at our table. Not only because it's cheap—thoug consideration—but also because it's delicious, meaty, flavorful if cooked

Baked Bluefish

2 onions, thinly sliced (leave them in rings)
1 green pepper, cored and sliced into thin rings
2 tablespoons butter
Salt and pepper
1 fillets of bluefish, floun other delicate white-fis
2 cups commercial sour c

Sauté onion and pepper in butter over low heat in an oven-type hea until tender. Don't let them brown. Salt and pepper the fish fillets w Now remove vegetables from skillet, place fish fillets in the bottom vegetables on top of fish and spread entire surface with sour cream. again with salt and pepper, lightly this time. Bake in a moderately 375° F., for 15–20 minutes or until fish can be flaked with a fork tables are thoroughly cooked. Serve directly from skillet at the tabl will break up if you try to transfer it to a platter). Makes about 6 serv

. . . . . .

All I will say about this next dish is that it is simple, quick and wonderful. You can get it ready to stick under the broiler hours beforeha it is marvelous for a dinner party. Cooking time is about 10 minutes. guests can do without you that long, can't they?

Scallops Broiled in Garlic Butter

2 large cloves garlic, peeled and split
½ pound butter
1½ tablespoons minced chives, scallions or onions
2 tablespoons chopped parsley
½ teaspoon dried tarragon
½ teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
2 pounds scallops

Brown garlic in butter. Remove garlic. Now add onions and all se Wash and drain scallops. Place scallops in a flat ovenproof dish. soned butter over all. At this point you can stop thinking about th just before serving time. Store them in the refrigerator. About 20 before dinner, remove baking dish from refrigerator and allow to room temperature. Preheat the broiler. Broil 3 minutes on each side the scallops with a pancake turner and basting once. If the scallo good and brown and the butter bubbly, move them closer to the bro for a minute at the end. Serve at once. Makes 6 servings.

. . . . . .

We enjoy Chinese food at our house. It is a wonderful way to use up and once you get over the idea that there is any special trick to fixin dishes, you'll agree nothing's easier. The only reason, according to my chil we don't have Tuna Eggs Foo Yoong more often is that they are so can barely keep up with their appetites.

Tuna Eggs Foo Yoong

Cooking oil for sautéing
8 eggs, slightly beaten
2 cans (7-oz.) tuna, drained and flaked
16 mushrooms, sliced and sautéed in butter
1 can (1-lb.) bean sprouts, drained
2 scallions, chopped (tops too)
1 stalk celery, chopped
Salt and pepper to taste
2 teaspoons soy sauce

SAUCE
2 tablespoons cornstarch
2 teaspoons soy sauce
3 cups chicken consommé
1 teaspoon sugar
1 teaspoon garlic powder

Just cover the bottom of a 6″ skillet with oil and heat. To the beaten tuna, mushrooms, bean sprouts, scallions, celery, salt and pepp teaspoons soy sauce. Spoon a little of the egg mixture into the skill on one side, then turn and brown on the other. Add more oil to needed. As "pancakes" are cooked, transfer to a hot baking sheet warm in the oven until ready to serve. Serve with the following sa together cornstarch, 2 teaspoons soy sauce, consommé, sugar, garli and salt and pepper if needed. Cook and stir over medium heat until thickened and clear. Pour a couple spoonfuls hot sauce over each pat serve remainder of the sauce in a bowl at the table. Makes about 6

T's is one of those lovely, foolproof d ved delicately with lemon juice and d t in the oven an hour and a half be th big bowl of broad, buttered noodl

Ragout

nds very lean, boneless
nb, cut into 1″ cubes
o flour
aspoons salt
t spoon freshly ground pepper
o olive or salad oil
s chicken broth (or 1½ cups oth and ½ cup dry sherry)

e lamb in flour which has been y ground pepper. Heat the oil in lid). Brown lamb. Now add chic poon salt. Cover tightly and plac ours, or until lamb is tender. If t end of cooking time, remove co e the gravy to 1 cup. Just befo and rind. Garnish, if you like, onions and sprigs of water cres

. . . . . .

e truth of the matter is that vegetables are, in fact, exquisite. They nd should remain, delicate. They are worthy of the most intelligent attention:
iven it, they are an amazement and a joy. Sometimes a friend and dinner will say to my husband, who is serving the plates, as he dips into the ruby
"But I never eat beets." The next minute that guest is savoring (and gobbling ese bright julienne strips, bathed in a lovely, fragrant orange sauce.

Julienne Beets With Orange Sauce

lespoons cornstarch ups water
lespoons vinegar
p light brown sugar
Juice of 1 lemon
Rind of 1 orange, grated
2 cans (1 pound) julienne beets

l cornstarch with water until all cornstarch is dissolved. Combine with ar, light brown sugar and lemon juice. Heat, stirring constantly, until is dissolved and mixture is thickened and clear. Now add the grated e rind. Heat the beets, drain and serve topped with the orange sauce.
s 6 servings.

BOY
AIRS

NTINUED FROM PAGE 53

on lived in the apartment directly Marches'.
with you?" said Joanna. She sat telephone stand and looked at the dy yet?" said Brandon.

guess so." Joanna glanced at her l lowered her voice. "I wish it was
'
I'll come by for a minute, hey?"
you would. I mean if you've got ll."
ve got time. Why wouldn't I have hat time's your date? I mean you've ver there and all. Fifteen miles."

muttered something unintelli-

I can't hear you."
enty of time. I'll come down, O.K.? I rab a shower." There was a pause, t whistling sound. When Brandon's ned it had a surprised, faintly ag-te. "I can't get used to it, you know ving dates."
r can I. I feel crazy."
yfield," said Brandon. "You're go-he world, buddy."
ah," said Joanna. She swung her ning the satin toe of her slipper care-said Brandon, "I'll prob'ly be urry." She hung up.

"Don't let him try any funny stuff." He followed Joanna as she moved rigidly out of the kitchen.

Jack Bayfield was standing in the center of the room, talking to Mrs. March. He looked extremely handsome.

"Oh, there you are," said Mrs. March. Her smile dried up when she caught sight of Brandon.

"Hello," said Joanna to Jack. "You know Brandon Harper, don't you?"

"Sure thing," said Jack. "How'sa boy?"

"O.K.," said Brandon. "You're sure looking great, Bayfield. Can I get you a mirror or anything?"

"Funny," said Jack. "Real funny. You're not going to the same dance we are, I trust."

"Brandon has a date in Westport," said Mrs. March. "Brandon, I'm afraid you're going to be awfully late."

"Don't worry about it, Mrs. March. It may be tenish instead of nineish, but I'll get there."

"I'll get your wrap, Joanna," said Mrs. March. She flashed Brandon one look before she left the room. Unfortunately, its eloquence failed to reach Brandon, whose eyes were pinned on Jack Bayfield.

"How's your beard, Bayfield?" he asked.

Jack smiled at Joanna and shrugged faintly. "Pal of yours? Out loose like this?"

"For heaven's sake, Joanna," said her mother. "Why in the world did you ask Brandon to come down here tonight? Jack will be here any minute, I should think."

"What difference does that make?" Joanna asked.

"He won't be overjoyed, will he? To find another boy underfoot the minute he walks in."

"Oh, mother, Brandon's not another boy. He's just Brandon."

"Doesn't he have a date of his own?" her mother asked.

"I don't know. Yes. Sure he has."

"Well then, what's he coming here for? Why isn't he taking you to the dance, if he's so anxious to see you all the time?"

"Brandon doesn't even belong to Men's Club. He's only a sophomore. Men's Club is for seniors. He couldn't take me if he wanted to. And anyway, I told you about sixteen-hundred times. Brandon goes steady with this girl in Westport. He's practically engaged or something. Just because I love Brandon doesn't mean he's my boy friend, for heaven's sake. I don't know why grownups are always trying to sex things up. It's so juvenile."

"That's an extremely vulgar expression. If you can't express yourself without ——"

"All right, all right."

"You're so edgy, Joanna. Calm down."

"I don't know why I'm having this stupid date, anyway," said Joanna. She began pulling distractedly at her fingers. "I don't know why that stupid Jack Bayfield asked me or why I said yes. What I wish is, I wish I could forget the whole thing."

"Now, Joanna. A perfectly nice boy, an outstanding boy, asks you for a date —— Stop cracking your knuckles. Most girls would ——"

asion

An exciting new be OVING... just minutes aw

call United

Who wouldn't pop a button or two? It's a happy occasion when a promotion comes through.

And moving your family to the new assignment is also a pleasure when the United Agent "Pre-Plans" the details. His personalized service—including helpful advice from noted moving consultant Bette Malone—begins the moment your goods are "UNI-PACKED"... doesn't end until you're comfortably settled at your new address.

A United move is safe, swift, pleasantly convenient. And only United vans are SANITIZED* to keep your furnishings fresh and clean.

Whatever the occasion... if it calls for moving, call your UNITED Agent. Look under "MOVERS" in the Yellow Pages.

* REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

United

United Van Lines

MOVING WITH CARE EVERYWHERE®

"I don't care how outstanding he is! I wish he'd fall down an elevator shaft or something."

"You're just nervous because it's your first real date."

"Of course I'm nervous. Why wouldn't I be nervous?"

"You're not worried about your dancing, are you? You dance beautifully. And you really look marvelous. You haven't the slightest reason to worry about ——"

"You don't understand anything. You absolutely don't understand anything. It's all your fault. You deliberately pushed me and pushed me in that subtle way ——"

"Joanna!"

"Well, you did. You wanted me to have dates. Being so interested every time I mentioned a boy's name."

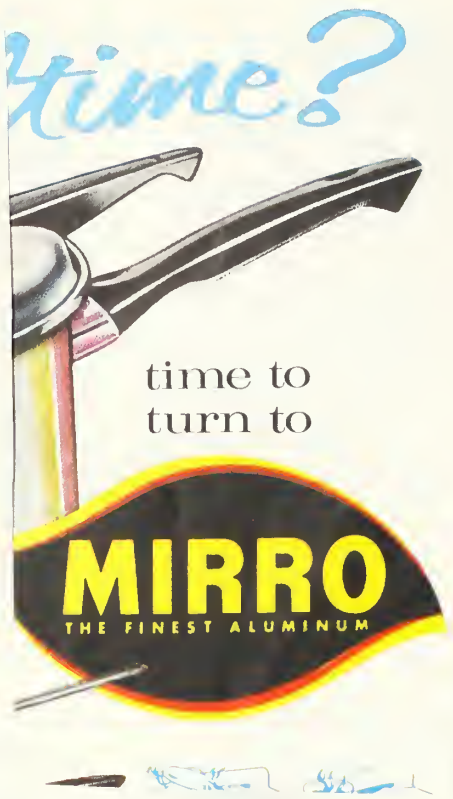
"You're not being very fair, Joanna. After all, a normal girl of fifteen does go out with boys. All your friends ——"

"What am I going to do? That's what I want to know. What am I going to do?"

"Baby, relax," her mother told her. "Do about what?"

Joanna twisted her hands. "What if he tries to kiss me?"

"Oh." Mrs. March leaned back in her chair and closed her eyes briefly. She suddenly felt tired. "So that's what's worrying you."



"He probably kisses girls all the time," said Joanna. "He's probably kissed every girl that ever got one foot inside his stupid car. He probably ——"

"Now look. In the first place the problem probably won't come up. I happen to know Jack Bayfield comes from a very nice family—his mother ——"

"Nice family! I've never heard anything so completely ——"

"And if it does come up, you'll know how to handle it. You'd be surprised how easy it is to discourage that sort of thing in a nice way. The main thing is, don't ruin your whole evening worrying about it. Take my word for it, you'll know what to do."

"Oh, sure," said Joanna. "Oh, sure." A faint knock sounded at the door. "That's Brandon." She hurried to open the door. "It's about time you got here," she said crossly.

"Wow," said Brandon. He was wearing a dinner jacket, and he looked, as usual, obscurely hectic and disjointed. Even in party clothes Brandon transmitted the peculiar impression of being assailed by invisible winds. He had blond hair and blue eyes, widely set in a brown, triangular kind of face. He was a very beautiful boy, in a wild, unlikely way. "You sure you want me to come in?" he asked, stepping inside. "I'll only stay a minute. Boy, you really look swell, Joker."

"Hello, Brandon," said Mrs. March. "How's your mother?"

"She's O.K.," said Brandon staggering politely toward Mrs. March's chair. Mrs. March put one hand protectively on the base of her best porcelain lamp "She's gone to a lecture. Some guy's making a talk about teenagers. Their sex life or something."

"Really. I see you're all gussied up this evening too."

"Yeah," said Brandon, craning and leaning precariously to his invisible wind. "I'm taking Selma to a party. It's my contribution to teenage sex li——"

BOUN FROM KITCH

CONTINUE

We use a lot of fish at our table. A consideration—but also because it's d

Bak

2 onions, thinly sliced (leave them in rings)

1 green pepper, cored and sliced into thin rings

Sauté onion and pepper in butter o until tender. Don't let them brown. Now remove vegetables from skill vegetables on top of fish and sprea again with salt and pepper. lightly 375° F., for 15–20 minutes or un tables are thoroughly cooked. Serv will break up if you try to transfer

. . . . . .

All I will say about this next d

"Never mind," said Mrs. March. at her watch. "Joanna's date will p here any minute."

"Mother, he knows. Come on, Joanna pulled him toward the kitc Alone with Brandon, she felt a tr A plate of cookies had been left on t in the kitchen. Joanna picked up th offered it to Brandon.

"Don't let my mother bother sort of hysterical."

"What's she hysterical about?" picked up a cooky and looked at i

"Oh, you know, me having a da

"Yeah," said Brandon. "Parer alike." He laid the cooky back on t

"I bet your mother didn't push having dates, though. Like mine.

"I wouldn't say she pushed, exa Brandon. "It was more like a l shove." He collapsed against the looking at Joanna intently. "You O.K. in that rig, you know it? Yo ferent. What'd you do? Wash yo something?"

"Seriously, did your mother wa start dating?"

"My mother's a very interesting ity," said Brandon. "Very hot for p She'd think a guy my age wasn't nc wasn't madly in love or something ding. If it wasn't for Selma she'd pr me to a head shrinker. Parents can if their kids aren't normal. They'll normal if it drives you crazy."

"Well, you're lucky," said Joanna got Selma, and it's all sort of settl nervous I could die."

"What are you nervous about? look nervous."

"I don't know. Weren't you n your first date?"

"Sure I was nervous. I guess I was

"I bet you weren't. Why would nervous?"

"A boy is a whole lot nervouser t in my opinion. Girls don't have to b They hold all the cards, buddy."

you mean?"
ey hold all the cards, that's all."
ked up another cooky, broke it
, and laid the halves back on the n. Can I ask you a sort of per-

n?"
eyes grew a shade darker. "Go t. I won't say I'll answer it, but well ask it."
about you and Selma." Joanna andon and then looked quickly nly reason I'm asking is because I've got to talk to somebody
. you know. Experience. What I is, does a boy . . . you know, kiss n like did you kiss Selma good r first date?"
a short silence, filled only with m of the refrigerator. "What do know that for?" Brandon asked just don't haul off and ask a guy e that for Pete's sake."
ght. Forget it."
that what's bothering you? I really think that big ox will or something?"
now," Joanna told him. "How
w?"
hatcha going out with him for,
're too young to go out with guys
"
I'm fif*teen*. My mother said——" ther. Mothers don't know any-d she say?"
not to worry."
's great. That's so specific. Listen, ything you let him have it, you
p him one. I mean it. Give him and swing."
sh."
ran his hands through his hair.
at her wildly. "What time's he hat time's he supposed to be

now. Nine. He said nineish."
That's exactly what you'd expect ny slob like Bayfield. Nineish.
e him up. Tell him you can't go.
u broke your leg."
o that. My mother would have a
, he's probably on his way over
."
t to go with him, that's the truth
r. You'll prob'ly wind up wanting too."
t. I hardly know Jack Bayfield. I ike him very well."
of difference that makes," said Girls kiss boys they don't like all hey think it's their duty. Some gives them a ride in their convert-them flowers and they start kiss- l over the place. Listen, whatcha t dress for, anyway? You going yfield in that?"

the matter with it? You said I
."
tty bare, isn't it? Your mother ve her head examined, letting you that guy."
hat's wrong with him? I mean,
you like him?"
m. I like him. I'm crazy about him.
his razor."
hat?"
r. He's got this very fancy electric rings to school every day. Every . Carries it in his coat pocket. It's blanket or something."
hat's wrong with that?"
know. Nothing. He waits until a lot of guys are standing around er room, and then he shaves with sophomore guys are supposed to
or something."
ll. Is he nice, though?"
prince," said Brandon. "He's the ig shots."
" said Joanna. "I think he's here."
re coming from the living room: r's voice and Jack Bayfield's. Joan-s flew to her hair, smoothed her ndon, I'd better go in there before
—"
"
Listen, I've got to go."

"Don't let him try any funny stuff." He followed Joanna as she moved rigidly out of the kitchen.

Jack Bayfield was standing in the center of the room, talking to Mrs. March. He looked extremely handsome.

"Oh, there you are," said Mrs. March. Her smile dried up when she caught sight of Brandon.

"Hello," said Joanna to Jack. "You know Brandon Harper, don't you?"

"Sure thing," said Jack. "How'sa boy?"

"O.K." said Brandon. "You're sure looking great, Bayfield. Can I get you a mirror or anything?"

"Funny," said Jack. "Real funny. You're not going to the same dance we are, I trust."

"Brandon has a date in Westport," said Mrs. March. "Brandon, I'm afraid you're going to be awfully late."

"Don't worry about it, Mrs. March. It may be tenish instead of nineish, but I'll get there."

"I'll get your wrap, Joanna," said Mrs. March. She flashed Brandon one look before she left the room. Unfortunately, its eloquence failed to reach Brandon, whose eyes were pinned on Jack Bayfield.

"How's your beard, Bayfield?" he asked.

Jack smiled at Joanna and shrugged faintly. "Pal of yours? Out loose like this?"

"You brought your shaver didn't you?" said Brandon. "You wouldn't go to a dance without your shaver, would you, old buddy?"

"Listen," said Jack, "what's with this guy? He live here or something?"

"He lives upstairs," said Joanna. "Brandon, you'd better go."

"Where you guys going after the dance?" said Brandon. "Maybe I'll meetcha or something."

"Sure," said Jack. "We can play hop-scotch."

"Come on, Bayfield, no kidding. Where you going afterward?"

"I'll send you a special-delivery letter," said Jack.

An exciting new bedroom—just minutes away!

Rit lets your washer do the work!

Rit Royal Blue did the trick here.

Just pop your 'washables' in the washer ...RIT COLOR will do the rest!

Draperies and bedspread dyed with Rit Fuchsia.

Rit Yellow brightened this spread and drapes.

Rit is designed for washer dyeing. So safe, so sure, it's recommended by leading washer manufacturers!

Bored with your bedroom? No need to buy anything new—just dye it "new" with Rit. America's most popular dye gives smooth, even, luscious color to anything you can wash—right in your washer. (Except for glass and mineral fibers.)

No boiling—no stirring. Your washer does the work. Pop in your washables, sit back and relax. You get beautiful results in minutes. And only Rit gives you such rich tones of navy, black and other dark colors.

For tinting in the sink. Dainty lingerie and items too small for the machine take on glowing color in your sink. So easy and safe, Rit tints beautifully in hot tap water.

35 heavenly shades to choose from—and dozens of combinations for any effect you want. Good news: Use Rit Color Remover and Nylon Whitener to change dark colors to light—nylon "grey" to white that's bright again! Now it's so easy to change almost any fabric into a brand-new color!

You're so Bright when you use

RIT® COLOR

America's largest selling home dye!

"Here's your wrap, Joanna," said Mrs. March.

"Joker?" said Brandon. "We'll play tennis tomorrow, O.K.?"

"O.K., Brandon," Joanna told him. "'By, mother."

"I'll go down as you go," said Brandon. "You two guys mind if I ride down the elevator with you?"

"Be our guest," said Jack.

They rode down in silence. In the downstairs lobby Jack took Joanna's arm. "O.K.," he said to Brandon. "Blast off."

"You know something, Bayfield?" said Brandon. "You give me a royal pain."

"You scare me to death, junior," said Jack. "Now scram. Go play marbles or something." He turned a baffled gaze on Joanna. "What's the matter with this guy? He acts like he's cracked."

"Brandon, you've got a date," said Joanna. "You'd better hurry up."

"You remember what I told you," said Brandon. "About that forehand swing."

"Let's go," said Jack.

"She's got a terrific forehand," said Brandon. "That right, Joker?"

"I don't know," said Joanna.

"You don't know? Don't you remember what I told you?"

"Are we going to a tennis match or a dance?" said Jack. "Shove off, Harper. I mean it."

"O.K., O.K.," said Brandon. He moved outside with them and watched Jack help Joanna into his car. It was a yellow convertible. Jack shoved it into gear without another glance at Brandon, and Joanna looked up at him helplessly as the car began to move.

For a long time after the car disappeared Brandon stood alone on the curb staring after it.

All things considered, Joanna decided, she had had a pretty good time. Not until after the dance, when the car turned ... serted street and pulled up in f... apartment house, did she feel a... her earlier tension. The car stopp... shivered slightly.

"Hey," said Jack. "You cold or ... Here. scoot over closer. I'll keep ...

"I'm O.K.," said Joanna. She y... orately. "I guess I'm just sleepy."

"Sleepy? You be careful, nov... make me think I bore you or som...

"Oh, no," said Joanna. "I had ... evening. I really did. I'd better g... though. Mother's probably waitin...

Jack's arm slid along the back ... "You know something?" he said. ... very cute girl."

Joanna studied the dashboard ... "Well," she said, "thanks." She wa... conscious of his arm on the back ... It moved down around her shoul...

"I don't believe you realize wha... you are," said Jack. "I'm very, ve... you. You know that?"

Joanna stared, mesmerized, int... In the light from the dashboard t... oily shine. He was really awfully ... His eyelashes were thick, and he sm... Kissing him might not be too bad ... had to find out *some*time what it w... lowered her eyes and found herself ... Jack's tie.

"Your tie's crooked," she said. ... minded her of Brandon. Brandon' ... always crooked.

"This is a great time to be tal... ties," said Jack. "You really have a ... tonight?"

"Yes."

"How about a kiss then, hey?"

"No."

Jack drew back in astonishment. ... hung in the air between them, n... stark.

"Whaddaya mean, no? Just liketha... Am I poison or something?"

"I'd better go in," said Joanna.

Jack stared at her. "Boy," he sa... "Boy. I never got that kind of a brus... a girl in my life."

"Well," said Joanna, "good ni... started opening her door.

"Now wait a minute," said Jack. ... a minute. How come? That's what ... know."

"I don't know." She glanced quic... tie. He was straightening it and glari... "My gosh. Just because a person doe... to kiss a person —— I just didn't fe... that's all."

"Well, that's great. That's just gre...

"I've got to go in."

Jack got out quickly, slammed ... and moved around the car to help ... They walked silently into the lobb... apartment house and pressed the ... button.

"You don't have to take me u... Joanna.

"Have it your own way." He walk... as soon as the elevator doors opened ... sighed and leaned against the wall as ... up. I guess I ought to have kissed ... thought. There was something sad ... finished about the evening. The elevato... at the third floor and she stepped ou...

Brandon was leaning against the ... posite the elevator.

"It's about time you got home," ... He looked glassy-eyed and feverish. "... Bayfield? Didn't the guy even bring ...

"He brought me to the elevator. ... you doing here?"

"Whaddaya think I'm doing?"

"Well, I don't know. Is your party ...

"Yeah, it's over. I guess it's over. ... go."

"Didn't go? What did you do, ther... did you do all evening?"

"Nothing. I went to a double featu...

"What about Selma?"

"I don't know. She died or someth...

"Died? What do you mean? You m... really died?"

"We can't talk here," said Brand... looked around the corridor wildly. "L... on the elevator."

Enter the paradise Kittens Kitten-ettes contest

WIN ONE OF 15 SIX-PAIR SHOE WARDROBES OR ONE OF 100 PAIRS OF PARADISE KITTENS KITTEN-ETTES!

THE SOFTEST SHOES YOU'VE EVER WORN ABOUT $16

Just tell us why you think the Paradise Kittens are so happy. Get your contest entry blonk and full details from your Parodise Kittens/Kitten-ettes store. For name of store nearest you, write

BRAUER BROS. SHOE COMPANY ST. LOUIS 8, MISSOURI

EVERYONE WINS THIS FULL-COLOR KITTEN PHOTO SUITABLE FOR FRAMING.

epped back into the elevator, and ushed a button haphazardly. The rumbled upward. "Listen," said "did that guy kiss you? Hey?"

st don't haul off and ask a person a ke that," said Joanna. "That's what e when I asked you about Selma."

different," said Brandon. "That's a lot different."

vator stopped at the eighth floor. slid open on a silent and empty see anything different about it," a. "Just because it was Selma." fferent, all right. It's plenty difsee why."

muttered something.

What'd you say?"

here's no Selma."

lo you mean there's no Selma?"

her up. I invented her, for Pete's d her? What'd you do that for?"

know. To get my mother off my wanted me to have a girl. I told cracked on psychology. I had to do believe it. You've had a date every kend ——"

features," said Brandon. "I've seen ouble features I'm cross-eyed, prac- le gave her a blue, baffled look. rob'ly think I'm cracked or some-lon't. But gee."

mes I think I am cracked. I nearly tonight, you know it? Every time I thought of that guy Bayfield trying to kiss you I just about went nuts."

"Why?" Joanna asked him. "Why should you care?"

"Why should I care?" said Brandon. "Because I don't want him kissing you, that's why. I don't want any other guy kissing you, either."

"Well," said Joanna, "you never kissed me."

The wind seemed to go out of Brandon. He leaned against the wall and looked at his shoes. "I know it," he said. "I've thought about it, though. I've thought about it plenty. If you knew how much I've thought about it you'd probably think I was a maniac or something. Even my mother'd probably think I was a maniac."

Joanna also looked at her shoes. "I've thought about it too," she said.

"You have?" said Brandon. "You have? You mean —— Gee! D'you mean it would be all right if I . . . you know ——"

They stared at each other dumbly.

"It's—it's sort of embarrassing, isn't it? I mean, we know each other so well and all."

"We'll have to get over that," said Brandon. "Somehow."

"The door's open," said Joanna faintly. "Don't you think it ought to be—you know—sort of private?"

Brandon reached out dreamily and touched a button on the control panel. When his arm came down it came to rest, miraculously, on Joanna's shoulders.

"Your tie's crooked," she said, as the doors closed.

A few minutes later Joanna was in her own bedroom, having brushed past her mother with the briefest of good nights. But one glimpse of her daughter's dazzled eyes told Mrs. March all she needed to know. Well, she thought. Well, well. I do believe the child's been kissed.

In a certain, limited way Mrs. March was, after all, a woman of perception. END

I SAW AN ARMY

By GEORGE ABBE

an army coming against the un.
en were faceless and its banners dead.
leering voice was lifted—no, not one.
broken flesh of wounds forgot o bleed.

their shields they bore their children's limbs
d in the oven of atomic glare;
belts were fission; and their armor gleam
ust of blasts beyond the atosphere.

ed was their skin and threaded white with steel;
ame of rockets writhed along their thighs;
mistry of missiles bent the knee clothed the sorrowing mouth, the darkened eye.

n their ranks they marched upon the sun hands hung weaponless, with cindered cheek, spectral footstep faint as desert wind fails before it finds the strength to speak.

n death, the burning core of light, I watched.
cried with soundless throat, "Beware! Beware!"
deaf they moved, straight to what I had sought:
fire of mastery, the target of power.

Bruce Block Floor

You'll love this oh-so-easy beauty care for wood floors!

Old fashioned floor washing isn't for smart, modern gals like you! Not when the world's largest maker of hardwood floors actually recommends this easy, clean-as-you-wax way!

Here's how it works! Just pour this combination cleaner and liquid paste wax on your floor. As you wipe up the marks and dirt, Bruce leaves a new, clean coat of paste wax on the floor. It's that simple! Harmful water never touches your floor.

What's more, Bruce gets up stubborn spots and ingrained dirt that ordinary cleaners can't. And the paste wax buffs back to gleaming beauty time after time.

Try BRUCE CLEANING WAX for a heavy coat of wax. For lighter waxing on wood and linoleum use BRUCE FLOOR CLEANER. NEW! Try Bruce 5-Minute Wax Remover for all non-wood floors. It really works!

for floors use Bruce . . . Paste Wax . . . Self-Polishing Wax . . . Tile Cleaner of the "snap" in girdles and bras...and keep it there with LASTIC LIFE®, the cold water miracle that washes longer life into elasticized garments!

created specially by the makers of WOOLITE®

LIPS SORE?

Blistex — THE SPILLPROOF — POCKET SIZE 39c HIGHER IN CANADA

BEST FOR COLD SORES, CHAPPED LIPS, FEVER BLISTERS

CORNS

also Calluses. Quick, easy, and economical. Just rub on. Jars, 35¢, 60¢. At your druggist. Money refunded if not satisfied. Moss Co., Rochester, N.Y.

removed by MOSCO

Spare-Time* MONEY!

You can increase your income in your spare time. Write for our generous commission offer.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY

444 Independence Square Philadelphia 5, Penna.

Make up to $300 or more In Spare Time

Over 300 New Items For Quick EXTRA MONEY Now To Christmas

Just Show Fabulous New 1960 Evans Line

No-Money-Down, No-Risk Starting Sample Plan. You keep up to $1.00 Per Item. Self-selling EVANS Line, huge plant mean more sales, faster service. Send today for salable boxes to be paid for or returned—plus big Free Album of Personalized cards, 2 big Order-Getting Illustrated Catalogs of over 300 items. Write now.

NEW ENGLAND ART PUBLISHERS, North Abington 927, Mass.

Science Shrinks Hemorrhoids New Way Without Surgery Stops Itching—Relieves Pain

Only Preparation H Contains New Healing Substance That Now Makes it Possible to Shrink Hemorrhoids Without Surgery.

A world-famous research institute has found a new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids without surgery. It relieves itching and pain in minutes and speeds up healing of the injured, inflamed tissues.

In one hemorrhoid case after another, "very striking improvement" was reported and verified by doctor's observations. And most amazing of all — this improvement was maintained over a period of many months!

In fact, results were so thorough, that sufferers were able to make such statements as "Piles have ceased to be a problem." And among these sufferers, were a wide variety of hemorrhoid conditions, some of 10 to 20 years' standing.

All this was accomplished without the use of narcotics, astringents or anesthetics of any kind. The secret is the new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®) which quickly helps heal injured cells and stimulates regrowth of healthy tissue again. It is offered in ointment or suppository form called Preparation H®.

In addition to actually shrinking hemorrhoids without surgery, Preparation H lubricates and makes elimination less painful. It helps prevent infection which is a principal cause of hemorrhoids. Just ask for Preparation H Ointment or Preparation H Suppositories (easier to use away from home). Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded. Any drug counter.

THE JOURNAL'S 5-STAR WARDROBE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 56

"Since the coat must go with everything, its color is most important. I chose red. Red is divine with anything and everything. It is as basic as black. And it's strong enough to enhance any personality. The basic black dress, of course, furnished the other key color. Black is a wardrobe foundation. Black for women with many clothes and black for women with few. In the history of apparel, I am sure the basic black dress followed the fig leaf. It is always in perfect taste. Though primarily an afternoon dress, the wool with the moiré bow, worn with a black velvet cloche and black suède or white kid gloves, goes from luncheon through informal dining and movie-in-town evenings.

"The other most elemental shade, white, is ideal for the silk brocade. Since semiformality has largely replaced formality, women need ensembles which can go from afternoon to dinner to dance floors with equal ease. The white brocade dress with low décolleté dances deliciously and is, without a doubt, the ar dinner parties. Jacketed, it attends thea less formal parties.

"Beige for the basic day dress is neutral between the red and the black

"For the suit, I found a new color, 'Es A dark, dark brown, almost black, it the tone of its accessories. With green comes a dark, rich green. With brown brown. With black, a misty black. T presso suit is a natural traveler, whe plane, commuter train, car or foot. cross country and abroad, to town, sh to luncheons and matinees, to the office club meetings. A suit of many hats gray, Espresso shades or fur.

"These five ensembles, accompanied five hats, matching gloves, bags and clo pumps, go all over and do everythi shoes, for elegance's sake, must be clo high-heeled or low-heeled pumps. The and all the accessories are in solid colo way they go more places and do more The complementing costume jewelry is and classic. The finished product, the wearing the wardrobe, is elegant, c always perfectly dressed for the occasi has a five-star and four-season wardro

THE MAN WHO SAVES MARRIAGES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 71

Dr. Paul Popenoe's quick repartee has made him a favorite guest on Art Linkletter's TV show for the past fourteen years. Once when asked on the air about mothers-in-law, he replied that "the best kind keeps her pocketbook open and her mouth shut." He was deluged by letters of outrage from mothers-in-law all over the country. "This is no laughing matter," comments the marriage expert. "More marriages are broken up by mothers-in-law in the first year than by any other cause." Never allow a mother-in-law to add a bedroom to your house at her own expense, he advises. "You'll never get rid of her; you'll all be unhappy; and besides, she may get married again and add more people to your household!"

On a recent Art Linkletter show a young man asked the marriage expert with great seriousness, "Where can I find a girl who's attractive and fun and warm and friendly—who doesn't want to get married?" Quipped Dr. Popenoe instantly, "Do you know any other funny stories?"

Dr. Popenoe's humorous approach to the problems of modern marriage masks a deep and dedicated and passionate concern to improve marriage by improving people. He admits that as the product of an exceptionally happy union, and being very happily married himself, his attitude is evangelistic.

"The attitude with which you begin a marriage is the most important thing," he believes. "If you marry idealistically, with the idea that it's going to last until death do you part, then it will last, even if you married the wrong person. Anyway, it's not as important to pick the right person as to be the right partner."

This takes character, stick-to-itiveness and an optimistic personality, but the end result—staying married through thick and thin—is always worth it, according to Dr. Popenoe's experience. His studies have shown that couples having trouble with their marriages who have not been divorced before show better personalities than those with previous divorces. Those with one divorce show better personalities than those with two divorces.

He frequently points out that divorced people have a mental-disease and suicide rate two or three times higher than those who never divorce. Those who are happily married live longer than divorced persons.

In his unrehearsed and unscripted television show Dr. Popenoe tries to show divorce not as a glamorous "regaining of one's freedom" but as the sordid, depressing and heartbreaking affair it almost always is. Couples who have actually filed for divorce in the city of Los Angeles are invited to appear on the program and state their grievances. Dr. Popenoe sits in a judge's chair and listens to the bicker, snarl and back-stab—"good raw on the tape we eliminate only the profa and then, with the detached and Olym of one who has heard it all a thousan before, he gives them good sound backed by the latest scientific resear thirty years of personal experience field. (In his files at the American Inst Family Relations are the case histories 000 people who came for help with the riages; the largest collection of such c tories in the world.)

When Dr. Popenoe first began his m counseling center in 1930, America wa throes of the depression. Since then, Americans have less poverty but are in debt as ever. Also, they quarrel mo how to spend their money.

There are fewer sex problems today b more information is available and bet

> Of all good gifts which ever ca out of the wallet of the fairy go mother, the gift of natural gla ness is the greatest and best.
>
> BLISS CARM
>
> LEAVES OF GOLD, PUBLISHED THE COSLETT PUBLISHING

attitudes prevail. He tells of a woma came to him in 1930 and told him that divorcing her husband because he wa pervert. His scientific interest arouse Popenoe asked what the man did. "W mother told me that any man who's stil ested in sex after fifty is a sex pervert!" the distressed woman.

Today couples have more troubles w laws. "This is because we have more people and because small urban and sub apartments give them nothing to do. T solution is to find the older person among his contemporaries, and living q and a social life of his own."

There's no indication that mental has increased, but Americans today flicted with "freeway jitters—insecur spite of Social Security—and atom fright." This adds to the tensions of ma Dr. Donald Wilson, head of research American Institute of Family Relation that personality tests given by the insti 100,000 clients over the space of thirty show that the personality problems of p day Americans are more involved and co

"Another unhappy change," says Dr enoe, "is that parents argue more abo management of the children. Whether because parents are more on the run

CONTINUED ON PAG

New Yorkers were SHOCKED By The Recent EXPOSE of PATENT MEDICINE PRACTICES

Now You Too Can Learn How To SAVE...

STOP PAYING HIGH PRICES FOR VITAMINS

A recent public service study of Patent Medicines in one of New York's leading evening newspapers, devoted one entire installment to VITAMINS and disclosed many interesting highlights about the sale of Vitamins and Vitamin-Mineral combinations.

One of the startling revelations in this frank article was the wide variance of Vitamin prices.

The following three paragraphs taken from the series, as it appeared, are of particular concern to every family buying Vitamins.

"Any particular vitamin bottled under one label is, for all practical and therapeutic purposes, the same as if it is bottled under another label. The fact is, most of the Vitamin concentrates consumed in America are produced by only a few companies.

"The list of ingredients in a Vitamin compound is one thing the consumer can almost always depend on to be correct. Any company which fails to label the bottle with the exact formula and amount (or unit strength) of each ingredient risks a seizure by the U. S. Government.

"Bearing that in mind, it is interesting to pick up a few Vitamin catalogs and compare the prices charged by different companies for the same Vitamin compounds."

Following publication of the installment we received hundreds of telephone calls requesting copies of the Hudson Vitamin Catalog. This interest prompted us to tell the entire nation our story.

Hudson Vitamin Products has been serving doctors and nurses for over 25 years and now you, too, can purchase your Vitamins DIRECT from Hudson at savings that are up to 50% and more. Page after page in the Free Hudson Catalog shows tremendous dollar savings on Vitamins, Vitamin-Mineral combinations and Food Supplements.

Here is one example from the Hudson Vitamin Catalog: A very popular multiple vitamin that is taken once-a-day, regularly sells for about $3.10 per 100 . . . the Hudson formula sells for only $1.50 per 100.

Here is another — a well-known high potency B complex formula with Vitamin C and minerals (similar to a brand nationally advertised at $4.40 per 100) . . . only $2.10 per 100 DIRECT from the Hudson Vitamin Catalog.

These are only two examples that you will find in our 40 page catalog that is simple, easy to read and has been a Vitamin buying guide for millions from coast-to-coast.

Write for the Catalog and show it to your doctor if you like — but, by all means, discover for yourself why Hudson has become a DIRECT MONEY-SAVING source for Vitamins throughout the nation. All Hudson Vitamin Products are sold with a complete money back guarantee.

HUDSON VITAMIN PRODUCTS, INC.

89 Seventh Avenue, Dept. M-791, New York 11, New York

USE TESTED ACCEPTED by McCalls COMMENDED by the CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU of PARENTS' MAGAZINE

Hudson Vitamins have been awarded both the PARENTS' MAGAZINE COMMENDATION SEAL and McCALL'S USE-TESTED SEAL

Mail This Coupon Today!

HUDSON VITAMIN PRODUCTS, Inc.
89 Seventh Avenue, Dept. M-791, New York 11, N. Y.

Please mail me your Free Hudson Vitamin Catalog.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ ZONE ____ STATE _____

World's Largest Direct-by-Mail Vitamin Company

YOU FEEL THIS COOL, THIS CLEAN, THIS FRESH WHEN YOU USE TAMP

Tampax never shows, never embarrasses, never interferes with bat i or swimming. Millions choose it, millions use it. Worn internally i the modern way! TAMPAX . . . so much a part of your active l

Tampax® internal sanitary protection is made only by Tampax Incorporated, Pal working mothers, we don't know. But ys of educated couples show that they most about the children, then about the vs, and thirdly about sex."

TINUED FROM PAGE 120

ce the divorce rate keeps rising steadily s country every year, some of Dr. Popls critics have called him "a Pollyanna his finger in the dike." Dr. Popenoe feels, ver, that we are in a temporary cycle n is bound to stabilize eventually. "Toteenagers know little about sex and even bout the moral values involved. Survey survey has shown that students and ers and parents all want sex taught in ols, but the school principals shy away. year four thousand kids fourteen years r under get married in this country—to the divorce rate a few years later. These oys and girls from schools where sex ation isn't taught."

often tells his lecture audiences that the ymoon is over when the loving couple telling each other, "Darling, you're won-l!" and begin, "The trouble with you —" Says the marriage expert, "If I criti- my own wife, she says quickly, 'The ymoon's over!' and then we both laugh. her good device to prevent prolonged ments, we find, is to immediately pin what you're arguing about. A small re- to a wife about the coffee being cold can to a torrent of stinging remarks going into two or three generations of the and's family."

tty Popenoe is a delicate-looking, very y woman whose brown hair drawn back soft bun is hardly streaked with gray. In Popenoes' home, furnished with Spartan lieity with no TV set but about 1000 s, are several winsome bronze heads she f her sons. In a back study are stacks of scapes in oils, charcoal life studies and al excellent portraits of her husband.

etty and I are enough alike for harmony, enough alike for boredom," smiles the iage expert. "Like all artists, she is very tive and easily wounded. I do believe, ver, her moods are evener now than they to be."

'm an emotional person," Mrs. Popenoe ts. "Paul is a scientist, very matter-of-fact bjective. This took some getting used to. we married very idealistically and we've adjusting to each other every day since!"

'aul's tendency is to dominate the marriage Betty's is not to be dominated," says a family friend. "She's made her husband more tolerant and understanding of the nine point of view."

though Dr. Popenoe owes his unusual e to a refugee French Huguenot, the rest of ancestry is pure English and pioneer sas stock. His grandfather Popenoe was a perous Topeka farmer and Fred Popenoe, ather, became owner and publisher of the eka Daily Capital. A man of little formal ation, he had "a restless, cultured mind," rding to his son, and "vision beyond his s." He was the kind of person who never ed up a little dusty side road if it looked at orth exploring.

ly parents were always pushing my hers and myself into new experiences," ls Dr. Popenoe, who was especially close is mother, a Boston bluestocking who her Italian and French as polished as her r. She was "warm and kind and broadded and a good influence on everyone who v her." During one of the family financial rses, Fred Popenoe sold his interest in the us Inspiration copper mine, which soon ward became a billion-dollar producer. , well," Mrs. Popenoe told young Paul osophically, "all that money would probl have made you a snob."

hen Paul was about sixteen, his father's th failed and the family moved to Cali- ia. Here Paul entered Occidental College asadena and made a brilliant scholastic rd. It was his habit then to take a three- walk every evening and to be in bed by o'clock. (Today he often retires by 7:30) A female classmate remembers him as "a it, studious boy with English coloring— skin, pink cheeks and very blue eyes. He smiled a lot and was very likable, but reserved, and not at all interested in sports or girls. You had the feeling he was busy developing inside."

Fred Popenoe was then selling advertising space for a magazine called The Pacific Monthly. Young Paul was able to eat free in restaurants where his father had due bills, and accordingly he indugled himself daily in big juicy beefsteaks. Then one afternoon Paul fainted after leaving the restaurant. He decided that he had been eating too much meat and decided to cut down. After a few weeks he lost his appetite for meat entirely and eliminated fish and poultry from his diet too. From 1905 until this day he has been a vegetarian, except for one mouthful of buffalo meat during World War I. "A friend sent me some fresh buffalo steaks, and since the animal was fast becoming extinct, I decided I'd better eat it while I had the chance," explains Dr. Popenoe, never one to let a good opportunity slip by.

After finishing two years of Occidental College, Paul went up to Stanford. Within a year, however, his father suffered a severe relapse and Paul was needed at home to help support the family. He became a cub reporter for the Pasadena Star, where he rose rapidly to the city editor's desk. Within three years his father's health had improved.

Paul had saved $500 and could have returned to Stanford for his degree, but instead chose to splurge on a six-month walking and cycling tour of Europe. He took along a knapsack and a Bible which he read through twice "including all the begats." By budgeting himself strictly on $2 a day, he covered most of Europe, learning languages as he went along.

WOMEN'S IDEA EXCHANGE

When tying a package, moisten the string—it will dry tight and not slip off later, Miss C.P.L., of Seattle, Washington, has discovered.

His facility with languages is extraordinary. "It runs in the family," he explains modestly. He reads Spanish, German, Dutch, Portuguese, Italian, French, Latin, Esperanto and Arabic, and translates scientific articles freely in them; he also speaks Hebrew, Yiddish, Greek, Russian, Urdu (India), Serbo-Croatian and Japanese "well enough to ask directions."

At the end of his European tour in 1912, he received a cable from his father telling him to go to Spain and Algeria for some date-palm shoots for his experimental nursery. Paul hustled over to Spain, learned what he could about date palms there, then went far into the Sahara Desert of Algeria, quickly picked up enough Arabic to bargain with the desert sheiks and got 1000 choice shoots, each weighing from 30 to 50 pounds, and shipped them to California.

Fortunately, the date palm is just about the hardiest tree known and the shoots arrived at his father's nursery in the Coachella Valley and began to grow splendidly. Fresh dates were then a rarity in California and sold for as much as $2 a box. So with the idea of starting a large-scale date industry in California, Paul Popenoe and his younger brother Wilson went around the world the following year in search of rare and exotic dates.

In India Paul picked up the germs of typhoid fever which laid him low when they reached Basrah, Iraq, where he was desperately ill for six weeks. He was nursed back to health by missionaries, an act of devotion which impressed him deeply. When a couple comes to his marriage-counseling center hopelessly mired in marital difficulties, he often tells his staff, "Many a desperately sick man has been saved by the devotion and determination and optimism of his doctor. It takes highly dedicated and idealistic persons to make superior marriage counselors; and they must never give up!"

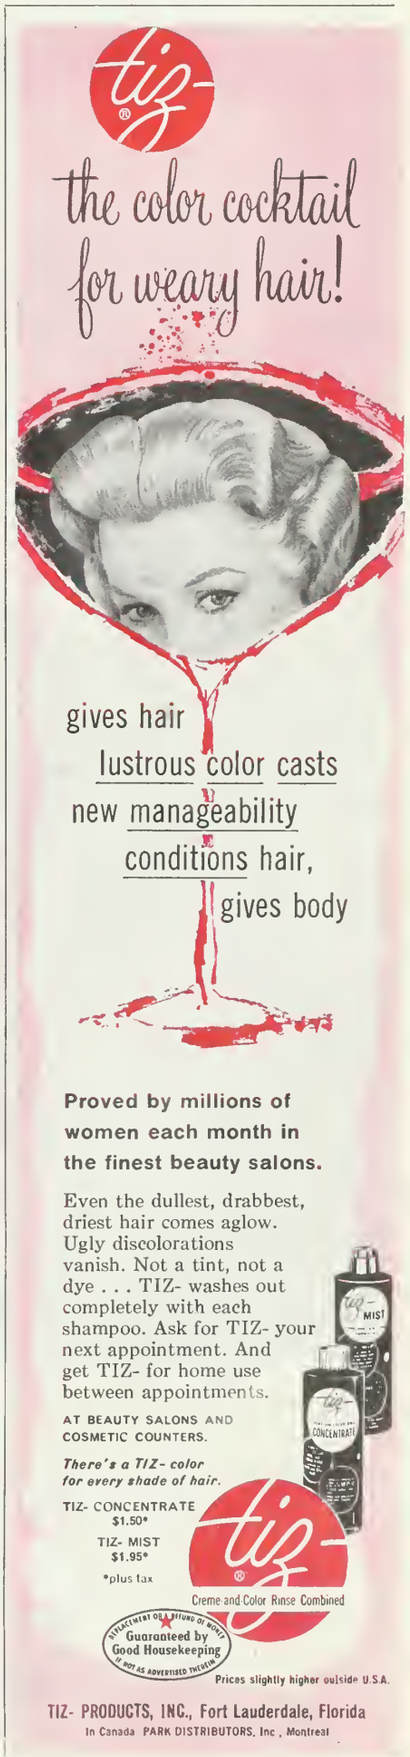
After recovering from typhoid on his date-exploration trip, Paul Popenoe compiled a card index of 1500 varieties of dates, and in 1913 published Date Growing in the New and Old Worlds, which remains the definitive book on the subject. These activities prompted the remark among his colleagues that Popenoe is "the only expert around in both kinds of dates."

For the next four years Paul Popenoe was editor of a magazine called the Journal of Heredity. He shared a Washington, D.C., apartment with his brother Wilson and Sewall Wright, who became one of the world's foremost geneticists. They furnished their apartment in Arabic style, largely with rugs, cushions and mattresses, and often sat up past midnight debating the fascinating new aspects of science and heredity. Evenings were spent, according to a friend, "paddling up the Potomac in a canoe and building a campfire on shore to cook supper. Then both brothers would hang up their hammocks in a tree and study until dark. Paul was learning Greek, and Wilson was polishing his Portuguese."

When America entered World War I, Paul Popenoe was commissioned first lieutenant and thrown into the fight against venereal disease. In those days more soldiers were incapacitated by syphilis and gonorrhea than by trench warfare. Remarks Dr. Popenoe, "I closed about twenty-five red-light districts around Army camps and brought about the outlawry of prostitution in Oklahoma, New Mexico and Arizona and the adoption by these states of regulations for the prevention and control of venereal diseases, written principally by myself."

He was then brought to Washington and put in charge of outlawing liquor and prostitution near Army camps for the entire U.S.

Following the war, he continued his fight against commercialized prostitution in New York City, where he was executive secretary of the American Social Hygiene Association, and he organized the first Pan-American Conference on Venereal Diseases. He also collaborated with Dr. Roswell Johnson, of the University of Pittsburgh, in writing Applied Eugenics, which became the standard college textbook for the next forty years.



Dr. Johnson and Paul Popenoe were both concerned that college women were having such small families. Says a close family friend, "We used to kid him about being over thirty years old, and not even close to having children himself." Actually, the young sociobiologist had spent seven years seriously looking for a wife. Then a fellow geneticist wrote him about a young dancer in New York named Betty Lee Stankovitch. Betty had been reared in Montgomery, Alabama, where her father was director of music at Huntingdon College. Her mother was an art teacher. When she was barely fifteen, Betty began studying interpretive dancing at the Florence Fleming Noyes School of Rhythm, in New York. When Paul met her, she was nineteen and teaching dancing in a small private nursery school on upper Fifth Avenue.

For forty years Betty Popenoe has treasured the letter a mutual friend wrote her about Paul. "Just a line or two about Popenoe," the friend wrote. "Queer name, queer fellow. Scientist. He haunts libraries and meetings of scientific societies and takes long, meditative walks. I believe he seldom, if ever eats meat, and smokes only occasionally so he can boast of at least one great viciousness. Paul Popenoe (how alliterative!) used to carry a cane and wear brown gloves."

It is not known what the mutual friend wrote to Paul about Betty, but it was sufficiently intriguing to bring the scientist promptly to her doorstep. Their first meeting was a disappointment to the girl. "Paul wasn't at all the dashing, romantic figure I anticipated. . . . He wrung me dry of information about myself in an hour, then looked at his watch and left." By their second date, however, he was convinced that here at last was his dream girl—beautiful, responsive, healthy, highly idealistic and "best of all—family-minded."

After a five-month engagement, they were married by a New York judge in August, 1920. Paul drew up the marriage contract himself, with the help of a friend who was an attorney. After the contract was signed, the bridegroom tipped his hat to the bride and hurried back to his office. "I did feel dashed," Betty recalls. That evening they left on the train for California. Neither of them liked New York City and so Paul had decided to devote himself to raising dates and writing scientific articles.

The newlyweds moved into an eighty-acre date ranch in the Coachella Valley, near Palm Springs. It is now a resort area, but in 1920 it was barren and desolate, flat as a board and dotted with mesquite shrub and cactus. The young couple moved into their new house before the roof was on; of course that night there was a downpour. For the next five years petite and fragile-looking Betty rarely wore a dress, only breeches and boots. This society dancer whose only experience roughing it had been a Maine summer camp found herself coping with rattlesnakes, scorpions and tarantulas. "Worst of all were the sandstorms," she says. "Then the sand drifted through shuttered windows to fill the bathtub with an inch of gritty sand; it sifted into closed cereal boxes and milk bottles and it got between your teeth and into your hair."

There were beauty and majesty to the desert too. "It casts a spell," recalls Betty, "like the ocean that draws you back and won't let you go." When the loneliness and desolation proved too great, she would saddle up her horse and gallop for hours. Her nearest neighbor was two miles away; she missed her family, her friends, and dancing "which was my whole life before I met Paul."

Dr. Popenoe was used to sleeping on a mattress on the floor. His bride protested that the bed linens and blankets would get dusty. In the end she won. Her hardest adjustment, she says, was getting used to a vegetarian diet. "I promised Paul that I would never serve him or our children any meat, or fish or poultry, but when the boys were strapping teenagers I used to worry about their getting all the protein they needed. It seemed I was always out in the kitchen chopping mounds of food—fresh celery and peppers and nuts and apples, or carrots for a carrot loaf. I filled them up with bread and macaroni and cheese soufflés and omelets; sometimes we made a whole meal of artichokes or creamed spinach on toast. They all grew up to be fine, strong, healthy young men, so I guess I worried in vain."

The four sons are no longer vegetarians. "The oldest one began to eat meat first; he found it too hard to get enough to eat in the Army," says Dr. Popenoe philosophically.

During the five years he spent running his desert date ranch, Paul Popenoe wrote Modern Marriage, a handbook for men; The Conservation of the Family; and Problems of Human Reproduction. The first book was heralded as a "bold and daring book" and overnight became a sensation, winning its author a place in Who's Who in America.

The practical problems of running a ranch began to interfere with writing. So in 1926 the Popenoes moved to Alta... to the house where they still live, and Dr. Popenoe, who had been awarded an honorary degree from Occidental for his outstanding work in biology and genetics, began a study of the California sterilization program for mentally unfit for E. S. Gosney's Human Betterment Foundation. He continued to write scientific papers, college textbooks and spent several summers lecturing on family problems at Columbia University.

The idea of starting a marriage-counseling center was simmering in Dr. Popenoe's mind and in 1930 he succeeded in interesting Mr. Gosney in giving some financial help to start the American Institute of Family Relations. At that time both the divorce and separation rates in the U.S.A. were high. It was Dr. Popenoe's idea to bring together all the scientific help available to strengthen the family. At first he was the entire staff in one rented room in a Los Angeles office building.

Clients drifted in with discouraging slowness. "If a person's radio set or plumbing gets out of whack, he calls a repairman immediately," bemoans Dr. Popenoe. "But when marriage goes awry, for some reason he feels 'This is my problem and I should be able to handle it myself.' Usually, conditions go from bad to worse when with just a little competent outside help, a little redirection the majority of shaky marriages could be saved."

Right from the beginning, the institute was organized to give practical on-the-spot help to unhappy couples and also to educate the general public on family living through lectures, films and pamphlets. It is a non-profit operation, and according to one of the trustees, Dr. Popenoe's salary has been at a subsistence level always." During the depression, his salary stopped for four years; to keep going Dr. Popenoe took to the road six months of every year lecturing. During this time he lectured at 150 colleges and universities as well as churches, schools and clubs.

"During the 1930's there were few lecturers who talked about the problems of the mind and sex," recalls Dr. Popenoe. In place like Northern Utah, school buses picked up parents from a radius of twenty-five miles—even in blizzard weather—and brought them to school where they packed the rafters to hear Dr. Popenoe.

Although she seldom voiced her concern, there was one worry uppermost in her mind during those hard depression years. A tuberculosis spot had been discovered on her husband's lung; the same disease which had taken his father's life. The Popenoes told no one, not even close relatives. Paul Popenoe fought his battle back to health alone—with diet, and rest, and more rest, conserving every breath of energy for his lecture tours.

"Fortunately, Betty never faltered in her loyalty to the institute," Paul recalls. One day a big piece of plaster fell down from the ceiling on the dining-room table. We had no money for a new ceiling, so Betty just said 'Well, then, we just won't invite anybody to dinner,' and we didn't, for a whole year."

During their father's prolonged trips away from home, the Popenoe boys brought their mother Sunday breakfast in bed, and all four became tolerably good cooks. They divided up the yard chores, and washing the dishes and they made their own beds and hung up their clothes. "We won't do anything that you can do for us," said their father. He taught all four of them to drive a car, and as soon as the oldest boy got his license he was given the weekly grocery list. Once the boys got the car stuck in a culvert. Dr. Popenoe looked over the situation and then remarked, "We got you did it. Now get it out." Four hours later, with the help of planks and a jack and the neighboring kids, they did.

But when the boys really needed help, it was available. Once the phone rang at 4:00 A.M. It was David, the youngest boy, in tears at the newspaper office because his hand was swollen from a bee sting and he could not get the elastic bands around the morning papers he was supposed to deliver. His father hurried right down and worked until sunup rolling his son's papers.

Fresh Cream Deodorant lasts and lasts and lasts!

No wilting with wonderful Fresh . . . the cream deodorant with a "Perfect Balance" of gentleness and effectiveness. Fresh Cream pampers your delicate skin, yet protects you because it's a deodorant and an anti-perspirant, too!

there's nothing fresher than Fresh

nces Bruce Strain, well-known child rity and a close friend, says of the noe family life, "The ideology is new, but rinciples are old—co-operation, unity, se."
e four boys got their college educations
y through the G.I. Bill and part-time
All four of them are now in what their fa-lescribes happily as "socially constructive
." The oldest boy, Paul, Jr., or Pablo, was ed at thirty-three and has a year-old ter. A graduate of the University of rnia at Berkeley, he lives in San Fran-and is an electrical engineer. The second Oliver, went to Antioch. He now lives in getown near Washington, D.C., with his nd three children and has an important ith the Office of Civilian and Defense lization. The third son, John, is married.
hree daughters, and lives in Homestead, da. He holds a Ph.D. degree and is with niversity of Florida's experimental sta-or the breeding of tropical fruits.
e fourth son, David, twenty-seven, also ated from Antioch, and just recently
ed. He holds a master's degree in city ing and is now working for his Ph.D. e in the same field at the University of sylvania.
cording to a close friend, all four boys are y, but when Dr. Popenoe praised them it ever "You're so intelligent," but "That "things do not get better by being eft alone. Unless they are ad-usted, they explode with a shat-ering detonation.

SIR WINSTON CHURCHILL WORLD CRISIS
CHARLES SCRIBNER

good job you did." (The first remark enges vanity; the second promotes more jobs!)
w world-renowned in his field, Dr. Pop-has seen his institute grow from one room andsome building on Sunset Boulevard llywood with a staff of seventy. With the seling techniques he has developed by and error over the years, and a staff of cated idealists," the institute's rate of is phenomenally high.
cording to Dr. Donald Wilson, research tor, 30 per cent of the difficult cases of al discord the institute treats are success-adjusted, and 40 per cent of the average
. This is all the more remarkable when considers that the average client spends three or four hours in counseling. About n seven clients has problems complicated gh to require further counseling.
Nothing is more important to America
y than the preservation of a sound family believes Dr. Popenoe, with passionate iction. "It's been shown again and again juvenile delinquents come from unsatisry homes where the relationship between usband and wife is bad."
his own marriage, he says he's been cons of very few adjustments. "Betty," he , "has done me a world of good. Increased orizons no end."
e is pleased when his secretary, who les his newspaper-column mail, which to 2000 letters a month, tells him. "My and's glad I work for you. He says that a day of listening to you I'm so much anter to live with at home!"
. Popenoe still lectures frequently, but accompanies him on every trip. Last they made a five-month tour of Europe in all foreign car, studying marriage coun-g abroad, which is, generally speaking, nty-five years behind the United States."
e has learned to recognize the signs when vife becomes overtired or depressed and distracts her with an unexpected trip or lay. "She gets so excited over Christmas
I know in January she'll suffer a big own," explains the marriage expert. "A days in new surroundings and she's her l effervescent self again."
hrough Betty's enthusiasm for the theater as developed a great fondness for Shake-re, and their wedding anniversary is usually spent driving down to San Diego for the Shakespeare festival there. And everywhere they drive these days, Mrs. Popenoe keeps a sketch pad on her lap and draws her husband's profile for the bronze plaque she's planning to do of him. "It has to capture Paul's looks and spirit exactly," she maintains. "I keep trying and trying, but when it's someone so very, very close, well ——" She smiles. "When Paul and I were first married, I was disappointed that I couldn't find any poetry in him. But I did." She smiles her wonderfully warm smile again. "It's there."

When tuberculosis got Dr. Popenoe down and his physician ordered him to bed 100 hours a week, Betty would bring in a tray from which they both breakfasted. They still do. Although she occasionally hankers for a lamb chop, she sticks to her husband's vegetarian diet at home and retires and rises with him very early. Their entertaining is mostly limited to large family get-togethers and informal teas for the institute staff. Betty likes to invite the wives and children, too, which makes upwards of 150 people.

Many people have remarked on how Dr. Popenoe hands his wife into and out of cars as though she were a fragile piece of porcelain. ("Actually, I'm very tough," she says, "and never sick.") A former college classmate says, "When I first saw Betty Popenoe, so bright and gracious and lovely-looking, I asked myself how Paul won her from the competition He was never a ladies' man, ever."

In recent years the Popenoes celebrated one wedding anniversary with a reception for their friends in their garden. Dark-haired Betty Popenoe, the mother of four strapping sons, wore a white chiffon dress and looked, according to one guest who was there, "as young and radiant as a new bride." When the guest told her this, Betty turned to her husband with a smile brimming over with happiness and gave the reason. "Paul's been so wonderful," she explained. END

the lass with the Pendleton® air

It's an air of things happening—surprises, adventures! She's ready for them in our wonderful Black Stewart Tartan skirt, half-lined to hold its lean shape and hers, with a crisp back pleat that keeps her striding free. In four other stunning tartans, flannels, tweedy plaids . . . all this, plus the indisputable, non-duplicatable good looks of wool. Purest, softest, virgin wool. Pendleton wool. 12.95

Pendlefleece sweater: a color-cued, classically handsome pullover 13.95

Country clothes by Pendleton ALWAYS VIRGIN WOOL

In America's quality stores For descriptive Pendleton Sportswear literature write Department G60, Pendleton Woolen Mills • Portland 1, Oregon

Setting Directions for

GLAMOROUS HAIRDOS... SMOOTH AND FULL

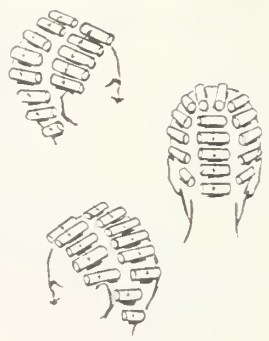
CONTINUED FROM PAGE 64

For smooth wide-waved arrangement: Set the top center hair on rollers, rolling away from the face and parallel to the hairline. These rollers, one behind another, go over crown and down the center of the back. Side sections are set on rollers, perpendicular to hairline, with the hair rolled under toward the scalp. One large forward pin curl goes on each side at ear level. Set back end hair in reverse pin curls.

For "comb out": Brush hair thoroughly, and part in the center. Allow slight rise in crown hair, and then brush hair on each side into large loose waves. Flatten hair at the temples and leave width at ears. Turn the ends under into wide-waved pageboy.

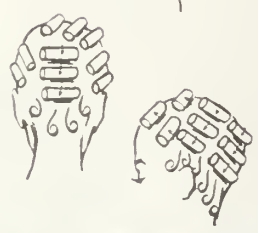
Smooth and sleek for fall: The length of the hair for this style varies from 5″ on the crown to 3″ at the forehead and ears to 2″ at the neckline. To set the center of the crown and back, place rollers parallel to hairline and roll hair away from face. On each side and perpendicular to top rollers, two sections of hair are rolled under toward the ears. The two side rollers in back are rolled toward the ears. Set ends of hair in forward pin curls.

For "comb out": Brush hair and part on side. To achieve fullness, lift hair with brush from underneath and then lightly go over the surface, curving side hair toward the front and back hair toward neck. Bang section can be brushed back or fall softly over forehead.



For this classic hairdo, the crown hair should be approximately 8″ long, the sides and back tapered to lengths between 2″ and 3″. Set the top center section on four rollers parallel to the hairline, rolling the hair away from face. Side hair turns under toward the ears—first roller is perpendicular to top rollers, the next two slope down toward the neck to make the soft wave coming toward the face. Place six rollers in back perpendicular to hairline. Roll the three on the left side toward left ear, the three on the right toward right ear. Use small rollers to turn ends of back hair under.

For "comb out": Brush hair away from face and tuck ends under. Then use brush lightly to pick up top hair on sides and bring forward. Top hair can be brushed back and a pretty ribbon added—or brushed down into a light, fluffy bang.



This young sophisticated hairdo is 8″ in length on the crown, tapering down to 3½″ at the neckline. Part the hair low on the right side. Using three rollers, perpendicular to hairline, turn the hair on the right side under toward scalp. The rest of the front hair should be rolled in the opposite direction. The second row of curlers is also set perpendicular to hairline—the ones on the right side below the part roll under toward the ear—all others go in opposite direction. In center back, roll hair under, parallel to hairline.

For "comb out": Brush hair up and over from the part. For full side waves, brush hair forward and under at the cheeks. Back turns under. Slight bang across forehead.

Set the front top section on five rollers, perpendicular to hairline, rolling hair toward the right side. Four rollers directly behind the first row go in same direction. On the right side, place three rollers perpendicular to the two rows of curlers, rolling the hair under and toward the ear. The two rows on left side also turn under toward the ear. In center back, use three rollers, parallel to the hairline, and turn hair under. Set ends of hair in forward pin curls.

For "comb out": Brush hair (from underneath) up and toward the face, flattening the hair on the sides and on the forehead. Swirl the top section. Hair length varies from 5″ on the crown to 3″ at the hairline.

Set on large rollers around the face, perpendicular to hairline. Bottom rollers on each side turn up, the next ones turn under. All others across crown are rolled in same direction. Roll hair on center crown away from face, and continue rollers down center back. Rollers on sides are placed perpendicular to front hairline and rolled under toward scalp. Ends of hair in back are set in reverse pin curls.

For "comb out": Brush hair in direction it was set, and then part it low on right side. Comb hair smoothly across the crown and into slight waves on each side at ear level. To hold front hair in place while combing the back, use clips behind the ears. Arrange lower back hair in French twist. To get height at back of crown, back-comb underneath hair. Brush top hair smoothly over this section. Loop ends over French twist.

IT'S NEW! THE AVON LIPSTICK in a rainbow range of shades

"AVON CALLING" with a lipstick miniature gift for you, and to show you THE Avon lipstick and the new fall shades.

It feels so good . . . creamy-moist, pampers as it colors. It clings . . . goes on like a charm, stays on beautifully. It holds a clear outline . . . doesn't feather or fade. It's everything you've ever wished for in a lipstick—it's THE Avon lipstick.
All shades have matching nail polish.

PLUS THREE DAZZLING FALL SHADES

FULL STOP—vibrant red that commands attention
FLASH PINK—pulsating pink charged with excitement
RUSSET RAGE—autumn tinged with Paris brown

©AVON cosmetics
NEW YORK • MONTREAL

AVON COSMETICS FOR ALL THE FAMILY ARE BROUGHT TO YOUR HOME BY YOUR AVON REPRESENTATIVE

ON A ROYAL HONEYMOON

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 51

or royal names, or anything other than "Pet" and "Sweet" and "My Love" for Margaret, and "Darling" for Tony.

They returned home bronzed from the Caribbean sunshine, with a profusion of freckles for Tony and three extra pounds for Margaret (who, conscious and proud of her tiny waist, dieted them off within a week).

They were different people inside as well, in their manner toward each other and toward others. Tony lifted his hand in greeting to crowds without the prompting he had needed from Margaret on their departure. He no longer walked in the shy-tense attitude he borrowed from Prince Philip (who does it from training, not nervousness)—hands clasped tightly behind his back. Instead, his arms swung freely and easily at his sides. He began to talk fluently and naturally even with people of high rank whom he had never met before. And Margaret, who with her quick wit and royal manner always has dominated and preferred to dominate any conversation, let Tony take the lead while she smiled quietly, watching him, or even let herself look away, unworried that he might be ill at ease among her friends and official circle.

The honeymoon was not entirely a smoothly running routine. Little unexpected, untoward things happened.

On the day they were to sail, crewmen of the royal yacht Britannia ran up a fresh new Union Jack especially ordered for the occasion. After frantic messaging from other ships they learned the flag had accidentally been sewed upside down to the halyard, in the traditional seagoing signal for distress. It was hastily hauled down and resewed.

At St. Johns, on the island of Antigua, they were greeted by three earthquakes which, though small, shook them slightly and churned the waters around the Britannia.

The minor mishaps only added a note of excitement and zest.

They let everybody at home know they were all right. Margaret radio-telephoned her mother, the Queen Mother Elizabeth, from the white telephone in her stateroom after they had been away a few days. Later on she talked to her sister, the reigning Queen Elizabeth. Antony—or Tony, as he is now known not only to his intimates but to all England—dispatched an airmail letter to his mother, the Countess of Rosse. But they sent no post cards to friends saying "Wish you were here."

They wanted, and to a surprising degree they achieved, the privacy which is a honeymoon couple's main desire.

It wasn't easy. Careful planning helped, and special appeals by Margaret. "Please," she asked the islanders, "think of this as an ordinary visit by any honeymoon couple."

To keep the route secret the Britannia sailed under sealed orders which were opened by the ship's captain, Vice Admiral Peter Dawnay, only after they were well out in the Atlantic. Shore stations which signaled the customary "Whither bound?" received the cryptic reply, "Destination unknown—high seas."

Still, a newspaper airplane followed the royal yacht until it was a day out to observe and took long-range photographs through a telescopic lens (Margaret was wearing a red sweater and red skirt, Tony a yachting-style jacket and white slacks, as they reclined on deck chairs).

A barbed-wire fence had to be strung up around the garden and grounds of the governor-general of Trinidad, with a cordon of guards assigned to see that the occasion was limited to a small party.

Police launches patrolled the waters outside the beautiful lagoon on the island of Tobago where the couple went ashore on three successive days, and authorities closed off the road to the beach-side cottage, "Honeymooners' Delight," so named by wealthy coconut-plantation owner Frank Latour, who built it for his daughter.

The royal yacht itself would hardly seem the ideal place to achieve a honeymoon atmosphere, with its populous complement of 22 officers and 236 sailors—and, in addition this trip, a Scotland Yard detective; Press Secretary Major Edward Griffin; Margaret's hairdresser from René of Mayfair, twenty-year-old Sylvia Davies; and Robina Gordon, who has been her nurse and personal maid since she was a year old. But it is. And that is the reason Elizabeth offered it to her sister and new brother-in-law at this time.

(The offer, in view of the $2800-a-day running expenses of the Britannia, caused Labor Party members to worry about the cost to the taxpayers, and London's Communist Daily Worker to report sarcastically, "The very dear couple sail . . . on their 40,000-pound honeymoon!" Actually the queen paid the entire cost herself as a wedding gift.)

Everything about the royal yacht is planned for privacy, luxury, comfort and convenience for the royal family such as they can find nowhere else in their everyday world of crowds, public functions, reporters and cameramen.

The Britannia is known as "the queen's water-borne country house." It is the largest and most expensive private yacht afloat.

It is also the quietest ship in the world.

There are no broadcast commands. Orders are communicated by gesture and sign language, never the spoken word unless absolutely necessary. Bulkheads are soundproof. The engine-room telegraph chimes softly instead of clanging.

The crewmen wear gym shoes so that their comings and goings will be as nearly silent as possible.

Aboard are 42 cabins for guests and staff in addition to the royal accommodations; a two-car garage; two high-speed launches; a royal barge with blue velvet seats.

The ship's dining room, which seats 32 comfortably, 60 with a little squeezing, has a parquet dance floor and can also be converted to a theater, with a movie screen concealed behind sliding panels.

There are facilities for deck games, a 50'x20' open-air swimming pool which was built for Margaret when she sailed on the Indian Ocean during her official East African tour in 1956.

The ship is entirely air-conditioned.

Royal accommodations are on the top deck over the other living quarters, in the aft part of the ship which, in wartime, when the sea

Britannia would be converted to a hospital ship, would provide space for a helicopter landing deck. The royal quarters are isolated from the rest of the upper deck by an arrangement of corridors.

The royal apartments were designed for Elizabeth and Philip and consist of a drawing room and two bed/sitting rooms with a communicating door, each with its own bath. They were redecorated for Margaret for Tony's honeymoon trip, with pale eggshell-blue walls and soft green silk draperies—Margaret's favorite shades and the ones she chose for her wedding china. The floors are covered with silvery-gray wall-to-wall carpeting. The furnishings, chosen by Elizabeth and Philip, are homey and comfortable-looking, a mixture of antique and modern mahogany.

In Philip's quarters—Tony's, for the honeymoon trip—is a hidden cocktail cabinet and a model of the frigate Magpie which Philip once commanded. In the drawing room is a baby-grand piano installed especially for Margaret. The rooms are softly lighted with concealed ceiling fixtures. Beyond is the gay sun deck. There, no one is allowed to go without special permission when any member of the royal family is on board, so royalty can sun-bathe and relax in complete privacy.

Like all royal servants and employees, officers and crewmen of the Britannia are pledged never to reveal anything seen or heard in the course of their duties, but this does not prevent

CONTINUED ON PAGE 0

RHYMES FROM YOUNG MOTHER GOOSE

By C. S. JENNISON

Come when you're called,
Do as you're bid.
And one thing I'm sure of:
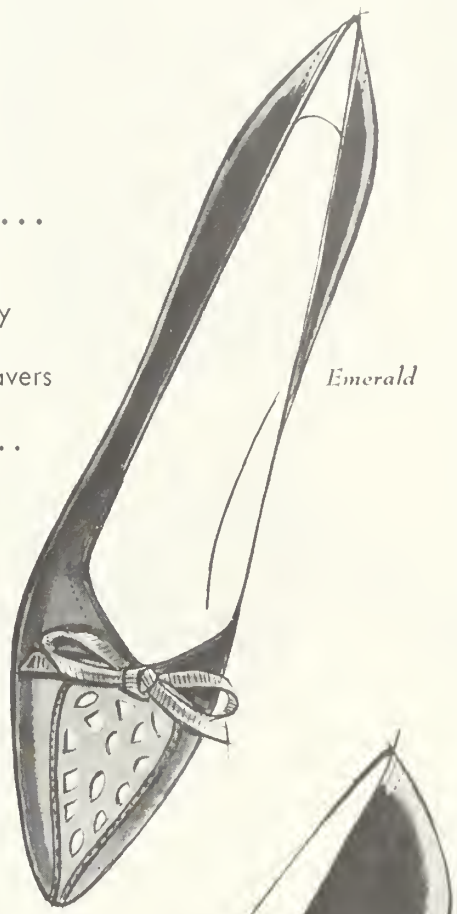
You're not my kid.

Hot cross buns,
Hot cross buns.
Don't tell me daughters
Are quieter than sons.
Little sisters argue,
Just the same as brothers,
And all of them offend the ears
Of hot cross mothers.



Hickery dickery dare.
The pig flew up in the air;
And lately—by heaven—
Along about seven
I usually join him there.

it's smart to be comfortable . . .

and comfort and smartness are basic ingredients in every pair of Foot Saver Shoes. Fashioned with care, Foot Savers offer the wondrous fit of the famed Shortback® last . . . styles that skillfully combine walking ease and flattering design.

For free Fall Style Folder and name of nearest dealer, write:
Julian & Kokenge Company,
39 West Cherry Street,
Columbus, Ohio

Foot Saver SHOES

Emerald

Miracle

Foot Saver's exclusive Shortback® last assures snug heel fit yet permits caressing foot freedom.

Most styles 19.95 to 22.95 a few slightly higher

Climax

Footsaver Shoes for men are manufactured by Commonwealth Shoe and Leather Co., Whitman, Mass.

Every woman knows Long Distance is just about the nicest way to keep in touch. With family . . . with friends . . . with everybody. You can tell all about you—hear all about them. Just pick up your phone and you're off on a delightful visit!

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM Keep in touch by Long Distance

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 128

the honeymooners from telling their friends.

For the honeymoon cruise, the royal yacht received four coats of fresh royal-blue paint on its gold-banded hull, leaving it so shiny it gleamed with the play of reflected light from the water's surface.

The hold was stowed with caviar and champagne and other delicacies—live lobsters in a special tank (Margaret's favorite foods are lobster, soufflés, chicken and peaches). They took along three films: The Vikings, Sink the Bismarck and a twelve-minute reel especially requested by Margaret—Princess Margaret, This is Your Life, a compilation of incidents covering her life from babyhood. Four big cases of Margaret's and Tony's favorite phonograph records went aboard—not, however, including an antiseasickness recording offered by a London hypnotist for the cruise (Margaret is an excellent sailor; Tony a fair one, but a pill is usually enough to restore him from a touch of mal de mer).

Both took new clothes: sweaters, wool skirts and slacks for brisk days, light sports clothes and swim suits for hot ones—the usual royal daytime shipboard wear; dinner clothes, because the royal family always dress for dinner; and a few more elaborate dress-up outfits for grand occasions.

Margaret took along five swim suits, all one-piece—Tony's and her favorite, a coral-red one. Besides her trousseau, she also took along some cottons she wore last year, as well as several outfits from the wardrobe made for her West Indies tour two years ago. Having been to the Caribbean on official jaunts in 1955 and 1958, she knew exactly what she needed.

No shorts or trousers—she considers herself two small for them. Instead, sun tops and full cotton skirts, or one-piece dresses along similar lines, strapless always—for ship and beach wear—no complicated strap arrangements to interfere with a smooth tan line. Several outfits had short matching jackets.

Tony did not help choose any of her new clothes, even though she considers him knowledgeable about women's fashion. She wanted him to be "a little surprised. I want them to seem new and exciting to him," she told a friend, "not like something he's already seen." She discussed them with him, though.

Five of her dinner dresses were from French designer Jean Desses, including a pink-and-yellow rose-printed organza shirtwaist with back-dipping skirt, which she wore the second night out; a navy organza with white polka-dot embroidery and matching coat; and a grand floor-length white organza ball gown, in which she appeared, wearing diamond earrings and pearls, at a Government House entertainment in Antigua. Two afternoon dresses were from Christian Dior—a navy-blue silk, and another in melon-pink satin with matching coat. From Victor Stiebel came a gray raw-silk frock and the eye-stopping lemon-yellow coat and matching chiffon dress she wore for her going-away outfit.

Her lingerie was of hand-woven white pure silk crepe de Chine loomed in Britain and embroidered and fashioned for her by Madame Mimi Isar of Belgravia.

Tony chose some of his clothes on personal shopping trips in Mayfair, others from selections brought to him at Buckingham Palace by representatives of exclusive West End shops. Most of them were about the same as he would have worn for one of the Mediterranean holidays of his bachelor days, except for more formal going-ashore wear.

It was Tony's frequent bachelor holidays in and around the Mediterranean that prompted him to suggest Italy first as a possible honeymoon spot. But Margaret remembered the islands of the Caribbean with their relaxed people, gay, uninhibited calypso music and dancers, and the drenching sunlight—all so different from England and everything she had known for most of her life—and convinced Tony. ("Oh, to be able to come back here," she said wistfully on her departure before—"not as a princess but just to enjoy myself!")

Their honeymoon departure was tumultuous. After they had waved a last greeting to the crowd from the Buckingham Palace balcony where Margaret for the first and last time in her life stood in front of her sister, the queen (her excitement was such that she forgot to curtsy to her), and cut a wedding cake weighing more than she does (150 pounds, one of twelve) Margaret changed into the dazzling yellow outfit she wore to the Britannia.

Upstairs, she said a private farewell to her mother and Elizabeth, and to her dogs, the Sealyhams Pippin and Johnny (who bit a palace footman last winter), and her King Charles spaniel, Roly, telling them, "Be good boys while I'm away!"

Then she dashed, holding Tony's hand, for the waiting open Rolls-Royce in the graveled palace courtyard, pelted with rose petals by members of the royal family and friends.

No one had anticipated the tremendous crowd farewell. The drive to the pier, timed for fifteen minutes, took almost an hour. Along the four-mile flag- and flower-bedecked route, people fought for a chance to look at the couple. At one point five minutes were required to travel 150 yards. Finally police formed a phalanx around the car and forced a way through the crowd. Margaret and Tony appeared delighted and amazed by the spontaneous public reaction.

Both were covered with rose petals and confetti by the time they arrived at the red-carpeted dockside to catch the royal launch out to the glistening Britannia. The din from ships' whistles was almost deafening. As the yacht got under way, Margaret brushed petals off Tony's shoulder, and they waved. They stood by the rail, waving, until the Britannia finally drew out of view.

The first night out they excused themselves from dinner with the ship's officers so they could dine alone together in the seclusion of their suite. Both were happy but on the point of exhaustion from the strenuous day and departure. They did not even change clothes, though royal custom is to dress for dinn they did dress every other night of the v

A steward served them champagn caviar, broiled chicken, a light dessert o and black coffee. They listened to r music from records they selected and the phonograph.

For the first five days and evening were completely alone, except for ra brief visits when Robina Gordon, Mar personal maid, attended her, and a s served their meals.

They swam in the open-air pool, sun-b played quoits and deck tennis. Both easily and quickly with the aid of a pr tion to prevent burning. Margaret tu smooth golden bronze, Tony deep brow freckles.

They breakfasted in Margaret's room, had lunch and dinner in the suite and took tea on deck at half past four.
was customarily at one-fifteen; dinner a after cocktails. Tony wore a black jacket in the evenings at first, a whit after the boat entered sunnier climes.

After dinner they danced on deck to r
by Frank Sinatra, Nat "King" Cole and American orchestras. Margaret play piano, and both sang and imitated p singers, a knack they have practiced un are proficient. They joked with each about imaginary shortcomings and ences, and laughed a great deal—a ter they have always had when together, a of their first strong mutual attractions.

Occasionally after the first week th cocktails in the wardroom with the officers, and several times during the tr invited the officers to dine with them white-and-gold dining room with mus vided by the Royal Marine Band (thou invitation, it was felt, came later in the than it would have from Elizabeth and Sunday church services were held o for the officers and crew by Vice A Dawnay, and Margaret and Tony atter members of the royal family always d on board.

They frequently "dressed together"— garet in a blue-and-white dress and Tony in a blue-and-white striped sh slacks of the exact same blue; she in a yellow flower-printed cotton dress, h matching yellow shirt and coffee-brown

In the early morning hours of May Britannia dropped anchor off Pigeon Pc the island of Tobago—a point just northwestern tip of "Robinson C Island," identified by local tradition spot where Daniel Defoe's fictional her his castaway existence. (This is romar incorrect; actually Alexander Selkir Scottish seaman who inspired Defoe's was marooned in the Juan Fernandez about 400 miles off the Chilean coast Pacific Ocean.)

A choppy sea prevented use of the nia's gangplank to a pier, so later that n
Margaret and Tony, carrying picnic and swimming gear, were lowered in on yacht's launches to go ashore at Golder beach. There they had a picnic lunch al afterward changed into swim suits an boled with a large beach ball in the crystal waters of a secluded lagoon. La went swimming and skindiving for an Buccoo Reef, famed for its underwater and rare and beautiful fish.

For three days the road to the bea officially closed and police launches p outside the lagoon so they could ha plete privacy. They basked, walked shod and barefoot on white sands, pic pieces of driftwood and coral, took s motion pictures of each other, and r to the Britannia at night. On May 20 t Tobago, and six hours later arrived of-Spain, Trinidad.

At Port-of-Spain some 100,000 peo had dubbed Margaret "The Calypso P and composed 24 calypsos in her hono her 1958 trip jammed the five miles often completely closing it. School c given a "free" day, were turned out best, most colorful attire. The crow

CONTINUED ON PA

NEXT MONTH

Does a man—any man—have a right to buy the house next door?

He was scared—they all were. Was it Negroes as such? A primitive, atavistic feeling about "color"? Or was it that the little community, already so heavily taxed, mortgaged, and dunned for dental work, dancing classes, washing machines, power mowers, cars, country clubs and commutation tickets, just could not afford to pick up the bill for Civil Rights too? "What's the answer?" Matt agonized, "why do I have to decide?" "Peaceable Lane," Keith Wheeler's complete-in-one-issue condensed novel, will rattle the cups at your coffee table wher*ever* you live.

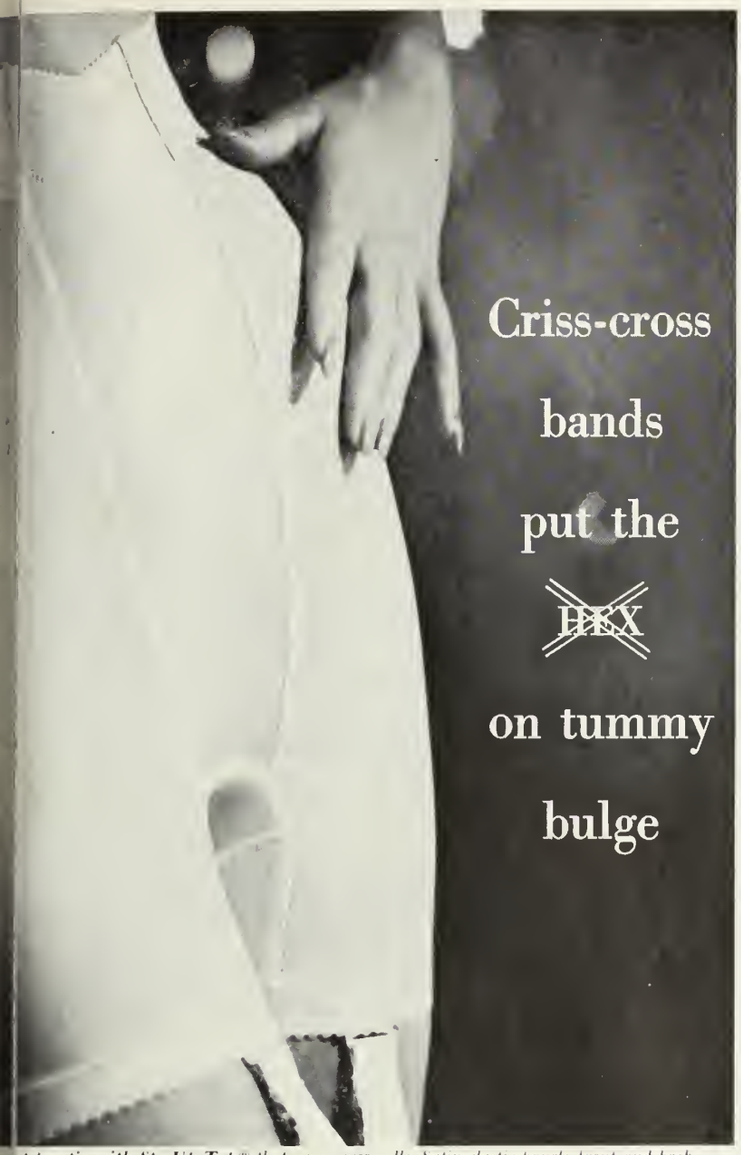
Where are all the bachelors?

Statistics reassure that there are still almost two million more unattached American men between the ages of 20 and 40 than there are girls to marry them. This doesn't seem possible to you? Maybe your town is not in one of the areas that attract marriage-worthy fellows. Never mind: in the October Journal we tell where the men are.

New information on the cancer "smear" test

It hasn't been so long since doctors thought that you either had cancer or you didn't. Now your Papanicolaou "smear" test can be graded more accurately. Dr. Schauffler explains how important recent findings are in "Tell Me, Doctor."

Do the Russians have some magic secrets of child rearing?



Over and over again, travelers returning from Russia comment upon the friendly, co-operative, good behavior of Russian children. Anything here we ought to know about? World-famous Dr. Benjamin Spock gives his answer.

The Cookbook

It's here at last. You who have lovingly saved old Journal recipes as lacy with age as grandmother's wedding veil—relax. And you who come to us by way of postage stamp with frantic pleas for the recipe, clipped and then lost—preserve yourselves in peace. The recipe, even if it goes back eighty years, will be in The Cookbook. Ladies' Home Journal Cookbook is a harvest table piled bounteously with the best dishes America has ever known. You'll find a generous taste in this issue.

Also, "Making Marriage Work"; Pat Boone on "Teen-Time Billionaires"; exciting fashion news; inspiring beauty help; stories; poems; and everything else for women in

THE OCTOBER JOURNAL

...t panie with Sta-Up-Top® that never ever rolls. Satin elastic panels front and back. (rayon-nylon-rubber-cotton). Red Pepper, Beige, Pink, Blue, White, Black. $8.95.

Once girls had tummies... then Warner's created 'DOUBLE PLAY'

And there's a style to make every body beautiful! Choose the light and lovely-making one that slims you best—here or on the next page. Then tear it out (we've even perforated the paper for you)...and take it to your nicest store. You'll love your new figure in your new 'Double Play'.

TEAR HERE

Easy panty brief in power net and satin elastic, #133 (rayon-nylon-rubber-cotton). Red Pepper, Beige, Pink, Blue, Black, White (packaged, too!) $5.95. Allure bra in matching colors, #1045. $3.95.

CUT OR TEAR HERE

PERFORATED

TEAR HERE

Power net pantie with extra firm hip control. Panels of slimming satin elastic over hips, tummy and derriere, where you need them most. #164 (rayon-nylon-cotton-rubber). In White only, $8.95.

CUT OR TEAR HERE

PERFORATED

Hip-and-thigh-slimming pantie with eased waist ... for the most effective, comfortable re-shaping you've ever known. #533. Power net and satin elastic (rayon-nylon-rubber-cotton). White only, $10.00.

High-rising girdle trims waist and midriff, #814. Exclusive 'LeNet' (sheer leno) with satin elastic front and back (rayon-rubber-cotton). Zipper. White, $12.50. Matching pantie, #815, $13.50.

Best-selling 'Double Play' girdle. Power net with satin elastic panels (rayon-nylon-cotton-rubber) #147. Red Pepper, Beige, Pink, Blue, White and Black. $8.95. Matching Allure bra, #1045, $3.95.

All-elastic 'Double Play' corselette with Free-Lift® floating bra designed to relieve any shoulder strap strain. #3706. (Nylon cups. Elastic: rayon nylon-rubber-cotton). White or Black, $15.00.

Whether you're 18 or "over 21"... tummy muscles often plain don't do the job they should! Lack of exercise, too many calories, even poor posture can be the villain!

But now there's a wonderful way to end tummy bulge once and for all—with Warner's® 'Double Play', the light-weight wonder whose famous criss-cross bands make your tummy behave beautifully—always. Whichever style you choose, you'll find that...

Nothing makes a tummy disappear like 'DOUBLE PLAY' by Warner's

And there's one that's made for your figure. Tear out—along perforated line—the one that suits you best and take it to your nicest store today! Prices start at $5.95*...even for colors!

*Slightly higher in Canada

Are you lucky? Watch your local newspaper for store ads announcing 'Double Play' contest in your town. Nothing to buy—just be lucky. (Hint: this Journal ad you're looking at will help you win a free gift.)

New and Young from Warner's

New! Warner Wash! Gives professional washing care to girdles, bras, lingerie, woolens. Prolongs their life, preserves their looks. It's Warner's gentle-formula cold water soap. Get Warner Wash where you buy your Warner's. $1.50 for 10 full ounces.

ED FROM PAGE 130

umbrellas to protect against the n, tossed flowers, waved, cheered, lanced to rhythms from a Dixieland
, and hung from every pole and bale Margaret and Tony—Margaret in wered dress with white gloves and a l pearl necklace, Tony in a gray uit—held hands in the back of their and waved, and grinned alternately her and at the happy people.
the official residence of the governor took two hours to clear the milling ay from the gates, and then most of drew to the park opposite the house d dance under the trees and await e's departure.
fternoon the couple visited and l walked in the cool gardens, but the official residence was ablaze
s, and outside dozens of lanterns n the palms and flowering trees. A dined alfresco and then danced to nd, which Margaret had especially Later there was other entertainypso singers and a vivid native dance argaret and Tony demonstrated the enthusiastic informality, breaking oyal protocol, that captivated the the island on Margaret's previous garet spoke personally with meme dance group after their performile she congratulated them an im-

magic of first love is our igno-e that it can ever end.

DISRAELI

itive woman, the troupe's dresser, rom the side lines, shyly. Finally she longer hold back and rushed up, lump hand through the others and ut, "I'm Helen Chance."
et took her hand and smiled de-
"How nice of you to come—we both so much," she said.
who often has been self-conscious ncing because of a polio-weakened orgot his diffidence and took off his tie to try to follow a native dance, Ting.
ally went native!" said pianist Gery
"He really has taken to this rhythm."
l man in feathered native costume mask to reveal part of his face.
erybody in the room recognized Bob t seventy the best "devil dancer" on
d.
l Margaret. "Hello," she said. "I t would be you, Mr. Wilkie."
d man beamed.
ominica, mountainous and fertile,
f the Windward Islands discovered nbus in 1493, they received a similar despite Margaret's plea to treat them ordinary honeymoon couple." The ere spread with tablecloths, blankets hes, in the native tradition for im-welcomes. Margaret and Tony were nned, and Margaret had had a hair-appeared as Londoners never have nd probably never will—bareheaded,
-shouldered strapless peasant dress,
curly and tousled, her smile comappy and relaxed. A straw-hatted oman reached into the car and thrust et of wild flowers into her hand, and ngly carried it the rest of the journey.
oys in dark brown shorts and heavily white shirts stood in various attitudes tion, a sight Margaret found so g she nudged Tony to draw his atten-hem. Tony gave them a special wave ulled up in a ragged—but energetic—he native crowds almost covered the imes as it inched along the narrow ut Margaret and Tony smiled hapdidn't seem to mind. A banner hastily oss the street—there had been only a rs' notice of the princess's visit—a lopsided "Welcome to her Royal s."

At Antigua they arrived during a triple earthquake—minor and causing no damage, although it roiled the water around the Britannia. There again they received a rousing welcome, but later they were able to be alone as they inspected and photographed historic St. Peter's Church in the outskirts of St. Johns. They viewed coral reefs from a glass-bottomed boat, and had a barbecue supper and Antigua rum punch at the home of Rear Admiral Earl Gould, USN (Ret.), before returning to ship.

Most of the time they managed to get off by themselves for at least part of the afternoons, to walk in lush tropical gardens, investigate historic ruins, stroll along wide beaches marked only by the tides, and even, several times, shop in native markets for exotic fruits and curios.

Everywhere in the islands they were greeted by steel bands, and often they heard the special song composed for their wedding by top Trinidad calypso singer "Lord Brynner":

Are you ready for the ceremony Between Maggie and Jonesy?
Maggie waited very long,
Then came Mister Armstrong.
It was never too late
Because best things come to them who wait.

I'm sorry I have no money
See you and Jonesy get marry,
But if someone lend me currency
I comin' England in hurry.
Princess I sorry I miss wedding,
But I got a calypso in
For the christenin'.

On June 5 they attended Whitsunday services in St. John's Cathedral on Antigua, and the Anglican Bishop of Antigua held private Communion services for them aboard the Britannia. On June 8 they weighed anchor in English Harbor and sailed for home that night while a steel band played the romantic Where Land and Sea Make Beauty.

When the royal yacht steamed up to Portsmouth after more than 8000 miles and six weeks away, Englanders saw a princess who looked "just like the old happy Margaret of a few years ago," said Mrs. Jean Band, of Ilkeston, who waited five hours to see them and ducked under a cigarette counter to get a closer look.

For Margaret and Tony both it had been a perfect holiday and honeymoon—and for Margaret, something she had never had before in her life: a time when she was completely free and independent to enjoy herself exactly as she wished. Always before on any trip there had been ladies in waiting, equerry, secretary and a retinue of others in attendance; and even when sharing a vacation trip with other members of the royal family, an itinerary of someone else's choosing.

This had been hers—and royal only in the way that has always been typically Margaret's: in the grand manner, but unconventional as royal honeymoons go, and as different from royal ideas as her choice of a husband. By contrast, Elizabeth and Philip followed the traditional pattern of "royals" for honeymoons: a sojourn first at a large country mansion. then on to a small house on another royal estate, walking, riding, driving around the countryside in a small car, reading, watching television, seeing a few old friends toward the latter part of the time, everything simple, quiet and correctly dignified. The difference could be illustrated no better than by a comparison of pictures: Elizabeth and Philip in tweed suits and sturdy walking shoes; Margaret and Tony in their gaily informal and colorful West Indian attire. Or Margaret as she appeared when she came back.

She was vividly dressed in a rose satin duster over a rose-flowered print dress, on her head a halo of gauzy white tulle scattered with tiny white bows, both colors in dramatic contrast to a tan so deep her natural-colored nail polish appeared almost white. Tony wore a pin-striped suit and red tie, his blond hair bleached almost white by the West Indies sun.

Except for doorways or places only wide enough for one to pass gracefully, they walked side by side together, instead of Tony several paces behind as he had when they left.

A short time later on the drive from a family reunion at Windsor Castle to their own new tax- and rent-free "grace and favor" home in Kensington Palace (a gift for life from the queen), Tony leaned forward and asked the chauffeur to stop and change places. Then, with Margaret beside him and the chauffeur in the back seat, he himself drove the rest of the way—the first time he had driven a car since the stunning announcement of his engagement to Margaret.

At Kensington Palace they inspected the decorating that had been going on in their absence in the red-brick Georgian palace "apartment" (actually a small house). Everything was progressing on schedule. Then they looked next door at the City of London Museum, which is open to the public the year around, and through their front gate to Kensington Gardens, also open to peering crowds—and they remembered the deserted beaches of the Caribbean. Nothing will ever be the same for either again. Certainly not Kensington Gardens, of which the story is told that George III, wishing, perhaps like Margaret and Tony, to have a little of the gardens just for himself, asked a minister how much it would cost to fence it in from the public. "Your crown, sir," he was told.

END

The Opposite Sex and Your Perspiration

Q. Do you know there are two kinds of perspiration?

A. It's true! One is "physical," caused by work or exertion; the other is "nervous," stimulated by emotion. It's the kind that comes in those moments when you are tense or emotionally excited.

Q. Which perspiration is the worst offender?

A. The "emotional" kind. Doctors say it's the big offender in underarm stains and odor. This perspiration comes from bigger, more powerful glands—and it causes the most offensive odor.

Q. How can you overcome this "emotional" perspiration?

A. Science says a deodorant needs a special ingredient specifically formulated to overcome this emotional perspiration without irritation. And now it's here... exclusive Perstop*. So effective, yet so gentle.

Q. Why is ARRID CREAM America's most effective deodorant?

A. Because of Perstop*, the most remarkable anti-perspirant ever developed, ARRID CREAM Deodorant safely stops perspiration stains and odor without irritation to normal skin. Saves your pretty dresses from "Dress Rot."

Why be only Half Safe? use Arrid to be sure!

It's more effective than any cream, twice as effective as any roll-on or spray tested! Used daily, new antiseptic ARRID with Perstop* actually stops underarm dress stains, stops "Dress Rot," stops perspiration odor completely for 24 hours. Get ARRID CREAM Deodorant today.

49¢ plus tax.

*Carter Products trademark for sulfonated hydrocarbon surfactants

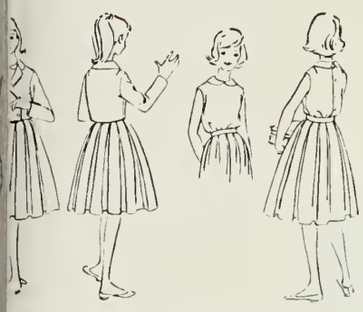
PARIS ORIGINAL MODEL BY NINA RICCI—VOGUE PATTERN NO. 1499

What is zig-zag sewing?

It's what lets a woman breezily pick a designer pattern with "complicated insides." (Zig-zag snips hours off tedious finishing and facings.)

Zig-zag is how you sew smoother seams in drapes, believe it or not . . . and give Johnny's corduroy shirt a new elbow that doesn't stick out like a sore thumb.

It's the modern way to sew on buttons, and add years to the life of every seam. It's what the SLANT-O-MATIC* Machine by SINGER (with its exclusive Slant-Needle) does easier—and better—than any other machine. Why don't you come in and find out about this exciting zig-zag way to sew?



SINGER SEWING CENTERS

Also headquarters for SINGER* Vacuum Cleaners, Rug Cleaner-Floor Polishers Listed in your phone book under SINGER SEWING MACHINE COMPANY

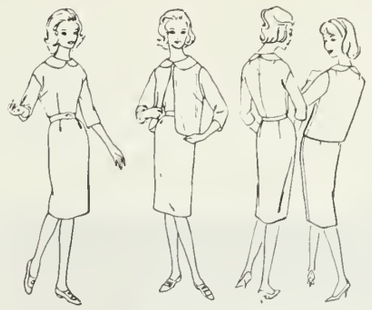
*A TRADEMARK OF THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY

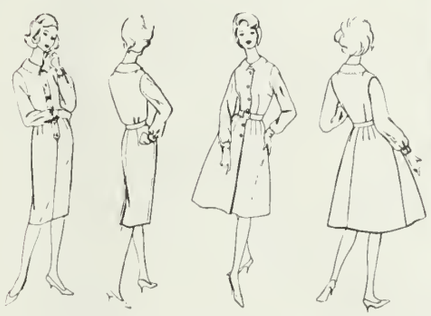
6 MILLION TEEN AGERS LOVE TO SEW



Other views, sizes and prices of Vogue Printed Patterns on pages 60, 61, 62 and 63.

Design No. 5080. Suit and blouse; ·en sizes 8–14 (28–33); 75c. Version requires 2¾ yards of 54″ fabric ıt nap for jacket, 1⅜ yards of 45″ without nap for blouse and 1 yard fabric without nap for skirt, size 12 ·en.

Vogue Design No. 5071. "Easy to Make" one-piece dress or jumper dress and skirt; Teen sizes 10–16 (30–36) and Junior Miss sizes 9–15 (30½–35); 75c. Version shown requires 1⅞ yards of 54″ fabric with nap and 4 yards 1″ novelty braid trim. Size 13 Junior Miss.



Vogue Design No. 5084. Blouse, skirt and jacket; Teen sizes 10–16 (30–36) and Junior Miss sizes 9–15 (30½–35); 75c. Version shown requires 1⅞ yards of 35″ fabric with nap and 3½ yards of 1″ novelty braid for jacket, 1¾ yards of 35″ fabric without nap for blouse and 1⅜ yards of 45″ fabric without nap for skirt, size 13, Junior Miss.

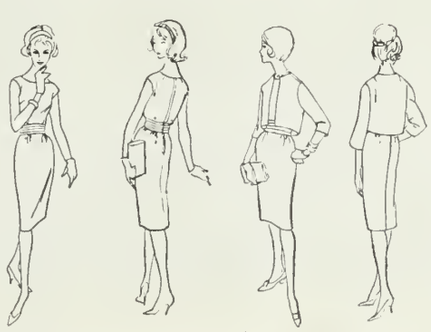
Design No. 5072. Shirt, skirt cket; Sub-Teen sizes 8–14 (28–5c. Version shown requires 3⅜ of 45″ fabric without nap for and skirt and 2⅛ yards of 35″ without nap for shirt, size 12 ·en.

Vogue Design No. 5062. One-piece dress or jumper dress and blouse; Junior Miss sizes 9–15 (30½–35) and Misses sizes 10–16 (31–36); 75c. Version shown requires 2 yards of 54″ fabric without nap for jumper dress, 1¼ yards of 54″ fabric without nap for blouse and 6 yards of 1″ novelty braid trim, Misses size 14.

Vogue Design No. 5077. One-piece dress and jumper dress; Misses sizes 10–18 (31–38); $1.00. Version shown requires 3½ yards of 35″ fabric with nap for jumper dress and 3½ yards of 35″ fabric without nap for dress, Misses size 14. (Note: Dress is worn under jumper dress.)

Design No. 5092. Two-piece dress and ; Misses sizes 10–16 (31–36); $1.00. n shown requires 1½ yards of 54″ fabric ap for blouse, 1 yard of 54″ fabric with-ap for skirt and ¾ yard of 54″ fabric ıt nap for dickey, Misses size 14.

Vogue Design No. 5003. One-piece dress and petticoat; Sub-Teen sizes 8–14 (28–33); 60c. Version shown requires 4⅜ yards of 35″ fabric with nap for dress and 5¾ yards lace edging for trim, size 12 Sub-Teen.



Vogue Design No. 5015. Bodice, shirt, skirt and detachable overskirt; Sub-Teen sizes 8–14 (28–33); 75c. Version shown requires 3¾ yards of 45″ fabric without nap or 4⅜ yards of 35″ fabric with nap for bodice and skirt and 4⅛ yards of 35″ embroidered fabric with one scalloped edge for overskirt, size 12 Sub-Teen.

Design No. 5067. One-piece dress; sizes 10–16 (30–36) and Junior Miss)–15 (30½–35); 75c. Version shown es 2¾ yards of 54″ fabric without ize 13 Junior Miss.

Vogue Design No. 5004. One-piece dress; Sub-Teen sizes 8–14 (28–33); 60c. Version shown requires 4⅜ yards of 35″ fabric with nap, size 12 Sub-Teen.

Vogue Design No. 5103. "Easy to Make" one-piece dress and bolero; Teen sizes 10–14 (30–34) and Junior Miss sizes 9–13 (30½–33); $1.00. Version shown requires 1¾ yards of 54″ fabric without nap for dress and 1⅛ yards of 54″ fabric with nap for bolero, size 13 Junior Miss.

New Curity®

S-T-R-E-T-C-H WEAVE GAUZE

DIAPERS

MORE ABSORBENT
for maximum protection

STRETCHABILITY
renews itself with each washing

BETTER FIT
for all size babies

EASIER PINNING
overlaps easily—the stretch does it!

NO BINDING
expands with baby's tummy

LESS BULK
more comfortable, streamlined size

Curity washes softer, smoother in quality products like Ivory Snow, Ivory Flakes or Dash Detergent. Don't forget Curity dress-up diapers and double duty night diapers, too. At leading stores and diaper services.

All Curity Diapers
DRY FASTER
WASH EASIER ABSORB MORE WEAR LONGER

THE KENDALL COMPANY
Textile Division, Walpole, Mass., Dept. JB90
Enclosed is 25c (coins only) for a new Curity Stretch Weave Gauze Diaper. Print clearly. Only one to a family.
Name_____
Address_____
City_____ State_____
Good in Continental United States and Hawaii

ECHO ANSWERS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 48

different. And I'm going to give her a little money, a kind of financial backlog, as soon as I get around to it.

But Belinda is twenty-one—twenty-two; is it possible? Her mother was married at that age. So was I the first time.

"Oh, here we are ——"

The driver pulled her luggage out of the trunk and the doorman took the alligator dressing case into his personal custody at once, his welcome and respect proportioned to her expensive bags and long mink coat.

"Oh, they've given me Sixteen-eighteen?"

"It's one of our very best suites, Mrs. Tarrant."

"I know."

"It's just been done over," the bellboy told her.

Clare went through the little foyer. Done over it might be, but there was still the effect of space as a tribute to wealth, of more dignity and privacy than most people were allowed in a hotel. It was old-fashioned luxury. That was what Jerome had liked about it.

My hair's gray— Now, I love it that way!

There's a bright holiday ahead for even the dullest gray hair with Come Alive Gray, Clairol's new miracle rinse! Takes just 2 to 5 minutes to rinse in glowing gray color that stays true till your next shampoo. To add youthful radiance, banish unsightly yellow—without purple or blue. Hair is shining, silky gray—easy to manage, in fine condition! So rinse in new sparkle with Come Alive Gray®. You'll love it that way! At cosmetic counters and beauty salons.

Free offer! Send for new booklet—"10 Questions Most Asked By Women With Gray Hair." Write Dept. HJ-2, Clairol Incorporated, 666 Fifth Ave., N. Y. 19, N. Y.

Four Glamorous Shades—One Just For You!

White Sapphire®. . . adds a brilliant pearly glow to white and almost-white hair.

Silver Diamond®. . . polishes white and gray to gleaming silver.

Black Pearl®. . . adds sparkle as it evens tones of salt-and-pepper gray.

Midnight Opal®. . . adds lustre as it conceals gray with rich, smoky tones.

COME ALIVE GRAY

Made by CLAIROL, world leader in hair cosmetics

©1959 Clairol Incorporated, Stamford, Conn.

She thought, The room needs flowers. I'll have to buy them for myself now. It might have made more sense for me to take a bedroom at the club. But this was our place. Empty as it feels, I'd rather be here. How often did we have these rooms? The first time was just after we were married.

That first time Jerome Tarrant had closed the door on two satisfied porters and said, "Is this going to be all right?"

"Darling, you're going to turn my head. This is fabulous. What does it cost?"

"Never you mind."

"Is that big white article really a grand piano?"

"Looks like it."

"Then I'll have to take music lessons."

He laughed. He said, "The only lessons you need are in being a wife."

"Am I doing so badly?"

"Not too badly. But I can't seem to make you realize that you have a man to take care of you now."

"I know. I'm so used to doing things for myself and figuring the expense. When you signed the register for us both downstairs—it's still hard to believe."

"You don't know how proud I was when I wrote 'Mr. and Mrs. Tarrant,' with you there beside me. Tell me, you like to be my wife, don't you?"

He was a big man, but when emotion came over him his hands would tremble. As he held her close they became quiet and firm again. When he was reassured that she was happy, there was a foundation under everything. Jerome began to give his attention to details.

"Now we have to get organized," he said.

"The organization man," said Clare. "Look—there are pigeons outside."

"Don't fall out of that window!"

"I think they're good luck."

"Shall I wear a blue or a gray suit down to the city? Which would you like me in best?"

She said gray, not that it mattered. But Jerome wanted to do everything now in the full light of her agreement and approval.

"Are you going to abandon me?"

"You'll want to rest. And I think I should get in touch with some of our people. They know I'm going to be here and they'll want to hear the details about the new power plant. And I have to get my girl some flowers."

The first consignment came within half an hour after he left. By noon the room bloomed with white chrysanthemums, yellow roses, several dozen white carnations—he wanted to wear one in his buttonhole usually—a pot of gardenias, heavy-headed anemones which had caught his attention and so he wanted Clare to see them too, and of course a perfect white orchid for her to wear that evening. Clare arranged and rearranged them. It was more fun than unpacking. Also, she read the messages that came with the flowers and each card sent her thoughts over their long and rugged love.

With the white orchid, "For Clare, who becomes more beautiful every day—wear this with my love. JEROME." The card with the gardenias read simply and ridiculously at the moment, "Don't forget me, JEROME."

That was an intimate phrase between them, the password of hope. They had used it often during the years of frustration. Clare felt the insistence of the words again. She was a bride of only a few weeks, a woman well into her middle years. No one had ever been better served by love, she thought.

It was very peaceful in the luxurious room. She hung up her clothes in one of the vast wardrobes, treating them with the same respect and care that she had given them when a good dress was a gamble or an important investment. Her own serenity surprised her this morning. Clare had been slightly apprehensive about this first return to New York as Mrs. Jerome Tarrant. She was pleased to find that she did not feel either restless or uncomfortably idle. She did not even want to call up Claude Gregory, to whom she had sold her literary agency, and ask him how things were going.

The Delchamp Agency, which her first husband had established and which Clare had continued with such success after his d th did not belong to her any more. Tha ull seemed strange, but she had no twinge o os- talgia or regret. She was no longer Clare elp champ. She had wondered if she would iss being that woman, miss her exciting if di ult life. Not of course during the past m th while she and Jerome were sailing tr cal seas, adventuring and loving. The last ks had been different from any that Clare ad ever known, new to her experience in eli pride and safety.

Jerome wants me with him, she though Always available. Marriage takes much re time than love. I've found that out alrea. It was a sweet thought and she lingered w it. Thinking, I am going to give him the ki of home he's never had—the kind I've never h— spacious, gay, untroubled. It will be comp ely different from living in that mausoleum wi Helen. Some of her friends will probably r nt me at first. They know Jerome's been in ve with me for years. But he did everything po ble for Helen as long as she lived. He has no ne to regret as far as she's concerned. I must ke sure that no sense of guilt ever creeps I couldn't live with that.

We had eighteen years, thought Clare ir- rant. But that wasn't enough for either o s. She went to one of the windows and lo ed for pigeons on the broad sills outside. Th re were none. She turned away, trying to ce herself in the present again. She must do so e- thing to quiet the memories, and to mak er presence here real. Better telephone som e.

To whom wouldn't a call turn into a c re or an intrusion? Naturally she should all Claude Gregory. She always did. And Je ne

> Just because you've fallen in love with the dimple is no reason for marrying the whole girl.
>
> W. C. FIELDS

always called Philip Merton shortly afte e arrived. He was Jerome's New York law r. Phil had written her a quite wonderful le er after she was widowed. Clare had thou t that she would consult Philip about d g something for Julia and Belinda financ y. Clare was reminded that she should ve Belinda a ring, and at least let the child k w she was in town. Without exacting or exp t- ing anything.

"Mr. Merton, please," she said. "It's Ms. Tarrant calling, Mrs. Jerome Tarrant fr m St. Ives."

He was quickly on the phone. "Well, Cl e, how are you? How long have you bee n town?"

"Just arrived this morning."

"Good—I certainly want to see you."

Not very much, she thought, hearing an u- dertone of caution—or did she imagine? He's afraid he has an old widow on his ha ds, she said to herself.

"I've thought so often about Jerome," d Philip Merton.

"Yes."

"It's a good way to go—I'm sure it's wh he would have wanted—but it's hard on e ones who are left."

How many thousand times had that be said to her? There was no possible answe t wasn't a good way to go. Jerome would he hated it. He liked to do things with dign , with full preparation.

"How is everything going with you, Phi " She swung the talk off Jerome.

"All right, except that I'm not getting y younger, unfortunately. We must have din r together, Clare. Look, let me see how n fixed—my very stern secretary keeps e straight on engagements—let me ring y back today or tomorrow."

"When you get around to it, Phil. I'll e busy with this and that. It's good to hear y r voice."

Clare remembered that when Jerome u to call Philip Merton an engagement had b n made instantly. The demotion of being a wid she thought. She did not call any more of people who had been their mutual frie moment's indecision she rang up regory at the agency.

'lare—actually you? When did you Clare, I was terribly sorry ——" v you would be—and thank you," upted. "Don't say anything more, t's true and talk seems to make it —worse. I'm a fugitive from pity. ly I'm in New York actually."
ou lunch with me?"
e that, though he must be breaking n engagement with someone else.
'e to. When and where?"
'clock be all right with you? How old place on East Fifty-third?"
vorite. I'll be there."
d now, as she left the telephone, a hold in the city. An engagement, a o where she would be expected. She f the famous little restaurant, the al busy bar always crowded with o made a pet of the place. Although n in the back of her mind to tele- inda, she decided to delay that. First I unpack and change and then for r two slip back into a world which credible without Jerome.
ging of the telephone surprised her. p Merton calling back so soon? No new that she was here.
——"
Clare," answered the rich, confident er daughter.
Julia darling—how nice of you to now's everything down in Washing-usual state of confusion. I flew up ing. I'm downstairs."

stairs here?"
have to make a talk at the Waldorf en's luncheon—a political thing. I e you'd be in New York—you were about your dates—but I knew you opped here. So I inquired and they I just checked in. Shall I come up?"
ld hope so!" Clare said. "This is erful."
se it was. Clare did not wish for a nd that her daughter were not on pstairs, in spite of that trace of ap- n which Julia could bring with her. ance about the room was involun- as her quick, critical look in the rror. Then she went swiftly down the meet Julia and the affection in their vas real.

nstant they appraised each other. vearing her career beautifully this She is not quite so slim as she was ten o, thought Clare. All that discussion ent and trying to be on the right side tle in her face. But she is very good- looking awfully well," said Clare a note of applause for the woman in you," said Julia; "but don't get any

v. I'm a wrinkled hag as it is."
simply wonderful," said Julia. "I w how you do it."
t quite a compliment, for the accent re's age. Clare laughed aloud. Julia uld deal a blow with the truth.
mean it," protested Julia, "and I ou how glad I am to have found you morning. You probably guessed on my mind when I was talking to telephone two weeks ago. I wanted ou, but it is the sort of thing that it is possible to put in a letter."
new at once that it was Belinda who e put in a letter. She wondered how conversation would take. She had o wear the gold knitted dress to t she couldn't change while Julia It would seem too frivolous—for a nearly sixty-five—to explain that she take a bath and change her shoes y, while Julia had a problem to put . She looked casually at her wrist. It ly nearly twelve o'clock.
a's drifting into trouble. I think she's roads in her life," said Julia.
. Crossroads. Such trite, political thought she had a job," said Clare. still with the magazine?"

"She has a miserable little research job," said Julia. "She verifies facts for articles—that sort of thing. There's no future in it."

"It may not be just what you wanted for her, Julia—I know you were disappointed when she had no flair for Washington life and wouldn't have a debutante party and all that—but if she wants to be independent, she'll be no less attractive and happy ——"

"I didn't care about the social end," said Julia. "She could do something worth while even in New York if she would let me arrange it. I could get her a very interesting job at the United Nations. I've helped other girls. But Belinda is so indifferent. I can't bear to have her turn out this way. It's not just what it does to me ——"

"But she won't turn out wrong! Julia, she's only twenty-two; she's feeling her way, testing her emotions. If she is playing around with some man you don't approve of, she may get burned, but she has to learn about fire ——"

"It's not playing. She's involved with a married man."

"Did Linda tell you this?"

"She didn't deny it," said Julia, "and she won't discuss it."

Clare's face was troubled now. She said, "I hope it isn't true. A love affair should be clear and untangled for her at this age, even if it's temporary. But feeling is never made to order, Julia. You have to take it as it comes and when it comes—if you want to live. If it should be serious, there's such a thing as divorce."

"Not in this case. I don't think Henry Cowper could get a divorce. Even if he tried. It would be scandalous and cruel ——"

"Nothing is more cruel than an unhappy marriage."

"The thing is," said Julia, "his wife is sick. She's a mental case."

Clare did not move or question. After a minute Julia went on. Now, as if a bridge were safely crossed, she made her points more calmly, added it up for Clare, told the story.

2,667,000 WOMEN

have traveled aboard Boeing jetliners...most proved, most popular jetliners in the world.*

*and adored it!

These airlines now offer Boeing jetliner service: AIR FRANCE • AIR-INDIA • AMERICAN • B.O.A.C. • BRANIFF • CONTINENTAL • LUFTHANSA • PAN AMERICAN • QANTAS SABENA • TWA • UNITED • VARIG • WESTERN. IRISH and SOUTH AFRICAN start service soon; EL AL in 1961. NORTHEAST and PAKISTAN operate Boeing jetliners under lease.

BOEING 707 and 720

"You see, this man lives in Chicago, in some suburb or other, but he has to be in New York quite often on business. He's been married for years—he's much too old for Belinda anyway. I should say he's between thirty-five and forty. He can be quite charming and I suppose it was quite a brilliant marriage—with her connections. But they had a stillborn child and his wife went into a state of melancholia. I don't know all the details, but she has to have a nurse with her all the time."

"How did Belinda happen to know him?"

"I'm responsible for that," said Julia unhappily. "That's another reason why I feel so dreadful about the whole thing. Senator Hume brought Henry Cowper to my apartment. I was having people for cocktails. I knew Henry was married to a niece of the senator's and I liked him. So when he said he was often in New York I said, 'Look up my Linda sometime. I'd like her to meet you and your wife.' Something like that, perfectly natural and casual. I showed Henry Cowper her picture ——"

"That must have fixed it," said Clare.

"Several months later Senator Hume asked me to lunch. He brought the conversation around to Henry Cowper and told me the story. At the time I didn't realize why John was telling me all that, or that Henry was seeing Belinda. Then I got a letter—unsigned—and it was very bitter about Belinda and Henry, and attacked me, saying that a depraved daughter was the result of a bad mother and why didn't I get out of public life. Of course you get those crazy letters occasionally and pay no attention—but this one horrified me. I called up Belinda and asked her to come over, because I couldn't get away; she came the next Sunday. I was as tactful as I could be."

"Was she disturbed—hurt?"

"I don't know. She escaped me—you know how Belinda is," said Julia in desperation. "I felt as if I were talking to the wind."

"She admitted that she was seeing him?"

"Oh yes! All she said was that there was nothing to worry about. Clare, will you please make her break off this affair?"

"I? If she won't listen to you?"

"I think she would listen to you. She's always thought you were wonderful. And you're the one person who could make her understand what she's letting herself in for because ——"

Clare knew the rest of it. She thought, Julia grew up with what I let myself in for. I never thought she was aware of it. She seemed so busy and she was so well taken care of.

Julia glanced at her watch. "I have to go. Call Belinda right away, will you? And, Clare, don't tell her that I talked this over with you."

Clare detained her after their kiss with one question.

"Wasn't there a boy called Peter in Belinda's picture? When Jerome and I were here last time—that was more than a year ago—I remember that we took Belinda and this Peter to dinner and the theater. He seemed quite mad about her. Jerome rather liked him."

Julia said, "That would have been Peter Sulgrave. He had to go into the Navy. I'm sure he wanted to marry her, but they weren't engaged." With one hand on the doorknob she said, "Clare, don't misunderstand what I said—for you everything worked out so wonderfully. But Belinda's so young—so casual about life—she's not like you."

"Not tough like me," said Clare. "Run along, Julia, and fix up the world."

The nurse had a hard job. It isn't getting any easier, thought Henry Cowper. Nobody knew what Sylvia's next whim would be or what would come to the surface of that troubled, darkening mind. The irony was that Sylvia had once so coveted luxuries that she could have for the asking now. Money was no longer the problem that it had been in the first days of their marriage. Always Henry's problem, not Sylvia's. She had never tried to help him solve it.

But with the generosity of his healthy mind, and with what pity was left after the long struggle, Henry reminded himself again that Sylvia had no capacity for love or for being a normal wife. He had memories of scenes with her which he had never discussed even with the medical men or psychiatrists who had taken care of Sylvia. They were too shameful and could add nothing to diagnosis. He could protect her that much.

He did his best to keep Sylvia satisfied and diverted. It was necessary to keep her use of drugs under control, for they increased her instability. Long consultations made much use of the word "disturbed" and avoided a definition of insanity. But the experts told Henry that his wife must be kept under constant care. He devoted himself to working harder, the solid core of interest in his work as well as the necessity for money keeping him steady.

These facts, past and present, were in his mind as he packed his bag for New York. Henry did not regard them emotionally or pity himself. He didn't always carry them with him and he would soon leave them behind. But he would have to come back to them. The facts would be waiting for him. They had marked his face with a seriousness that was almost austere. It was a very handsome face on a lean, disciplined body that had never been softened by dissipation nor taken much time for ease.

Finally, in the air, he felt free from dreariness. As the plane gained cruising speed he was already mentally figuring how long it would be before the use of solid fuel would be common in passenger planes, how soon most of them would be jets. He thought of the inevitable expansion for his company. And there were new products coming along, being tested. He thought, I'll talk about that to Belinda. The plane droned on and he began to admit her to his mind.

Thinking about her was a reward which he would not allow himself to have until other things were taken care of. She was kept apart from any tangle or mess. But in a few hours now he would see her, face her across a table, drive with her, laugh with her. She would carve out a piece of happiness and give it to him and it would keep him alive until he saw her again.

How many times had there been? Henry looked back at them. He'd had no intention of ever telephoning Belinda Rood. But in New York with a long evening stretching emptily ahead, he had looked up her name in the telephone book. Just for curiosity. She lived over by the East River. Henry decided that he wouldn't follow it up. She'd think he had a nerve—a married man, so much older than she was. Still, if she turned him down, he had nothing to lose. Of course he would make it clear that he was calling at her mother's suggestion.

He dialed the number listed for Belinda Rood. He told her later that it was pure luck that he did.

"Not luck," said Belinda; "you had to call me."

"Why?"

"Because I was waiting for you to call."

"But you didn't know I existed. You didn't even know my name."

"I didn't know your name. But I knew you existed," said Belinda.

"Are you a little fey?" he asked, teasing her.

"Sometimes," said Belinda.

He had come to believe it.

Henry had not known that the company of any girl could be both exhilarating and peaceful. He dropped his guard. He wasn't afraid to talk to her. He thought now, Belinda made it possible from the start. She made it so right. She was so unaffected, with no pretending, no double talk. He explained that his wife was invalided with a serious nervous breakdown, and Belinda did not question him about the cause nor ask for more details than he gave her. Nor did she offer him pity.

Before their second meeting, Henry had argued with himself that he should let well enough alone. He'd had a pleasant break, a very delightful evening with Belinda Rood, but friendship or continued association with such a girl was not in the cards for him. Of course he did not let it alone. He had called Belinda as soon as he reached the New York airport.

He did not try to resist seeing her after that, not after she told him how much she had hoped that he would come again to New York. There was no attempt at provocation in what she said, but neither did she try to deny the miracle of what was happ[ening] between them. There had been a we[ek] in October when conferences had kept [him] in New York, and they had seen ea[ch] other every day.

She made the city different for hi[m] with new amusements and interest[ing] experiences. They dined in famous re[s]taurants, but Belinda would cook a meal in [her] apartment if that idea seemed bette[r].

Their relationship was being [built] on laughter and gravity, of his work an[d] of what they mutually liked or could [do] without, of the last meeting and the [next] of telephone calls. Henry had put [a] telephone in his Chicago office so [he] could talk to her without having t[o go] through the switchboard at the plan[t]. Sometimes he had to make sure that she [was] there, that nothing had happened to [her], no one had robbed him of her. He [was] now and then, fearing that this love [in] could not safely anchor might be [drawn] some dangerous current.

They had been seen together. Her[e's] that. One of the Chicago salesmen in [his] company, a man he didn't like, had m[ade] uncomfortable in a New York restau[rant] night. The fellow kept staring at [them] though Henry ignored him after a n[od] ognition. There was no reason wh[y] should not take a girl out to dinner. [The] man knew about the Cowper domes[tic] tion and he was the type who migh[t] make a salacious story of the incide[nt].

Once in January, when he had [gone] Senator Hume in Washington to d[is]cuss Army contract, Henry had felt that [the] mosphere was slightly strained. The[y] had asked about Sylvia's condition—[an] only natural—and gone on to inquire [if] Henry had ever called on Mrs. Ro[od]. question did not seem casual and H[e] at the time that there was motive b[ut] He said that he had not seen Mrs. Ro[od] the cocktail party. The senator had r[aised] untidy eyebrows, then frowned, as i[f] something on his mind. Henry h[ad] away with a very uncomfortable fee[ling] suspected that there must be gossi[p] Belinda and himself. If it had come to [the] of Senator Hume, it must be widespr[ead].

He knew what would be taken for [a] if such rumors were persistent. But [the] vious conclusion was not true. He [was] still trying to protect Belinda with t[he] He loved her. He had told her so ma[ny] He had never loved a woman bef[ore] knew that now. But she was not his [mis]tress in spite of desire and opportunity. Th[ey] talked about it, of course. It was his [idea] but Belinda who made it possible for [him] keep it.

He was thinking as the plane began [to] thinking realistically that nobody [would] credit the situation. He thought, Is it [for] her? That is all that counts. What is [best] her?

At Idlewild, in the early dusk, he dia[led] number. When he heard her voice [it] complete and safe.

"I'm here, Belinda. Do you love m[e]?" me quickly."

"Yes. You'll be surprised. It's grow[n] you've seen me."

"You darling girl. As soon as I leave [you] at the hotel and get cleaned up I'll com[e] Where would you like to go for dinner?"

"I must tell you ——"

"What's happened?"

"Ah, nothing to make you [be] alarmed. It's only that Clare is in New [York]. I found a message at the office and [she] called her back a little while ago she su[g]gested dinner with her."

"Who's Clare?"

"Clare Tarrant. My grandmother."

"Oh." Henry faced up to disappoint[ment]. "Must you really see her tonight?"

"I want to. She's alone—her husband [died] not so long ago. It must be dreadful for [her] be here without him. She's probably [living] into memories everywhere."

"Let me take you both to dinner. [Joy] suppose," he added hopefully, "that [you]

Death from the Hospital Nursery

"Death From the Hospital Nursery," an article that appeared in the February, 1959, Ladies' Home Journal, reported epidemics of staph infection originating in hospital nurseries among the newborn and spreading to their parents and to other patients. Now there is new evidence that the virulent staph organism still finds a place to thrive in some hospitals.

In a recent issue of the New England Journal of Medicine, two doctors give their analysis of an outbreak of impetigo in a western hospital. This outbreak, of three months' duration, resulted in disease conditions for 128 infants and 150 persons in their immediate families, according to their estimate. "The children of one family in our survey," these doctors say, "transmitted type 80/81 staphylococcus to their cousins, who were frequent playmates, and staphylococcal skin infections are now recurring persistently among both families." The authors stress that the attending physicians of the families in their study often failed to realize the hospital origin of the infection, or that it was running through entire families.

"Hospital staph" is resistant to antibiotics. Reliance upon antibiotics as an easy cure may have led to laxity in hospital sanitation procedures that permit it to start. Alert, informed physicians and hospital administrators can stop staph dead in its tracks. It does not occur, or is immediately eliminated, in hospitals where vigilance is the rule. The rooming-in system of maternity care tends to eliminate staph for mothers and babies. Prospective mothers can seek and insist on such care. Staph infection, which is usually characterized by persistent skin sores, can result in death when the infection reaches the lungs, heart, the intestinal tract, or causes general blood poisoning. The Ladies' Home Journal will continue to inform its readers of this danger whenever it occurs.

CONTINUED ON PA

re of the most exciting women in the world: Elsa Martinelli

RTINELLI is a glamorous and hard-working actress, o handsome young Roman count, and mother of a -year-old—"I often feel tense but I must never look it." She uses Pond's Cold Cream to deep-cleanse and moisturize, to ease away tension lines—"Pond's leaves my skin so clean yet keeps it beautifully soft and smooth."

SHE'S BUSY...YET SHE'S BEAUTIFUL... SHE USES POND'S

OV! POND'S COLD CREAM IN BOTH CREAM AND NEW FLOWING FORM

w—or you who love lotions—Pond's Flowing Cold am a wonderful new form of Pond's Cold Cream! s exclusive new flowing cleanser is creamy-rich as y the cold cream can be . . . never dries your skin th "detergent" liquids. Pond's, in cream or flowing form, beautifies as it cleanses. Moisturizes to soften and smooth . . . "plumps up" skin cells so tired lines fade, tension vanishes. Use Pond's to beauty-cleanse at night, to moisturize under make-up all day. With Pond's you need never be too busy to be beautiful!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 138

grandmother will want to stay out very late."

There was a sound of laughter. To hear her gaiety again was so good—no one was so gay!

"What's so funny?" he asked.

"The way you said 'your grandmother.' Clare doesn't fit that tone of voice, Henry. I told her that I expected you and she said to bring you along."

"Belinda—won't she think it's out of line?"

"Because you're married? I told her you were. She wants to meet you. You'll like Clare."

"I've been starving for the sight of you," said Henry Cowper. "Every mile between us seems like a personal enemy."

"There are no miles now. It's so good to have you here."

"I feel as if I've come home," he said. "But I should be making a home for you, not letting you do it, Linda. By rights you should throw me out of your life."

"I wouldn't like an empty life," Belinda told him.

"You could soon fill it."

"No, I couldn't," said Belinda. "You can't take your life to the nearest filling station and say, 'Fill it up with love, please. High test.'"

"Maybe not like that. But you'd soon find some man who was free," said Henry. He made himself say it, but he was waiting for denial.

"I think that if you hunted for love or made a lot of conditions you'd never find it. It's never in the obvious places. It's a surprise. A compulsion. You had to call me that Sunday and I had to be there. There's nothing we can do about it, Henry."

Yes, thought Henry, she's right. Why do I want only this one girl? She's out of my reach. But no one else will do.

"I must take care of you," he said.

"You do. Would you like a drink?"

"Yes, I would. But how about you... mother?"

"I told her we'd be there about ei... have half an hour. I must tell you abou... She's quite beautiful even now, unle... changed since last March. And to me... ways has been one of the most r... people in the world."

"So you have a romantic grand... Who takes after who?"

"The reason she may have seemed... mantic was because Jerome was ali... much in love with her."

"Her husband?"

"Her second husband. I don't re... her first one, who was my mother's rea... He died when they hadn't been marri... long. There always seemed to be some... little obscure about him. I know that ... in England during the First Wor... Clare married Jerome when I was on... or four years old, so for me he was alw... husband. He was the man in the famil... I was growing up."

"Your father was in the last war, y... me."

"Yes. He was killed. We lived in W... ton then. He had been in Congress, ... was quite young for that. I can rememb... fragments about my father."

"Don't be sad, darling."

"I'm not. I'm just remembering. Cla... to run a literary agency here. She wa... successful. She's a fabulous person."

"I'm beginning to be afraid of your... Your mother is a political big shot an... your grandmother turns out to be a... celebrity."

"Clare is very different from my m..." Belinda said. "You'll see." She added ... little sigh, "I don't disappoint Clare th... do my mother."

"You couldn't disappoint anybody."

"Yes. I do. But anyway Clare's not a ... rity now. She gave up the work she use... when she married Jerome and they lived ... Ives when they weren't traveling."

"What was his business?"

"Jerome was head of an electrical con... Does Charters Electric mean anyth... you?"

"I should say it does. He was presid... Charters?"

"Yes, I'm sure I'm right. He was ve... portant until he retired and it showed ... manner even after that. Not that he was ... ous at all, but he had an air of being u... controlling things and people, of takin... of situations. Jerome always gave m... most complete sense of safety. Without p... a fence around me. Do you know w... mean? He was bigger than trouble. I... express it very well. But sometimes you ... me feel the same way."

"I make you feel safe?"

"It's better than being safe," she pu... "because it isn't dull and safety wou... that. Neither Clare nor Jerome was eve... They lived in a quite beautiful house tha... built after they were married and it was ... erous place. Clare always had lovely ... around her, but she didn't rely on them. ... relied on her. It was an exciting house t... perhaps because everyone was conscio... that active love between the two of then ... that they were sloppy about it. They'd ... I suppose they must have quarreled. Cla... lash out. But they never took each oth... granted. He kept courting her. He wou... his glass to her and mean it ——"

"Like this?" asked Henry.

"Just like that," said Belinda. "Thank... my love. I remember seeing Jerome ... Clare into his arms one night. I was st... with them that winter because Julia had ... to Congress to fill out my father's unex... term, and she was living in a hotel ... thought that was no place for a child. ... and Jerome had said good night to me—... were all dressed up and going out to ... dinner party—and I watched them fr... window in the upper hall as they went ... the car in the driveway. It was snow... little. There was a kind of golden light ... the lights on the front columns and Clar... wearing white furs—she's rather golden ... self. And suddenly Jerome turned and f...

LIQUI COLOR BELONGS IN YOUR HAIR TO COMPLETE YOUR MAKE-UP

...to provide the freshness of beautiful natural-looking color above your hairline. Instantly, your hair will gain a younger look that sparks up your personality and complements your facial make-up and costume. Any woman can use it confidently, effectively, discreetly as every shade of hair responds beautifully. LIQUI COLOR really conditions the hair...gives extra sheen and body to dull, limp or damaged hair... keeps hair soft and pliable for easy molding of hair-dos that stay set in dry or humid weather. Use LIQUI COLOR to add just the right amount of natural-looking color to beautify all shades of hair...to blend-in gray...or as a toner for bleached, tinted and dyed hair. It's quick and easy to use. The color "takes" instantly. No waiting for color to develop. No messy patch or strand tests. You'll like its economy too, as little as 18¢ per application since you get 5 to 10 applications from each 6 oz. bottle. Only $1.75 plus tax. LIQUI COLOR is a safe, temporary rinse, not a bleach or permanent dye. It carries the Good Housekeeping Guaranty Seal. A color range of 8 shades at cosmetic counters everywhere.

LIQUI COLOR® BY Noreen

COPYRIGHT 1960 NOREEN DISTRIBUTORS, DENVER, COLORADO

o his arms as if he couldn't help
'

y was stirred as she re-created the t was not the man and the woman he t Belinda watching them: his innocent nd she still was in spite of everything.
a kind of gratitude to those people who wn the child how a man and a woman el about each other, and done it so
r. She feels safe with me, thought I must never let that change.
now he's dead?"
Last March. Clare didn't expect it. I that's the other way that love can you, the ghastly way. When it leaves enly as it comes, goes out of sight and nd hearing. Clare was incomplete saw her again. She was surrounded by and not paying attention to any of was as if she were listening all the a voice she couldn't hear."

had expected to meet someone who seem bereft, probably pitiful. The who opened the door of her suite for and himself and took them into a lendid sitting room was not at all the Henry had built up in his mind as told him about her grandmother. She was very fond of Belinda. He could tenderness in Clare Tarrant's voice e welcomed the girl. Of course she be expected to like me under the cir-ces, Henry told himself as he re-to skilled graciousness that kept him
e distance she wanted.
sn't sure that he liked Clare Tarrant though he had thought that he would.
as no doubt that she had been a beau-

best way for a man to get out lowly position is to be conuously effective in it.

REV. D. JOHN HALL

nan, and she didn't look much more y now, though she must be considerer. But she made no pretense to he wore a black dress and her hair ing from gold to silver. Her eyes were lue, unfaded.
a was rejoicing tonight. The sight of d the meeting between her and Henry l Belinda.
e the way you take possession of any ere you lay your head, Clare," said
"with all your books and flowers.
ns like your own house already."
hard to make this bowling alley said Clare. "But they do help out.
so extravagant as Jerome was, and oms need a lavish touch."
telling Henry about Jerome." said, "Thank you, darling," as if she at must have been said. She didn't hat. She asked, "Henry, will you a drink for us? Everything should be re on the side table by that roaring ire. I'll have a Martini—there's bour-Scotch too."
him you'd have a Martini."
t you keep any of the family secrets,
ble child?"
rom Henry. Anyway, now he knows
y, he'd find out about us pretty quick.
met Julia, you know—before he knew id he?" Clare was thinking. *Belinda if it were settled between them, like an girl. She looks at him that way. He's an I expected, younger than Julia led ieve. Handsome, too, and he looks very

t. I like his control. That's the worst eems a strong person. Whether we like isn't going to change his mind. He's h in love with her. This man couldn't if he tried. Neither could Jerome. He as determined—but that was different.
der. I'd been married once and I'd o look after myself. I knew what I was to. Linda doesn't. Henry Cowper has a may live forever, from what Julia years, twenty! Linda hasn't the faintest
t it would be like.* Without apparent pause she said, "You live in Chicago, don't you, Mr. Cowper?"

"Yes, Mrs. Tarrant. At present. Our firm has its main plant there."

Now ask him about his wife and if he has any children, Clare told herself. No, I cannot. I will not turn the knife.

She said instead, "I thought it would be pleasant to have dinner served up here. We always used to put the table over there by the windows and watch the lights of the city."

"It's heavenly," said Belinda. "I remember. I had dinner with you up here before."

"With Jerome and me last year. And your young man—Peter . . . what?"

"Pete Sulgrave."

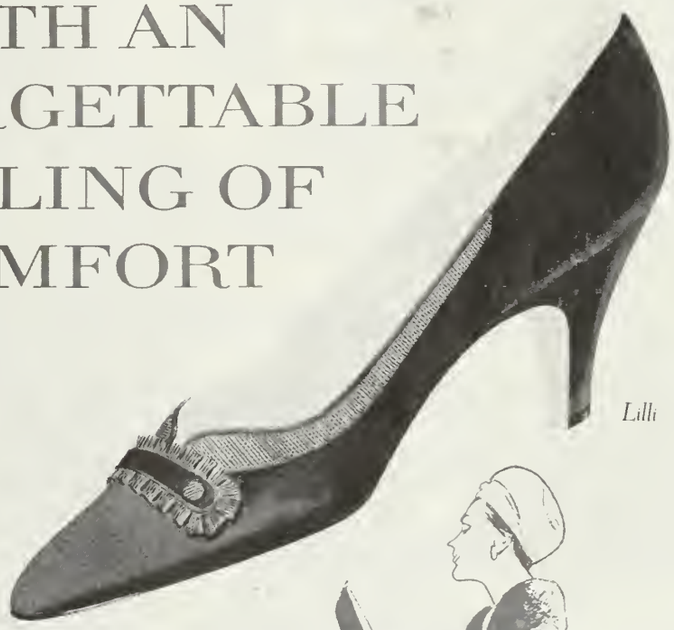
"What did you do with him? He seemed quite firmly attached."

"He's doing time in the Navy. In New London."

"Doesn't he ever get leave?"

"Oh, yes. He gets here sometimes."

"You must bring him to see me again," said Clare. "Jerome liked that young man."



Henry Cowper was mixing drinks with a deadpan expression, but of course he had heard. A cheap and obvious way, Clare told herself, but he will understand that he can expect no concession to an affair between him and Belinda. I will make none; it's much too serious. As she telephoned the waiter, she could see the couple standing by the window. It made Clare feel like a ghost. She knew so exactly what they were feeling, how they could communicate without words, that they were adding another happy moment to their small store of them. They were beautiful together—Belinda so supple and feminine; she was a girl who needed a strong man. There were few men who showed devotion like that.

They talked over the melon and the duckling and the cheese—Clare had ordered the kind of food that Jerome liked—of jet planes and

CONTINUED ON PAGE 143

Du Barry

FASHION...
WITH AN UNFORGETTABLE FEELING OF COMFORT

Lilli

Beth

Selby ARCH PRESERVERS

The miracle of Selby's fashionable pumps . . . is their very special talent for letting you go in fashion, arrive in comfort. With the fitting support of Arch Preserver's famous hidden comfort features . . . the clinging caress of an elasticized topline . . . now anyone can wear a young and pretty pump. Styles from* $16.95 to $18.95 now at your retailer's.

* The A B C of Arch Preserver's Hidden Comfort Features

A Special snug-heel, toe-free lasts
B Individually-positioned Metatarsal Cushion
C Cuddle Arch with Heel-to-Ball Fit

FOR NAME OF YOUR NEAREST SELBY ARCH PRESERVER RETAILER, WRITE TO SELBY ARCH PRESERVER DIVISION, THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO.

Surprise! Betty Crocker brings you the easiest fudge cake recipe you ever tried!

And the tastiest! It gives your family a cake with so much rich chocolate-fudge flavor... so much melt-in-the-mouth goodness, with so little time and effort on your part!

EASY CHOCOLATE FUDGE CAKE:

Heat oven to 350°. Empty 1 pkg. Betty Crocker Brownie Mix into small bowl. Blend in ¼ cup water and 2 eggs, unbeaten. Beat 1 min., med. speed on mixer or 150 strokes by hand. Scrape bowl often. Blend in another ¼ cup water. Beat 1 more min., scraping bowl. Fold in ½ cup chopped nuts. Pour into greased 9″ sq. pan. Bake about 30 min. Frost with Betty Crocker Chocolate Fudge Flavor Frosting Mix. Cut into squares. Perfect with ice cream.

P.S. You can also make 36 homemade-good brownies with this mix!

The red spoon Betty Crocker tells you it's Betty Crocker good... and General Mills guarantees it.

'TINUED FROM PAGE 141

fuels and the Formosa Straits and e and the chance of war.
as Jerome in the First World War?"
Belinda.
re was silent for a minute; then she said, me couldn't go in 1917. His first wife was valid and dependent on him for every-
He had no money. Finally he made mind to go anyway, but the war ended." did not look at Henry Cowper. She hem lightly, "It's very rude of me to tell wo to eat and run, but this has been a lay and I am going to finish my unpackid get to my bed. Belinda, go into my and fix your face, if you like, and then nd Henry can run along."
nda was gone and the door of the bed-was closed. The strain had come back Henry's face.
re said, "I'm sorry, Henry."
ealize what you must think of me, Mrs.
nt. I know how it must look to you. I nly say that this is no ordinary thing.
's nothing cheap about it. I have a prob-try to do my best with it. In law, I'm a ed man. In fact, I'm not. All of myself important belongs to Linda."
never works," said Clare. "Now this eem enough. Soon it won't be."
ry not to think farther than the present,"
her.
at isn't fair to her."
keep her safe. Somehow. I promise

w can you? They are talking now about lations between you and Belinda. Her r is getting vile letters."
idn't know that," said Henry, his face ere's been only one that I know of so t they breed quickly. It's not necessary Belinda about them, not now anyway."

course not. Mrs. Tarrant, what I want n the world is to take care of Belinda.
en told her that she should cut me off, of me. She says she doesn't want to."
en you have to make the decision. A e isn't possible?"
e no legal cause. My wife is helpless.
lly ill."
d there's no future ——"
ysically she's quite healthy," he said in voice.
or boy," said Clare. "Henry, I'm not g you. No one can help falling in love. you're a good man. And for your sake, most glad you met Belinda. It's given glimpse. But it mustn't go on. For the s reasons that are so terribly true."

e was a ball going on in the Persian of the Plaza and people in evening dress athered in groups in the lounges and ors. Among them Belinda looked very dressed. Henry realized after a minute that he expected her to be embarrassed,
s to suggest that they go somewhere Sylvia would, he thought. But Linda is ful. She has the air of a princess.
will be quiet in the Oak Room," she y settled in a corner and she let her ll on the bench where they sat.

you know that you are especially ul tonight?" he asked.
n I? Isn't beauty a strange thing? You
–I believe people give it to each other.
t something you have by yourself.
lost so much beauty—it's sad."
hink she is a very handsome woman."
s, of course," said Belinda, "but you have seen her when Jerome was
l."
you mean that I make you feel beau-

, yes. I've never felt this way. I shall ly become intolerably vain if I see you nough."
was his hour. Henry ordered vintage agne for her, Scotch for himself because membered that he had a big day tow.
hink we're good for each other," said
"I know that just seeing you makes me r man. If that's true, if we can bank on
—"

He stopped, for he recognized the man at the bar who was watching them, trying to get their attention. It was Bob Sheldon, waving a cordial hand—Henry had to respond, but he did it with restraint. No use. Sheldon had begun to make his way across the room.

"This is a man I do business with," said Henry in a swift aside to Belinda. "He's coming over. I can't do anything about it. Have to be civil."

By that time Bob Sheldon was shaking hands with Henry and looking Linda over with inquisitive eyes.

"I'd like you to meet Miss Rood. May I present Mr. Sheldon, Linda?"

Sheldon said that it was a pleasure and that it was good to see Henry. "Terrible mob out there," he said. "I'm absent without leave from my own party, but my ears were beginning to hurt."

Sheldon was talking to Henry but regarding Linda with interest. Henry knew what the other man was thinking. He would see at once that this was not a commonplace New York date and that Belinda was both beautiful and rare. He would wonder what was going on between her and Henry Cowper.

Meeting almost any other man would matter less, thought Henry. Sheldon was a partner in the investment firm which already had put considerable money into Victor Products and would certainly be asked for more if the company expanded. Sheldon sat on the board of directors of Victor. It seemed to Henry now that Sheldon was very carefully not mentioning Sylvia, and the attempt at tact annoyed him too. Why wasn't Sheldon natural? Why didn't he inquire about Sylvia? There was nothing Belinda didn't know about his marriage. And what right had this character to be asking Linda personal questions and letting his glance roam over her that way?

"Do you just live here or do you work at something, Miss Rood?"

"I work."

Henry could not stand the fatuousness. He said, "Belinda is on the research staff of Today Magazine."

"It must be quite interesting work," said Sheldon. "I suppose that you have different assignments?"

"Yes, I do what I'm told," she said. "Right now I'm getting statistics, as far as they are available, on abortions."

She spoke quietly and cleanly. But the word hurtled into Henry's mind and made him uncomfortable. He wished she hadn't brought that up. Sheldon was the kind of person who would make something of it, build up a story. He would say, "This girl who was out with Cowper is an expert on sex stuff." Why didn't he take himself off? He must know he wasn't wanted.

Henry made an attempt to laugh it off when Sheldon was gone. He tried to resume possession of his hour.

"Unmitigated gall, his horning in that way. But I suppose he'd had a few drinks and felt popular."

"Why did you mind it so much?"

"I don't particularly like the man. He has all the characteristics of the rich bully."

Belinda looked too thoughtful, was too silent.

Henry said, "He's the kind of character who'd get the wrong idea. He has that kind of mind."

END OF SUMMER

By KATHERINE GARRISON CHAPIN

Summer is not ended
When a calendar page is turned, or when a few
Dry leaves fall whitened on green grass,
Or when the meadow spires
Ripen in amber fires,
Or early sky hangs cool above sea's change.
Summer has endings, unaware and strange,
Beyond bright days extended.

Summer is done
When no toys or rubbers lie below the steps,
An empty ladder leans against the barn.
Dogs bark at shadows, and their whines
Bring no whistled answer from the pines.
No screen doors bang, and there is no admonitory hush
For sleep. Birds possess again the elderberry bush Quietly, in the sun.

Summer was blended
Of laughter under trees, and shouts along a beach.
When the sands hold no print of quick bare feet,
No lithe and naked body of a child
Thigh-deep in minnows stares into the tide
(A fishlike being among fins and flippers)
And no one builds a wall against incoming waters, Summer is ended.

"The idea that we're in love?"

"He wouldn't understand the situation. He's incapable of it."

"Doesn't he know you are married?"

"I suppose so. Yes, he should. If he remembers. Actually he met Sylvia some years ago. Before she went completely to pieces."

"That was it. I knew something was disturbing you. Hurting you. . . . Henry, no one is going to understand, no one could possibly think it's right except us. Not that man. Nor my mother. Nor Clare, after tonight. We can't help that. We can't help it if someone looks at us obscenely."

"I don't intend to allow it," he said sharply.

"I seem like a thief," she said, "but I'm not a thief. All I'm taking is something that doesn't belong to anyone else. And never did. It's mine—it exists just for me."

"Darling, that's the truest thing you ever said."

"But I don't like to have you feel humiliated. By being with me."

"Humiliated! I'm never more proud than when I'm with you!"

"You hated that man's guesses. And what Clare said to you tonight when I was out of the room."

"How did you know she said anything?" he asked.

"How could I not know? One look at your face—remember that I love you."

"She didn't say very much. She was rather kind. But she put it to me straight that I wasn't taking care of you. Of course she was only telling me what I know. You should have something so much better than what I can give you."

"Nothing is better than what you give me."

"There's no one in the world like you, Linda."

He reached for her hand and was about to lift it to his lips when several men came up to the bar. Henry gave them a quick look.

"Let's go," said Linda, and though she spoke softly it was decision.

Back in her apartment, Henry said, "There must be some place where I can take care of you. You don't need to go running around, working on stuff like abortions. Why should you? Let me take charge. You might like a place in the country where you could have a couple of dogs and get a lot of fresh air and have room to do anything you want. I can well afford it. And, if things work out—I'd make them work out so I could be there quite a lot of the time."

"You want me to be a kept woman?"

"Don't talk like that, Linda."

"That's what I would be."

"Please, darling. You know that all I want is to do something adequate for you. Try to give both of us a place that would be a kind of home."

She made a gesture.

"But this is your place," he protested. "I want to do what a man should do."

She said, "No, Henry dear, you can't have two wives. You're a law abider. You're honest. You promised your wife what they call your worldly goods. You promised to cleave to her—horrible word—and she can't release you from that promise because she doesn't think straight. Perhaps she wouldn't do it even if she weren't muddled. She'd have the right to refuse and the law would back her up. But she hasn't any right to a love that didn't exist until you and I created it together. Sometimes I'm almost happy in thinking that I don't take a thing that belongs to your wife or make you dishonest. I don't think I'm rationalizing—it doesn't feel like false reasoning. It feels like the truth."

"I've made it so tough for you," he said.

"No. It's been wonderful." Her eyes were suddenly startled as she heard what she was saying. "It is wonderful."

Henry had a flash of fear. He took her hands and drew her up from the chair, holding her straight and close, his lips against her hair, letting the warmth of love envelop them.

"I love you, Linda. You're here. We're together."

She released herself gently, as if she might tear something delicate if she were not careful.

She said, "I'm thinking of your leaving later, walking those deserted blocks alone, and a kind of shame and a feeling that this is not right will creep out of the shadows and walk along with you. They'll whisper that you're demeaning yourself, doing harm to me, that it's hopeless—oh, I know what it's like for you when I'm not there."

"You're all my life," said Henry. "Don't you know that?"

"I'm part of it. But the work you have to do, the people you meet, are part of your life too. And tomorrow morning the Sheldon man will be watching you across the table. He'll look a little sly. And you'll hate him because he saw us together." Belinda gave a strange, sad little laugh.

"Oh, my darling, forget about Sheldon ——"

"If you could," she breathed. "Henry, give me a present. Give me something I want, will you?"

"What is it?"

"I want you to walk away from here tonight loving me with pride. Do it now."

"But I always have pride—I always ——"

"Please. Give me what I want."

He lifted her face and looked at it for minutes before he kissed her.

Henry had slept badly, but his mind was firm this morning. Already he had talked to Belinda on the telephone and told her that he would be with her at seven o'clock tonight. He was on time for the meeting of the directors.

The offices were small and standardized. Philip Yost, who was chairman of the board, cared nothing for front or show. Henry liked to work with Mr. Yost, who had an imagination like a divining rod. He would touch a suggestion or possible project with it and could tell almost at once whether it would be useful or profitable. A tall, spare, Lincolnian figure, always wearing a stringy tie, he was sternly virtuous about his dealings. Henry had once told Linda that he would bet Philip Yost knelt down to say his prayers every night and that he probably wore a nightshirt.

"Sit here, Henry," said Mr. Yost, indicating the chair at his left. "I want you to take a look at these estimates. But before we settle down to business, Mrs. Yost wants you for dinner tonight. Just some of our business family and a couple of others."

"I appreciate the invitation," said Henry, "but I'm tied up for dinner tonight. Will you tell Mrs. Yost how sorry I am?"

"You can break your engagement, can't you?" Yost asked. "General Apps is coming, and I want you to meet him before you go to Washington tomorrow."

"You want me to go to Washington tomorrow?"

"The sooner the better, Henry," Mr. Yost told him. "You beg off from that other engagement."

"I don't see how I can," Henry began and then he saw a wise, amused look on the face of Bob Sheldon, who was sitting across the table. He was probably going to the Yost dinner. And he would be perfectly capable of saying to Mr. Yost, "Henry has a very attractive friend here in New York. A girl who works on a magazine. She told me she was investigating abortions. These girls are nothing if not broad-minded. Of course no one can blame Henry for playing around a little und circumstances."

It was a business dinner. Part of h General Apps was a good man to kno

"But I'll see if I can't fix it. Of cou like to come very much, Mr. Yost," Henry.

"We'll be counting on you," said Mr with affable authority. To the stenograp said, "Tell Miss Flack to make a reser on an early plane to Washington tomorr Mr. Cowper."

Henry would call Belinda at noon a plain about dinner. She would under and he could leave the Yost party early would have hours together tonight.

The reports and discussion went on. Flack came in and passed a note to Mr. He turned to Henry again.

"There is no space on any plane avail Washington tomorrow morning. You ter take the train tonight, Henry. You c right from our place to the train."

"I'm sorry," said the girl at the switch of Today, "I don't know where I could Miss Rood."

Henry rang Linda's apartment, but was no answer. He left the meeting s times to call the magazine office, but i futile. It was after five o'clock in the afte before the conference broke up and he back to his hotel and the telephone. A past six he finally heard Belinda's voi sounded a little breathless.

"Are you all right? I've been trying a long to get you on the phone. Where ha been?"

"I went to Brooklyn to visit a hon girls. It's part of this research I'm on. I expect you'd be calling again after we s on seven o'clock."

"That's the trouble," he told her. Yost is pulling off a business dinner t and he insists that I be there. I couldn out of it, darling."

"It's all right. Come when you can."

"The worst of it is that he wants me to Washington on the night train. Thin popping fast and we don't want any o competitors to get ahead of us. You see it is?"

"Of course I do."

"But I want to see you so much. You know how much, Linda."

"I'll guess."

"I'm up against the ax. I may be tied up these people until traintime. I'm goi eleven-thirty. My darling, I'm so mixe about us. I'm no good to you. I've go job on my hands and I've got to deliver when am I going to see you?"

"When you come back. If you do."

It was after ten o'clock before he could the dinner. Mr. Yost wove the discu around Henry's expert knowledge and him answering questions on technical ma Finally Henry said he must go, and esc In the lobby of the apartment buildi found a telephone and dialed the far number. Steady ringing brought no an Frustration began to turn to fright. Wa hurt? Was this silence telling him she through with him? Could he taxi out t place and get back to Pennsylvania Stati time to take the train? No, it wasn't fea I'll call her from the station, he tho drearily.

In the waiting room Belinda stood up. denly emerging from all those people didn't matter. Her face was pale, her smi quite certain. "I wanted to see you off."

"There was never anything so kind, no so dear as this. It's been torture not to be you all evening."

"I'm here now," she said, claiming present moment.

Behind the high back of a deserted ben kissed her and tried to say it all at once.

"It's no good, not being together. I wa live with you—this isn't right for either When I saw you there, as if you belong me——"

"I belong as much as I can," she whisp against his shoulder.

"How can I leave you tonight? Linda— you come?"

Put flavor-magic into everyday meals...with

America's No.1 Pepper and Instant Minced Onion

You'll Never Peel Another Onion Once You Use McCormick-Schilling Instant Minced Onion!

McCormick-Schilling Instant Minced Onion provides all the true, fresh onion goodness and flavor with none of the work! No peeling, no chopping; no tears, no lingering odor on the hands. No storage problem, no waste. Use Instant Minced Onion for every purpose where minced or chopped fresh onion is called for—in soup, chowder, stew, fricassee, pot roast, omelets, shrimp Creole, sauces for meats and spaghetti—in many different ways.

And almost everything tastes better with McCormick-Schilling Pure Black Pepper. So fresh, so spicy, so pungent—gives full flavor to every meal. Buy both these fine products from the world's largest spice house the next time you shop!

McCORMICK
Schilling
ONE FAMOUS EMBLEM - TWO GREAT BRANDS

McCormick
RECIPE OF THE MONTH
Chicken en Casserole

Dip 3½-4 lbs. chicken, cut up, in mixture ⅓ c. flour, 2 t. salt, 2 t. Black Pepper. Brown in ½ c. butter or marg. Transfer to baking dish. To butter add 1 to 2 T. of the seasoned flour, 2 T. Minced Onion, 1 T. Celery Flakes, 1 T. Sweet Pepper Flakes, ¼ t. Nutmeg, dash MSG, 4 oz. can mushrooms with liquid, 8 oz. can tomato sauce, 1 can water. Simmer 5 min. Pour on chicken. Cover. Bake in 350° oven until tender.

© 1959 McCormick & Co., Inc.

McCORMICK · The House of Flavor · SCHILLING

McCORMICK in the East • SCHILLING in the West • CLUB HOUSE in Canada

d feel her body tighten. "With you ould fly back in the morning if you

, do you want me to come?'

, planning quickly, "I have a com-
I can get another ticket on the train.

ould know a thing about it ——" nged. Something happened to what had been compliance. She stood king or feeling ——

ody might," she said, "somebody us together."

care," said Henry. He meant it to ou do," she said, "you would. That's e, Henry." Her breath lifted, not h.

love you, Linda ——"

rse you do—and I love you. I had o the station, Henry. I couldn't let alone—like a man who isn't loved.
that isn't going to be missed every you with me," he said desperately.

I was waiting," Belinda told him, tending. That we were going away

Down to the mountains. I was looking out the window of the train morning and seeing peach blos-I planned what we would have for on the train—a big Southern break-sausage and hominy grits —— r train, Henry. I'll just walk to the you," she said.

Rood approached the entrance to dining room, her heart quickened; ume was coming from the other eldom die of hard work; ac-is God's medicine.

R. S. MACARTHUR

It was his companion who startled
l. She recognized Henry Cowper at moment that Senator Hume was er. He bowed slightly in his grand would have been natural to stop the men, but Julia did not do so.
ly she spoke to the senator and she em to recognize Henry at all, but ssed them by.

ator said, "Suppose we postpone
nry. Let us go back to my office.
times when food loses its flavor." ed himself behind his desk in a nner and took his time.

ot sorry that you dropped in to see Henry. I have been contemplating ty of an interview with you."

t expect to be here until later in the yesterday at the board of directors' Victor we came to the conclusion
ould try to cut some of the red tape to an operational status. Last night ith General Apps. He thought you us. You've been so kind before."

convinced that we have something at is highly practical."

talk about that later. Perhaps. How know, she's not at all well," said fly. "We've had consultations with edical men available and they all it's a condition that calls for quiet g care. She has someone with her clock now."

aid the senator, "that is sad. I hope personally tried to restore her to confidence."

ne all I can."

seems to be some doubt of that,"
nator.

know what you mean, sir."

you do," said Senator Hume. "In choose to be oblivious of gossip, d's treatment of you at the door of rant a few minutes ago must have eelings clear. You have been seeing al of her daughter in New York?"

nd then," said Henry, tightening up.
is own business.

"I'm not going to mince words," said the senator. "There is a certain kind of scandal which has never affected my family, and Sylvia—your wife—is a member of my family. I don't like what I hear, Henry."

"I don't know what you have heard, Senator Hume."

"Is it true or not? Have you an attachment for this girl?"

"I like Belinda Rood very much. I admire her. I respect her in every way. She is a person of great character, and ——"

"I'm glad to hear it. That should make it much easier to set the situation right. You must stop seeing this young woman."

"I'm sorry, sir, but I think that is my personal business."

"You are a married man."

"Technically," said Henry with bitterness. "I have done everything I can for Sylvia."

"For better or for worse," the senator reminded him, "in sickness and in health. Henry, I cannot command you. I advise you in as friendly a way as possible to give up this girl. For her mother's sake. For her own sake, for she can only be harmed by the association. And for your own sake too. If you do not give up the affair, I cannot continue to act as your friend and your sponsor with the Government agencies. In fact, I will use such influence as I have against you. And if Mr. Yost should inquire into my reasons, I can only say frankly that I do not trust your judgment nor can I rely on your stability. I'd rather not see that happen," said the senator, mild again in the way of a lawyer who could make a weapon of conciliation. "I've always liked you very much, Henry."

"At the moment that doesn't seem obvious," said Henry grimly.

"If you should call on me tomorrow morning and wish to talk about business, I shall be glad to be of any assistance within my power. You might like me to accompany you in making a few calls to the Pentagon. But if you do

ELMER: Elsie, you're out of your mind!

ELSIE: Oh, I think I have a pretty good chance.

ELMER: But you have no experience—no organization—no platform—no . . .

ELSIE: Don't be silly. I've had loads of experience and you can't beat my platform; "A gallon of Borden's Milk in every refrigerator."

BEAUREGARD: We've even got a campaign slogan —"Borden's Milk—the All American drink."

ELMER: Pretty savvy. . . but not enough to make you President of the United States.

BEAUREGARD: Pop, that's the Uptown School Association!

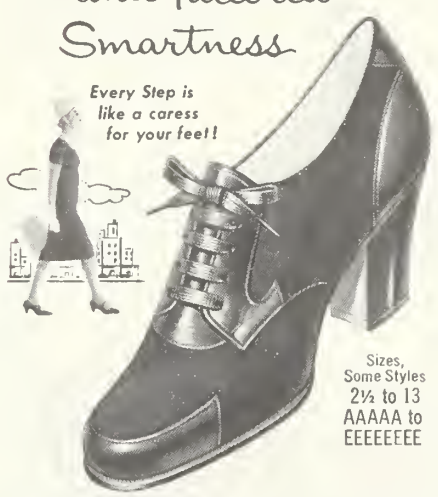
ELMER: Oh . . . . . !

BORDEN'S

VERY BIG ON FLAVOR



Available in Canada, in Quebec and Ontario Provinces.

©1960, The Borden Company

Dr. Scholl's SHOES

Masterpieces of Foot Ease and Tailored Smartness

You'll quickly discover what real walking ease is like when you step out in your first pair of supremely comfortable, smartly styled Dr. Scholl's Shoes. Made over Dr. Scholl's scientifically designed lasts, their glove-like, foot-cradling fit makes them ever so kind to your feet—devoid of any "breaking-in" discomfort.

Dr. Scholl's Shoes are made in all sizes for all types of feet. Expertly fitted at Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort Shops in principal cities and selected Shoe and Department Stores. If not obtainable locally, write for new catalog to Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Dept.13S3, Chicago 10, Ill.

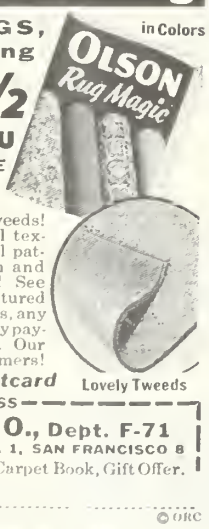
MORE PEOPLE USE refreshing, calorie-free

Sugarine LIQUID SWEETENER

SWEETER THAN SUGAR YET NO FOOD VALUE

Recommended by doctors for diabetics, overweights and lo-calorie diets. Use for beverages, desserts, cooking. Pure. Harmless.

USE-TESTED McCall's



GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 oz.– 75c

AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

FREE NEW, MONEY SAVING BROADLOOM Color Catalog

Your OLD RUGS, Carpets, Clothing in Colors SAVE UP TO 1/2 FACTORY-TO-YOU

Write for big New FREE Olson Rug, wall-to-wall Carpet Book!

49 Model rooms. New Tweeds! Lovely solid colors, casual texture blends, leaf and floral patterns, Early American and Oriental patterns, Ovals! See how you can get deeper-textured Reversible Broadloom Rugs, any size, at big savings. Monthly payments. No risk trial Offer. Our 86th year...4 million customers!

Lovely Tweeds

Mail Coupon or Postcard to Nearest Address

OLSON RUG CO., Dept. F-71
CHICAGO 41, NEW YORK 1, SAN FRANCISCO 8
Mail Rug & Wall-to-wall Carpet Book, Gift Offer.

Your Name .....
Address .....
Town ..... State .....

©ORC

call me, Henry, I shall take it for granted that you are going to put your life in order immediately. Otherwise—don't come back to this office."

Henry walked the streets of Washington, heedless of direction. He had never known such anger and humiliation as drove him now. He was stripped of dignity, outraged by the intrusion into his private life and the exposure of what a decent man had a right to keep secret.

Though he had suspected gossip even before Clare Tarrant told him of that letter to Belinda's mother, he had never thought that he would have to face it in his business. He had tried to think that it was a marginal, unimportant thing that could be ignored. He had been determined to believe that.

Desperately he planned alternatives to concession. He would go to the Pentagon without Hume. He would find the right people, convince them, get the contracts—but would he? Nothing would be done without the knowledge of the Armed Services Committee. And Victor would need those Government contracts if it was going to expand. Mr. Yost had laid that on the line yesterday.

If this got to Yost, especially if it affected business, Yost would go right up in smoke. He probably would anyway. Yost was old-fashioned and sentimental, and he doted on that wife of his. He loved to brag about how she had stood by him when the going was hard. He was talking about that last night at dinner. But Sylvia never had stood by. I never let her down, thought Henry bitterly. I pretended for a long time. But I never knew much about women. I thought they all acted like that. Until I found Belinda.

Did Belinda know this was coming? She was different the other night.

Other men cut loose. They break away from intolerable situations. I believe she would come with me. We could leave the country. But I'd run out of money. There's got to be money. Hume knows that. It's what gives him the whip hand. If I had a lot of capital and could settle enough on Sylvia to take care of her and run with the rest, it would be different.

It was a quarter to five and beginning to get dark. He remembered with pain that he had told Belinda he would telephone her as soon as he found out how long the business here would take, let her know when he would be back in New York so they could make plans. There couldn't be any more plans unless —— How can I tell her about this blackmail? Tell her that they've cut the ground from under us and cut the heart out of me? And Belinda—have I done you harm? If I could stand with you before the world —— But I can't take care of you. It's more impossible than it was before. I have to fade out completely. Oh, Linda, I don't care what happens to anyone else, least of all to me, if you're all right, if you're safe.

"You will come to dine with me very soon, my dear?" Philip Merton was saying.

"I would love it," said Clare. "Do you still have that wonderful cook?"

"I have indeed. Would you like me to include your granddaughter?"

The fear that Philip Merton's call had crowded out for a few minutes swept over Clare again. It had begun when Julia telephoned yesterday from Washington to say that she had received another of those anonymous things, worse than the first, and that she had seen Henry Cowper in Washington and cut him dead.

She said to Philip, "Belinda's very young."

"I often ignore age brackets," said Philip. "A few young people give a dinner party a fresh flavor. How old is your granddaughter?"

"Twenty-two. Incredibly."

"And does she take after you? Is she a beauty too?"

"Belinda's really rather lovely looking," she told him. "But I don't know what her engagements are."

Clare thought, Linda wouldn't want to come to his dinner. That sort of thing isn't up her street at all.

"I must meet her," said Philip. "Do try to bring her. Would next Saturday be possible for you?"

"Saturday is perfect," said Clare.

"And if in the meantime I can be of any service to you, Clare, you must let me know. I was deeply attached to Jerome."

"He was fond of you, Phil. I might like, one day, to ask for a little professional advice. I would like to work out a plan to help my daughter financially—she's in Congress, you know."

"I know that. She must be very clever. I often see her name in the press."

"Also I want to give Belinda a small income now and the balance of my estate when I die. There's no hurry, of course. I'll be here for weeks, perhaps even months. . . . Excuse me one minute, Phil. There's someone at the door."

Clare went through the foyer and opened her door to the complete surprise of seeing Belinda there.

SEPTEMBER ORCHARD

By FLORENCE B. JACOBS

Duchess, Astrachan, Pearmain,
Stark,
Walk in the thickened aisles,
each bough
bent to the grass, almost, with dark crimson, plum-colored, golden fruit older than history, from a root deep in legend and timeless myth.

(Solomon's comfort, Eve's undoing,
discord seeding the Trojan War, compulsion to send Old Johnny strewing
the wide west plains with a fertile pith
from his leather knapsack.)
Consider how the taste of apples stays in the mind,
never too lushly sweet, too bland, clean on a man's tongue, cool
in his hand,
with a cool, clean scent. He may let go by melons', pomegranates' heavy rind,
while he still remembers and hungers for Jonathan, Winesap, Wealthy Spy.

"How nice—this is lucky, Belinda ——"

"Do you mind?" asked Belinda. Then she saw Merton's coat and hat on the hall bench and said quickly, "Oh, you've company. I won't stay now."

"But you must. This is someone who wants to meet you. He's just been inviting you to dinner, as a matter of fact."

"Who?" A flash of excited hope came into Belinda's eyes and died out as Clare said, "Philip Merton. An old friend of Jerome's."

She drew the girl into the living room, thinking she was right about Belinda's beauty. It didn't matter what she wore. Today it was a green tweed suit with a yellow scarf twisted at her neck. She seemed keyed up and that was becoming too.

"Phil, here's Belinda dropping in just when I wanted to show her to you."

"I'm so delighted that I lingered." Merton's connoisseur's eyes went over the girl and were pleased. He didn't hesitate. "I've just been telling Clare, whom I will not call your grandmother when she looks as she does, that she must bring you to dine with me. I've a funny old house, with a funny old cook ——"

"I would love to come," said Belin

"And I shall have to find a young you. Unless you prefer to supply one. a special young man?" asked Merto

She mustn't suggest bringing Hen per. I couldn't let her do that, thoug with apprehension.

"That depends," said Linda. "Wh invited to dinner?"

"Next Saturday. At eight, Clare?"

"It just happens that a man I kno Clare shuddered inwardly; she must s Then she heard Belinda going on pl "He's in the service and he'll have a leave. But please don't include us unle

"Is that the same young man Jero met and liked?" asked Clare.

"Peter Sulgrave," said Belinda, s like someone else.

But when Clare had closed the Merton and returned to the living r saw the girl who had been there wit Cowper. Belinda was standing by the in the very place where she had st him. She's re-creating it. She's come something, thought Clare.

"Thank you for letting us come t night, Clare," said Belinda without "You've always been my favorite g know," said Clare, "ever since you little thing. Jerome's favorite one too

"I loved to stay in your house. T so much light and color. Your hou how to live so well, Clare. What h done with it?"

"Locked it up," said Clare. "Of co all tell me I should sell it."

"Should you? Why?"

"Widows used to get themselves neries," said Clare. "Now they're sup get to apartments. It's a big house. I be. Jerome was a big man."

"You're tall, too," said Belinda. "I ber that Jerome called the house citadel."

Clare laughed aloud. The sudden was delicious. "He did, didn't he? A was a reason. He knew I never felt s I married him."

"The other night I tried to tell He happy you were," said Belinda.

"I liked your Henry." Dear heav was exactly what she should not hav

"Not mine," said Belinda.

"I didn't mean that," said Clare, useless laugh. "It's just my way of id people with the ones who bring them She went on hurriedly: "He seems ve gent. Quite charming. I can see why joy his company."

There was no answer. Clare told You can't dodge this any longer. Yo let Belinda believe that because you ha with her and Henry Cowper you are be an accomplice in this affair. Speak her how you feel.

"But it's not particularly wise, is it Isn't it futile? From what I've heard uation—and Henry told me the sa when you were out of the room—he a divorce. Isn't that true?"

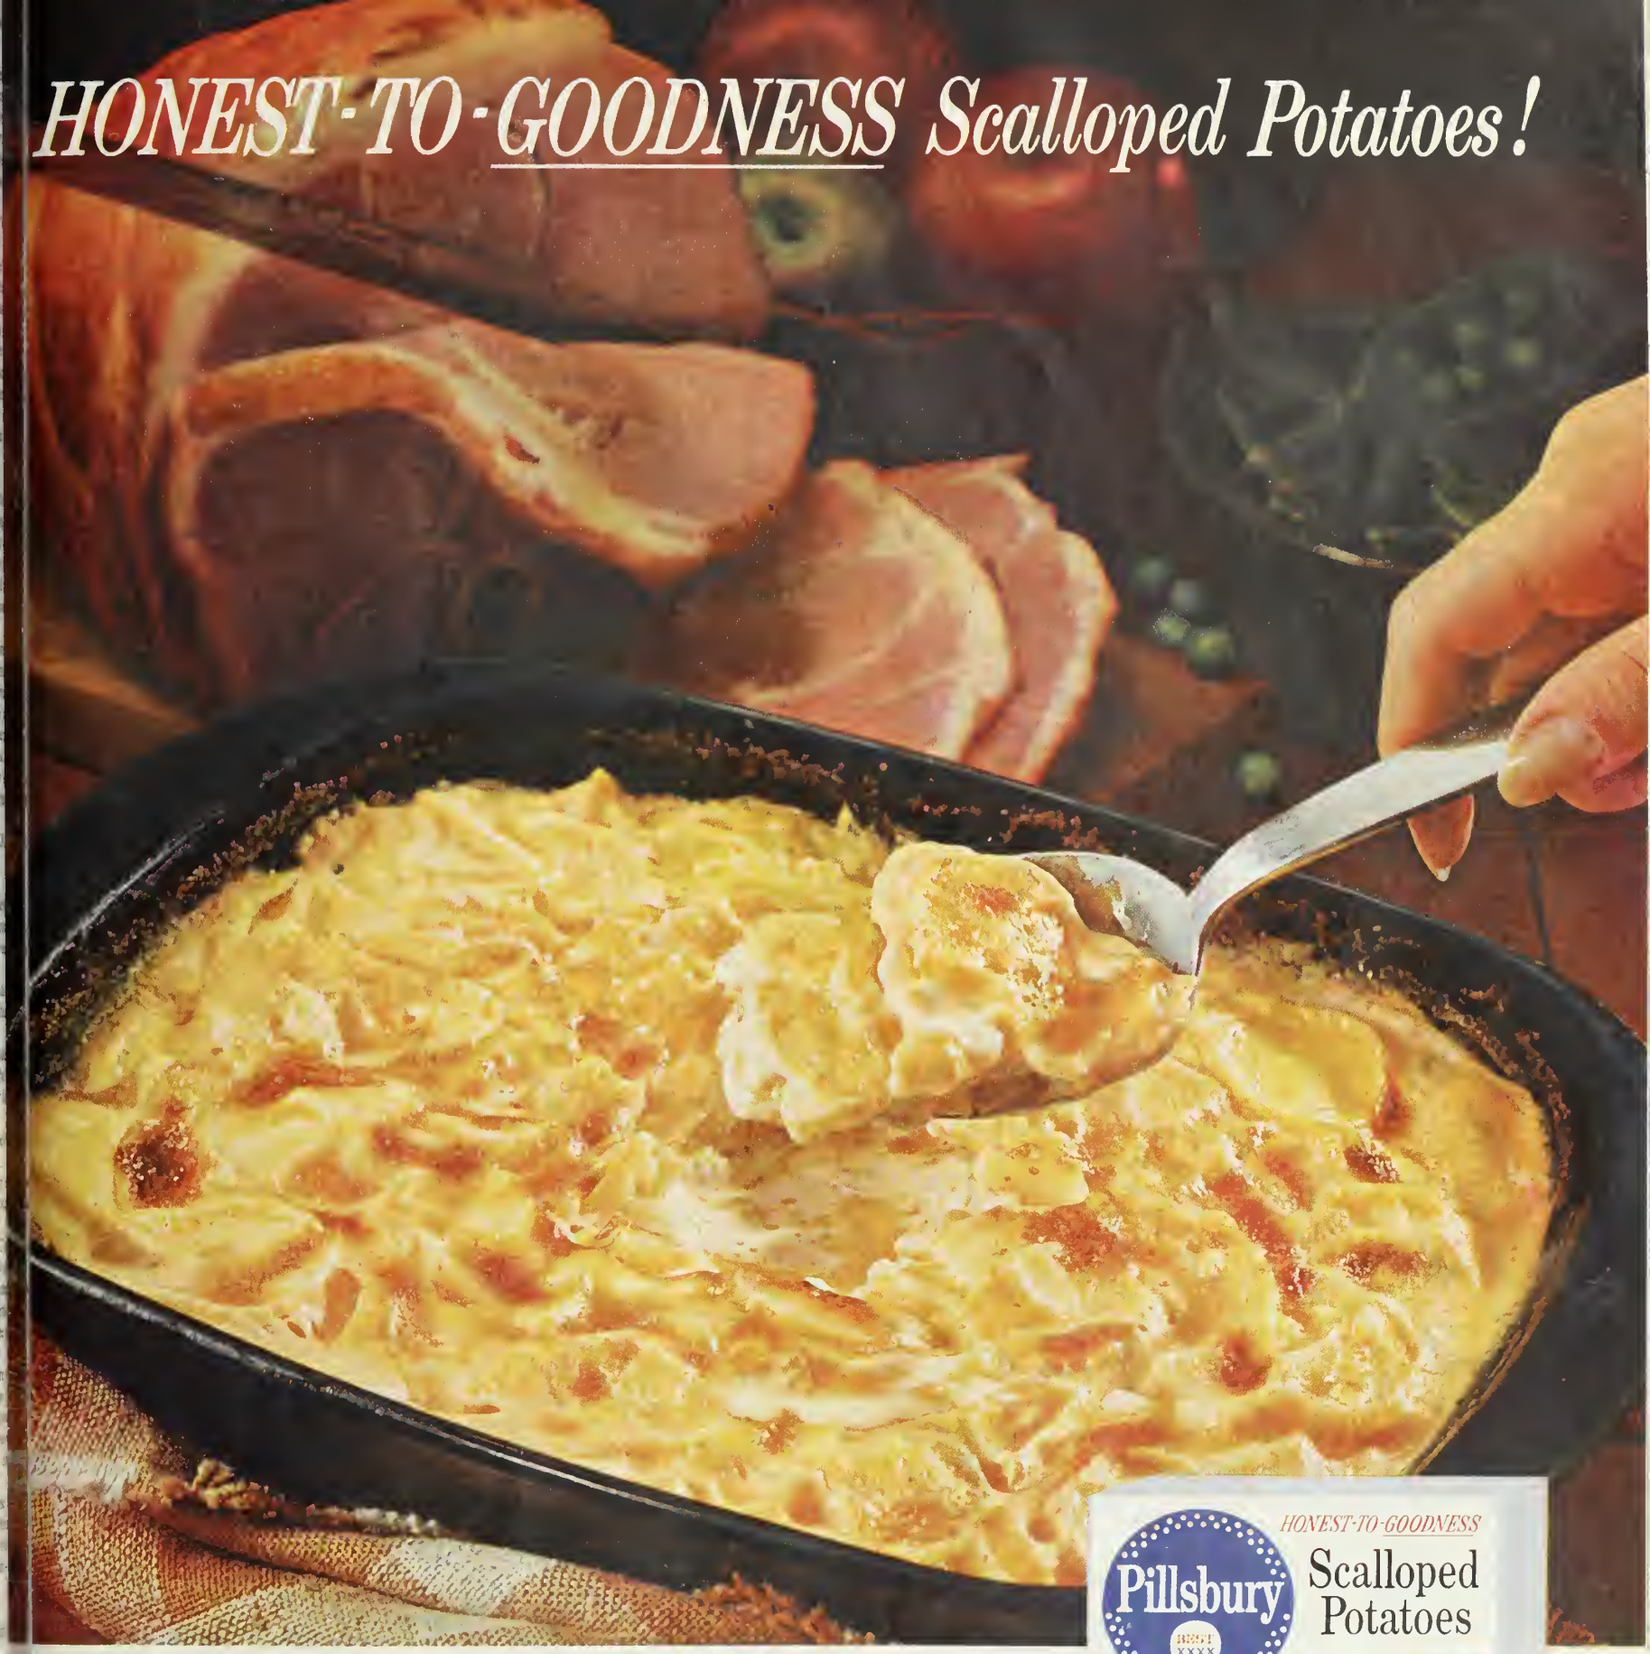
"Yes."

"It's a dead-end relationship. It c to marriage."

"It didn't have to lead to marriage

"You think that now," said Clar "At first it is always a brave adventu the bitterness sets in."

"Bitterness would never set in," linda.



"You don't know how it is, Linda moralizing about this. I'm not talkin the right or wrong of the feeling you for each other. I know this happens like a serious accident that they aren't blame for. You've stumbled into the relationship on earth. And the mo the people involved are, the more cr

"That's true," said Belinda. "O right about that. It was why Henry over things. He has to feel honoral happy. Even to be comfortable."

Like Jerome, thought Clare. An i look from a porter or a waiter could squirm. It could infuriate him.

CONTINUED ON

HONEST-TO-GOODNESS Scalloped Potatoes!

Ah·h! And just 2 minutes to the oven!

Because Pillsbury puts a magic Sauce Mix in the package, too!

Now, any night: scalloped potatoes baked to a golden finish just like these! Season them (superbly!) with our Sauce Mix which turns like magic into flavor-y thickening. No "kitchen" work, just "oven" work! Slim potato slices come ready to pour right into the casserole. Bake 'til they bubble and brown. Fit to go with your nicest ham: honest-to-goodness scalloped potatoes!

Try these potatoes from Pillsbury, too!

Hash Browns. Steak-house style. Ready to simmer, then fry.

Mashed. In f-l-a-k-e-s, for fluff and flavor!

Try all 3!

HONEST-TO-GOODNESS potatoes from PILLSBURY

90th Anniversary Year

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 146

"The more decent, the more cruel," repeated Belinda. "Why couldn't something happy and harmless be left alone? Just because he is a good man?"

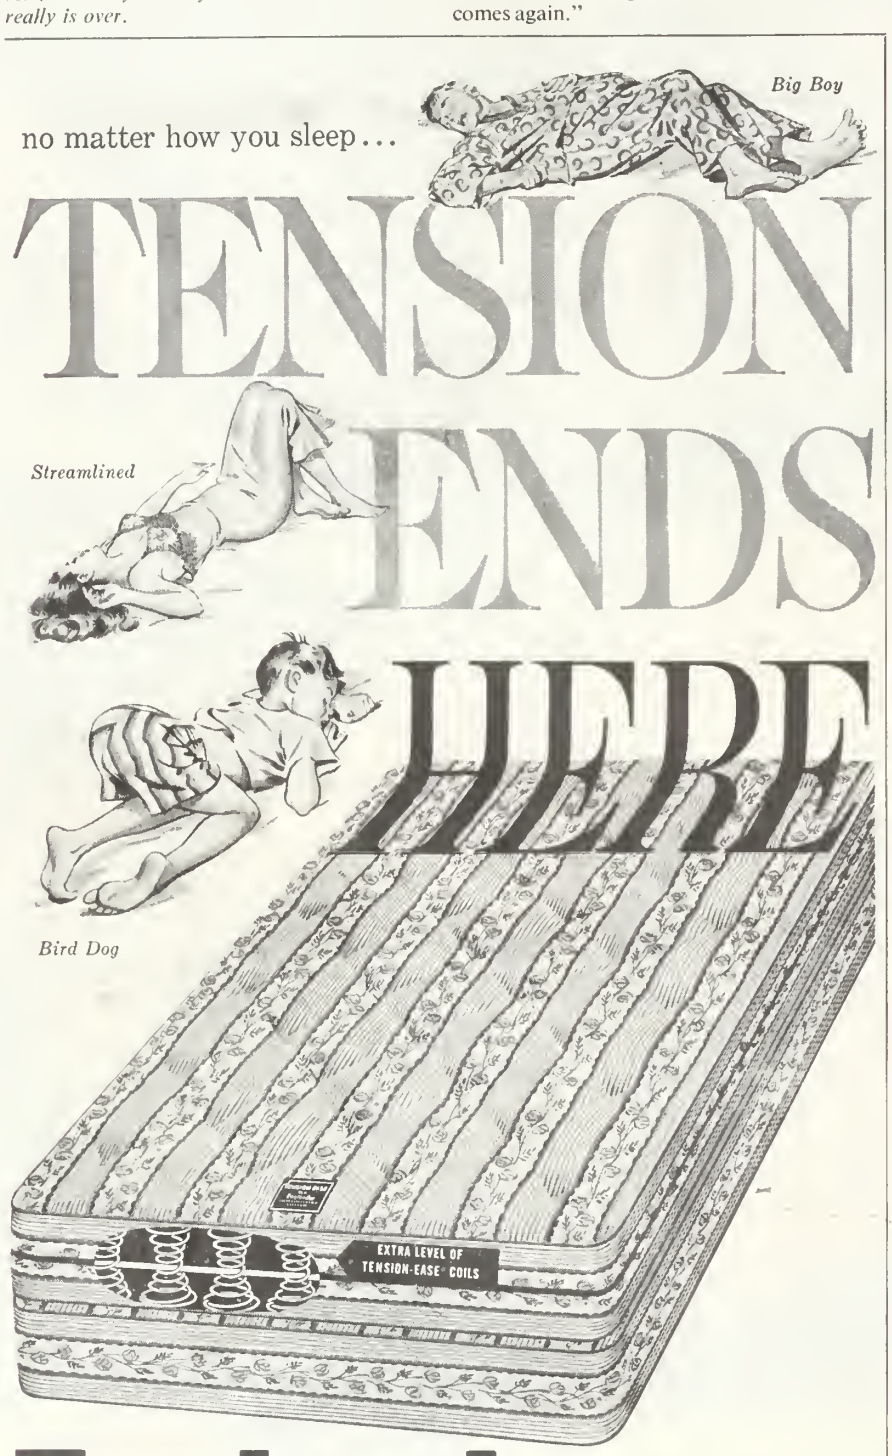
"It's not harmless, Linda. Not for you. It's not what you should have."

"All I ever wanted," said Belinda, "was what belonged to us."

They must have quarreled, thought Clare. She sounds so despairing. She speaks as if it were past. There are always those terrible quarrels, those days when you think that this time it really is over.

"He's had so little happiness," said Linda. "He hardly knew what it was like to be happy. He was learning—so was I ——" She stopped, blocked by some prospect that defeated her.

"Henry is still in Washington?"



"Yes."

"I would like to see him again," said Clare. "When is he coming back?"

"He isn't coming back. He's going out to Chicago. Where he lives."

"But he said the other night ——"

"His plans have changed," said Linda. "I'm not going to see Henry any more. Not even when he comes again. I won't know if he comes again."

Englander

TENSION·EASE mattress

Lie down. Feel that tense, tight feeling drain away. Feel your body become calm . . . relaxed. This is the first mattress designed to help you unwind!

The Englander Tension-Ease is the only firm mattress specially made to relieve tension . . . because it's the only mattress made with an extra level of Tension-Ease coils. The lower coils give you firm, healthful support, while the upper coils relax your body to ease away tension. And because of this exclusive construction, the Tension-Ease mattress is truly sag-proof.

Every Englander Tension-Ease mattress is identified by a red line around the border. Available in your choice of Innerspring (shown) or Airfoam†, $79.75.

© 1960 The Englander Company, Inc. * T. M. The Englander Company, Inc. † T. M. The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company

If that's true, everything is all right. They've come to their senses, thought Clare. But the girl's voice and the sight of the bereft figure at the window sickened her.

"You've decided that's best?"

"Henry decided it. Something happened in Washington—somebody interfered, there was something cruel. It wasn't mother. I asked him that, but he said he hadn't talked to her. He said there was nothing else he could do. That was the night before last. He telephoned. He sounded dead. Not just tired or worried—I know his voice when he's that way—this was much worse. He said it was . . . better for me." Her voice mocked the last three words.

"He must love you very much, Linda."

"He does."

"It's a horrible shock—I know how hard it is—I'm so sorry ——"

Linda said, "Do you know why I came here tonight? Because this was the place where we were really happy for the last time. He wasn't at all sure he ought to come—and then, when we got here, he loved it. It was wonderful, so family, and everything he liked . . . and you didn't make us feel that anything was wrong—until he had that last bit of talk with you ——"

"You believe this was because of what I said to Henry?" Clare remembered that she had said he must break it off, if Belinda would not.

"Oh, no. He told me you were kind. I really don't think it was because of what happened in Washington, whatever that was. It was something in himself ——"

"I'm sure you're right. I was never perceptive enough to realize that about Jerome ——"

She cut her words off. She was saying too much. But if Linda had heard, it meant nothing to her. She had room for no more than one thought now. For another moment she was silent and then said she must go.

"Have dinner with me," begged Clare. "We'll go over to the club. You won't have to talk."

"I can't. I have to get some work done. Don't worry about me, Clare. I'll be seeing you soon."

"On Saturday night? Will you really come to Phil's dinner?"

"I rather liked him," said Belinda. "He certainly doesn't pretend to be anything but a snob. I'll come."

"Shall I pick you up, or were you in earnest about bringing that young man?"

"I'll have to bring Pete if I come at all. I've a date with him. He called me last night." She met Clare's eyes. "Henry thinks that I ought to go out with other men. He doesn't want me to be alone. He hates that most of all. So I promised that I wouldn't do anything crazy—that I'd take care of myself and try to be happy. I don't want Henry to worry about me. That's all I can do for him—all—well, it's Philip Merton, isn't it? Where does he live?"

"Sixty-first Street. And there's nothing I can do for you?"

Belinda hesitated. "There's mother," she said. "Will you take care of that? She will be glad. But don't let her ever tell me so."

After Philip Merton's perfect dinner, the card tables were set up. Peter Sulgrave glanced at Belinda with pleading and she went to her host to say good-by.

"Will you forgive us if we go, Mr. Merton? Peter is a dancer and his leave is so short," she told him.

"Of course, my dear. You were kind to come."

Clare lifted her face for Belinda's kiss. "Have a good time. And if you are late and happen to be close to my place when your evening is over, remember that I have an extra bed," said Clare. "I'll leave an extra key for you at the desk just in case."

"I'll probably go home. But thank you, Clare."

When Clare got back to the hotel, it was long past midnight. She did not expect Belinda to come. But Clare was wakeful. She lay in bed thinking of the people she had been with tonight. Then she heard the tiny clink of a key—Belinda had come after all. The luminous dial of the clock on the bedside table showed that it was three o'clock.

The girl came into the bedroom with almost no sound.

Clare said, "Don't try to be quie Lin
I'm not asleep."

"Did I wake you?"

"No, I've not been asleep. I didn get myself until after one, and I've been lyg h thinking about my sins and other eopl virtues." She snapped on the light bde h and pushed up her pillow. "I'm so ad y came."

"I didn't want to go home," said Binda

"Did you have fun?"

"We danced. Then went to Reub 's a talked for a while."

"Peter is a very personable boy. M ."

"He's twenty-five," said Belinda, pull her dress over her head. She was shad y th
"He finished his law course before w into the Navy. He'll make a very gd la yer."

"He might make a good husban to said Clare. "You'll find a nightdres in second drawer in the highboy."

Belinda found one and slipped it n. S shook out her hair and sat down on he edge of the other bed.

"I hope I won't disturb you," she sd.

Clare laughed. "You used to say stu
when you were a child. And you we w scrupulous about not doing it. I lov nav you here. That empty bed can drive i cr sometimes."

"Yes," said Belinda, as if she under od
"Put that blanket around your sho der you're going to sit there."

Belinda did it absently. "Clare, c I you something?"

"Anything."

"What was my grandfather like? n rome. The real one."

Building boys is better than me ing men. REV. I. W. WILLIAMSON

It was a completely unexpected st and Clare hesitated. She must answ th estly.

"He was a fascinating person," s sa
"Clever. Handsome. He was a restles ma
"Were you in love with him?"

"I must have thought so."

"As much as you were with Jerome

"Oh no—no, it was very differen T.
bedazzled me. And I was so young ne married him. I don't suppose I had he pacity then for a profound love."

"How old were you?"

"Not quite twenty-one. I was jus we when I got out of college and came N York. And girls were greener—muc m unsophisticated than they are today."

"I was wondering," said Belinda, if y could feel the same way twice. About o ferent people. I can't imagine you be married to anyone except Jerome."

"Nor can I. I don't think I was tua Of course Tony was my legal husba . A we had a child, though he never s y mother, you know. But with Jerome wa real marriage."

"I don't believe you can contrive m
riage," said Belinda.

"You can create one," Clare sai gen
"Peter wants to marry you, doesn't he

"Yes. That's what we were talkin ab tonight. Before I knew Henry I thou t th perhaps I might marry Peter. I hadn ro ised. I suppose I was waiting—I kno I w
But I wanted to marry—you natural th about it. Living alone is so unfinis d—temporary for a girl. And there is a cle qu ity about Peter. So many men are s H not."

"If you felt once that you coul ma
Peter, you will probably feal that way ga
"What he'd get from me now wou n't good enough."

"Does he know about Henry?"

"He knows there was someone. So on can't marry, so Peter thinks it doesn't att That I'd forget. That he could wa it out."

"And don't you think he may be ght

CONTINUED ON P

ow to Turn a $5.00 Raise into a $1,000 Bonus

Wishing won't turn a $5 a week raise nto a $1,000 bonus, but it's easy to lo. If you take that $5 raise and put t into U. S. Savings Bonds you can buy a $25.00 Bond a month (cost 18.75) and have money left over. If ou keep buying one of these Bonds month for 40 months you'll have your big bonus—Bonds worth $1,000 at maturity.

It's a pretty smart idea to save a raise. It's money you didn't have before and shouldn't miss. But, whether you've just gotten a raise, or not, why don't you ask your employer to include you in the Payroll Savings Plan?

Why U.S. Savings Bonds are such a good way to save

• You can save automatically with the Payroll Savings Plan. • You now earn $3\frac{3}{4}\%$ interest to maturity. • You invest without risk under U. S. Government guarantee. • Your money can't be lost or stolen. • You can get your money, with interest, anytime you want it. • You save more than money; you help your Government pay for peace. • You can buy Bonds where you work or bank.

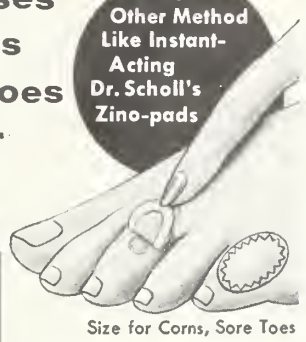
EVEN IF YOUR BONDS ARE DESTROYED, YOUR MONEY IS SAFE. Your Bonds are recorded in your name at the Treasury. If anything happens to them the Government replaces them free.

AT SHOULD HE DO WITH AN EXTRA $5 A WEEK? He can spend it, of course. But, if he buys a $25.00 U. S. Savings Bond each month for 40 months with his $5 a week raise, he is going to have Bonds worth $1,000.

You save more than money with U. S. Savings Bonds

YOU SAVE MORE THAN MONEY. You help save the things worth living for. Every Bond dollar helps keep America strong to preserve the peace.

Every Savings Bond you own—old or new—earns ½% more than ever before when held to maturity.



The U. S. Government does not pay for this advertisement. It is donated by this publication in cooperation with the Advertising Council and the magazine publishers of America.

ADVERTISING COUNCIL · PUBLIC SERVICE ·

Corns

Callouses
Bunions
Sore Toes
Tender Spots

No Other Method Like Instant-Acting Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads

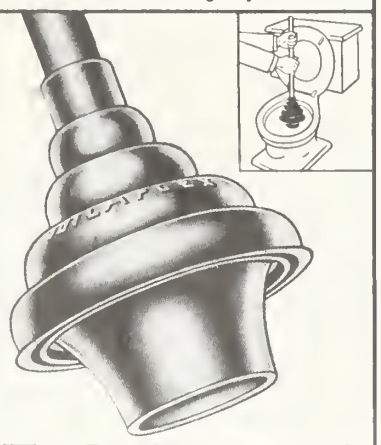
Size for Corns, Sore Toes

SPECIAL SIZES FOR

Super-Fast Relief!

Multiple-acting Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads do more for you by far than any other method. Zino-pads end pain of corns, callouses, bunions, sore toes in a jiffy . . . stop corns, callouses before they can develop . . . remove corns, callouses one of the quickest ways known to medical science when used with the separate Medications included. Water-repellent. See how they stay on in bath.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads



FEET HURT, BURN?

Dr. Scholl's Foot Balm quickly relieves foot discomfort caused by exertion. Very soothing and refreshing. Costs but a trifle. Try it!

Dr Scholl's FOOT BALM

CLOGGED TOILETS
cleared in a jiffy!

'TOILAFLEX'
Toilet ALL-ANGLE Plunger

Ordinary plungers don't seat properly, forcing air and water to splash back. Thus you have a mess and you lose the very pressure needed to clear the clogging mass.

With "Toilaflex", designed for toilets, no air or water can escape. The patented, tapered tail forms an air-tight fit: the full pressure plows through the obstruction and swishes it down. Can't miss!

$2.65 fully guaranteed

AT MOST HARDWARE STORES
Higher in Canada

GOTTSCHALK'S metal sponges

For 45 years, housewives' favorite for cleaning and scouring utensils, tiles, metal, porcelain and enamelware, floors, woodwork. Efficient, long lasting, harmless to hands and fine finishes. Sold everywhere—demand original Gottschalk's Metal Sponges. Gottschalk Metal Sponge Sales Corp., Phila. 40.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 148

"No," said the girl with her curious sureness.

"Marriage is happier than any relation between a man and woman outside of it, Linda."

"Is it?" asked Belinda. She leaned across the bed, turned off the light and said good night again. Then she lay very still, like the little girl who would not cling to anyone for comfort.

She doesn't believe that's true, thought Clare in the darkness. How can I convince her? I know it's true. Jerome and I were far happier after we were married. The worry was gone, and there was the sureness and the pride. I was never so happy—but wasn't I? When I had nothing from Jerome but love and could give him nothing else, I used to walk on air.

They had met one night in New York at 21, which was the most notable of all the speakeasies. The home offices of Charters Electric had always been in St. Ives, but much of its financing was done in New York and that brought Jerome Tarrant, who was vice president in charge of appliances, to the big city now and then. He had seen the wine cellars before and while the rest of his party went to inspect them, Tarrant sat at a corner of the bar and watched a kind of life with which he had no connection.

He noticed the girl when she first came in. She was tall but lithe, and carried herself with confidence, though not as if she wanted or needed to attract attention. There was a man with her and they sat down at one of the small tables across the room. It was the girl who faced Jerome and he was glad of that. She was worth watching.

The man began to talk earnestly, as if continuing a discussion. The woman—Tarrant saw that she was young but not a girl—listened beautifully. She had brown-gold hair that was uncurled and shaped to her head. When she loosened her coat and flung it back against her armchair it was dramatic, for it was lined with fur more golden than her hair. She drew off her long black gloves as the waiter placed a stem glass in front of her. Every gesture she made attracted Jerome Tarrant. He watched her with pleasure and at length that drew her eyes toward him. She did not quite smile, but she did not discard his glance.

His host came back with one of the proprietors whom Jerome had met before.

"Who is the girl at the table in the corner?" asked Jerome.

The proprietor looked and answered, "That's Mrs. Delchamp. Clare Delchamp. Very well known in the literary world. It's Louis Boyd with her, the publisher."

"I believe she comes from my home town." And Jerome Tarrant added, some compulsion destroying his usual habit of reserve, "I'd like to meet her sometime."

"Let me take you over now. She won't mind." The proprietor caught Clare's eye and he waved at her and then took Jerome's elbow and moved him toward the table where the man and the girl were sitting.

"This is very bold and impudent of me," said Jerome Tarrant, "but we're a long way from home. I merely wanted to pay my respects—glad to meet you, Mr. Boyd—I mustn't interrupt."

"It's all right," said Louis Boyd, who was a gentleman and knew another when he saw one.

"I think it's very friendly of you," said Clare.

She had noticed him at the bar because he was so very handsome, so quietly observant and because he admired her. Now, as he spoke in apology and yet with dignity, she thought, I like him. His name was vaguely familiar, connected with some business or story. What had she heard about him? She remembered almost instantly. This was the man whose wife had been crippled in a hunting accident and he was completely devoted to her.

"Do sit down for a minute and tell me about the home town," she said.

During the months which followed their casual meeting in 21, she gave Jerome Tarrant no serious thought. She liked him. It had been natural that he should ask her to lunch after that first encounter, and he did. She accepted with a feeling of amused triumph—he was an important man from her home city, the first one who came from St. Ives to pay her attention.

If they had not happened to meet in a Chicago railway station on a November night, that might have been the end of it. But possibly not. For when Jerome Tarrant recognized Clare, there was a pleasure in his face which neither his dignity nor his shyness could mask. They were, they discovered, both on their way home to St. Ives and that meant an overnight trip. They dined together, lingering in the dining car until it had been deserted by all the other travelers. They finished their talk in Clare's compartment, yet were not done when they parted. By that time they were explaining themselves, as if it mattered what they thought of each other.

"It seems to me that you work very hard," he said with concern.

"It's interesting. And sometimes useful. Besides, I have to work. I have a little girl to bring up."

"And you said she lives in St. Ives?"

"Yes. It's better for a child there than in New York. She's why I dash back and forth. Fortunately I've an extraordinary housekeeper who's been with us for years and she takes wonderful care of Julia. I'd like to have her with me more, but I can when she's older."

> Beauty is power; a smile is its sword.
>
> CHARLES READE

"You're carrying a big load."

"Not too big," said Clare and suddenly felt tired and comforted.

"I hope I'll see you while you're in St. Ives," he said. "If Helen . . . if my wife were able to entertain, it would be the greatest pleasure for us—but she can't do that sort of thing ——"

"I understand perfectly," said Clare. "I'd love to have you stop by to see me and meet my child someday. Your wife doesn't go out at all?"

"No. Helen is paralyzed."

"I'm sorry."

"She doesn't suffer—that's the blessing."

"What caused it?"

"I'm afraid I did," said Jerome Tarrant. "May I tell you about it?"

"Not if it hurts you."

"I'd like to tell you. I'd like you to know—for some reason. I don't often talk about it. We were not married long when it happened. You see, I used to hunt and fish a lot—I always loved those things and I wanted Helen to enjoy them too. She had never done anything like that—she wasn't athletic in any way. I suppose I was selfish. We went on this little hunting trip. She was reluctant to go—that's why I always blame myself. I thought her gun was unloaded—I had warned her never to take a loaded gun in the car, of course, but she was inexperienced. It went off in the car—she was hit in the spine."

"But how were you to blame? How can you think it was your fault?"

He said grimly, "I was the man. I was in charge." And then, "I hope I haven't depressed you. I just wanted you to understand—I'm afraid you'll think I'm a dreary egotist."

"I think you are a very good man," said Clare, "and I don't say that lightly. I don't often link good and man."

Clare was having a conference with Maud Sothern while she was in St. Ives. It was easy to find out more.

"Do you know a man called Tarrant? Jerome Tarrant?"

"Oh, yes. Do you know Jerome?"

"I met him in New York. And we came up on the train together last night."

"Isn't it tragic?"

"You mean about his wife? He seems devoted to her."

"If ever a man was wasted," said Maud, "it's poor Jerome. Of course he has some compensation by being a huge s business, but he has no personal lif

"That's not her fault. She m Mentally if not physically."

"No, she makes quite a thing ou an invalid. There are worse things t idolized by a man without having t it. If she hadn't been hurt, she n have held Jerome Tarrant."

"Why not?"

"If she had been well she would to compete," said Maud, "do he cially. She would have had to sta comparison with other women. And hadn't the capacity. Helen was very a girl, one of those beautiful dolls tha But I went to Country Day with h put it mildly, we all knew that she w bright. She never could have kept Jerome. As it is, she doesn't have excused. She's like an exquisite piece Dresden on the shelf, to be admired carefully handled but not for ordi And Jerome sits at home and look

"He seems to feel responsible for in her," said Clare.

"I know. But he wasn't to blam you like him?"

"Very much."

"You must have been fun for h Maud. "Look, once in a while he for a drink with father and me. He n for dinner because Helen would that's why I've no patience with h think she herself would insist on his more. I'll ask him to come about fi row and you come too."

So it began. There was never a that for years when Jerome Tarran aware of Clare's arrivals at and from St. Ives. She would find the ho flowers when she came. He would dr the train when she went away. Th discuss what to do if he was comin York, what play to see, where to dir times by good luck their engagemer place them in Chicago for part of a conversations soon ceased to be impe

"But I couldn't hurt Helen."

"I wouldn't want you to, Jerome. your nature to hurt people. You' yourself."

"I never realized what I was missin years."

"Jerome, I don't want anything ex belongs to us."

The flag they flew above their rela which must be kept so exceptional an was Clare's independence. She neve rome buy a train ticket for her. Or p bill she had incurred. The thousand ers, the theaters and dinners, the caviar—those were all right. And fi kept the watch in spite of its diamon because it was Christmas and she hurt him.

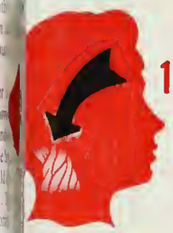
She chose her clothes for Jerom creased her expenses because she wan so beautiful, and also because if t pened to meet in Chicago she woul hotel suite so that he could call on he times he would fly in from New Yo Ives.

There were endless arguments an sions. They were sure that no one ha plored their vein of emotion before. discovered it, staked it out, had claim. There were the days when brave and noble. And there were hours.

She could not break it off. Som furious determination Clare would would be hurt or shamed for rea would not admit. For she had prom self—and Jerome—that her lack of place in his life would never make h him. She could not keep that promise had vowed that if ever he made her he would drop out of her life. That promise he could not keep.

Finally Clare was called out of a pa best-selling writer to answer the te The words came to her unbelievably.

"Helen died at six this morning. H gave out. Suddenly. It was quite peace



CONTINUED ON P.

WHAT DO DOCTORS DO FOR ENSE NERVOUS HEADACHES?

3 out of 4 recommend the ingredients in ANACIN® for headache pain

TER THAN ASPIRIN OR PRIN WITH BUFFERING

How Tension Headaches Start

1. Tension

Nervous tension builds up in neck and scalp muscles.

2. Pressure

Tension puts painful pressure on nerves and tiny blood vessels in the head.

3. Pain

Tension and pressure cause headache pain. Anacin contains special medication (not found in aspirin or any buffered aspirin) to relax tension, release pressure and relieve pain fast.

ANACIN® relaxes tension, releases pressure, relieves pain fast!

When you suffer pain from headache, neuritis or neuralgia, why not take what most doctors recommend—the ingredients in Anacin! Here is why Anacin gives more complete pain-relief. Mere aspirin or even aspirin with buffering contains only one pain reliever. They have no special medication to relax your nervous tension. Anacin contains a number of medically proven ingredients, including special medication that not only relieves pain incredibly fast, but also relaxes tension and releases painful pressure on nerves. In this way Anacin assures a better 'total' effect in relieving pain. Anacin Tablets are safer, too. They have a smoother action and do not irritate or upset the stomach. Buy Anacin today!

FOR FAST--FAST--FAST RELIEF →

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 150

"Oh, Jerome—are you all right?"

"Yes. Dazed, I guess. Poor thing."

"Jerome—don't blame yourself. Not for anything."

"I'll have to take over here for a while."

"Of course. Don't give anything else a thought."

"But Clare—I love you."

"I know—not now ——"

"Don't forget me."

The nurse studied her good looks in the mirror in her bedroom. She loosened her auburn hair, and then took the stopper out of a bottle and touched her ears with it. Sometimes scent was the first thing that made a man conscious of a woman and could lead to a desire for her. She had read that somewhere.

Henry Cowper had told her when he returned from Washington to get a substitute and take a holiday, if she wanted to. But Mrs. Merrill had not gone away. She did not want him to begin to rely on any other nurse. She wanted him to consider her indispensable.

Mrs. Merrill had never seen her employer in his present mood. There was an almost angry force in him since his return. He was grim, and the nurse thought she knew the reason for it. His little New York affair had blown up. That must be why there wasn't a smile left in him.

Mrs. Merrill wondered if the letter and clipping she had sent had been responsible for breaking up the affair. Of course one couldn't be sure. But she congratulated herself on sending them. Certainly something had happened to make Henry Cowper act like a bear with a sore head. He'd get over it. A little snip of a society girl with no morals wasn't good enough for him.

Sylvia Cowper ought to be in an institution. She was never going to be any better and she'd be a whole lot worse as time went on. The expense of the way he was taking care of her was fantastic. If he asked my advice, if he came to me about it, thought Mrs. Merrill, I could help him. I know some quite good places. But he doesn't realize that what he needs is a woman's help. She sighed, smiled at the perfection of her teeth, considered in one sweeping thought her age, the scarcity of husbands, and the necessity of not being fool enough to miss the best chance she might ever have.

"Excuse me, Mr. Cowper."

Henry looked up and saw the nurse. "Anything wrong upstairs?"

"No. Our little lady is fast asleep. I was just wondering if it would disturb you too much if I turned on the television in the living room. There's a documentary that I'd so much like to see. Since Mrs. Cowper turned against TV I don't have much opportunity to look at it," she said with bright uncomplainingness.

"Good heavens, of course I don't mind. Use that thing in there whenever you want to, Mrs. Merrill. Make yourself at home."

She came over to pick up a paper that had dropped to the floor and placed it neatly beside him. The scent she wore drifted to him. He thought, Why do women use that stuff? Belinda never does. She's so clean, so natural, so beautiful ——

He put down the magazine he was trying to read and hunted in the pile for a more absorbing one. They all looked alike to him. Through the doorway he could hear a confusion of voices on the television and see the nurse, her red head catching the light. Henry got up restlessly and she was aware of it on the instant.

"The program's just coming on. You might enjoy it, Mr. Cowper." She was thinking, If he does come in to watch it, I might suggest making a highball for him. I won't take one myself. Though there's no reason why not. If he once gets used to a little woman in the evenings when he's home, it would be the best thing in the world for him. No one ever comes in any more. One thing leads to another.

She smiled up at him in a companionable way, but Henry was staring past her at the television screen. The facts revealed in this picture are based on research done by the editors of Today Magazine. Its current article on abortions tells the story that is pictured here.

"I hope the subject doesn't shock you, Mr. Cowper."

Henry was thinking of Belinda in the Oak Room at the Plaza. He could almost see her, hear her saying to Bob Sheldon, "Right now I'm getting statistics on abortion." She had said it so simply, without any embarrassment. He thought, Belinda was never embarrassed. Or afraid. There she was in the station with her head up, waiting to see me off that night. Or to go with me. And I left her. I ran away. I let them scare me, lick me, give me orders about my life, my love. Now I'm afraid to go back to New York because I couldn't keep away from her. I know I couldn't. I don't intend to.

He said, "I'm leaving for New York tomorrow, Mrs. Merrill."

She wore a blue shirt, cut like a boy's. Her cheeks were hollowed more deeply, her forehead as serene. Her hair fell in the waves he remembered. When she saw him, she closed her eyes unbelievingly.

"Oh, my darling—oh, Belinda ——"

"I didn't know it was you. I didn't think it would ever be you."

"It had to be. This can't go on. I've done everything wrong. But from now on you will always come first. Always. Belinda, do you still care? A little?"

Her smile wavered at that foolishne

After a little they were comforted. prise the shock was delight and th exult over not having missed each o cause she had planned to go out in hour.

"But you won't go now?"

"I don't have to," she told him. "H can you stay?"

"I've a plan. I'll tell you."

"It must be a good one. You're Henry. You're happier."

"Things are going very well with with my love again."

"And not bothered?"

"Never that again, my darling."

"Your wife?"

"She's about the same. No better ever we do doesn't matter to her now will. I've known that for a long time worrying about keeping up a false phony reputation. When I took a lon myself finally. I didn't like the guy I sa

"I always did."

"You'll like me better from now on

NEXT MONT

Eleven families lived peaceabl Peaceable Lane. One moved o threatening to sell to a Negro— then there was none in peace. Ins there were cruelty and fear, viol and arson. For Matt Jones, who to hold back the tides of unreason job, even the safety of his wife child were at stake.

PEACEABLE LANE

By KEITH WHEELER

Complete in the October JOURN condensed from the novel soon to be published by Simon & Schuster

"How is your work going?"

"We'll talk about that day after to Or the day after that. If we can spare t Now where would you like to go?"

"For dinner?"

"And breakfast."

Her eyes grew larger, darker.

"Linda," he said gently, "will you g with me for a little while?"

"People would know."

"A few people, perhaps. But our l long to us. I wish I could promise wouldn't have to come back, Linda shall have to. I have to earn money, bills, take care of things out there—th one else to do it. You wouldn't lik didn't. But I shall never leave you, n even when I can't be with you. It's not for you—they'll condemn me, and t right—but no man ever offered a w deeper love than I have for you ——"

"It's all I want. Henry, without you a real person. I'm not myself. The ma goes on. I breathe. But I don't feel—I and I can't. Now I've come to life Where are we going?"

"Where would you like to go?"

"Could we find the spring?" asked "I know where it is now, south, bel mountains. I would like to go to a pla I have never been before—do we know where we are going?"

"I thought we might rent a car."

"Could we?" she asked rapt "Won't it cost too much? I have some but not very much."

"Hush" he said. "Nice girls don about money."

"All right—watch me cling. But we do it, Henry. They—back where yo

CONTINUED ON PA

ONLY

Fleischmann's Margarine

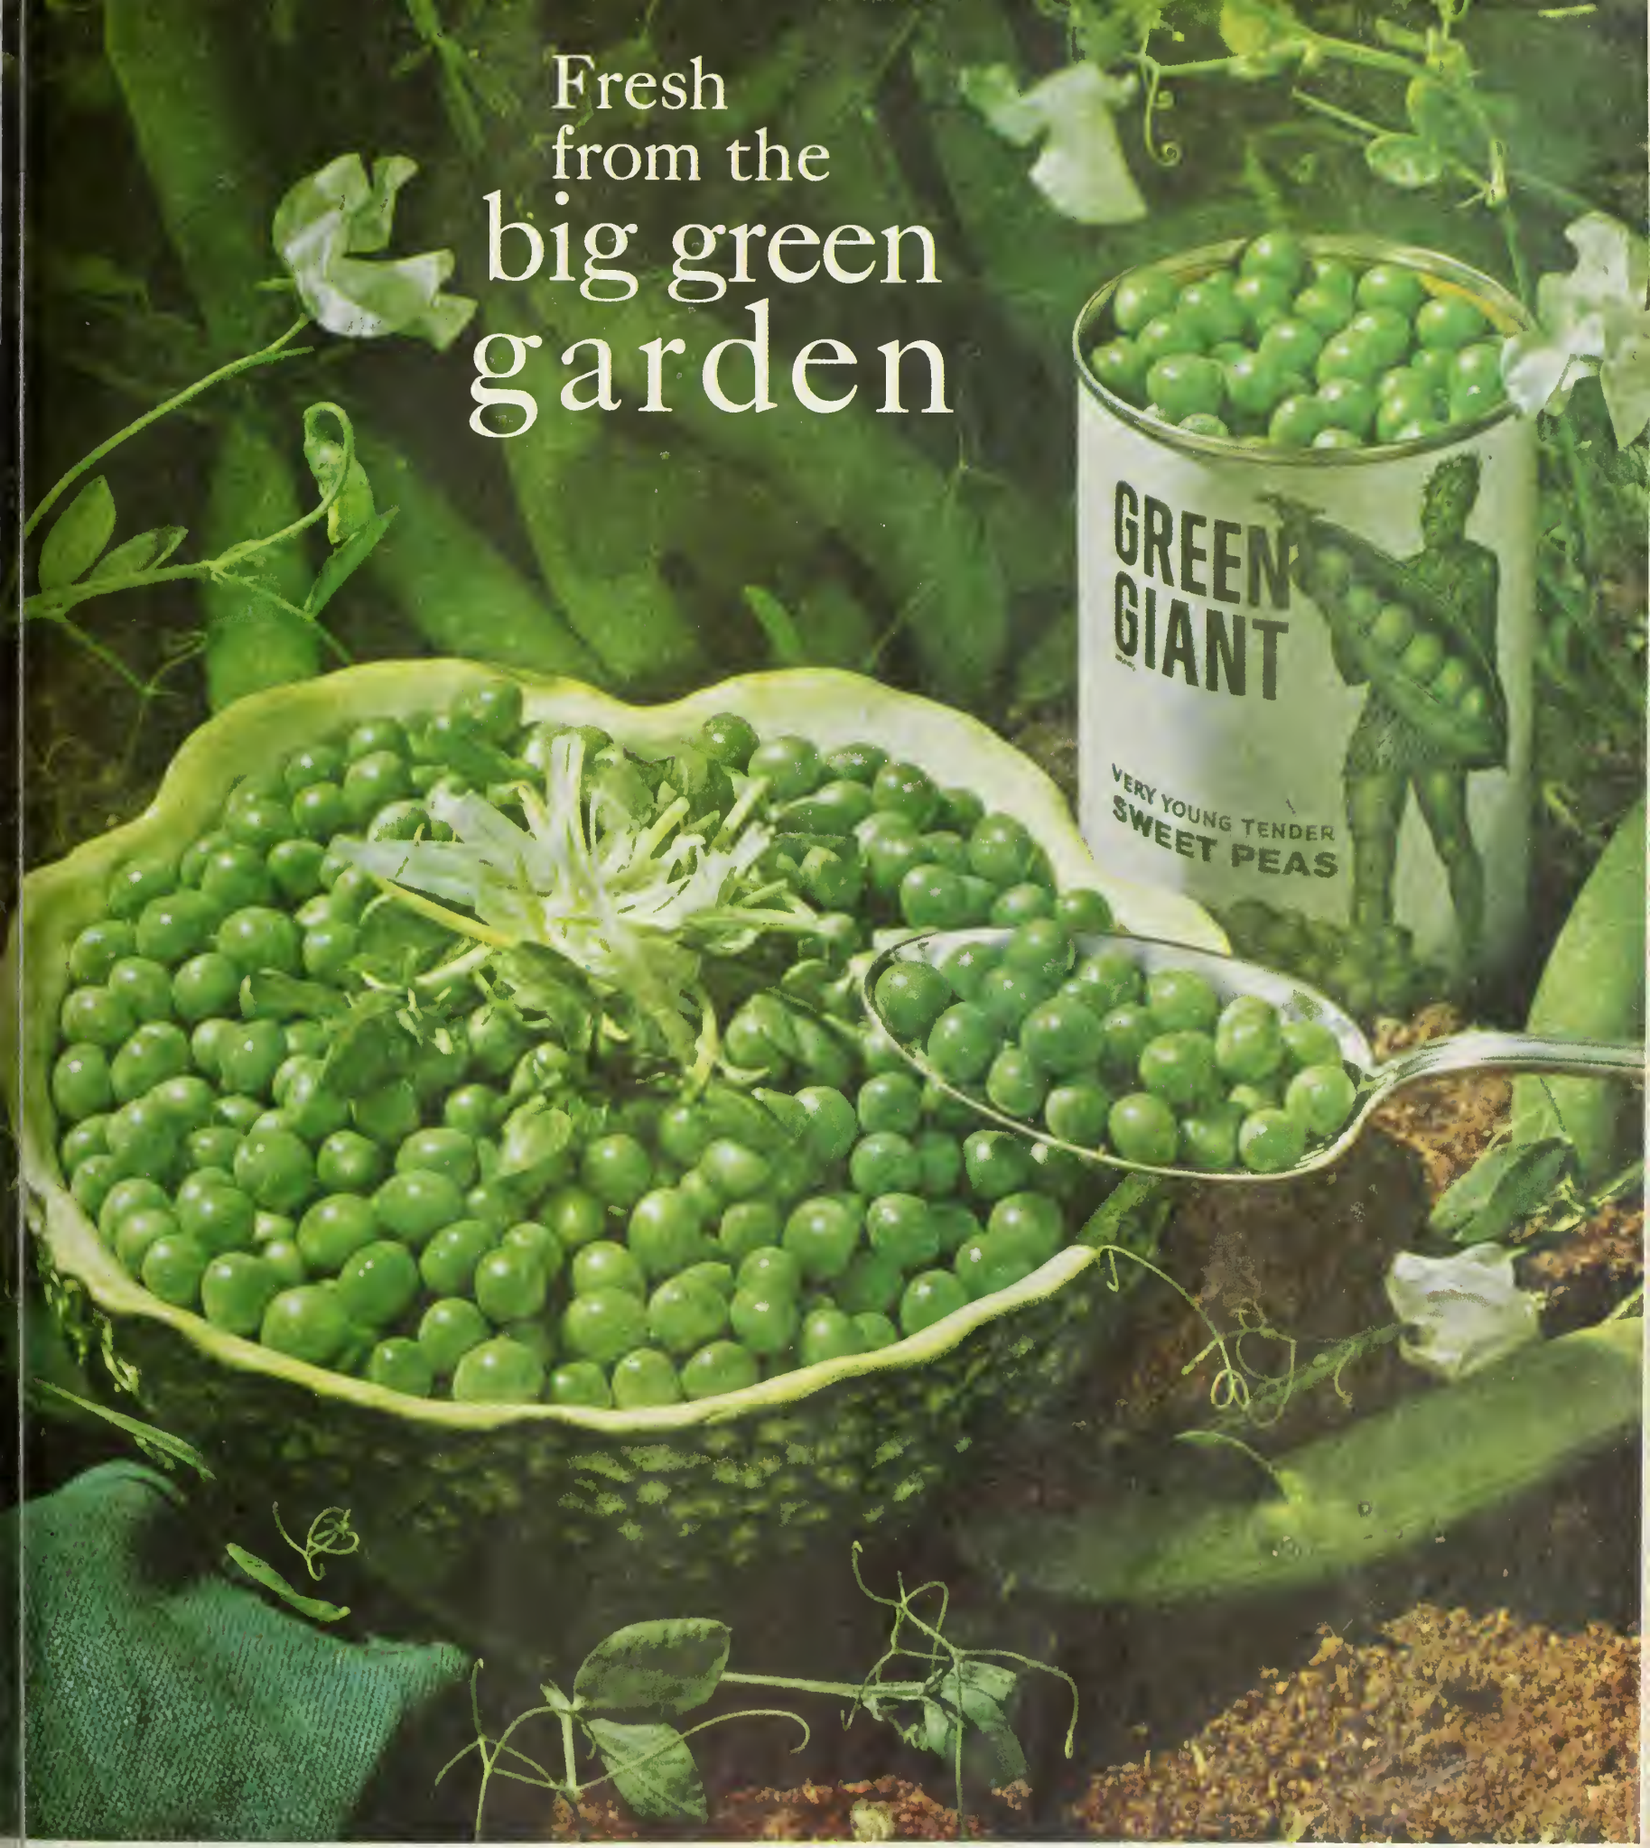
brings your family the goodness of

100% Corn Oil*

By the Makers of Fleischmann's Yeast

100% GOLDEN CORN OIL* BRINGS THESE IMPORTANT BENEFITS TO FLEISCHMANN'S MARGARINE

High nutrition and energy values . . . Light, delicate flavor . . . Extra-smooth spreadability!



*At last, nutrition experts have scientifically perfected a margarine made from 100% golden corn oil. It's new Fleischmann's Margarine . . . partially hydrogenated to give it a flavor so delicious you can hardly believe it. And Fleischmann's Margarine has a finer texture, too, for extra-smooth spreadability.

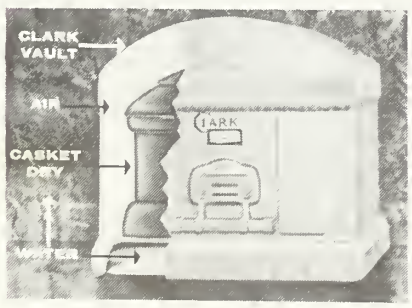
Yes, Fleischmann's flavor is more delicate than the taste of ordinary margarines made from a mixture of vegetable oils. It has a golden taste just like the high-price spread. Try Fleischmann's Margarine.

Fleischmann's CORN OIL MARGARINE

QUICK VARIETY TRICK with Green Giant peas. Chop fresh green onion into small bits and mix through peas. Season, butter and heat.

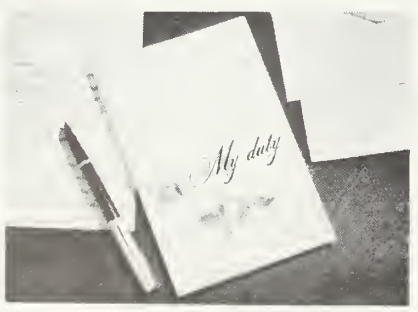
Just once to every pea comes that high moment when seed, soil, sun and rain have done their best. When flavor and tenderness are at their peak. Whether day or night, it's then the Green Giant picks and packs his famous sweet ones. Green Giant Brand sweet peas. Taste the difference perfect timing makes.

Green Giant®



Good things from the garden

GREEN GIANT CO., HDQRS., LE SUEUR, MINN.; GREEN GIANT OF CANADA LTD., TECUMSEH, ONT. "GREEN GIANT" BRAND REG. U.S. PAT. OFF. © GGCO.



When the time comes for you to take charge . . . Will you know?

- how soon the family should call the funeral director?
- how best to take care of the one most deeply bereaved?
- who should be notified right away, in addition to relatives?
- how to select pallbearers?
- what to look for in selecting a casket?
- why it's important to select a proper grave vault at the same time?
- how to be sure it protects against water in the ground?
- whether the closest relatives are expected to greet callers at the home?

How a Clark Vault provides a dry sanctuary even when the rains saturate the earth. The one-piece air-filled dome of the Clark vault is made of enduring heavy-gauge metal. It is designed to exclude water just as an air-filled tumbler does when you turn it upside down and push it under water. This trusted protection (not provided by vaults improperly engineered or made of porous material) brings ever-increasing consolation and peace of mind.

Every funeral director can furnish Clark protection. Insist on it. There is no substitute

Send for FREE 32-page booklet. "My Duty" answers above questions and many more you will face when you are the one who must take charge. It also tells how to write those difficult sympathy notes and includes many beautiful poems that have brought consolation to millions. Write, today, for your free copy. The Clark Grave Vault Co., Dept. LHJ-90, Columbus 1, Ohio.

Copr 1960

CLARK metal grave vaults

The finest tribute. The most trusted protection.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 152

is—they have to know where you are. They might need you."

"I fixed that," said Henry. "I told my secretary—I can trust her—that I might be traveling and asked her to keep in touch with the house every day. I'll call her—that's the arrangement. I didn't want to call the nurse. She's too . . . something or other. But she's good at her job. Don't think of it. You get your things packed and I'll get us a car—any particular color?"

"Yellow as a daffodil!"

"Yellow it will be. I'll be back in an hour."

At the hotel Henry also sent a telegram to Mr. P. L. Yost, president, the Victor Company. He wrote it quickly and with decision.

"This is the best breakfast yet," said Belinda.

Henry looked at her plate and grinned. "Breakfast with you is a theory, not a meal."

"It's a bridge," she said, "between the night and the day. The view from it can be beautiful. You look wonderful this morning."

"I should."

"We've had ten breakfasts," said Belinda. "Do you remember the first one?"

"I certainly do. When we ran away from the motel early and drove fifty miles before we found a place that was open for breakfast. Do we have to go today?"

"We decided on today."

Henry pushed away his cup. "I know. But how am I going to know you're all right? That you're not going to have a baby?"

"Would it seem so dreadful?"

"It would be the most wonderful thing in the world if it were possible. But it mustn't happen to you. Of course there isn't more than an outside chance."

Belinda said, "Henry, we were never going to be frightened again."

"I know. I'm not really. It won't happen. But I'd like to stay with you until we're sure."

She shook her head. "It was only going to be a week. Staying longer won't make it easier."

"And I have to find a job," said Henry.

She knew all about that now. He had told her everything that had happened as the yellow car sped along the highways, its top flung back. They had faced consequences and penalties in those unfamiliar rooms which had felt like homes and which they would never see again.

"You're sure of that?" she said.

"Oh, yes. They can't do anything else. They'll have to put in a new man. They need Senator Hume's support too much."

"It's going to hurt."

"Nothing can hurt me very much as long as you love me, Linda."

"Then you'll never feel a pang. Let's have a last look at the dogwood trees before you load the car," she said.

"Mr. Yost, I appreciate all you have done for me. I wish there were some way to show my gratitude. I've been honored to have a place in your company and I've enjoyed the work. But ——"

Mr. Yost offered no help.

"The thing is," said Henry, "that I feel that a man has to decide for himself what he is justified or right in doing."

"Within the law," Mr. Yost remarked.

Henry said stiffly, "There's nothing to be gained by a discussion of my personal situation."

"What else is there to discuss?" asked Mr. Yost.

"Well," said Henry, "as to that, I can only say that I felt Senator Hume's interference with my private life was unjustified. I thought at first I could come to terms with it. I could not. It not only seemed very cowardly on my part, but it involved other things, other obligations that I could not overlook."

"Hume is your wife's uncle, isn't he?" Mr. Yost asked.

"Yes. I can understand how he must feel about her condition. It's an appalling thing. But except in marrying her, which she desired as much as I did, I am not to blame for her . . . illness. Nor was she. The doctors tell me that it was probably inevitable. If I've left a stone unturned to bring Sylvia back to normality, I don't know where it is."

"Very sad," said Mr. Yost without emphasis.

"Senator Hume does not understand the situation. He believes, or pretends to believe, that I could change it by—well, by a normal domestic life. That's not true. My wife is a prey to obsessions. She hardly knows me. I have given her every protection and care that is in my power and I'll always continue to do so. I can't give her what she doesn't understand or want—or what isn't in me to give."

"What did Hume want you to do that you are not doing?"

"He's probably told you."

"I would rather hear it from you."

"Very well, sir. He was aware of the fact that I have a deep attachment—that I love—Henry gave the word its full value—"another woman. Who loves me. There is nothing cheap, nothing ephemeral in what we feel. I have never honored any person as I do her. Senator Hume is acquainted with her family. He issued an ultimatum that I was not to see the person I mention again. If I did so he would withdraw his support from the Victor Company. I was insulted and greatly troubled. I have a real devotion to your company. I tried to submit my feelings to his order. It's not been possible. And since that is the case, I came in this morning to hand in my resignation."

"May I ask what you intend to do?"

"Well, I'll have to find another job. I've no prospect of anything like the connection I have here, but I've a good deal of technical training and it ought to be worth something. Enough to take care of my responsibilities, I hope."

> One cannot always be a hero, but one can always be a man.
>
> BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

"You will continue to be under the burden of great expense?"

"Naturally," said Henry. "But I'll make it all right."

"Pardon me for asking"—Mr. Yost's voice was courteous—"but do you intend to support two establishments?"

"There will be no question of that."

"In spite of the great affection you bear the lady?"

"Belinda," said Henry slowly, using her name for the first time, perhaps because Mr. Yost's tone now made it possible, or perhaps because it made the decision so personal, "wants nothing from me which she believes to belong to my legal wife. She is like that. She thinks that we must not continue to see each other even at intervals, nor at all unless there is a serious reason for our meeting. She wants me to provide for my wife—to do my best to maintain a decent household—and I have promised to do what she wishes. She sees very straight."

"She does indeed," said Mr. Yost gravely. "Now about this resignation. I don't think we can go along with that, Henry. We need you."

"I'd only be a liability, sir. You'd get no support from Senator Hume."

"Oh, I'm not so sure of that. In any case, I don't like to see a man throw his weight around and get away with it. I've never liked a bully. I think we can weather Hume's annoyance, Henry, without sacrificing one of our men because he didn't knuckle under to the senator."

"You don't mean that, sir."

"I do indeed, Henry. I know a good man when I see him. You've had a rough time, and I fear it isn't going to be any smoother in some respects. But I trust your judgment to do what's right—or should I say the young lady's judgment and your own?"

Henry stood up, turning away. He could not speak for a moment.

But he heard Mr. Yost say, "You know Mrs. Yost thinks very highly of you, Henry."

When Clare arrived at the offices of Merton Ply and Davis, Philip Merton was ready to see her. He chose a chair for her.

nda is coming, isn't she, Philip?"

nt letters to both Mrs. Rood and fixing the time. You've been in touch m, haven't you?"

with Belinda lately. I can't reach her telephone. But if you wrote her, I'm 'll be here "

're being very generous, Clare. I know appreciate it " only what I should do. Jerome and I ed of it, but we put it off, because we she should find out what it's like to our own. What I'm giving Julia is the of what I got when I sold the agency. had to use all of it and it comes more from Julia's own father, because he one who started the business. But was Jerome's favorite, and three hundollars a month will give her some arranging to cash in that annuity of nd put the money in trust for Belinda. ou won't miss it."

—no, there's plenty for me," Clare told as things are with you now. Of course should need to provide for someone would be different."

re isn't anyone else."

Merton smiled wisely. "In one way I to hear you say that. An attractive —and one with considerable private -is apt to be sought after."

flushed, which was unusual. "Not at seem young to me. And Jerome's nust have left a great gap in your

Of course I must do something. My partner in the agency wants me to go work there."

n agency?"

the only thing I'm trained for."

't do anything hasty. I wish ——" and lia Rood came in and there were greetings.

nda's coming, isn't she, Clare?"

"I expect so. She surely would have sent word if she couldn't make it. When did you write her, Phil?"

He glanced at the correspondence before him. "On the fifteenth. A week ago."

Julia asked, "Shall we call her? She may still be at the office."

"I did call there," said Clare. "an hour ago. They said she was on vacation." She had to say it, though she did not want to.

"Vacation where?" asked Julia. "How long has she been away?"

"I don't know," said Clare. "I've tried to call her a number of times."

Julia exclaimed, "But I took it for granted that you were in touch with Linda!"

"She's not a child, Julia, she has her own life ——"

Philip Merton said, "Well, if Belinda does not come, we can always make a later appointment for her. These two settlements which Clare so generously wishes to make are not connected with each other. I think we can go over the one which concerns Mrs. Rood now ——"

But Julia was standing. "No," she said. "I'm very grateful, but I don't want to talk about it now. I'm . . . concerned about Belinda. Something must have happened. I must go to her apartment."

"I'll go with you, Julia. I'm sorry, Phil." Clare touched his hand, then followed Julia, who was already ringing for an elevator. "Don't worry, Julia ——"

Julia turned a white accusing face to Clare. "Where is my child?" she asked.

Once again Julia was asking the question, as if repetition could force an answer. They were now back in Clare's rooms. They had gone to the office of Today and learned only that Belinda was on vacation. They had gone to the apartment where Belinda lived; there was no answer to her bell. So they had come back here and Julia was walking back and forth, asking the same questions. "But where is she? Why didn't she let me know? She has never done a thing like this before!"

"Julia, she was probably tired or had a touch of spring fever and wanted to get off by herself for a few days."

"You don't believe that, Clare! She's gone off with that man."

"You have no reason to suppose that."

But I have, thought Clare. She must protect both Belinda and Julia—from each other if it was necessary—if she could.

"Try to realize, Julia, that Belinda is not a child any more. She's able to take care of herself."

"She has disappeared. Oh, this is so awful!"

"It may not be awful at all. And nothing can change the fact that she is a lovely girl ——"

"She was once. Until the bad blood came out in her!"

"Bad blood?"

"I'm sorry," said Julia in a hard voice. "I've never brought it up until now. I never meant to. We look at things differently. You always did as you pleased. No matter what people said. And now it's come out in Belinda. Did you encourage her to do this? Why did you lie to me, tell me that they had broken it off?"

"I told you the truth. What Belinda told me. And why do you say I always did as I pleased?"

"Do you think I liked to have Jerome around our house before you were married? To see you get off the same train with him? And someone would say, 'Is that your father?' and know it wasn't."

"I didn't know anyone said that to you."

"You didn't care, did you?"

"Julia, I always did my best. Jerome and I loved each other for a long time. But there was nothing to be ashamed of in that. I never loved anyone else."

"If my father had lived, you wouldn't have been faithful to him."

Her father, thought Clare. If Julia only knew of the infidelities of her father, his dislike of her conception—the long faithfulness was between me and Jerome. But I must not tell her. Let her have something to tie to, even if it's a delusion—she's in such trouble ——

"I didn't know Jerome until long after your father died," was all she answered.

"Never mind. I don't want to talk about that. It doesn't matter. I've lived it down. All that matters is Belinda!"

"If you're going to worry to distraction, perhaps we should get in touch with the police ——" Clare broke off the sentence, for she heard someone coming into the entrance hall. Julia went rigid, standing like the statue of an avenging angel. Then Belinda came in.

She spoke first. "Hello, Clare, I must give you back your key. Oh, hello, mother, I'm so glad you're here. I hoped you might not have gone back yet. Clare, I only read that letter from Mr. Merton a few minutes ago and then I realized that the appointment with him was for today and that I'd missed it. I've been out of town until day before yesterday and the mail was piled up. I hadn't opened any of it until just now—there were so many things I had to do first ——" She stopped, as if conscious of a barrier heavier than silence. She tried to go on, "I'm so sorry, Clare. Please don't think I'm ungrateful. I suppose I've inconvenienced everyone ——"

"Where have you been?" asked Julia.

When Belinda had come in, happiness was wrapped around her. Clare had seen it instantly, recognized it. She was more beautiful than ever, her bare head ruffled with wind and haste, her eyes growing darker as Julia demanded answer. She looked very young and vulnerable. She was begging them not to spoil it. Clare felt that painfully.

"Where were you?" repeated Julia.

"South," said Belinda, "a place in the mountains. I'd never been there before—you've no idea how beautiful it is now. The redbud's out—and the dogwood ——"

"Were you alone?"

Clare did not know how long it was—it seemed long because she dreaded the exposure which she knew was coming—before Belinda said quietly, "No, Henry was with me."

"I thought so," said Julia harshly. "Have you lost your mind? Do you know what you've done? To yourself and to me? I shouldn't have trusted you—believed what Clare said. She told me that you had stopped seeing that man ——"

Belinda turned swiftly to Clare. "When I told you that, it was the truth, Clare. I didn't think this would happen. I didn't know that Henry was coming to New York. He had to come. For he couldn't leave it between us like that. You see, they put pressure on him. It wasn't his decision, it was a kind of blackmail. He hated it. He couldn't live with it. And finally he knew what he had to do—what we should do—even if he did lose his job." Her face lit up again. "But he isn't going to lose his job."

"I'm not interested in Henry Cowper's job," said Julia. "He ought to be behind bars! But when I think of my daughter running around the country with a married man like a common ——"

"Julia, control yourself ——"

"Leave this to me, Clare. If she can do this sort of thing, she can hear it described. I suppose you think you can get away with it, Belinda. People have been writing letters to me, taunting me with this affair of yours, telling me that you are Henry Cowper's mistress. God knows I didn't want to believe it. You can be dragged into court—sued; I told you that, but you paid no attention. How do you expect me to hold up my head, to have any public influence for good when my own daughter is living an immoral life ——"

"I'm not living an immoral life, mother," Belinda told her.

"Then what do you call what you've been doing?"

"Love," said Belinda almost under her breath, but they heard the word.

"Belinda," said Julia Rood, forcing a kind of composure, "I beg you to listen to me. I'm only thinking of your own good, your future happiness. You must not go on seeing this man."

"I know. We know that, Henry and I."

"Where is he now?"

"In Chicago, I think."

"Then he's gone back to his wife?"

"To his house."

"Until the next trip, I suppose. And you are actually willing to be a traveling man's mistress ——"

"Stop," said Belinda. Her pride faced her mother's anger. "It's not like that at all. I'm sorry you feel like this. I didn't want to hurt you. Of course I wish it could be different. But it's Henry I love, no matter what the situation is. Henry's marriage is a tragedy. He has to take care of her—I want him to. But he never loved anyone until he loved me."

"The old story ——"

Clare winced. "Julia, don't be so cruel ——"

Julia lashed out at Clare. "I'm not surprised that you'd think it's all right. You were just as bad. Or worse."

"Never so forthright. Never so brave," said Clare.

"And I hold you responsible, Clare—I begged you to help me stop this affair before it went this far ——"

Belinda had turned to Clare again for understanding. "It's different now, Clare," she said. "When I was here, after Henry had telephoned from Washington that he wasn't coming back, I felt so helpless. I knew he was angry and defeated, but I couldn't help him. He's not like that now. He can face anything. So can I. It's true that we aren't going to keep on seeing each other. We decided that's best. I specially for him. Unless he should be ill or badly hurt or something like that. Then I'd have to go to him. But not otherwise." She added as if to herself, "And I mean it."

"If I could believe that ——" said Julia.

"It's true."

"God knows I hope so. You must have been out of your mind to run such a risk. Suppose you found you were pregnant!"

Belinda was silent and the quiet in the room became ominous.

"Belinda ——"

"Yes," said Belinda, "you'd rather I wouldn't lie, wouldn't you, mother? I don't want to lie about this. I am going to have a child."

"Oh, darling, no," breathed Clare. Julia was frozen with shock.

"That's what I had to find out about today. I didn't go back to my job as soon as Henry and I came back. I didn't want to see a doctor until Henry had talked to the president of his company, and then I wanted to see him off without his having anything to worry about. But then I went to Brooklyn to see a doctor I know over there. That's why I didn't open my mail yesterday. I couldn't think of anything else until I found out. I was waiting—and it's really true; they can tell almost right away now ——" Her voice held nothing but joy.

"And Henry doesn't know this?" asked Clare.

"I don't want him to know now. He's going to be working very hard—it would worry him—and then . . . he might not be so happy about it as I am."

"No, I don't think he would be," said Clare.

Julia was looking at her daughter now as if she were a project.

"You can't be far along," she said.

"No. But the doctor is quite sure."

"Will this doctor take care of you? At this stage it won't be too dangerous if he's a good man."

"You mean . . . have an abortion?"

"But of course you must—what else can you do?" Julia said. "The man's married. Even if he could get a divorce—and that would be a complete scandal—it would take too long—the child would be born too soon. Maybe this will be a lesson to you!"

"Clare ——"

"To go through with it would be very difficult. And it's not fair to the child, Belinda," said Clare.

Belinda moved backward, as if the older women were dangerous or contaminating. But when she spoke it was quietly.

"I wish you both could understand," she said, "how happy I am about this. You see, Henry's wife can never have a child."

"That doesn't enter into this at all," said Julia.

"But it does," said Belinda. "Suppose Henry and I can never marry—or only when I'm too old to have children—don't you realize how he'd be cheated? This is the only way. The only time ——"

"It would be a child without the right start," said Clare. "You must think of that, Linda."

"Stop being fantastic," said Julia. "Come to your senses, Linda! This is a dreadful situation, but we shall have to face up to it. First of all, you must promise me on your honor never to see this man again. And then we must arrange for proper care and see that you get through this without any physical damage that might affect you in later life—when you marry."

"Mother," said Belinda, "I'm not going to have any abortion."

Julia shivered. "You'll come out of it all right. They're quite safe under the right circumstances."

"I know. I did research on abortions for Today just recently. But I want this baby. I'm responsible for it. I love it already ——"

Absurdly Clare thought, This will make me a great-grandmother. How strange.

Julia spoke defensively: "Please don't think I countenance the practice of abortions. I've always been definitely opposed to them until ——"

"Until you don't want a certain child to be born," said Belinda gently. "It's usually what they say. Not this child. But this child is wanted. I wish you could want it, too, mother."

"I want no child under such a cloud," said Julia.

"You talked so often about how much you care about what happens to all children. You've made other people care. The refugee children in Europe—so many of them were illegitimate, but you cared about them ——"

"This is quite a different matter!"

"It's a life. And it won't be under a cloud. I won't let that happen. My child will be happy, loved every instant. It's the way I can make Henry go on."

If only I had made Jerome go on, thought Clare. She's braver, clearer than I was.

Aloud she said, "I know, Belinda. You're right. See it through."

Clare was sleepless that night. But the direction of her concern surprised her. She thought of Belinda, of how protection and care could be provided for her, of places in Europe where it would be possible to live quietly for a year. She thought, I could go with Belinda. If she wants me. If she is willing to go. She has no idea of the practical situation she is facing, Clare told herself, but she did not convince herself of that. Her worry for Belinda was mixed with pride in her, and also with the curious envy Clare had felt before.

It was Julia for whom Clare ached with pain, Julia who seemed to be seriously hurt. And the injury had been begun long ago. Clare knew now that she was responsible for it. The hurt had been concealed so long that Clare had to search for the beginnings of it among her own memories.

We embarrassed Julia, she thought. I didn't know that. I think I didn't. Or knowing it, did I ignore it? She realized that our situation w[as] normal and Julia always loved regularity [and] conformity. Most children do. We were wrapped up in ourselves, so highhanded in love, that I neglected Julia. Not that she wanted for anything. Not for anything mat[erial] you mean, face up to that. I loved Jerom[e] much that there wasn't enough left ov[er] Julia. And he was very kind to her, but he [al]was close to her. Perhaps he knew that sh[e] sented him. Jerome was quite different [from] Belinda, in spite of the extra generation [be]tween them.

Jerome didn't want children. When we [fi]ried I was too old to start another family a[nd] was he. Sometimes before that I used to [ask] his child—we talked about it, but it was [a] flagrant a thing to allow to happen. Yet if [we] insisted, if it had happened, would he have [been] glad in the end? "The continuance of d[is]" Belinda said tonight. If I had borne Jer[ome's] child, his life would be going on today. [He] wouldn't be gone as he is now, finished. [Is] illegitimate? That's not fair to the child. Is [that] an excuse? Or is life itself more important [than] all the rules we make about the way to liv[e]? Isn't it? If I had kept Jerome alive, cont[rol] him—was anything else, our reputation, [our] pride—even our happiness—as importa[nt] that would have been?

His child would be tall, like that pictu[re] Jerome that I love, the one taken long bef[ore] met him, which shows how sensitive and [vul]he was at twenty. It would have been a [boy]. Jerome said, "If you and I can ever have a [child] let's make it a boy. You have a girl." We t[alked] the idea around because it was exciting, bu[t] were careful that it never got beyond the [talk]. The fact would have scandalized Jerome. [Be]linda knows that Henry Cowper will be h[is] fied—he's bound to be. But that isn't goi[ng] stop her. She's seemingly docile, but so [was] And grave. She's sent him back to his dera[nged] wife and she says she doesn't intend to see [him] again unless there is an emergency. [A] child—how long will they hold out? Euro[pe] the solution for her, at least the first step [to] solution.

But no matter what can be done, Julia [will] suffer. She's never been a realist. She's alw[ays] thought life could be managed by laws [and] rules. She's not in the least like her father. [He] was a truthful rascal. Julia's more like me w[hen] I was in college. She believes all those spee[ches] she makes.

Julia will always love Belinda because [Be]linda loves her. That came through tonight. [But] Julia will never forgive me, not quite, and [I] must always pretend I don't know that. I [must] see her again soon and get that money set[tled] on her. It's all I can do. It's all I ever did do[ne] her. But it will give her independence if not[hing] else. Tomorrow morning I'll talk to Belinda [and] Julia and make another appointment with [Mr.] astonished Phil. Not immediately. Julia [will] need a little time, and I won't hurry her.

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

There are three ways to get rich in the United States today: make something for the mother of a new baby; for a woman decorating for Christmas; or for a school board building a school.

A new husband cured his wife of going around with her hair in curlers during the daytime. Every now and then he would look at her and observe sweetly, "My, you're pretty!"

One definition of an educated man is that he knows when to use not only commas and periods, but colons and semicolons as well.

Children today know so little Bible that a young boy thought the Sermon on the Mount meant a lecture while riding a horse.

We are the kind of family which starts to find out what's "worth watching on television," and before we get through reading the paper the evening is over.

When the preparation of the evening meal was assigned to a young girl, home from school for vacation, she declined on the grounds she couldn't cook a dinner.

"What!" exclaimed her parent. "After two years of home economics!"

"I know, mother, but you see we never got off breakfast."

One wife, who seems to manage situations with a gracious touch, heard that a carload of her husband's folks were headed for a visit, so she persuaded him to visit them—confident that passing ships in the night would not meet.

A woman, wearied by five children, took off for a few days, leaving the following note: "Remember, dear, what you always told me; when you get tired just dress up the children and get yourselves out of the house for a nice long walk."

And another mother says, "Every night I read the diary of a small boy's pockets."

When the postponed legal conference t[ook] place several weeks later, it went off [with] surface smoothness at least. Philip Me[rton] noticed that Belinda was looking extrem[ely] charming. Julia Rood pleased his taste [as]. She was a very handsome woman, but Me[rton] felt that she lacked the appreciation w[hich] could be expected on receiving what w[as] a considerable gift of money. She acted [as] if she were entitled to it. Clare had probably [told] her that story about the money's coming f[rom] an agency which her father had started, [but] that of course was nonsense. Clare had [given] the money and need not make any distri[bu]tion until her own death. Taxwise, of cou[rse], this was sensible.

Belinda's glowing gratitude made up [for] any reserve in her mother's manner. Beli[nda] told Philip that she didn't need the mo[ney], and she had never expected to be so rich [and] that it would be wonderful to have the i[n]come. She was delightfully happy, obvio[usly] dreaming already of how she would spen[d it].

"It will be useful when you begin to s[hop] for a trousseau," said Philip, interrupting [his] legal statements with that little pleasantry.

Julia Rood suddenly stiffened, almost pa[le]. Philip realized that he must have touched [on]

CONTINUED ON PAGE 9

AMBROISE PARÉ—Surgery Acquires Stature—reproduced here is one of a series of original oil paintings commissioned by Parke-Davis.

Great Moments in Medicine

s French Army surgeon in 1536, young Ambroise Paré refused o llow the medical tradition of pouring boiling oil into gunshot ou ds. He proved that wounds healed faster and pain was reduced ho less drastic measures were used. Paré's military and court medical rr r was served under four kings. During this time he instituted ma medical improvements and surgical reforms, including a return o te use of ligatures for tying blood vessels instead of searing them it cautery irons.

h courage to break with tradition has enabled medical men to make tremendous advances in all phases of medicine, surgery, and supportive fields of treatment. Today, the patient benefits from these scientific advances whenever his physician is called upon to combat illnesses or physical defects.

Working with physicians for nearly a century, Parke-Davis has significantly contributed to the advancements in medicine. Through original research, development, clinical testing, and production programs, Parke-Davis has improved the medicines physicians prescribe and pharmacists dispense to help people achieve better health and longer lives.

COPYRIGHT 1958-1960—PARKE, DAVIS & COMPANY, DETROIT 32, MICHIGAN

PARKE-DAVIS . . . Pioneers in better medicines

NOW! A 3-DAY HAIR SPRAY

Renews its holding power every time you comb ...works softly without sticky stiffness!

New 3 Way Curl Spray does away with constant respraying. It holds your hair-do softly, naturally for three full days! The secret's in the superfine "lanolized" mist that conditions as it holds. Once applied you can't see or feel it, but at the touch of a damp comb the mist "comes to life" again! 3 Way Spray renews its holding power without a trace of the sticky stiffness you've found in other sprays. And 3 Way works this damp-comb way no matter what the texture of your hair—no matter what your hair style. So spray away with new 3 Way...and you're set for tomorrow and tomorrow. 1.50 plus tax

New easy-aim ... for perfe... spray co...

new 3 WAY® CURL SPRAY

Another fine Desert Flower product by Shulton

NUED FROM PAGE 156

amily problem or disagreement, pere that concerned a clash of opinion as n the girl should marry.
lieve that concludes our business for e being," said Philip. "I shall proceed
e the stock transfers. You are going Washington today, Mrs. Rood?"
, immediately."
n imagine how interesting and absorb-r brilliant career must be."
ve this term in the House to finish," lia. "It probably will be my last in gton."
n something was wrong. Merton saw ost pleading glance that went from toward her mother. Clare had lost her He made no more comments on Mrs.
political life.
e was still a lingering constraint be-he others as they said good-by outside ding. Julia signaled a cab.
da said, "Shall I drive out to the air-h you, mother?"
e you time?"
. I've the whole afternoon off. I'd like od-by, Clare. I don't know how to ou for what you've done today. I love d Jerome—for it. And for so many asons."
've been generous, Clare," said Julia.
hat won't make Julia approve of me, Clare. She tried to be amused, not to erted as they left her. She was glad to n go together. Belinda was doing all ld to make up for what Julia was en-now, and what she must bear in the Has she really made up her mind not to dness is the golden chain by ch society is bound together.

GOETHE

Congress again? wondered Clare. Why e punish herself? She's not done any Shall I try to persuade her? No, I can-Julia except with the money. She trust my judgment. She couldn't find for it in her manual.

la would be all right now as far as went. It would be a kind of protection.
gently Belinda already had rejected of going to Europe with Clare until r child was born.
nk I'd rather stay in New York," she Clare. "I'll be able to work for a long . And then I ought to be here. I want be born in his own country. I believe
—"
knew that what Belinda believed was enry Cowper—if he had known—ant his child to be born in the United ates.
was nothing more she could do for
She doesn't need me, thought Clare.
does. Suddenly she was conscious of a ss that was new and frightening. It was and physical. She had never felt so was a kind of indifference to going her, to walking even the distance to corner, to looking for a cab. She had ude she would come to his office this n when she was through with her eeting. She was on her way there now.
couldn't go farther. She hadn't the
.
was a department store just ahead.
have a rest room. She found at length ty chair with plastic covering that she own would be there, that all women re getting old and became suddenly unted on being there. Clare sank down ough cushion, spread her knees for
. She thought, I don't care how I look, hat moment touched the bottom of the on which had been sucking her down
i.
closed her eyes. I'm more tired than ad a house to look after. It was a lovely Belinda said it lived so well. And it was er thoughts took on color and move-he could see the sweeping coral cur-the staircase landing, and now Jerome was coming up with his sure tread, calling her name, finding her in her dressing room —— What shall I wear tonight? Dinner will be at home—we like that best—we always congratulate each other on being alone—it's not too often—we savor it, and there are special hot appetizers tonight—he will go out and tell Minna how good they are. No wonder people always like to work in our house. The house is full of affection, safe in devotion—the Irish silver is always beautifully polished. The house has the generous feel of a country house though it's on the edge of the city—we planned it so.

What am I doing in this rest room? In New York?

It was half an hour before she stood up, washed her hands, put on fresh lipstick and drew on her gloves. On her way out she passed the chair where she had been sitting and gave it a little grateful pat. She looked at her watch. There was still time to get to Claude's office.

Claude said, "You're looking very tempting today."

"Good for me," said Clare. "I'm remarkable."

"I've always thought so."

"I came in to tell you, Claude, that I'm not going to take any job in the agency. Not even a small one."

"I wish you would, Clare. If there's any chance that you would reconsider ——"

"I'm very sure I won't. I have to think of my future."

"What are your plans? What are you going to do with yourself now?"

"I'm going back home."

The telephone in her room rang sharply and brought her back to time and place. What hour was it? Almost ten o'clock? She must have fallen asleep, sitting here.

"Mrs. Jerome Tarrant, please. Long distance calling."

"This is she."

"One minute, please. . . . I have Mrs. Tarrant on the line, sir."

"Thank you." It was a man's voice, vaguely familiar. "Is this Mrs. Tarrant?"

"Yes."

"This is Henry Cowper. In Chicago. I must apologize for calling you, but I didn't know what else to do. I cannot reach Belinda at her apartment. Her telephone doesn't answer."

"That's probably just as well," said Clare coldly.

"There's something she must know." Henry's voice was urgent. "Tonight. And I can't keep on trying to get her on the telephone. There are so many things I have to do here. My wife is dead, Mrs. Tarrant. She died this afternoon. Will you tell Belinda?"

"Died? I'm so sorry." The words came with no meaning. "Was she ill? I thought you didn't expect ——"

"It was an accident. I hope that we'll be allowed to call it that. What happened—I would like Belinda to know the truth—was that my wife took an overdose of sedatives. There was always some danger of that, but we had taken precautions—they were locked up. And she was never left alone. So I thought. The nurse was criminally careless. Of course my wife wasn't responsible. I trusted the nurse too far—it was my fault. Mrs. Tarrant, do you know where Belinda is?"

"Not at the moment, but I'll find her. I'll tell her."

"And could you ask her to understand why I may not be in touch with her for a little while—there are obligations ——"

This was Jerome talking. This was the way he had sounded twenty years ago. Stern, decent ——

"Of course she'll understand. Don't worry about that. Don't give anything else but your loss a thought now," she said to Henry Cowper as she had said to Jerome once in almost the same words.

"And when you talk to Belinda," the grave, weary voice pleaded, "if you could make her feel—I want her to know—if you would ——"

"I will," said Clare. "I'll tell her that you love her, Henry."

She was trembling as she broke the connection. She took a few minutes to believe it, to throw off the fears and pain that had ceased with the life of that unfortunate woman she had never seen. The present and the past had to be untangled, and vivid glimpses of the future flashed like lightning in a storm. She did small things that needed doing—emptied an ash tray, threw the newspapers she had read into the wastebasket, straightened a lamp shade and it was still true. She must go to Belinda, tell her carefully and slowly. There must be no shock for her in her condition.

Belinda had just come home when Clare arrived. She said that after she had left her mother at Idlewild she had come back on the bus. It was a long ride. Belinda looked tired.

"You got your mother off all right?"

Belinda said, "Yes, she got off. Oh, Clare, I feel so cruel. It's so hard on her. It's going to ruin her life. If I could only make her believe that mine isn't ruined ——"

"Of course it isn't," said Clare. "Neither is Julia's. Sit down and relax. This is the first time I've seen your apartment. It's charming. How are you feeling?"

"Oh, I'm fine."

Clare picked up the lighter on the table, remembering. Jerome would press it, then look up to see if she had an unlit cigarette. Then the flame would light up his firm face. He would

CONTINUED ON PAGE 161

Embroidery and tucks, so elegant together . . . on no-iron blouses of 65% Dacron® polyester and 35% cotton. Each 3.98

Burgerpizza!

Better than hamburger, better than pizza ...this quick, easy recipe combines two favorites with Hunt's Tomato Sauce!

Once in a while, you find a recipe everybody goes for —and here it is.

A hearty new kind of pizza. Topped with ground beef, savory Hunt's Tomato Sauce, and melty cheese.

What's even better, you make these Burger-pizzas in just 30 minutes. Great when you're short on time before lunch, dinner, or a late-evening get-together!

Quick cooking like this is where Hunt's Tomato Sauce really shines. It's ready to use when you open the can. And because it's all tomato, with just the right seasonings and spices added, it gives your cooking a new, rich tomato goodness.

For instance, pour it over hamburgers frying in the pan. Or try it with spaghetti. Or as a basting sauce for pot roast. Kettle-simmered Hunt's Tomato Sauce makes a wonderful, flavorful difference.

This recipe, developed especially for Hunt's, makes two 8-inch Burger-pizzas.

- 1 cup packaged biscuit mix
- Pure vegetable oil, such as Wesson
- ½ lb. ground chuck
- Salt, pepper, garlic salt
- ½ teasp. oregano or basil
- 1 8-oz. can Hunt's Tomato Sauce
- 1 tablesp. chopped parsley
- ¼ lb. Swiss cheese, cut in 1-inch strips

Prepare dough according to package directions. Divide dough in half. Roll each piece to fit bottom and sides of 8-inch pie pan. Brush with oil. Put half of the remaining ingredients on each pie in the following order: crumble beef evenly over the dough, sprink with salt, pepper, garlic salt and crumbled oregano basil. Cover with Hunt's Tomato Sauce and parsle Arrange cheese strips on top, like spokes of a whe Bake in hot oven (400°F.) about 20 minutes, or un brown and cheese has melted. Cut into wedges, a serve it right away!

Hunt...for the best

HELPFUL RECIPES on every can. Al write for FREE Recipe Booklet, "21 N Ways to Serve Hamburger." Hunt Foo Dept. K-9, P.O. Box 5, Fullerton, Cal In Canada: Hunt Foods, Tilbury, Ont.*

NT UED FROM PAGE 159

e, he had no nervous habits. He liked time for everything. For breakfast, ions, for making love. Don't think of
I must tell her. In a minute I will.
that a celestial globe? And a very Really old. Where did you ever find y found it. He knew that I wanted unted all over for it."

treasure."
ll for baby," said Belinda and her acked open with pain. "I wish my s weren't misery for other people!
-Henry ——"

Clare sat down and held out her hand. The girl's head soon was on her shoulder and she held the frail, desolate body close, as never before.

"It's hard, but you're going to be happy ——"

"I was—I had my share ——"

"Just a taste of your share so far. Linda, I talked to Henry tonight."

"To Henry! Is he in New York?"

"No, he called me from Chicago."

"He called you?" said Belinda incredulously.

"Yes, because he couldn't reach you. He wanted me to tell you something. He sent you his love."

"Is he all right?"

"He sounded tired. Belinda, his wife died today."

"His wife ——" whispered Belinda and was on her feet, her face ghostly. "Oh, poor Henry!"

"Strange," said Clare. "I felt that way when Jerome's wife died."

"What happened to Henry's wife? She was quite strong—I mean ——"

She didn't even hear what I said about Jerome, thought Clare. But for her there's no echo.

"Henry said it was an accident. An overdose of something. She did it herself, Belinda. In a fog mentally, I suppose."

"Poor thing ——"

"That's right, Belinda. Begin with pity for her. The rest will come. And you must give Henry time. Any such break, any separation, even when it's been a burden ——"

"He'll think he didn't do enough for her."

"Probably he will. He's a good man. You must make him feel that he did all he could."

I did that well, she thought. I convinced Jerome of that. It took a little time.

Belinda said, "Now everything is different. He may think we should have waited. He may be sorry. I thought I was right. Perhaps I was wrong. He could even feel ——" she said with dread.

"Belinda," said Clare, "you must believe him. He sent you his love."

NORMAL FORMALITY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 87

ither make your own by putting eas through a food mill or strainer or food.) Bring again to a simmer. Add dissolved in the milk and continue to few minutes. Taste for seasoning and to be warmed up—or, if the weather be offered cold—at serving time.

ng the soup I have assumed that you a serving maid. From here on, be-u might not, I shall assume that you o have her and I have divided the ween host and hostess.

LEMON PIE

misnomer. The product looks rather a piece of edible jewelry than pie, gh it does not seem rich, it goes down one's having to swallow. You will ave on hand:

4 eggs
1½ cups sugar
2 lemons
1 pint heavy cream
Salt and cream of tartar

the crust": Beat 4 egg whites with a pinch lt and ¼ teaspoon cream of tartar until . Add 1 cup sugar, a little at a time, and ue beating until your mixture is glossy the sugar is dissolved. Spread it into a
-b ered 9" pie plate, carrying it well out the m. Bake in a very slow oven, 275° F., 25 inutes. Then raise the heat to slow,
F or 25 minutes again—or until a faint nge has appeared. Remove from the n allow to cool.

filling: Beat 4 egg yolks until thick.
d ½ up sugar, ¼ cup lemon juice and the ted nd of 1 lemon. Stir and cook in the o a double boiler until the mixture ke Use a whisk or spoon for this. Reve m the heat and cool. Whip 1 cup vy eam. Fold it into the cooled filling and n it to the crust. Save the remaining cup rea until tomorrow, when you will put it top f the pie. Wrap well with Saran and p c led in the refrigerator until wanted.

On s day also, you should make sure that ha a good linen damask cloth and naps at nd. Make sure that your china, silver l cr al are all clean and ready. You may nk se details comic. On the other hand, m not. You won't if you've ever ruined oas while you polished extra forks at the m ite.

STEP 2

s is Wednesday. Early in the afternoon you f bu and arrange the flowers, lay out the fee vice where it will be wanted, and set b —very thoughtfully. There must be no ock over a glass later as you jump up to the lt.

Nov or the beans, and salad and dressing.

FRENCHED BEANS AMANDINE (part 1)

3 unds or more fresh green beans (the zen whatever their virtues at other times, n do here). Be generous because beans prep ed cook down amazingly. Snip off the ends and "French" them—that is, sliver them lengthwise with a bean Frencher or a knife. If the beans are jumbos, cut these slivers in half, crosswise, so that they are easier to manage when eating. Set the beans aside in a plastic bag until cooking time, about an hour before dinner. A cool place is best, like the vegetable bin in the refrigerator. This cooking will be described in Step 3.

Whip the remaining 1 cup heavy cream and spread on top of the pie. Keep chilled until serving time.

If you wish to serve wine, it ought to be a dry white wine—a white Burgundy such as Chablis or Pouilly-Fuissé would do excellently. It ought now to be put to cool.

BELGIAN-ENDIVE-AND-CRESS SALAD

Remains now your salad, a plain green one. Wash and separate 8 heads Belgian endive and a bunch of water cress. Drain and leave in a plastic bag in the refrigerator to chill. (As the late Lady Mendl used to say, "Whatever is to be served hot must be hot, hot, hot; and whatever is to be served cold must be cold, cold, cold!") And here make up ½ cup plain old French dressing (to be poured on and tossed at the last moment); that is, to 1 part good wine vinegar (with salt, freshly ground black pepper and a garlic clove) add 3 parts olive oil. Note: If olive oil seems strong, use part peanut oil.

All this done, you should still have time to walk the dog, to bathe and take a nap. The last is important, because Step 3 is coming up.

STEP 3

Here the host comes on and you may both say that the staff work begins to look like a close-order drill. However, whether you call it headwork or footwork, the best hope of victory lies in order. And order in these circumstances is best got at by a division of labor. The hostess must have her part down pat and the host must have no doubt about his. For instance:

Before the guests arrive the host prepares the cocktails if cocktails are to be served. And he may also, if he can be trusted to peel an onion, whip up one very simple snack.

PARMESAN-CHEESE SPREAD

1 cup grated Parmesan Cheese
6–7 tablespoons mayonnaise
1 shallot or small onion, grated
1½–2 dozen bite-size crackers or miniature English water biscuits
Parsley

To the freshly grated cheese (or the sort sold already grated) add enough mayonnaise to make a thick paste. Squeeze into this the grated shallot or onion. Mix and serve on the crackers garnished with a little sprig of parsley. (If you happen to be fortunate to have two ovens, these may be toasted.)

Meanwhile, the hostess busies herself with the Rice Pilaf and the second stage of the Beans Amandine.

RICE PILAF

Choose a pan with a tight-fitting lid that can go into the oven. In this, gently cook 1 medium onion, chopped, until it is soft but not browned in ¼ cup butter. Add 2 cups raw rice. Stir it until it is well coated with butter. Then add 4 cups rich chicken stock. (Make this as you did for the soup, and remember the warning about the salt.) Bring to a boil. Place a sheet of aluminum foil over the pan. Cover with a tight lid and leave the pan in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 25 minutes. Take the pan from the oven. Float it in a larger pan of hot water, over a very low back burner, until wanted.

FRENCHED BEANS AMANDINE (part 2)

Lightly brown ½ cup slivered blanched almonds in a little melted butter. Place aside to drain on paper toweling. Melt ½ cup butter in a little pan to season the whole bean dish and leave in a warm place. Boil the beans briskly for 10 minutes. Drain them. Sprinkle with one of the commercial "savor salts" if it is available, otherwise use ordinary salt, lifting with a fork so that the seasoning goes all through. Put all aside until the last moment and keep the beans hot as you did the rice. Obviously the nuts will remain crisper on their towel and the beans will stay firmer without the hot butter.

You then address yourself to the chicken dish.

CHICKEN BREASTS FLAMBÉES

8 chicken breasts, boned and with wing attached
Salt and pepper
½ cup butter
8 shallots or small onions peeled and crushed
1 cup light cream
3 egg yolks
½ cup cognac

Have a chicken breast for each person. Salt and pepper them. Brown these in the butter over a quick heat in a roomy skillet. You probably will not be able to do these all at once. Place the skillet, covered with its heavy lid, in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 25 minutes. Remove and arrange the pieces of chicken on their serving dish which you will cover and return to a warm oven to keep hot. Cook the shallots or onions in the skillet over low heat. Stir with a whisk until they are soft but not browned. Add no salt if the chicken is well seasoned. Add the light cream into which you have beaten the egg yolks. Simmer, stirring with a whisk, until the sauce is thick and smooth. Transfer to a double boiler and keep warm. Have on hand ½ cup of good cognac and a little pan (really a tiny one) to heat it in.

That's the whole recipe, but it, too, is to be taken in stages.

While the host is locking the dog in the basement and plumping up the pillows—certainly before the guests arrive—the hostess browns the chicken pieces as stated above, places on the lid and puts them aside. She peels the shallots or onions, lines them up beside the garlic press and beats the egg yolks into the cream. When the guests arrive, she runs the covered skillet into the oven and sets the timer for 25 minutes. These minutes—an extra 5 wouldn't really hurt—she may spend out among the company as if she were a guest herself.

When the timer rings, she removes the skillet and tests the chicken to make sure that it is done. If it is, as it ought to be, she arranges the pieces on the serving dish and returns it, covered, to a warm oven to stay hot.

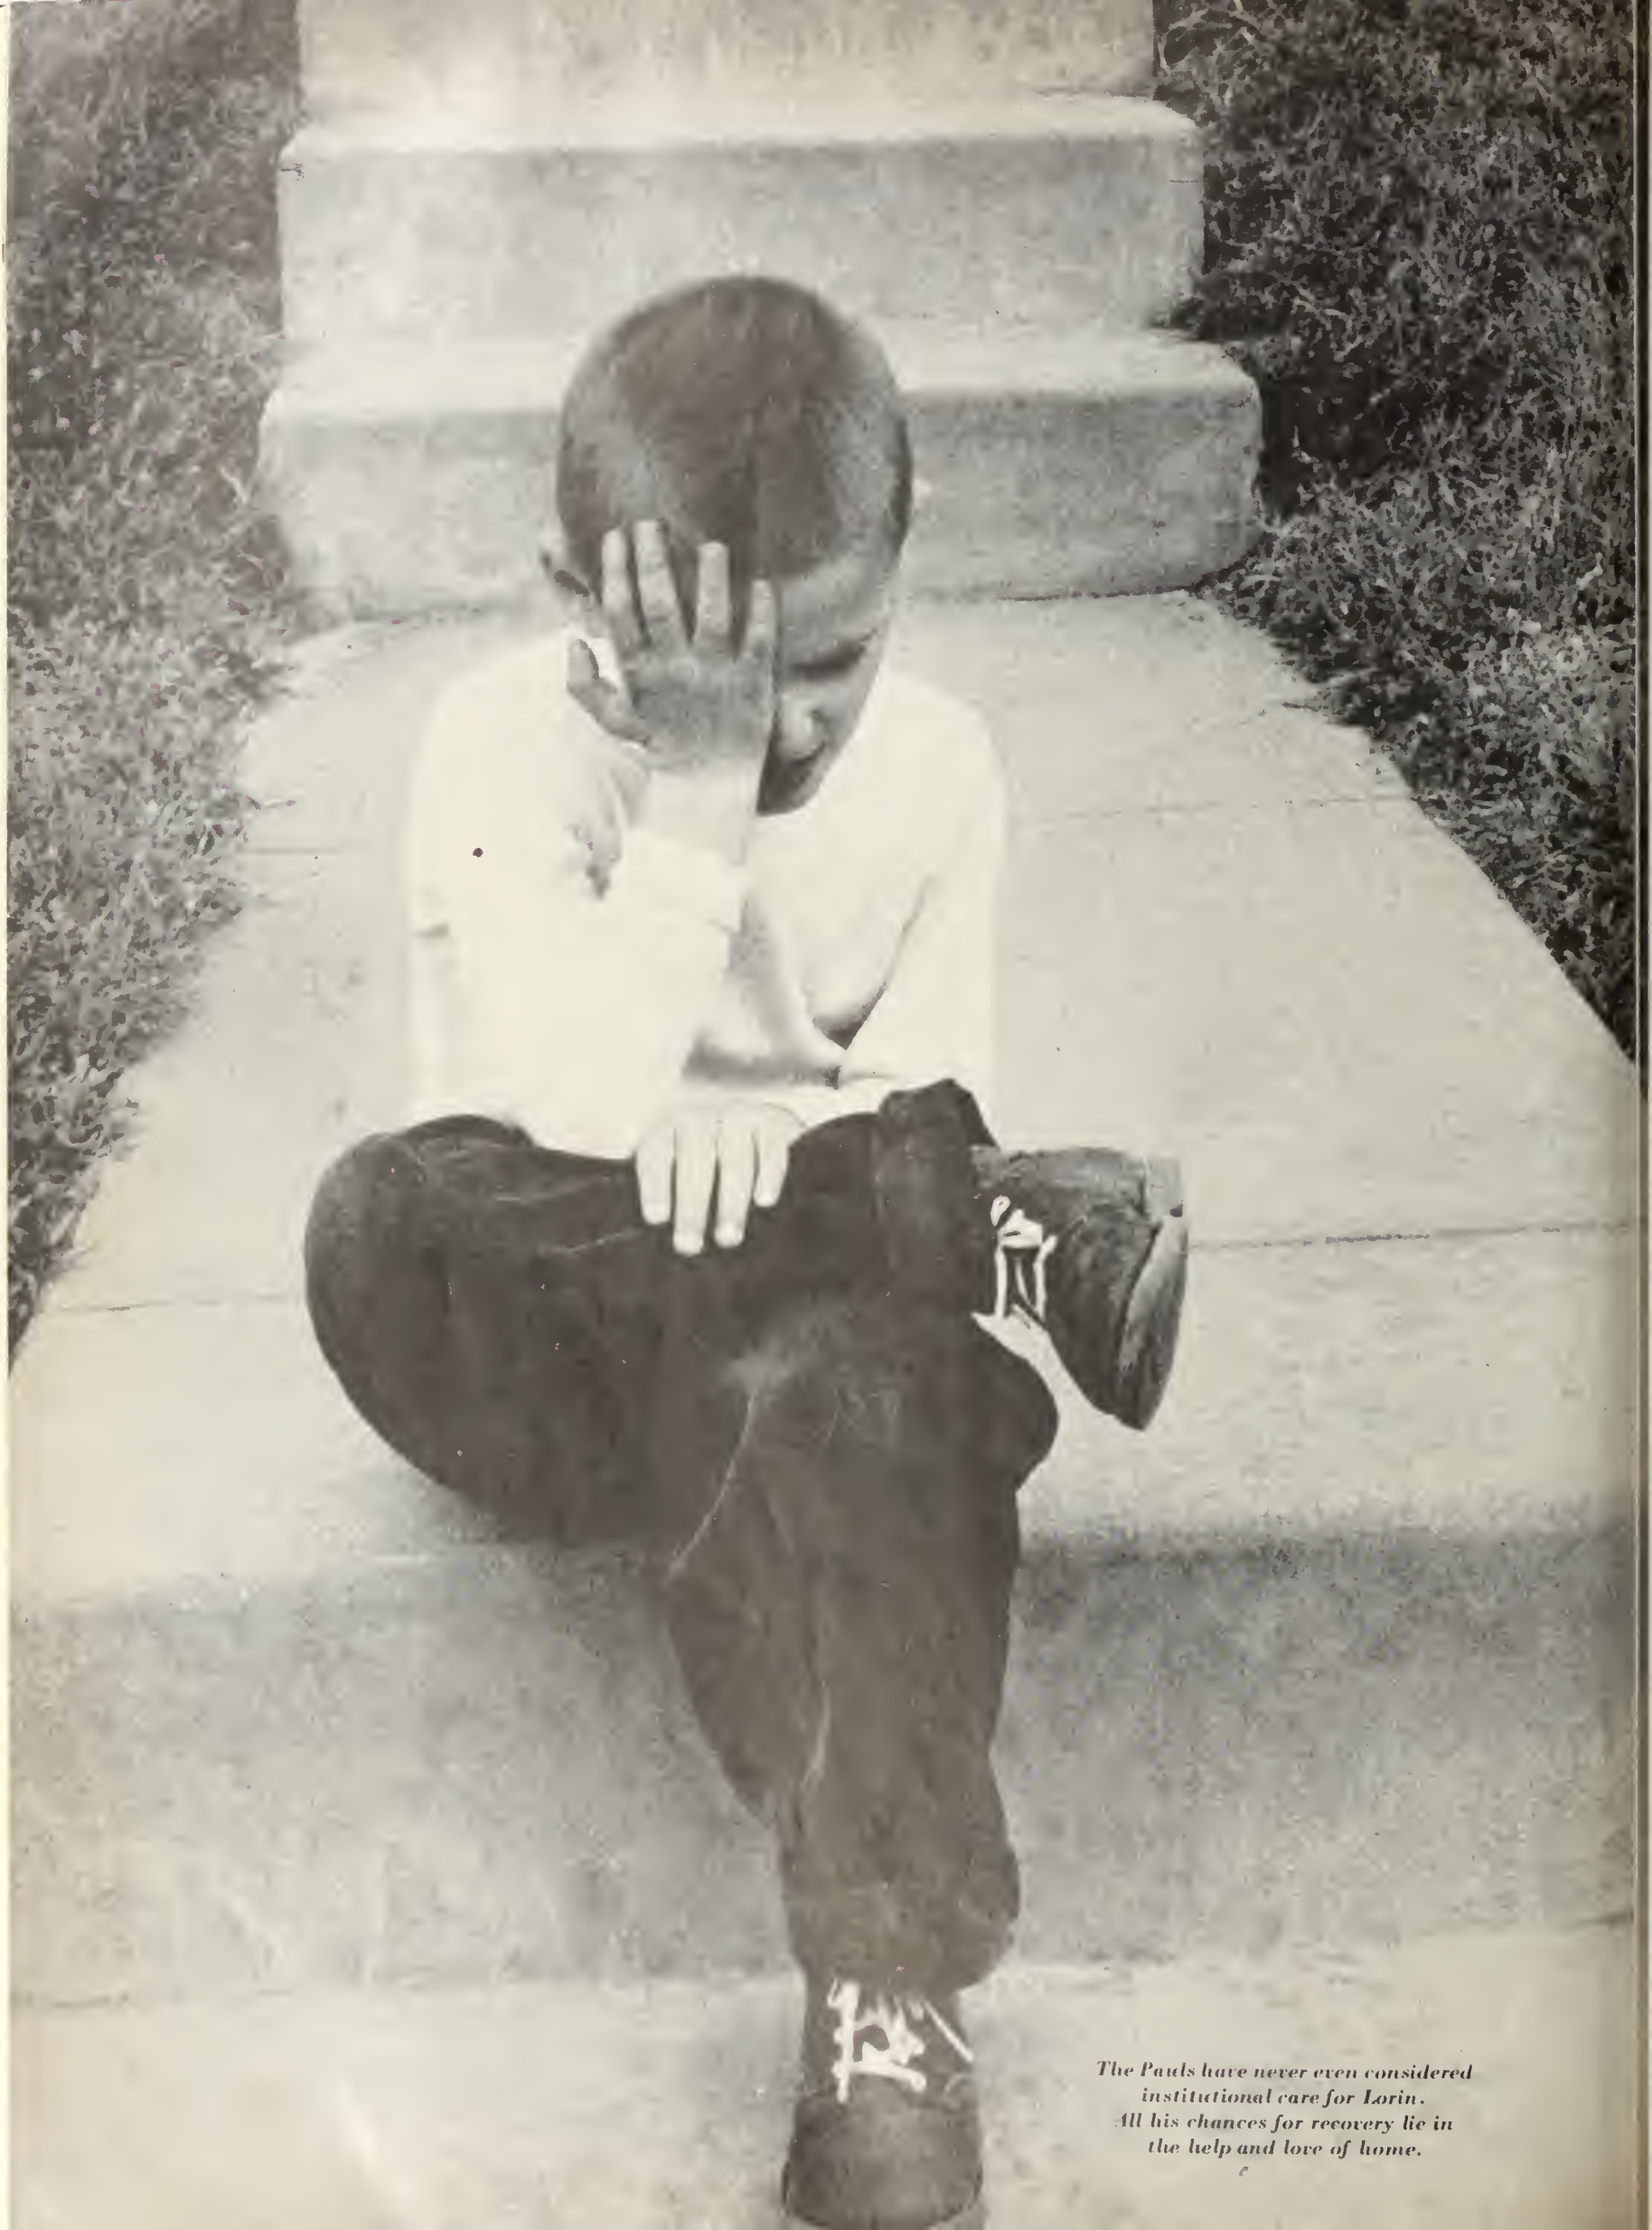
Here you may like to play a wise French trick on yourself: Sprinkle some flour on the handle of the skillet as a reminder that it is flaming hot. Now complete the sauce as described above.

If you choose to have wine, the host fills the wineglasses before the guests are seated, unless you have maid service and start with the soup course. This is a bit odd, but makes things easier. Then he lights the candles. The hostess checks the pilaf for heat, she reheats the beans, adding the almonds and melted butter, turning them with a big two-pronged fork. She places both the pilaf and the beans before her own place at table, and the sauceboat before the host's. Now all are seated and . . .

STEP 4

. . . begins. This is often rather touching, either because all men retain a boyish love of fireworks or because they secretly have something to do with The Pickwick Papers, which only an analyst could untangle.

Anyway, the host now retreats to the kitchen alone. In the small pan (remember, it had better be a tiny one) he brings the cognac to a boil (otherwise it will not ignite). At this he cuts off the heat, strikes a match to the cognac and pours it, flaming, over the chicken. After a quick check to make sure that no pets or footstools lie in his path (to change his entrance from Dickens to Laurel and Hardy), he moves in with the flaming triumph and lowers it before his own place.



But he must keep on. He must spoon the burning cognac over the chicken and keep spooning it until the cognac has burned away. This is important. The idea is to serve the chicken with no liquor on it, to have conferred upon the chicken the flavor of cognac to which no alcohol is left.

When he is sure that the burning is through, he ladles the sauce over the whole dish, serves the plates with chicken and sauce and passes them along to the hostess, who "helps" the vegetables.

From here you ought not to be pursued by much advice, but we are tempted to keep on awhile; to say, for instance, that when the hostess has brought on her salad, seasoned and tossed, she would do well to serve it not on clean plates but on the used dinner plates still remaining before the guests. This may cause American eyebrows to go up, but it is a French notion and its object is not to save dishwashing. The truth is that if a meat sauce was any good in the first place, the flavor of whatever remains on the plate greatly adds to that of the salad. We have this direct from the wise old Abbé Dimnet, author of The Art of Thinking, who used to add some of the juice of the roast to his salad dressing as a valued ingredient.

We also urge that, while the hostess attends to the dessert, the host himself do the unserving of the table. Here he must be firm with the guests. If he fails, if the guests trail after him, trying to help, the evening will resemble a clambake or a picnic by the old mill. Not the sort of thing we had aimed at on this occasion. As we have said, you may find these minute instructions comic—as you might those of Mme. St. Ange, authoress of the famous Livre de Cuisine, in which she goes as far as to tell the host on which foot to place his weight as he carves the goose. Yes, but an orderly and, so to speak, a restful dinner party is a fine thing. You are sorry to see the guests go. You sleep well when they do. The next morning you feel the sort of glow you'd feel if you'd got a letter from the bank saying that the business about the overdraft was all the bank's fault and that the staff humbly begs your pardon.

END

The Pauls have never even considered institutional care for Lorin. All his chances for recovery lie in the help and love of home.

By NEAL GILKYSON STUART PHOTOGRAPHS BY JACK ROSEN

HOW AMERICA LIVES

Mental illness doesn't often strike before adolescence, but when it does it consigns little children to terror, parents to heartbreak. There are perhaps 50,000 such young sufferers in America today. The Sheldon Pauls, of Philadelphia, have one of them.

SCREAM IN THE NIGHT

On the night of January 9, 1956, the Sheldon Pauls, of Levittown, Pennsylvania, were one of the millions of families across the country who made a special treat of watching on their television sets Mary Martin in a two-hour production of Peter Pan. Three-year-old Lorin and two-year-old Candice Sue were allowed to stay up late, Candi snuggled much of the time in her father's lap. (Her mother, Ruthe, was seven months pregnant.) An early talker and keen story-listener, Candi watched the show with absorption.

Her brother Lory, however, paid little attention to the screen. He sang, danced and wandered about the house. Every now and then he talked discursively about trucks. With pretty, black-haired Candi's development, the faintest of shadows had fallen across the Paul household. Lorin, a handsome, lively boy with blond hair and big blue eyes, had been a particularly alert baby. He had stood and walked at an earlier-than-usual age. It seemed odd to his mother and father that his early flow of words seemed to have stuck at a level that was now below Candi's. He used his good vocabulary more in a private gabble than to communicate systematic three-year-old feelings. He appeared not to hear directions. He still played alone in a group of children.

But Ruthe and Sheldon were anxious not to compare. The look of brightness on Lory's face was unmistakable. Life had started out so well for him that as an infant he used to cry, "Happy, happy! Lory happy!" making neighbors and strangers turn around and smile. The only really upsetting thing he had ever done was try hard to pretend Candi wasn't there when she first came home from the hospital. When his mother showed him the baby, he averted his face and talked of something else. But Ruthe and Sheldon felt this was fully understandable. They told each other that girls were quicker than boys. Lately they had been trying with extra tact to prepare him for the arrival of a new baby.

Peter Pan over, Ruthe and Sheldon hurried the children to bed. Candi settled down at once. The instant Lorin was left alone he sat up in his bed and screamed.

It was a scream such as should never have to issue from the mouth of a well-cared-for, much-loved little boy. "It was a terror-stricken, hysterical screaming," says Ruthe. Lorin screamed all the rest of that night. He screamed most of the next day and night, and the next. Except for interludes of drugged sleep and even more frightening interludes of utterly deranged behavior, he screamed for weeks.

With less frequency, his scream has rung down through the years, for it is only lately, after years of expert help, that Lorin no longer startles with his panic cry. Ruthe and Sheldon Paul did not know it then, but they do now: they are the parents of one of the most cruelly afflicted of beings—a mentally ill child.

A psychiatrist once asked Ruthe, "Is there any episode in Lorin's past about which you feel guilty?" and she replied, "No—no, nothing! I don't feel I was a perfect parent, but I feel I was a good parent!"

The Pauls have been completely frank with their neighbors about Lorin. The result: plenty of kindnesses, not a single raised eyebrow.

Virginia Jones sleeps in three nights a week, works about fifty-five flexibly arranged hours a week for $37.50 plus bed and board. She does all laundry, cooks and cleans, but her great gift is her gentle patience with the children. Lorin has a special, calm relationship with Virginia that is very good for him.

Ruthe Paul has been through much since that night, including agonies of guilt, but she is now able to square her jaw and say, "This is not my fault!" She has, with a psychotherapist, with Sheldon, and with her most secret self, searched and searched through her memories of Lorin's infancy looking for causes. "No," she says firmly, "this is a dead end. Everything I did for Lorin I did through love. If I did everything wrong, they will have to throw away the books and write new ones." She has come through her self-doubts with one certainty: "I am convinced that this is a physical illness. When people talk to me about 'environmental causes' I can tell them 'This is not so!' I think all parents of psychotic children must be helped to feel this way—that they did not cause their psychotic child."

Certainly she and Sheldon, with their combination of deep affection and enlightened intelligence, seem almost a textbook example of a couple that has done the important things right.

Ruthe Zucker Paul was the older child of a close, lively family that moved from Brooklyn to Philadelphia when she was in her teens. "My father is a very sweet, kind person whom everybody loves. His electrical-contracting business went bankrupt during the depression, but he came right away to the Philadelphia Navy Yard, and we were always comfortable. My mother is active, vibrant—a great theatergoer and reader. As long as I've known her she's been studying something. We used to camp every summer on a bit of wild property my father had on Long Island. I remember my brother and me teaching my mother to ride a bike so we could take trips together."

Ruthe has black hair, blue-gray eyes and a small feminine figure, and she began dating soon after she reached her teens. For what it is worth for a psychoanalyst to probe, Ruthe was a serious-minded adolescent even with popularity. More than a trace of this seriousness still remains. It is Ruthe who goes to sculpturing classes once a week, who hangs Paul Klee reproductions and her own abstract paintings on the walls of their living room, who has read the psychoanalytic books and picked up some of the jargon. "I feel that I was a very introspective child. I had difficulty relating. I tended to have one close friend rather than lots."

There are gay memories, too, however. She was graduated from high school in '44, when personable young ladies could pick and choose among jobs, and she and her best CONTINUED ON PAGE 166

HOW AMERICA LIVES

Everyone concerned with Lorin has hope. Never so ill as some psychotics, he has responded "most promisingly" to treatment, has made such strides that he now has concentration for quiet play, can share a little with sisters, Candi and Steffi. His therapists agree Ruthe's and Sheldon's steady strength and intelligence have been decisive factors in change.

BE REALLY REFRESHED... AROUND THE CLOCK!

RECIPE: Make your own "Lazy Susan" by using a large and small plate and a stemmed glass as shown. To make dainty and interesting sandwiches, cut bread, cold cuts and cheese into the shapes of hearts, diamonds, clubs and spades with cooky cutters. Sandwich together layers of meat with prepared cheese spreads, combine bread with meat and with cheese slices and there are your sandwiches. Serve with celery, olives, pickle slices, carrot curls. A clever way to present a buffet that's sure to please!

KING • REGULAR

At party time ...try this "Grand Slam" Bridge Buffet idea with King Size Coke and be really refreshed! Only Coca-Cola gives you that cheerful lift...that cold crisp taste that makes snacks more appetizing. Sign of Good Taste friend had "about 5000 different ones" over the next three years—landing in 1947 in the office of a dry-cleaning plant run by an elderly man and his bright, brash nephew. The nephew was Sheldon. "He was exactly not my type. He was a smoothie, a playboy. He was just home from the Army, and his plan was to enjoy himself. I liked the sweet type—the kind you think of marrying right away."

COPYRIGHT © 1960 THE COCA-COLA COMPANY. "COKE" IS A REDISTERED TRADE-MARK.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 164

But she and Sheldon opened the office together every morning. "We began talking. We found our ideas were alike about everything." They double-dated on a Saturday picnic with Ruthe's friend, and it poured rain. They sat in the car and talked some more. After that they dated every single night until their marriage ten months later, on May 9, 1948.

The wedding took place with more than the usual parental blessing. Broad-shouldered, boyish-faced "Shell" was something of a hustler—although a decidedly good-natured one. He was most interested that Ruthe's father was starting his own electrical-contracting company again (in Philadelphia this time), was operating out of the Zucker family basement with Mrs. Zucker answering the phone. Even before the wedding, Sheldon had bade the dry-cleaning business adieu ("It was very dull work") and become Mr. Zucker's apprentice. After the young couple were settled in a small apartment, he started on a three-year program of night courses in electrical engineering. In twelve years M. Zucker Co. has grown to a payroll of forty men, but since Sheldon has contributed so much to its growth he feels none of the onus of working "for" his father-in-law. Sheldon, now vice president in charge of practically everything, says, "Anybody could get along with Ruthe's father." Ruthe says, "Shell and my father have been so close. The company has prospered. When you think about it, life has been very, very good. Only one thing has gone wrong."

Their first apartment was the apple of Ruthe's eye, and Ruthe speaks of this as a happy time." But one thing was wrong t too. For three and a half years the Pauls fa what Ruthe calls "a sterility problem." It a time of temperature taking, chart kee and fervent wishing. Ruthe says, "I wa children; oh, how I wanted them. I fel though I was a failure. I had wanted f Sheldon wanted a big family. Believe me, playboy had changed!

"When I finally did get pregnant in 195 was probably the last possible minute bef was going to have to go for psychiatric h This was what having a baby meant to r

As Ruthe tells the story of her first pregn and birth, there can be little doubt about own joy. "My pregnancy was absolutely fa lous! I felt wonderful. I'd read about nat childbirth and knew right away that thi what I wanted. We had no trouble findi doctor who was interested, and Jefferson H pital had just started a program of classe

"Sheldon was with me all through labor delivery. I had a long labor—thirty hou was tired! I'd had no sedation at all. Bu

What every baby dreams of–

going "bye-bye"!

Planes, trains, Daddy's car . . .
Grandma's house, the beach—
babies thrive on new sights,
new sounds, ask nothing
but to be comfortable.

Mommy, make going "bye-bye" easier with

Chux Disposable Diapers

The take-away, throw-away diaper—
complete in itself...no panty needed!

Water-proof back . . . soft, comfortable facing.
Quilted for absorbency, medicated
against diaper rash.
No wonder more mothers buy Chux
than any other disposable!

Made by a Johnson & Johnson Company

At baby departments and drug stores

Copyright C. M. Inc. '60

NEXT MONTH

It was a middle-of-the-night fire—everyone helpless, shivering, thinking of nothing except that the children and the cats must get out. And when the house stopped smoldering—just a "big black mess"—there was the re building to worry about. But New Canaan, Connecticut, came to the rescue of the Frank Perrons. They had never known before how much human kindness could mean.

FIRE! FIRE!

By NEAL GILKYSON STUART

HOW AMERICA LIVES
in the October JOURNAL

soon as the baby was born, what did it mat I heard the words from Sheldon, 'Oh, wha beautiful boy!' Immediately I felt comple relaxed. Everything was all right!"

Lorin was one of the first babies to be t at Jefferson by natural-childbirth meth and word quickly spread that the unsed baby was amazingly alert. "All the interns d nurses came to look. He had this bright s right from the first—big bright eyes, and t he was so beautiful with his golden blond h I nursed him with no trouble. He was right side me in his plastic cart and Sheldon vis us often. For me it was the most exciting t of my life—a fulfillment. Nothing went wr Nothing! Everything was perfect."

During the pregnancy, Sheldon had bou a house in Levittown, about an hour's d from Philadelphia, and it was into this h that they moved when Lorin was six weeks l Ruthe's cup seemed to be running over. T the serious, deeply feminine young wom her own baby and her own house were t main reasons for being.

"Levittown was perfect for a young co with one child. We made friends. Never n the sea of mud! The only time I remember trouble with Lorin was when we first mo and I switched him from nursing to form Levittown didn't have a pediatrician yet, a was getting directions from our old docto phone. No formula seemed to fill him up. had already been sleeping through the ni but for a week there he woke up crying hunger every two hours. Then a young pe trician moved in and put Lorin on orange j and cereal right away. I never had a mom trouble after that. And I can't believe it week could have done such terrible ha Lorin was never left to cry. He was al picked up and fed right away.

"From then on his development was s wonderful. He did everything early. He d 'bye-bye' and played peekaboo. He l men—Sheldon and his grandfather ularly—and he was good with strangers.

:aner, the breadman, the pediatrician all
:azy about him. I feel he got a lot of at-
, the nice kind of attention—the kind ys, 'I like you, you're a nice boy.'" n's superior looks and charm filled with the deepest kind of pride. Sheldon with laughter when it is suggested to t young fathers are supposed to be subously jealous of first sons. He took a caring for Lorin from the first, glowed ally at Lorin's evident pleasure in his ny. Lorin had doting grandparents. He fact, all the riches of domestic love that posed to nourish children and give trength for the time when they must lone. Things were so ideal that Ruthe eldon asked their doctor how soon they tart another baby. Candi was born in r, 1953, when Lorin was just thirteen old. When Lorin pretended not to see e black-haired, blue-eyed baby for her v weeks, Ruthe says, "We did all the things. We didn't force him, we gave tra attention. Other adored children brothers and sisters and come through
ght. Why shouldn't Lory?"

n a beloved three-year-old shrieks, do not immediately think in terms of illness—not even if the shriek is weirdly able. There was a period of about two between the Pauls' first hasty conject Lory had been frightened by Captain
"But then he hadn't really seen the
) and the day in March when they their first psychiatrist. This was the when they watched in utter bewilder-e disintegration of their son. It was so ng that they find their memory of it is irred.
on says, "All I remember out of this bloody mess was this poor little boy ng his head off—and what could you emember rocking, rocking him in a chair. But he wasn't there."

Ruthe says, "I was so frightened. I didn't even want to be pregnant any more. I was in hell and this baby was in hell and the only thing that mattered was getting him out of it."

The young pediatrician who knew Lory had moved away, and they took him to a general practitioner. The doctor called it the "night terrors" and prescribed sedatives. One can guess now that it was hard for him in his office to grasp all that the Pauls were going through at home, but at their request he built up the dosage of Seconal to almost an adult level. It never gave Lory more than two hours of sleep. A neighbor telephoned to say that if they didn't stop torturing their child she would report them to the police.

"Then he got worse every day. He started tearing at himself—clawing at his face and ears with his fingernails. He still bears the scars. He smeared his food, screaming in terror at the sight of it. It was not a question of his turning against the rest of us; he was locked in with some nightmare about himself. For example, he would scream, 'I want my daddy, I want my daddy!' with Sheldon right beside him. He would scream for fifteen minutes, then run wildly for fifteen minutes, then start ripping at himself. I would wrestle with him. He was so wild he was strong; often I had to sit on him.

"I would cry—when I wasn't too busy. I was on the verge of hysteria all day long. The minute Sheldon came home at night he would take over. He would say, 'Go on, get out. Take a walk. Go to a movie.' But I couldn't leave. I would go sit in the car for a while to get away from the screaming, and then come back in. I gave Candi every moment I could spare, and she was such a good little girl. She seemed to understand that Lori was 'sick.'"

Ruthe and Sheldon discussed the possibility that Lorin had fallen on his head. Their doctor continued to be reassuring until he discovered in February that Lorin's reflexes were not acting. He now suggested that Lorin be put in a hospital for complete physical tests. Ruthe says, "I'm proud of my reaction to this. I've learned since that disturbed children often withdraw completely when they are sent to a hospital. Then they are so much harder to reach with help. We insisted on keeping him at home and taking him in daily for his tests. Everything proved negative. He was in excellent health."

There was only one avenue left. Their doctor recommended a child psychiatrist and they made their first appointment. Ruthe and Sheldon kept it with beating hearts and the conflicting emotions of those who long to know, yet fear to learn. The main lesson they learned was that the first psychiatrist is not always the right one. Her first words, without preliminary (she had not seen Lorin yet), were, "Can you afford three visits a week at fifteen dollars a visit?" When Sheldon answered "No!" and then on second thought began to hesitate, she agreed to see Lorin the next day.

They brought Lorin and she retreated into another room with him for five minutes. When they came out Sheldon drew a deep breath and asked the question that cost such agony to phrase: "Doctor, is my child retarded?" She gave him a long stare and then said, "Why do you ask?" (Countering questions is an old psychiatric game, but Sheldon still explodes in what he feels is righteous anger when he recalls the incident.) She never did answer him. The next morning she telephoned to say she had "re-evaluated" her notes and decided she could not take Lorin as a patient.

Ruthe was alone except for the children when the call came, her pregnancy was now full term, and she says, "I hung up and had hysterics. This was the doctor who had been going to tell us what to do. To me, she was saying Lorin was hopeless."

In the midst of her tears she remembered a friend who had a disturbed child under treatment, and from her got the name of another specialist in child psychiatry. Dr. R, a man, came readily to the phone and was immediately sympathetic. His kindness made Ruthe weepier than ever. "Now, now," he told her, "nothing can be this bad. He's only three years old. He's talking. If we can't treat him, psychiatry had better shut up shop." He tore apart his schedule to make an appointment.

Ruthe's and Sheldon's enthusiasm for Dr. R mounted with their first visit. He heartened them with his optimism that Lorin was still expressing *some*thing in words. In fact, Lorin had begun to withdraw noticeably by late February. The shrieking had lessened. He stared straight ahead, seemed uncertain about his physical existence (rather than use his own hand to open a door, he would reach for Ruthe's "as though it were some object" and put it on the doorknob). Yet he was still saying randomly (with no truck in sight), "Look at the truck." (Lorin's doctors believe that what they call his "truck focus" dates from an occasion before his breakdown when he had a childishly high fever and Ruthe brought him a toy truck to play with.)

Dr. R told the Pauls he would like to see them once more before seeing Lorin, whereupon Ruthe blurted out, "Doctor, is there any way to stop labor?" She had begun her labor pains the night before, but had been unable to bear the thought of missing the appointment with the doctor who had sounded so kind. "I know I stopped that labor. I just couldn't have that baby until Lory was settled."

Dr. R said, "It certainly is possible for anxiety to stop labor. Let's say that I'll see Sheldon tomorrow. You must start putting your mind at ease."

His words were so effective that Ruthe never made home that day (Lory and Candi were safely at her parents' house). She and Sheldon stopped for lunch, a meal that they left in a great hurry. Two and a half hours later their second daughter, black-haired, brown-eyed Stefanie Elin, was born.

Ruthe says now, "Once we got through the period of not knowing, it's been uphill."

It's been a rough hill. Facing their problem was only the first step up. Learning the best ways of living with it has been another. Ruthe and Sheldon have had Candi and Steffi to think of, money to worry about. Always there was that indispensable—sometimes heavy-hearted—little creature called Hope to pull along with them toward the top. The Pauls

e age of greatest growth . . . The Protein Age

Baby's "hungry as a little lion"
when they're Swift's Meats!

..time to trust Swift...the meat specialist!

T e Protein Age is your baby's first year . . . the time of fastest growth, almost unbelievable eve pment of bone, muscle, mind and nerves. It's the time for the body-building benefits of meat, especially the complete, high-quality proteins only meat provides. It's the time to trust Swift, the meat specialist . . . for the very best in High Meat Dinners—6 delicious one-jar meals rich in Swift's high-protein meat, with choice vegetables and cereal.
And for lean 100% Meats—9 nourishing varieties (available in tins on the west coast).

Swift's Premium
. . . the two most trusted
words in meat.
OUR 105th YEAR

Electrasol ends FOAM CHOKE-UP in your dishwasher

How new-formula discovery gives you spotless, film-free dishwashing!

New formula Electrasol frees your dishwasher from the sluggishness caused by foam choke-up! Releases torrents of water for all-out full spray action! Dishes come out spotless, your silver gleaming, your glasses sparkling . . . without a hint of dulling film . . . every single time! So let Electrasol restore full spray action to your dishwasher . . . whatever make you own!

Here is how foam choke-up builds up from food remains on dishes to strangle your dishwasher's cleaning power. Dishes come out muggy, glasses spotty, silver is streaked!

Here's how new Electrasol with its exclusive chemical formula frees your machine for full spray action. Dishes come out spot-free, glasses crystal-clear, silver dazzle-bright!

Does what no other dishwasher detergent can do . . . even in hardest water!

© 1960

Another famous product of ECONOMICS LABORATORY, INC., St. Paul, Minn.

are a lesson in the human capacity to keep on climbing with resourceful courage.

Dr. R's role proved only temporary. He quickly dismissed their lingering thoughts of retardation. ("Lorin's smart," he told them. "This is one of the things we can tell.") Extensive psychological tests laid bare how very ill Lorin was. "It was not a neurosis—it was a psychosis. He had been affected in every area of development."

The Pauls are one of the fortunates in that they live in the environs of Philadelphia—one of the great medical and research centers of the East Coast. Dr. R quickly referred Lorin on to those better geared to help him—the psychiatrists and therapists of Philadelphia's Child Study Center, under the famed Institute of Pennsylvania Hospital.

The Child Study Center believes in helping all the family members of a patient, and for the next two years some or all of the Pauls were commuting to the Center four times a week. This was an hour-and-twenty-minute trip each way from Levittown, and on some mornings Ruthe had to get up at 5 A.M. Infant Steffi rode in a portable basket. ("She grew up in the back of the station wagon," says Ruthe. "And oh, what a good baby she was!") Candi attended the Center's nursery school for normal children. She was such a bright, happy youngster that "the reports on her were ecstatic." Sheldon began with individual therapy, eventually found evening sessions of therapy with other fathers more congenial.

But those who obviously needed therapy most were Ruthe and Lorin. Ruthe entered willingly into individual therapy with a staff psychologist, stayed with it for two years under the Center's family plan, continued it privately for an extra period. She found it an invaluable support. She admits that she had assumed most of the guilty feelings (without having any idea what she was guilty of); Lorin was cutting her to the quick almost daily by screaming for Sheldon instead of mommy, by rolling on the floor and screaming, "Don't beat me! Don't beat me!" when she approached him. She credits her therapy with bringing her through the early bewilderment of guilt ("You cannot function as a parent until you have worked through this!") and restoring her self-confidence as a mother (Candi's and Steffi's ideal development helped).

As for Lorin—Ruthe was profoundly shocked that spring of 1956 when she saw for the first time the other mentally ill children in Lorin's nursery-school group. One wore thick glasses and barked like a dog. Another salivated constantly and tried to climb the walls. Was Lorin one of these? "Lorin was always cute-looking," says Ruthe earnestly "even at his worst. People still turned around to admire him because he looked like such a normal, appealing little boy."

But Lorin needed help as much as any. When he first arrived at the Center he was in deep psychosis. He too clawed at the nursery walls—or lay in a corner in withdrawal. Yet a therapist who came to know him well says now, "Lorin is one of the most promising children we have ever treated. He had this strength in him which he was able to use. His eyes never kept for long that glazed, sa[d] ward look of the completely lost."

In addition to his hours in the nursery [w] a therapist, Lorin had individual treat[ment] with a psychiatrist. Ruthe's therapist h[elped] her provide Lorin with better discipli[ne] home. She says, "I had thought everyth[ing] did must show him love. But Mr. Bolanc[e] me that he needed the strength and safe[ty] discipline. When I became firm with hi[m] could relax better. I could say to him, 'I[am] your mother. I will not allow you to kic[k] window.'" The Center found that Ruth[e had] never pushed toilet training on him, and [they] encouraged her to do so. Within three w[eeks] he was trained. Her spirits rose as her own [role] became clearer.

The steps upward began—steps that in[it]selves were sometimes frightening. He [began] to respond somewhat to his therapist—[but] not to other children; he simply didn't n[eed] them. He began to talk more—but only t[o] press horrible fears. At table he would scr[eam], "I don't want to be poisoned!" When [his] bowels were moving his cry was one of m[ortal] terror: "I am losing my stomach!" A ty[pical] flow of conversation might be, "Oh, my [eyes] tired eyes hurt. My eyes, my poor tired [eyes] are bleeding. My ears hurt. My ears are b[lee]ing. Take me out of my nose. The hou[se is] breaking!" Small, tenderly reared Lorin [had] his thoughts on beatings and poisoning, bl[ood]age and blood.

At home, he developed a terribly frig[hten]ing habit of disappearing. Ruthe and [her] helper that she and Sheldon were event[ually] obliged to hire would try to keep an ey[e on] him every minute, but "The minute our [back] was turned, woosh! and he'd be off. It w[as a] terrible problem, not only to us but to him[self]. The psychiatrist told us that it frighte[ned] Lorin—he didn't want to be alone and lo[st]—but he had no control over the impulse. [The] most terrifying time was when he landed [on] the other side of a busy highway half a [mile] from home. We used to pin a large tag on [him] back with his name and telephone numb[er], but there were many times when I had to [call] the township police to help us." Ruthe reports that the police were uniformly gentle with [the] small, blond, blue-eyed boy who looked [so] terror-stricken when found.

Even his nights were haunted for years by what Lorin has called "a trouble." She remembers as late as the summer of '57 spending the hot nights in Lorin's little bedroom [on] a mattress under Lorin's bed. "He would startle awake very suddenly—as though [some]one had a knife at his throat. Then he would shriek and cry. At first I'd be sleepy, and [try] him to be quiet. Then I'd realize this was a [child] bouncing off a wall. I'd get up and pat [him] and talk to him in a quiet voice. You could almost see the tide of anxiety running [out]."

By the end of '56 the Pauls knew Lorin's progress was going to be a long haul. It meant money problems were going to [be a]

CONTINUED ON PAGE [0]

HOW MUCH HAS LORIN'S ILLNESS COST THE PAULS?

Below are the total costs to the Pauls from January, 1956, to August 1, 1960, specifically attributable to Lorin's illness. Included are only three days a week of Virginia's time, for the Pauls figure that under ordinary circumstances they would be glad to have help twice a week. Not included are the costs nobody kept track of: the move from Levittown to Philadelphia, gas and lunch money on Ruthe's long commuting days to the Child Study Center.

Medical and dental fees* (not including Dr. X)	$350.00	Child Study Center	1,298.00
Physical and psychiatric tests	98.00	Summer schools	813.00
Ruthe's private therapy	630.00	Dr. X	1,705.00
Sklar School (regular sessions)	2,820.00	Medication	340.00
		Three fifths of Virginia's wages	3,680.00
		Total	$11,734.00

*Lorin cannot tolerate routine trips to the dentist. Last spring he went to the hospital overnight (Ruthe stayed with him), and major dental work was done while he was under anesthesia. The bill: $200.

961 Frigidaire somersault washing action bathes deep dirt out without beating!

No Blades, No Beating! No Lint Problem!

the somersaulting Teddy Bear at Frigidaire Dealer's now. Watch patented 3-Ring "Pump" Agitator how it gently turns each load over and over while it sends soft-charged water through the fabrics 30 times a minute!

Clothes get cleaner, cleaner, new! No wonder this Frigidaire Automatic Washer was rated Number 1 for all-around performance by Testing Co., Inc.*

Frigidaire saves wear and tear! You can wash even a fine cashmere sweater in this washer without worrying! No pulling, stretching or beating!

No way lint automatically! No lint traps! Frigidaire exclusive Lint-Away System automatically sends lint across water, out of the tub and down the drain forever.

In controlled laboratory tests, the Frigidaire Washer proved best of 6 leading automatic washers tested in the following points: soil removal, lint removal, dryness of spin, automatic care of Wash 'n Wear fabrics, simplicity of use and flexibility, use of washing time and current used. Report No. 584 dated May 3, 1960.

Only Frigidaire has the 3-Ring "Pump" Agitator—secret of Somersault Washing Action! Frigidaire patented the 3-Ring "Pump" Agitator. Its unique up-and-down movement gently somersaults each garment under water. At the same time, it surges the sudsy water through every inch of fabric 330 times a minute to bathe out deep dirt and grime—but never, never beats or pounds!

Imperial WCI-61 Washer Custom Imperial DCIF-61 No-Vent Electric Dryer

1961 Frigidaire Washer dispenses detergents, dyes and conditioners automatically! Dispenses detergent and bleach—liquid or powder. Automatically dispenses dye, fabric softener, rinse conditioner. Rapidry Spin saves time, money. Special Wash-and-Wear settings. Fully automatic soak cycle.

1961 Frigidaire No-Vent Dryer—faster, safer than sunshine! No venting—no plumbing! See the sensational new Frigidaire Dryer with exclusive Moisture-Minder! No expensive venting to outdoors. Removes moisture automatically! Frigidaire "Flowing Heat" system is faster, safer than sunshine.

Frigidaire Factory-Trained Dealer Service Everywhere

FRIGIDAIRE
PRODUCT OF GENERAL MOTORS

ADVANCED APPLIANCES DESIGNED WITH YOU IN MIND

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 168

long haul too. When Lorin first began at the Center, Sheldon was earning $125 a week. Their Levittown residence made them ineligible for the Center's special rates to Philadelphians, and the cost of their family plan was $45 a week. Sheldon was able to keep more or less abreast (often less) by borrowing heavily from M. Zucker Co., staking everything on his share in the company's rapidly increasing prosperity. It was a risk that he has won. But meanwhile it was only sensible for them to leave Levittown and move to Philadelphia, where their rate would drop to $18 a week.

The finest frostings plead for this delicate flavor

BURNETT'S

the true vanilla

Burnett's gives frosting, cakes and other desserts a special kind of deliciousness because it's made from the pure, natural vanilla bean with no artificial ingredients added.

MOCHA-CREAM FROSTING

1 cup (½ pint) heavy cream
¼ cup granulated sugar
¼ cup cocoa
1½ teaspoons instant coffee
1½ teaspoons Burnett's True Vanilla Extract • dash salt
2 tablespoons blanched, slivered almonds, toasted

In chilled bowl, combine all ingredients except almonds. Whip until stiff. Spread between and on top of two 8 or 9-inch layers. Sprinkle with almonds. Chill till ready to serve.

Ruthe didn't want to leave a bit—she loved the Levittown house—but they moved in February of 1957. They found a house to rent in an attractive development of $18,000 houses laid out on pleasant, winding streets in Philadelphia's northern suburbs. Ruthe says, "I didn't even know we had a view in back until after we'd signed. When I saw it I thought, 'Whew! Somebody's looking after us.'" A little stream flows at the bottom of their large back yard; beyond it is a gentle slope of open fields that reflect the seasons.

They decided to put the money saved into full-time live-in help. This was more for Steffi's sake than for Ruthe's—she was getting too big to live all day in a basket. Thus Virginia Jones entered the Paul family, bringing a calm and loving intelligence to her handling of the children, a rocklike reliability and industry for Ruthe to lean upon; she is with them still.

Ruthe declares that the new house itself was "a mess." She has a low opinion of builders who build picture windows facing the street instead of where the view is. "Besides, believe it or not, the previous occupants had raised birds in the bedroom!" But she had Virginia now, and before the move she came down alone to "paint and think."

They bought the house a year later, and have been transforming it into what they want ever since. Sheldon, the former lighthearted bachelor, now dedicated domestic man, has enlarged the living room, moved the picture window bodily from the front of the house to the back (bringing the countryside into living and dining rooms), put in another picture window in his and Ruthe's bedroom (at the back!), renovated the kitchen, and plans to turn the attached garage into a playroom next. Ruthe has a bold eye for color. Turquoise, royal blue and emerald green vibrate next to restful grays. Plenty of books, plenty of art and art objects give the house the Pauls' own stamp.

Ruthe says now, "Sheldon has always helped me. When Lorin seems to be standing still he'll say, 'Be patient. He's consolidating his gains. Don't you remember when you would say if only he didn't do so-and-so—and now he isn't? He'll move forward again.'"

In the spring of '58 Lory moved on from the Child Study Center to small Sklar School in nearby Germantown, which he now attends regularly. Sklar is a highly unusual school; it is one of the few in the country that offer a day-school environment to what it calls "underproductive" children. There he is in a small class that has a sprinkling of normal children. He has had the same gentle-voiced teacher, "Miss Marie," in the two years he has been there. Sklar also has a summer session that offers swimming (Miss Marie is there too), and the Pauls send Lorin because it is in the pool that he is most nearly a happy, normal boy. The price is $1000 (plus extras) for the regular school year, $200 for the summer session.

Lorin also has psychotherapy once a week with one of Philadelphia's most respected child analysts. When the Center first referred the Pauls to her in the fall of '58, she was, like many top-notch psychiatrists, "very busy and taking no more patients." But the professional people concerned with Lory were so fond of him and had such high hopes for him that doors were somehow opened. Dr. X now plays an enormous part in Lorin's life. She does not treat Ruthe and Sheldon (she quickly satisfied herself that their past therapy had given them strength and insight), but she is always available to them. Ruthe takes Lory to his appointments (she waits in the hall), telephones Dr. X freely. Two or three times she and Sheldon have asked for special appointments to talk things out at length. Ruthe says, "As far as I am concerned, Dr. X is a born psychiatrist. She is always kind, attentive—and simple. She never uses jargon; she gets to the heart of things in everyday words."

By now Lory has left his screaming (Ruthe's first "if only") a long way behind. He may still erupt with a scream from Dr. X's office, but that is only because tense matters sometimes come up there (for example, the time mommy stayed in the hospital with Candi during Candi's appendectomy); the scream is relevant—and he is quicker afterward. The blood-and-thunder has practically gone from his discourse. He hasn't wandered for half a year. He sleeps through the night.

Lorin talks a great deal now, in a gentle voice, with an odd, gentle smile—as though not sure anyone would listen. In the back seat of the car, keyed up because he is on his way to Dr. X's, he will say to Ruthe, "Are you trying to watch the highway while I'm resting? Am I distracting? Do you tell the ears, 'Get off my back on Pineapple Street'? . . . I'm allowed to complain. I'm allowed to whip and whine. Is it not pleasant to complain? Is it not pleasant to whip and whine?" At home his most thunderous statement may be, "I am going to have a horrible [hard-boiled] egg." Any seven-year-old could make the same joke. His remarks may even be soothing, as when he sits comfortably on Virginia's lap sucking on a green lollipop. "My lollipop is banana, vanilla, cherry, orange. It's blue. I have blue, I have blue, I have blue." There is no doubt that Lorin's world is calmer than it was.

His troubles are still there, of course. One of the disconcerting things about mental illness is the apparent element of willfulness involved. Lorin is ill because of overpowering necessity, yet some corner of his brain decides with a kind of cunning sanity what he will see or not see. If Ruthe should go to him and say, "Your lollipop is green," he will (still calmly) say, "It is red, it is yellow, it is blue." "Say green," demands Ruthe. "It is blue," says Lorin. One can almost see lurking the little > Hostility to youth is the worst vice of the middle-aged. It is silly to quarrel with the chamois because he has not come by the mule path. I hate to hear people saying, "He is young, he must wait; he will get plenty of chances." How do they know? Could Keats have waited, or Shelley, or Byron, or Burns?

>
> J. A. SPENDER
> THE COMMENTS OF BAGSHOT

boy who knows perfectly well it is green; but he will not be pushed too far.

He is still too driven to draw a circle on a piece of paper (he must tear through the pad furiously, scribbling on every page). He still runs distractedly about the house (wearing his bland little smile). Yet with the lessening of his panic, the amount of reality he deals with is growing. He pokes at his sisters now, sometimes hugs them, sometimes betrays jealousy. He calls Dr. X by name. He used not to call Ruthe anything at all (the one he loved most could hurt him most); now he calls her "mommy."

Everybody in the household has become practiced at living with him. For the grown-ups, devotion plus common sense is the rule. Virginia shepherds him through his evening supper with the same gentle dignity she shepherds Candi and Steffi; he can be trusted (most of the time) to feed himself competently. He takes himself to the bathroom, but he still has to be dressed. Dr. X has urged them again to be very positive with commands (when he gets away with misbehavior it adds to his load of guilt), so there is firmness. ("Lory! Give Candice back her book at once!") But there is play too. "Of course I can make him laugh," says Ruthe. "When we play 'Here's your nose, here's your chin, open your mouth and walk right in' he won't let me stop."

For Candi and Steffi, no easy rule seems to explain the small miracle of their adjustment. Sheldon says, "Out of this has come some good. I think the girls have learned compassion." Candi, a first-grader last school year, bounded to the top of her class in practically everything, by last spring had proudly taken over the family reading aloud at bedtime. (Everybody crowds on the girls' two beds for it, and it often ends in a fine roughhouse, with Sheldon at the bottom of the pile.) Her gray-blue eyes under her black hair are steady, and her mature little air comes as much from wisdom as from manners. She knows that she is, in every practical sense, the "oldest" child, and the responsibility has made her bloom.

Ruthe says of brown-eyed Steffi, "W wonderful little girl she's been. Happy loves mommy and daddy and the whole and yes, she'd be delighted to take a na Lory has got better, his capacity for t has risen 1000 per cent. He may swo Steffi's careful drawing of "a lady," sc over it, snatch her pencil and shove her floor. Steffi gives a startled shriek, then herself up, and the little black cloud visibly from her face. "That's all righ didn't hurt me," she says comfortingly mother. A moment later, as she shows a new picture, she will say, "I love you, turn up her chubby face confidently for Early this year Ruthe once said of "Sometimes when I play with him I 'This is what you are for—to enjoy.' know what will become of him—wha he has. But this he is for—right now."

More recently she has said, smiling, joined Sheldon's club." There's only one bership requirement: total optimism. Sh says, "Do I think he's going to come o it? Boy, do I! This is my son. Furtherm think my attitude of faith is a help to And when he does come out of it—we'r ing to have quite a boy. You're hereby in to his college graduation."

Lorin's doctor's optimism is more caut "Yes," she says, "Lorin's illness can pro be called schizophrenia—symbiotic sc phrenia." Dr. X has talked to many br broken parents on the other side of her and she says, "I have seen so many guilty ings—parents who need to hide the pro not only from others but from themselves studies on childhood psychoses reveal n cause, but a perplexing mixture of ca There is a definite constitutional factor in of these children, plus accidental factors as illness, plus parental influences.

"This is true for the less disturbed, neu children too. Mothers today are being m maligned, too easily accused of being 'overprotective' or 'rejecting.' Even the m cal profession has helped contribute to t load of guilt; in some centers 'treatmen the parents consists less of help than of pun ment. Fortunately, the Pauls' experience a Child Study Center was completely helpful "In Lorin's case, I've often wished I c have seen him at birth, when he was descri as so particularly alert. Well, I wonder —

"His acute breakdown came when the ginning separation from his mother occurring. Even the normal two- to three-y old child finds this a trying time; his des are mixed as he proclaims independence then runs back to the security of his mot Yet his natural development of himself a person urges him ahead. Somewhere Lo mislaid, or failed to develop, this nor budding sense of 'self,' or ego. His whole ing was defined by the adults who cared him. It was as though when they looked other way, he ceased to exist. Their looks other way must have increased as he g older; when he first screamed, he was alm certainly afraid of death. Quite literally.

"Lorin would still prefer adults to do thi for him that the normal child does for h self—not only put on his clothes, but perfo what we call 'ego functions': control actions, make his judgments, tell him whe start and when to stop. Treatment consists trying to help him develop an ego capable functioning, of coping with his impulses a the demands of reality. The therapist must him how he feels, remind him constantly w the rules are, even, if necessary, tell him t he exists, that he is a boy and not a tr When Lorin first began to use his own c trols he seemed afraid. He had to insist t the rules were not his—they were mother's Virginia's or mine.

"There has been real progress this last ye Our first months were so unstructured. screamed. He talked of nothing but truc Often he could not talk at all. Now we h structure, memory and judgment. He can call and make use of comments that I ma months ago. He's developing a sense of h mor. He will tease me, use nonsense phras He can even initiate conversation.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 1

"I'm dollars ahead twice when I shop at this sign!"

WE GIVE S&H GREEN STAMPS

—says Mrs. Roger S. Cox of Albuquerque, New Mexico—and 27,000,000 other S&H Green Stamp savers agree!

Shop Piggly Wiggly

"I'm dollars ahead when I shop

at the fine stores that give S&H Green Stamps
... such as Piggly Wiggly Food Stores here in Albuquerque.
Their low prices really save me money."

"I'm dollars ahead again when I redeem my S&H Green Stamps. I get such lovely S&H gifts for my home and family. And it's so wonderful that the gift I want is always waiting for me at my S&H Green Stamp Redemption Store."

Good Housekeeping Guarantees Performance of America's Only Nationwide Stamp Plan

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

S&H GREEN STAMPS

Mrs. Cox is pictured in her living room with her daughters Janice Ann and Elizabeth Ora. Mr. Cox is a real estate executive.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 170

"I think he still needs a great deal of treatment. The tensions of adolescence are ahead of him. Many former psychotics have functioned in jobs, but the role of husband and parent is less sure. But I feel optimistic because this is a child who can make use of treatments. He is much less ill than many psychotics."

That Lorin has done as well as he has is in part a tribute to some rational will for survival in him—for all the devotion, hours and money lavished upon him by his family, his therapists, his teachers and his doctors are not enough. Dr. X has told the Pauls that ideally Lorin could use at least five hours of treatment a week in addition to his days at Sklar. Sheldon, whose present income is under $15,000, and who still chronically borrows from his company and his bank to finance Lory's present treatment, offered to raise the weekly hours of treatment to two, but Dr. X felt that such an increase might better be saved for the future, when stresses might increase.

The Pauls have faced the fact that, like many other families, they do not have the amount of money it takes to buy the ideal hours of psychiatric help for their son. (If everyone had it, then there would be only a fraction of the psychiatrists needed to provide them.) Several years ago Ruthe joined a Philadelphia group called the League for Emotionally Disturbed Children (now joined with others to become the National Organization for Mentally Ill Children). She helped lobby in Harrisburg for a bill that would provide public-school funds for the education of such children. As it is, disturbed children ineligible for the public schools receive nothing. Ruthe says, "We worked so hard, and the State Department of Public Instruction backed it. But it never even came out of committee." Sheldon says wryly, "You can tell the readers of America: if you have to have a shook-up child, have a lot of money. Say $100,000 ... er taxes."

Yet the Pauls have many good things. V... Sheldon cleared their attached garage ... spring preparatory to turning it into a ... y-room, he turned the little girls loose int... h... delightful, bare chamber, with full permi...on to draw on the walls. Candi and Steffi h... wonderful afternoon, but then Lory can ... in and scribbled all over their pictures. ...ut look!" says Ruthe. "You can still see t...m. All these angels and mommies and dad...s. And every one has a smile." Sure eno...h, smile after smile peeps out from behin...he scribbles—the biggest of all possible sm...s, the one a happy child puts as a matte... of course on a drawn face.

Other smiling things are mixed right in ... th... the "trouble." Ruthe and Sheldon's close...s to each other is a visible thing. Sheldon w...ks hard—ten hours or more a day—but whe...he comes home, faces turn toward him as ... a sun. He can say, "I have provided my ... f... with the scale of living I think she deserv..." but he has also provided her with a str...g right arm for leaning on that has never ...l-tered.

She has needed it. Ruthe's private tragl... has been to let others help Lorin more th... she. The "symbiosis" in which Lorin's ill...ss is rooted means an extra-close relationship ...e-tween mother and child. It was a relation...p once very dear to Ruthe, but she understa...ds now that Lorin must separate himself f...m her if he is to get well. Thus Sheldon had t...e the one to lie under Lorin's bed on hot s...-

> The late Henry Ford was once asked in an interview if he felt that there were any disadvantages in having great wealth. "Well," drawled Ford, "for me it was when Mrs. Ford quit cooking."
>
> PAUL STEINER
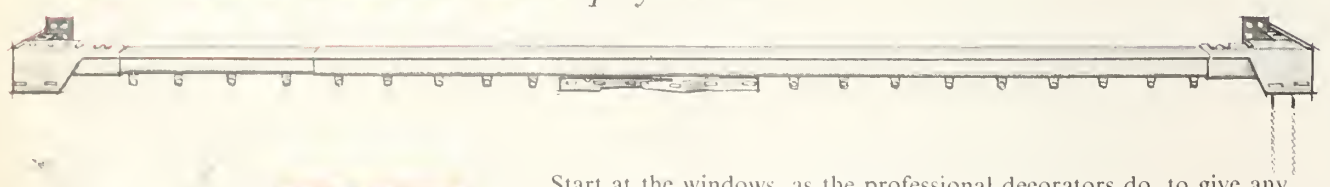
> THE BEDSIDE BACHELOR
> LION BOOKS, INC.

mer nights. Virginia's lap, uncomplicated... memories, is his present haven. ("You go ...a meeting," he says to Ruthe on Virgin...'s nights in.) Dr. X is giving him the defense ...e needs to live.

Dr. X says, "Recent studies indicate it s... ply is not true that a symbiotic relationship ... ways indicates a mother who has smothe... her child with a dependent love. I doubt v... much that Ruthe put so much pathology i... her relationship with Lorin that this is ... answer to his psychosis. Ruthe loved L... greatly, to be sure, and I'm sure she deri... fulfillment from him. But this is what we w... of normal mothers too. I do not feel that ... strong, intelligent woman put all of her ... into Lory. She has not needed him to rem... an impressively whole person since the r... ture. Her strength in sharing Lorin w... Virginia, with me, is one of the great reas... for his progress."



Sheldon's gentle understanding of her d... cult role has made an unbreakable bond ... tween them. When he is in the room, a stra... transformation comes over Ruthe. She e... looks a little smaller, more wifely. Her f... appears at rest (it doesn't always in his ... sence); she listens attentively to what he sa... A stranger could glance at her and ... promptly, "She adores him."

She and Sheldon live now with the vi... that they have been visited by a bewilder... and arbitrary act of God—the kind that ... quires so much courage and generosity ... spirit that in the end it seems inevitable. ... the Ladies' Home Journal does our stor... said Sheldon, "let us please be identifi... No anonymous treatment where the faces ... the pictures are turned away so they ca... be seen. Let's do something about the a... tude that there is something shameful ab... mental illness. Until people get over this id... there will never be enough done to help th... children."

Ruthe looks at him and nods, and her f... is at rest. E...

Kirsch drapery hardware

IDEAS FOR WINDOW STYLING

It's easy—and fun—to plan new window effects. Get a copy of the helpful Kirsch book, "Window Decorating Made Easy." Here are colorful room pictures, and hints and tips of the experts for every type of window. Color selector kit included. Only 50¢.
Kirsch Co., 164 Prospect St., Sturgis, Michigan.

Start at the windows, as the professional decorators do, to give any room a bright, new lift of loveliness. And—again as the decorators do—put your trust in fine, dependable Kirsch drapery hardware to ensure the lasting beauty of the window effect. After you have planned your window treatment, select genuine Kirsch rods and accessories, from the most complete line in the business. Make no mistake, drapery hardware is NOT "all alike," and you pay no more for the extra assurance that is yours with Kirsch. You need not look far; Kirsch is offered in several price ranges by stores which have your needs in mind. So don't settle for less Ask for Kirsch by name—and accept no substitute!

Y LIFE IN WHITE WORLD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 54

be like setting your alarm clock for the nt when day turns into dusk.

t I do know I was in my teens before I t by the full realization of what it could o be a Negro. And I mean hit; not by a it by something that was said to me. I u the shock was the most terrible I've id.

already been singing for quite some nd had even given some local recitals. in our church had got interested in my nd wanted to help me. They decided the ad come when I ought to have some voice training. My family couldn't af- y such thing, but these interested peo- re going to make up among them the it of money required. I knew the music I wanted to go to in Philadelphia. It t exist any more, but at that time it had eputation, and as far as I was concerned nted everything a singer could wish for. the money for the tuition was guaran- went for an application blank.

at day there was a line of people in front window where applications and infor- were given out. There was a young girl the window. She was blond, very and had a way of tossing her head that rt but cute, I thought. I had time to no- these things, because she didn't seem to me. She looked over my head when it be my turn, and took care of one after r of the ones behind me until I was the ne left. She spoke to me then, but in a nt tone of voice from the one she'd used other people. 'What do you want?' was she said. I told her an application blank. ssed her head, and this was still pert but n't cute. Her face wasn't even pretty, he- she raised her upper lip as if she smelled hing bad and said to me, 'We don't take d.'

romise you I was as sick as if she'd hit ith her fist right in the middle of my ch, and I mean really, physically sick. I r I didn't throw up right there, but I d. I don't know how I got out of the place ome. All I could think of was how anybody who was as pretty as that, and chance to listen to music all day long, at way and say such a terrible thing. hen I'd think, 'Can't I sing, can't I be a because I'm colored?'

now my mother talked to me then when home, and for days after that. Maybe it have been better if she had told me I was littler what kind of things could n to you if you were a Negro. I might been braced. As it was, standing in front t window it had never occurred to me I eing overlooked because of what I was; ought it was because I was younger than e hers."

se Anderson was evidently luckier than ster. She had been told off at the age of I learned this from Marian on the sec- fternoon of our intimate talks. She had ioned Alyse the night before, after our alk, and laughed ashamedly when she ted the call to Philadelphia, where Alyse ves.

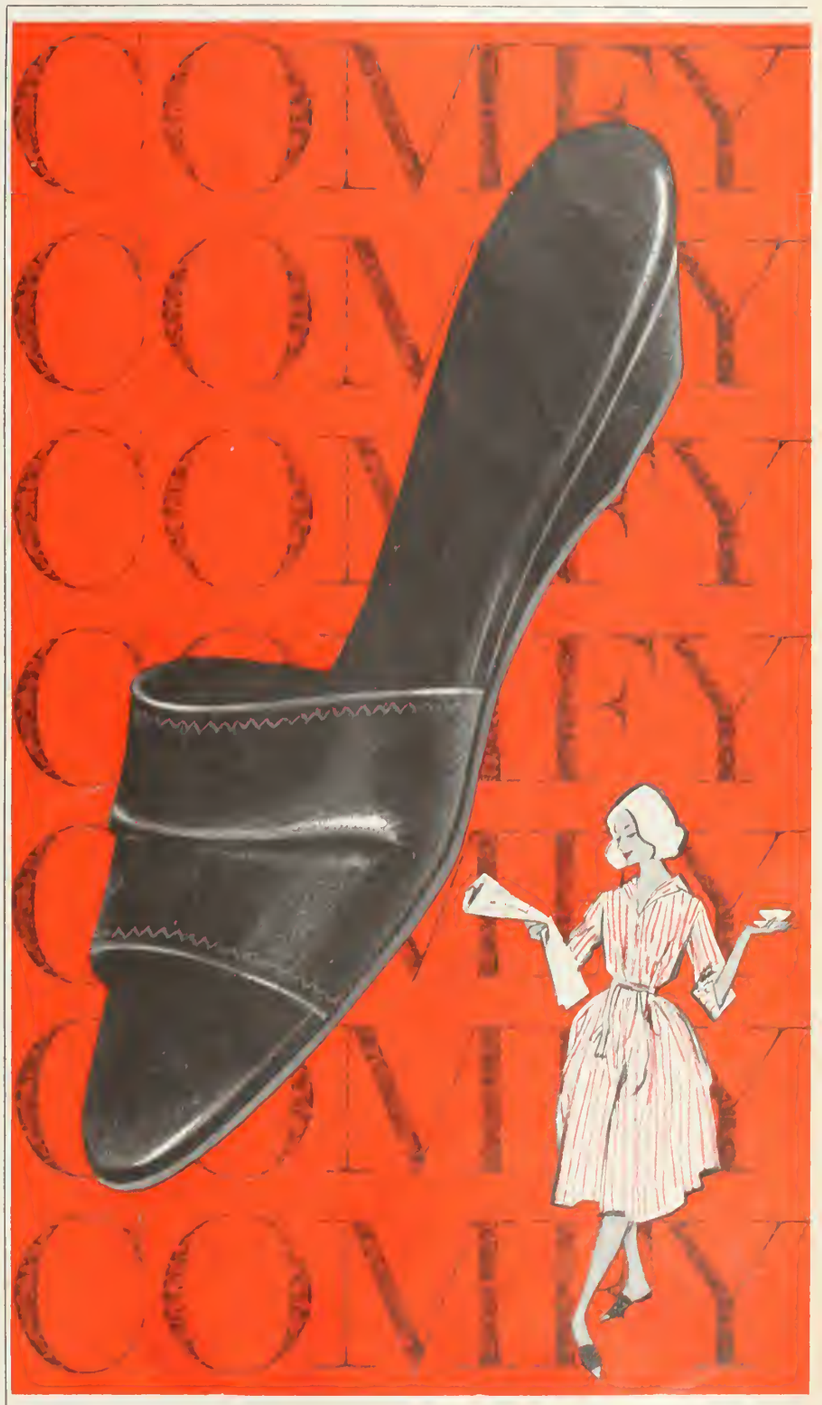
couldn't get out of my mind the things we lked about. I got to thinking about your g if mother had ever talked to us about Negroes, and in the end I called up to mother had ever had that kind of talk er.

lyse said she hadn't, and then she told me cident she said she'd never told anyone e, but it had happened when she was She said there was talk at the time in the borhood among parents about a petition vas being circulated. They were asked to heir consent to having a Negro teacher eir children. Up to then, Negro gradu- of Normal schools were sent only to o schools in the South.

here was a little girl who lived across the from us. Her name was Hannah. Alyse n't remember her last name. I can't , but she was white. She was under school age, but she'd evidently overheard her parents talking about the petition. She was sitting on her front stoop one day when Alyse came along the street and she called out in baby talk, 'Mamma say me will go white thchool, but you have to go to black thchool.'

"Even if the little girl didn't know what that meant, Alyse did. She knew, she said, at that instant a black school was not so good as a white, and being black was somehow lower than being white. But she said she had a guilty feeling about hearing such a thing, as if she'd found out something about sex she wasn't supposed to know. So she never told a soul, but she'd cried and cried about it off by herself."

Looking back on their childhood, Marian said, and hearing this from Alyse, she thought it strange they had been so oblivious. I agreed, and immediately contradicted myself. I had remembered, I told her, something that had happened only last summer at my house at the seashore, where my five grandchildren were visiting me. Four of them, little boys ranging in age from three to eight, were at the table with me, having breakfast one morning two or three weeks after their arrival. My extra maid for this enlarged household was colored. The children had become her friend almost from the moment of their arrival; she went with them to the beach, helped put them to bed and get them up; she also waited on table. On this particular morning that I had suddenly remembered, five-year-old Alexander, reaching his arm across hers to serve himself, paused, looked hard at her arm and at his, and asked enviously, "How did you get more tanned than me?" The other children, interested, looked at their own arms and at hers, sharing something of Alexander's exasperation. The maid answered equably, "I was born with more tan than you." The children settled back, appeased. "That's all right, then," Alexander had said, and served himself from the dish she was holding.



"These children," I emphasized to Marian, "had seen the maid every day and a good part of every day from the time of their arrival; but this was the first time a difference in color had attracted their notice. What's more," I added, "I was the only one who was embarrassed; at least troubled lest the maid's feelings be hurt. I think the hand of the Lord was clapped over my mouth, because I didn't tell Alexander that was not a nice thing to say, or any other inanity. Inasmuch as he had paid a tribute of grudging and envious admiration, he would certainly have been astonished to be chided for it. And there, I think, is one answer to this question of 'When did you know?' It's when some adult makes a social issue of pigmentation. I know this is oversimplifying, but at least it's one aspect. And the 'solucination,' as one of my grandchildren calls it—a lovely word—is for grownups of both colors to keep a hand clapped over the mouth. Don't create self-consciousness, and don't 'make something' of color."

Marian took me up on this. "Don't think for a minute," she asserted, "a Negro isn't aware of that self-consciousness, and doesn't wince under it, in spite of knowing that sensitiveness and kindness have provoked it. Sometimes overkindness makes us more uncomfortable than a snub. In the end it comes to the same thing; it sets us apart.

"It's hard to put a bracket around kindness or unkindness," Marian said thoughtfully. "Sometimes you say something was unkind when it wasn't meant to be. There was a little girl in my grandmother's yard one day with a cat—I haven't thought about her for years. I was older than she, but I came out to play with her. She had a paper bag in one hand and a stick in the other. She was marching round and round, keeping time by thumping the stick against the bag. When she saw me she said, 'I've got a kitten in the bag. We're marching and beating a drum.' I persuaded her to let me see, and sure enough there was a cat inside, nearly dead, poor little thing; its eyes were shut and it was scarcely breathing. I got it away from her and took it in the house and it got all right, but it had very nearly suffocated, let alone the beating it had taken from the stick and being swung around. Now then, if somebody had gone up and down the street telling people Mabel had killed a cat, the neighbors would have been scandalized and Mabel would have been marked as a terrible child who had deliberately killed a helpless animal; but she hadn't meant for one moment to be deliberately unkind.

"People are so ready to make inferences," Marian continued. "I know my people do, all of us. Some Negroes stand at a bus stop and a bus goes by. Everyone in that group thinks the reason is that the driver doesn't like to take on colored passengers. If there are white people among those waiting, the Negro has other explanations: another bus is just behind, the driver is behind his schedule, his car is already overcrowded; but the Negro never thinks of any of these reasons when he is alone or with just his own people.

"The same is true about taxis. You may think the cab doesn't pick you up because he has to get to the garage, it's time to turn in his car to the other shift; or perhaps he didn't see you flag him. The Negro only thinks the driver doesn't want to carry Negroes, or doesn't want to drive to the part of the city where they live. You try not to think that—at least many of us try—you argue with yourself it isn't so; but years of being waited on last, or ignored until you give up and leave the store, having an elevator door slammed in your face when

DORMIE . . . the scuff you can wear for walking Supple soft leather in pink, red, yellow, turquoise, coral, panama, dark blue, powder blue, white, black
AA and B widths. 5.50, slightly higher west of the Rockies

DANIEL GREEN

IF YOU CANNOT FIND THIS COMFY® SLIPPER IN YOUR LOCAL STORE, WRITE: DANIEL GREEN COMPANY, DOLGEVILLE, NEW YORK

you've stood aside to let other people pass first out of common politeness, all these things make for a little scratching irritation you can't brush off." That was when she said, "It's like a hair across your cheek. You can't see it, you can't find it with your fingers, but you keep brushing at it because the feel of it is irritating."

Marian broke off to insist apologetically she had never spoken of these things before. I prompted her to go on. "We'll probably not have this kind of talk again," I prophesied; "and furthermore, what you say about Negroes carries weight."

She raised her eyebrows questioningly.

"Why, certainly," I reiterated. "If it were someone of less achievement talking, I could think this was part of an over-all frustration, excuses provided as a solace for lack of accomplishment. But when these admissions come from—excuse me—such a horse's mouth, no one can discount them. You've accomplished everything you set out to do; and gone so far beyond even a child's fairy-tale dream of fame, you'd certainly have no reason to prop up a lack of success by naming these obstacles."

She smiled quizzically, but when she spoke her voice was low and there was no laughter in her eyes.

"Accomplished everything?" she echoed. "I wanted to sing in opera," she said. "That was my dream. Concertizing was second choice. I don't have to remind you when I sang my first operatic role; you were there. Four years ago. And I've been a concert singer a long time. You don't think I could start a new career now, do you? If only I could give what I had to offer then. But they wouldn't accept it, or me. Other Negroes will have the career I dreamed of, because this is one more barrier that's been let down; but when I tell you these confidences, I'm not speaking altogether dispassionately."

"Well, at least," I told her, after a pause in which I found it difficult to say anything, "you are recognized wherever you go, so you're not subjected to a hair across your cheek."

Marian's answer was, "Oh, really? Yesterday when I left you I took a taxi home. You may remember it was after five when we stopped talking. The driver didn't pass me by, and he was friendly and talkative, but there was not exactly recognition of me as a person. He said he hoped I'd done a good day's work and that my boss lady was satisfied. Any Negro going uptown at that time of day he assumed to be a domestic, treating herself to a cab to ease her tired feet. You see, white people make inferences too.

"Last year," she continued, "when I was on tour, I went to a hotel in California where I had stayed many times. I found it had changed management since my last visit, and consequently had a new staff. My reservations had been made in advance. I registered at the desk, and the clerk told me they were delighted to have me back again, and he was coming to my concert; he knew who I was. But when I reached the elevator its operator, a new employee, put his arm across the door as I started to enter. 'The back elevator for you.' So, being Marian Anderson doesn't make such a difference."

She reiterated her contention that white people make inferences. "Those who don't know individuals lump Negroes under a general category: domestic, train porter, whatever.

"I couldn't count the number of times the hostess of a party given for me after a concert has taken me to her kitchen to meet her cook. Now I'm delighted to meet the cook for two reasons. She's probably a nice person, and then"—Marian floundered a little in embarrassment—"well, I know it means something to her that one of her people is a guest in the house where she's working. If there are colored people serving at the party, I always make a point of speaking to them. If they are white, I don't speak; I'm shy about it. I'm afraid they'll think I'm getting above myself."

"There you go," I interrupted, "making inferences. I always speak to the maid at the door, the table, wherever. It's no treat to her, but I think it's polite. She'd be honored, I'd be willing to bet, if you did."

Marian was skeptical. "All right, I'll do it," she conceded. "But anyway," she resumed, "I'd be willing to bet you a hostess doesn't make a point of taking a white singer to the kitchen to meet her cook. There would have to be some special reason. But Negroes are lumped together. Here's another instance:

"A few years ago King" (the nickname of her husband, Orpheus H. Fisher) "and I tried to buy a house close to New York. The price kept increasing from the first one quoted. We finally gave up, and then we learned one citizen was offering to buy it to keep us from having it, because he said since I was a musician, I'd be bringing So-and-so, and he named a Negro band leader, to our house for noisy all-night jazz sessions, and he wanted it kept a quiet neighborhood. In the first place, I don't happen to know the band leader he mentioned; I also happen not to be a jazz singer; and in addition, the house we wanted was in the middle of a considerable acreage, so it would have taken a powerful 'session' to have penetrated to our own gate, let alone the neighborhood."

Geographically we had remained in the Eastern part of this country, since that is the locale common to both of us, but I asked if in her experience the attitude in the South had changed appreciably since the time she had begun touring.

"From what I hear," was her answer, "it has, but I haven't sung in some parts of it for over five years. I had asked the local managers to let my people buy seats like anyone else, and they haven't been able to accomplish this. When I first went to Southern states, Negroes had to sit in the top balcony. Then at our request, the managers agreed to let them sit downstairs, but in a separate block of seats. What happened was that the white people were sold their tickets first, and the block for the Negroes got smaller and smaller as I became better known. That was when I asked they be given an equal chance of buying seats on the basis of first come, first served, and an equal choice of location. That hasn't been possible, so I stopped going wherever it isn't done."

> Little girls . . . the nicest things that happen to people. They are born with a little bit of angel-shine about them and though it wears thin sometimes, there is always enough left to lasso your heart—even when they are sitting in the mud, or crying temperamental tears, or parading up the street in mother's best clothes.
>
> ALAN BECK

I asked if there had been any incidents that had affected her personally, and she told me about one woman who had greeted her as Marian when they were introduced.

"We got off the train," Marian began, "and this lady came up immediately. She called the two men with me, my accompanist and my traveling manager, Mr. Rupp and Mr. Joffe, and told them their rooms were waiting at the hotel. To me she said, 'Marian, you're going to stay with the Robinsons (not their real name); they have a nice clean house. You'll enjoy it there.' She took us in her car. She wanted to leave the men first at their hotel, but they insisted on seeing my accommodations. When we drove through the Negro section of the town she saw me leaning forward and looking around at the crowded settlement: houses that needed repair and paint, old women sitting on their front stoops supervising children playing in front yards that were just dust—I imagine the mothers were off doing day work—and she said, 'Marian, your people just love it here. They're much happier than anywhere else.' My manager was sitting beside her and she explained to him, 'Mr. Joffe, I was just telling Marian how much better off the Nigrahs are down here where we love them and take care of them.'

"The Robinsons were pleasant people. I spent the night in their little house, and it was clean, as my hostess had promised. It was also charming and so were they. The next morning I went to the auditorium for a rehearsal. Franz Rupp, my accompanist, was waiting for me outside the entrance to the hall. We found Joffe on the stage talking to our hostess of the day before; she was evidently in charge of arrangements for the series on which we were appearing. When they said 'Good morning' I could see Joffe was ruffled. It was easy to notice this because Joffe is usually all smiles and serenity. He said nothing about the cause of his frown and grim eyes; he went down to sit in the house while Franz and I rehearsed. The hostess went backstage. I could hear her from time to time giving orders.

"When we'd finished, the three of us, Franz, Joffe and I, left the building. We were standing on the pavement to wait for a taxi when Joffe suddenly asked Franz to go back inside and speak to Mrs. Blank, the hostess. 'I'll stay here and get a cab for Marian.' I started to tell Joffe this wasn't necessary; if they both had business to do with her, they needn't go one at a time. And then I decided it really was necessary. Here were Franz, a German, Joffe, a Russian, and I, an American, the only one of the three in my own homeland; and yet I needed one of the two foreigners to insure my getting a taxi. I knew it was more than likely in that part of the country a cab driver would refuse to carry a Negro. Before Franz returned, Joffe had put me in a taxi and I didn't see either of the men again during the day.

"Both of them seemed a little nervous at the concert that night, but I had music on my mind and paid little attention. At the end of the first group of songs, Franz and I followed the usual pattern. We left the stage and I led him back by the hand and we took a bow together. Until that instant the applause had been quite overwhelming, but as we emerged from the wings, his hand in mine, you could have heard the well-known pin drop. Then there was an avalanche of sound, applause so much greater even than it had been before that it was like a roar over the whole auditorium. The rest of the evening went very well too." Marian admitted this apologetically.

"After the concert, Joffe and Franz took me home. On the way I remembered their nervousness before the program began, Joffe's uneasiness in the morning, and his sending Franz back into the auditorium, so I asked what had been going on. The two men looked across me at each other. Then Joffe said, 'Well, I will tell you. When you arrived this morning, that lady was telling me she had heard that in other places when you came out to take a bow, you held the hand of your accompanist. She wanted me to tell you if you stood on that stage, holding the hand of a white man, she would not be answerable for what might happen to both of you. I told her that was your business, and I would ask her to stick to hers. Then I got to thinking this was not fair to Franz. So I asked him to let her tell him direct. He told her, and later me, he would not pay the slightest attention to such a thing, but I must admit we were both a little uneasy.'

"Then there was another time," she continued, "and you can believe these experiences weren't easy to explain to Franz and Joffe in the beginning. As foreigners, seeing me in my own country, they were sort of groggy, they were so confused. They certainly were confused this time I started to tell you about." She resumed the story.

"We came into a station and found a big committee waiting. I was presented with flowers, while photographers from the papers took pictures. Then I was interviewed. Finally we were able to leave. All this ceremony had taken place on the platform. When we reached the door to go through the station to the cars waiting on the other side, we saw a man standing in the doorway. I don't know what his job was, but he wore a uniform. When he saw me, he put his arm across like a bar and said, 'She can't come through this way. This goes to the white waiting room. She'll have to go through the other side.' Franz and Joffe started to protest, but I stopped them; I didn't want a scene. Then they wanted to go with me, but the official wouldn't permit that either. In the end, the members of the hospitality committee, the photographers, the press, Franz and Joffe all waited for me by the cars, while I went around to the Negroes' waiting room, through that and out to join the group. Now the inconsistency is that I'd been met at that same station a number of times before and taken through the white waiting roo this particular man wanted to make a t it. For that matter, what kind of cont tion or whatever could I inflict by just through the waiting room? I wasn't ever to sit down. It's like the inconsistency i about shoes and hats. In many places they don't in the least object to your try a dress, they don't like you to try on s hats. Hats I can understand; that's dire tact. But why shoes? A Negro doesn stockings that are different from people's."

"Practically everything you tell me," to Marian, "reminds me of something I've experienced vicariously about this bewildering situation. This parallel ha a few years ago when I was on a lecture the South. I never thought I'd be repe to you. However—after my progra afternoon, the lady chairman invited m to her house for tea. I accepted with pl because in the little time we had had t before my talk, I'd found her interesti charming. We had talked about book cause I had discovered she did a consid amount of reviewing for magazines. At broke into our book talk abruptly. 'I'd ask you something very personal,' she 'and please don't feel you must answer i rather not.'

"I must say this aroused my curiosity urged her to ask whatever she wished.

"'Well,' she said hesitantly, 'in one books you make the statement that th few things you boast about, but amon few are the possession of twin daughter close friendship with Marian Anderso

"I remembered the passage, and ad ruefully my display of arrogance.

"'Well,' she went on, 'what I want you is: When you say you're a close fr Marian Anderson's, what do you really by that? Have you ever been in her Has she ever been to yours? Do you hands with her, for instance, when you

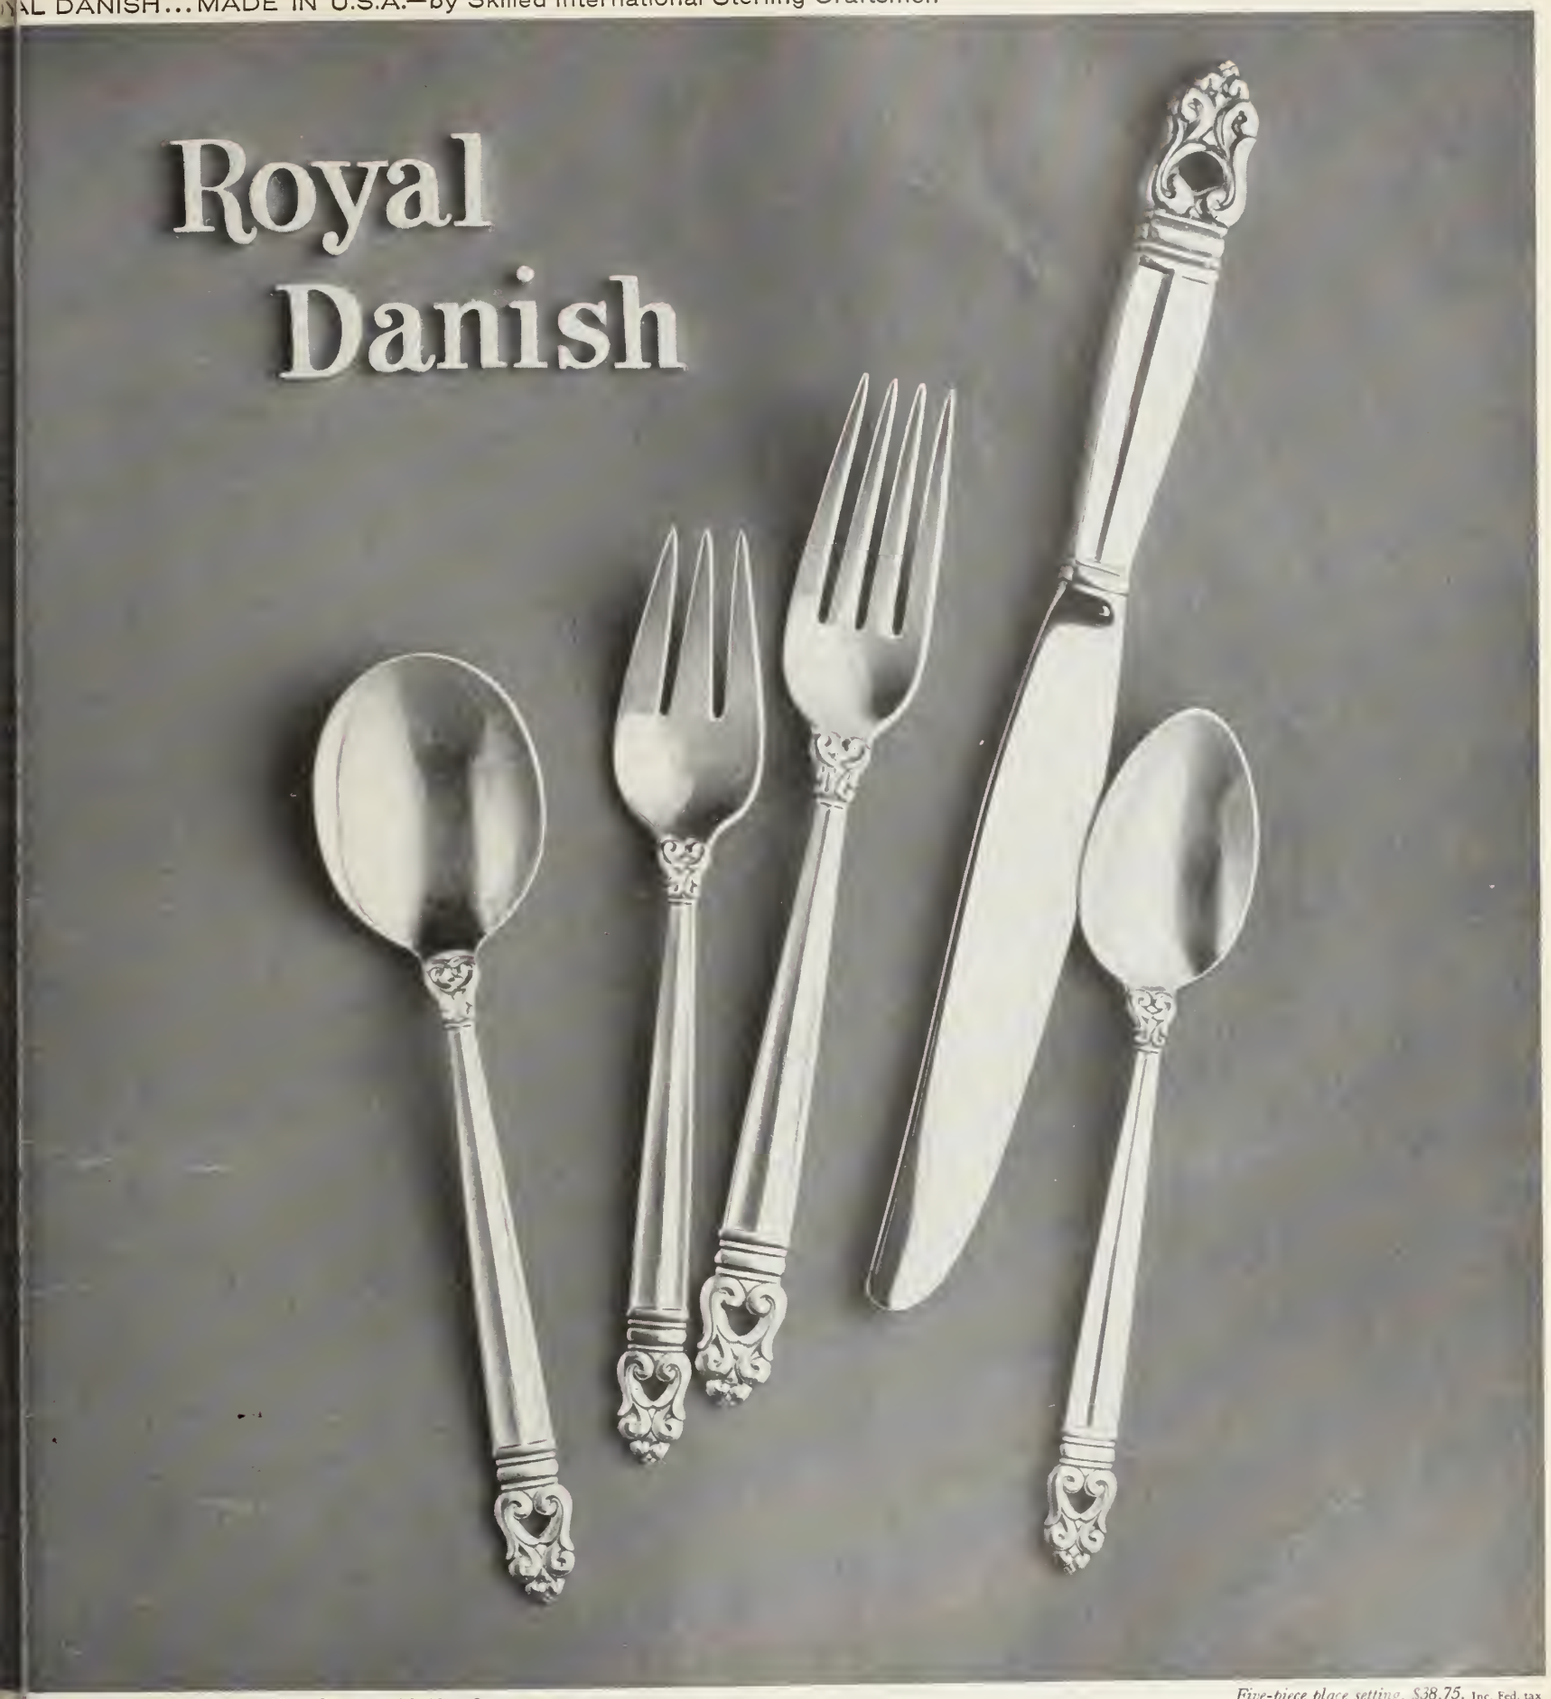
"I'd laughed aloud at the idea that be reluctant to answer such questions.

"'Certainly I've been in her house, swered, 'many times. And she's been in of course. As to shaking hands with doubt I do that; sometimes, I suppose occasion demands that we be very f Usually, like other close friends, we kis other when we meet.'"

Sure then that if I did not ask quickly was on my mind I would never broac asked Marian, "Didn't your husban for white for a number of years?"

"Why, yes," Marian answered eq "certainly he did, for the same reason a many other Negroes, who are able to Economically, it's greatly to their adva King's an architect and an engineer. H could he go in his field? He wanted to himself entirely on his ability. You yourself, no one, to look at him, woul suppose he is a Negro. So he took advan that in order to get started on a career."

"Don't tell me if the story I've heard him isn't true," I urged. "They say in Ph phia, King had a big job with the bes neering firm in town; one of the best country, as a matter of fact. Then one handed to his boss his resignation. The of the company were dismayed; they various inducements; said they were sur could rectify any dissatisfaction he mig When the bosses had finished he told pleasantly he was in no way dissatisfie the job; only he was a Negro and fou companionship of his own people agreeable."



Marian laughed. "Well," she admitte a way that's how it was, but ——"

"You wouldn't be so mean as to spoi a good story?"

"At least, let me say this," she insisted held the job until he had proved what he do professionally, but he couldn't stand a deception. If white people think Negro joy passing, they're very much mistake a terrible decision to make. A Negro d want to cut himself off from those wh been closest and dearest to him. He d

CONTINUED ON PAG

AL DANISH...MADE IN U.S.A.—by Skilled International Sterling Craftsmen

and made by The International Silver Company, Meriden, Conn.

Five-piece place setting, $38.75. Inc. Fed. tax

O all the solid silver patterns created in the famous Scandinavian tradition, Royal Danish has wn more hearts than any other. Start your own family tradition. Give your family precious sterling.
Share with them the life-long pride that only solid silver brings. Visit your jeweler or department tore, today. Only International offers you substantial savings on services for 4, 8 or 12 people.

INTERNATIONAL STERLING... loveliest, by design

INTERNATIONAL designs for changing America

Distinctively modern . . . distinctively American . . . distinctively New. . . Americana, in International Stainless Deluxe.

The clean, sweeping lines that characterize the contemporary silhouette are gracefully embodied in New Americana. The crisp, tailored beauty of this dramatic new pattern is a lasting one, for it is styled in stainless steel with a lustrous velvet finish.

See Americana and other exciting patterns in International Stainless Deluxe soon. You'll find them at fine stores everywhere. They're American-made . . . constantly available.

INTERNATIONAL STAINLESS

The International Silver Company, Meriden, Conn.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 171

want to live a lie. He certainly doesn't enjoy living under the constant threat of being identified and humiliated as someone who is not only passing but trespassing. But he weighs against all these things the realization that if he recognizes as an advantage the possession of a light skin he can utilize this to provide his family with far greater financial support than he could hope to accomplish by contradicting his appearance. So he goes into self-imposed exile.

"Now, you take King and me," she continued. "If King were not married to me or to someone else with as dark a skin as mine, he could live anywhere he chose and hold any job he's qualified for. The minute I come into the picture everything changes. . . . We were talking about the time he and I tried to buy a house just outside New York." I remembered.

"Well, when we had to give that up, we tried farther out, and went to Connecticut. There was a man who had been in the Philadelphia engineering firm when King worked there, and they'd become friends. When this man found out King was looking for a house, he suggested a real-estate friend he knew. This agent took King around and I went, too, naturally. The agent reported to the friend what he had shown.

"The friend said, 'Why don't you show King the [let's call it] Smiths' place?'

"The real-estate man was appalled. The friend told us about it afterward. The agent had said, 'You must be crazy. Why, the Smiths' house isn't far from the places of . . . [and he named two well-known families]. Don't you know King is married to Marian Anderson? She can't live near those people.'

"To this day I don't know whether that mutual friend thinks King is not a Negro. The point is that my very existence, whatever kind of person I am, set up a boundary line for King as well as for me. In the end, we had to buy a place with twice the amount of acreage we needed so we wouldn't contaminate the neighborhood."

"Why isn't every Negro," I demanded, "so neurotic as to be unable to function at all in this society? If every time I left my house I had to put up my arm, so to speak, to ward off the affront, the slight, the discrimination in some form that must inevitably occur sometime during the day, I think I'd either stay indoors with the shades down, or go out, not with my arm but my fists up. The bitter irony of this vulnerability of the Negro is that the gulf between him and the white citizen is so conspicuous in our landscape because all of us live in a democracy. In other parts of the world where there's a marked division of classes, a dustman doesn't expect in the normal course of his life to dine with a duke, and doesn't think about it one way or the other. But in this country, where a President is perhaps the more acceptable if he was born in a log cabin, every child grows up with the complacent assurance he might be President one day, or dine with a duke or a king; no stratum of society is beyond his potential achievement; that is, every American child except the American Negro. If he has a dark skin, but speaks with an accent, or wears the costume of another country, he is accepted anywhere, or very nearly. I heard only the other day of two delegates from an African country to the U.N. who arrived in this country in Western clothes. Two days later they had shaken out and put on native robes they had brought with the purpose of wearing only on ceremonial occasions. Those robes acted like the magic cloak in the fairy tale, except that instead of making them invisible it made them acceptable."

Marian smiled tolerantly at my outburst.

"I can't speak for how other Negroes feel," she said. "I expect there are plenty of neurotics. For every one of those there are others so intent on working toward the goal for our people they have no time to be deflected by annoyances. I suppose there are others who are plain discouraged, or so apathetic they just sit down and let others cut a path for them. The ones who are working don't take time to look back much. When they do, they can't help seeing the path has come a long way from where they started. It's wider, it's clearer, so it's worth while for them to keep pushing ahead and cutting down obstacles."

"Where do you belong?"

"I'm a believer," she answered.

"In what?"

"In God and the ultimate goodness. I think that was the way for me. When I was a little girl, there was a revivalist meeting in our church. I got caught in the tremendous urge to become a believer. I prayed and I wrestled about it, I thought of nothing else; I was in a turmoil and I anguished. Then all of a sudden one day, as I remember it came over me I was going through an unnecessary lot of agitation. There didn't have to be a violent change in me; I'd been a believer all along. It's been as simple as that for me ever since. Here's something else I believe: that one day it's going to come over a lot of people who are shouting and carrying on now against equality for the Negro, that they've really had good will toward him all along and that association with him is just as easy as believing is for me.

"When I was a member of the United States delegation at the U.N. I understood better, I think, than others serving with me a real many things that motivated the hopes and pleas and demands of the little nations particularly those whose people are dark-skinned. How much my people could contribute to our Government's understanding of these other nations! But at the same time my Government is learning more about my people because it's concerned now with the worl So this is good, good for my country and my eople. I believe this.

WOMEN'S IDEA EXCHANG

For conversational knitters, Mr H. O., of Mountlake Terrace, Washington, has an idea: paint one needl with bright nail lacquer as a guid for "every other row" instructio to knit or purl or increase or de crease.

"You see, I care so much about my cun try. I've sung all over the world, or ery nearly, and I've loved the opportunity 've had to travel. But east, west, home is certnly best. Only I worry about it. I felt this anxty, or perhaps an urgency, especially when was working at the U.N. You see"—I was di vering that Marian invariably "sees" in ic torial metaphors—"when you have a god set of china that gets a crack in some of the pes, you begin using it for second best, and en finally you put it away or give it awa If you're in a shop and you try on a dress at has a tear or some conspicuous imperfec n, you put that aside and take another one ut you can't put away or give away, or turn de from, a nation that has a crack in it. A a nation that doesn't acknowledge itself as de up of all its parts has a crack in it.

"Something else I think of often abou my country. A man said it in a speech to my ass at school, so you can guess how long I've remembered it. He said you can't put or old something down without bending over in some way lowering yourself. You have t get down to that same level. I'm so proud o my country I hate to think of it stooping or b d- ing to hold down some of its own people

We had come to the end of a conversa on Marian and I will probably not repeat, th gh our friendship, I'm sure, is the stronger or having said these things to each other.

We were saying good-by at my door wh I thought of one more thing I wanted to kn w.

"Do you think these things you belie in will be accomplished by the laws of schoo n- tegration, housing, employment, and so o ?"

She shook her head. "Not by those in th n- selves, wonderful as they are; they've certa ly widened the path and carried it way ahead, ut you have to accomplish the little things o. Wipe away once and for all that hair across he Negro's cheek. Take away the inconsisten es in the relationship between white and N o Americans. It's as important as all the l s. You can't build a chimney from the top, ou know. Good-by."

N THIS RRIAGE SAVED?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 72

a meat and drink to Buff. He was born t fists up. I wasn't. There was so much gument between my elders in my d—I had a stepfather with a nasty e -that I suppose I got my quota early. r Buff starts trouble, I grab Jimmy by and the two of us run for cover. No ich behavior seems a little silly in a oman, but it's the way I am.

Mae asked no awkward questions nmy and I rang her doorbell at one spent the night in her apartment— ayed with Aunt Mae so often in the nonths I should pay rent—but in the , as meek as lambs, we went wagging Buff. He was meek too. He apolo- ofusely, we hugged and kissed each id everything was rosy—for about ten en there was another row and Jimmy ok refuge with a cousin of mine.

MARKS F EXTINCTION

By JEAN CONDER SOULE

en our youngsters were growing
They hammered and banged,
ttered and clambered,
Pounded and clanged.

lelibly marked are
The dining-room chairs.
e bounced-upon sofa
Needs drastic repairs.

e house is a shambles
Now toddlers have grown.
e handprints of childhood
Brand all that we own.

e scars on the woodwork,
The plaster and thatch test to the fact
That we started—from scratch!

's lunatic jealousy has probably caused eal trouble in our marriage than any- lse. He is jealous of everything and dy." He is jealous of my affection for he is jealous of Aunt Mae, he is jealous ex-husband for whom I care nothing. gets annoyed if I speak a good word ex-wife, who is a total stranger to me whom I sometimes feel quite a bond of hy. If a girl friend phones me, Buff earshot and then clamors to know lled, why she called, how long we've quainted.

ore we'd been married a month, Buff me to give up my job. One evening in a ntial mood he got to talking about an ne of his and, because his confidences , I felt very close to him. Carried away intimacy, I told him how his appear- the scene had busted up my romance e senior partner at my office. Buff was ed. He demanded that I resign at once. d. I'd held the job for years, my salary cellent, my contacts with the senior at the office were infrequent and ff wouldn't listen to reason. He shouted iations until the neighbors on both woke and pounded on the walls. He e up until dawn. In the morning I was a I tottered to the office, but he tele- me five times that day and stopped in At the end of a week of intimidation, I resigned my dandy job and took another—less stimulating and less well paid. Buff approved of the second job after he assured himself that the five male employees were all safely married, and all past the age of fifty.

"Possibly his jealousy of my old boss has some justification. His jealousy of Fred, my ex-husband, is nonsense. Fred is supposed to send me seventy-five dollars a month for Jimmy's support, but he hardly ever does. One day Buff found out that Fred's payments were nearly two years in arrears. He demanded that I telephone Fred instantly. Dunning Fred is a waste of time and I said as much. Buff exploded. He accused me of still being halfway in love with Fred. The outburst was ridiculous—but terrifying too. His face was pale, his eyes were popping, he was shouting. Loud voices have always frightened me.

"I begged Buff to lower his voice. He raised it. When I tried to run out of the room, he grabbed my shoulders and pushed me into a chair. I put my hands over my ears. He jerked them away. Finally I twisted free. Buff banged out one door and I went out the other. Somehow I got hold of Jimmy—the youngster was panic-stricken too—and we were out of the house and gone. Jimmy and I stayed that whole weekend with a girl friend.

"On Monday morning Buff showed up at my office and sweet-talked me into going back to him. Nothing was improved. He continued to belabor me because of Fred's financial slackness. He threatened to prevent Jimmy from seeing his father, although Fred has legal visitation rights on alternate Saturdays. I make it a definite point to play up Fred's virtues to Jimmy. Buff does just the opposite. He tells Jimmy that his father is irresponsible and untrustworthy, and I'm sure it's wrong for the child to have his loyalties torn that way.

"Jimmy and I used to let a cleaning woman do our chores or else let things slide. Buff changed all that. He put Jimmy under orders to clean his room, hang up his clothes, make his bed with hospital corners—a daily inspection takes place—empty all wastebaskets, scrub the back steps, vacuum the living room twice a week, and I don't know what all. Buff says he is teaching Jimmy responsibility, but the child has scarcely a minute to himself.

"One time Princess chewed a hole in Buff's sleeping bag, which Jimmy had borrowed to play with, and Buff made me cancel Jimmy's allowance for a month. Jimmy lost another month's allowance because he left his bicycle in the driveway.

"I must say Jimmy hasn't seemed to mind the constant harassment—he adores Buff—but I mind plenty. Buff's sons, ten-year-old twins, are no more manly than Jimmy. The twins visited us every Sunday. Buff made the visits a misery. He is obsessed with the notion that his ex-wife, Lillian, is spoiling his boys, turning them into sissies. To counteract her influence, he undertook to turn his boys and my boy, too, into pint-sized commandos. He promoted rough sports only—football, soccer, boxing. He encouraged the twins to fight Jimmy, encouraged Jimmy to fight the twins. My poor kid developed a permanent scab on his nose and the twins acquired so many scars that Lillian had Buff on the phone regularly. Jimmy and I left home several times as the direct result of those Sundays.

"All the coming and going has been hard on Jimmy, hard on me, hard on Buff too. Despite the front Buff puts up of being the big, bluff male, I know in my heart he needs love and understanding. He seldom talks about his first marriage, but, unlike me, he was badly hit by divorce. For one thing, religion was involved. In order to divorce Lillian he left his church.

"Unfortunately, I don't see how he and I can ever achieve peace and companionship, and I need companionship. I married Fred at seventeen to get away from the warfare between my mother and stepfather. The two of them usually staged their fights at the supper table, while in fear and trembling I watched for the opportunity to escape. If I did manage a getaway, I spent the night with a schoolmate down the block and my mother collected me in the morning.

"Fred was my schoolmate's brother. Even at seventeen I didn't see him as a partner and

HOLLYWOOD VASSARETTE
PRESENTS
"TAKE IT ALL IN"
EASY EFFECTIVE CONTROL WITH STAY THERE®
ELASTIC KNIT DESIGNED FOR ACTIVE LIVES
IT'S STAY THERE® PANTY GIRDLE 37 WITH FRONT AND BACK CONTROL PANELS 7.95

This is a fabulous book
Overnight it will teach you how to achieve fascinating room decor with curtains and draperies: how to use color to make a room seem larger or smaller—how to get a cool effect, or a warm one—how to treat "difficult" windows. In quick, easy steps it will lead you to results that you would hardly dare believe possible. Be sure to get a copy. Your windows can be beautiful.

only 50¢ SEND TODAY or get it at your Stanley Drapery Hardware dealer's STANLEY®
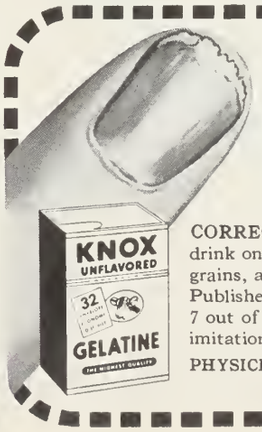
Stanley-Judd Div. 4909 So. Cherry St., Wallingford, Conn.



Stops Bad Breath INTERNALLY!

You Simply Can't Offend
No other method dares make this claim!

For quick, safe, sure, 'round-the-clock freedom from odors of strong food, alcoholic beverages, smoking, etc., take wonder-working, pleasant-tasting "ENNDS" Tablets containing the miracle extract, Daratol®
"ENNDS" act internally where sprays, mouthwashes, toothpastes simply can't reach. Can't upset the stomach. Trial size at Drug counters only 54¢.

"ENNDS"®

If your NAILS BREAK OR SPLIT

CORRECT THEM THIS MEDICALLY PROVED WAY. Just drink one daily envelope of Knox Unflavored Gelatine (115-120 grains, about 5¢) in fruit or vegetable juice, bouillon or water. Published clinical studies—using Knox, and Knox alone—show 7 out of 10 women have success. Mostly within 90 days. Avoid imitations. Your doctor will tell you.

PHYSICIANS: Reprints of all published medical studies on request.

© 1960 Knox Gelatine, Inc., Johnstown, N. Y.

protector. Every job Fred ever held I located and coaxed him to take. Often I became so disgusted at his spinelessness that at parties I would deliberately flirt with someone else. Fred would retire to the kitchen and cry. From the time Jimmy could walk, Fred treated him as a contemporary. While I was living with Fred, I had two children to raise.

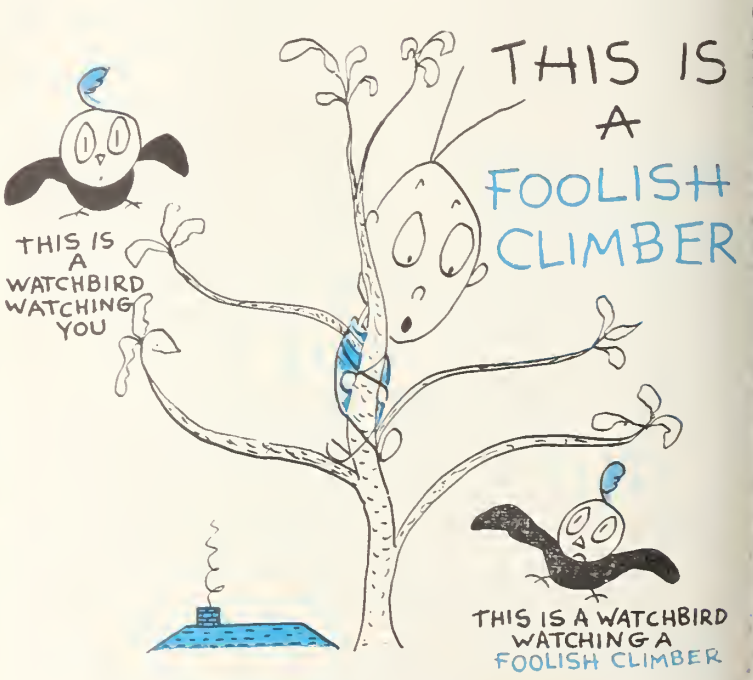
"Buff and I have been separated for three weeks. Our last fight sounds idiotic, but most of our fights were idiotic. He and I were in the kitchen drying the dinner dishes and everything was cozy when suddenly he ordered me to stack the cups his way. I kept on stacking my way. Buff grabbed for a cup. I held on. The cup fell in the sink and broke. Buff doubled up his fist and hit me.

"That same night Jimmy and I moved in with Aunt Mae on a permanent basis. I've missed Buff a great deal, I suppose I will always miss him, but I don't believe we should try to live together again. Buff and Fred are completely different types of men and yet I failed to make a go of it with either. Apparently I don't know how to choose a husband."

BUFF TELLS HIS SIDE:

"Apparently I don't know how to choose a wife," said thirty-three-year-old Buff, a dark man with close-cropped hair and a tense, narrow jaw. "My first wife was lacking in warmth and human feeling. I never saw Lillian kiss the twins good night, although she keeps them spotlessly dressed. She sewed the buttons on my shirt and kept my bureau drawers in order, but if I put my arms around her she turned her cheek.

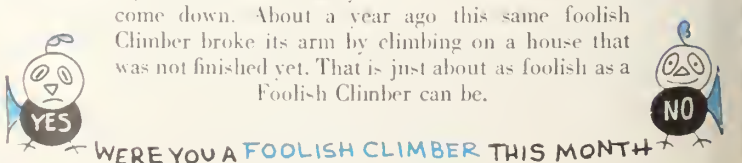
"Donna is a sweet and loving woman, but it seems she and I just can't talk to each other. I thought we could talk and argue and settle our differences like other couples. Shucks, an argument can clear the air and help married people get better acquainted.



"Whenever I try to explain my views to Donna, bring out the facts of a situation and show her just where she's wrong, she takes the position we're having a big fight. If I raise my voice or otherwise step out of line, she and Jimmy are out of the house and gone.

"I'm too quick-tempered, I know—my father was just the same—but for Donna's sake I intend to master my temper. It makes me sick just remembering what happened she left me three weeks ago, how I lost c and struck her. That is something I will repeat. My only excuse is I was practica of my head from pressure and frustratic particular evening.

"That morning I'd missed out on a b and big commission—I keep my bu problems under my vest, so Donna know it. In the afternoon my supervisc spent thirty minutes chewing me out. W was hung up with him, I got a ticket for parking. Jimmy was playing the TV ful when I reached home. I turned off the T he gave me a piece of lip. I reprimande and Donna was miffed. To smooth both feathers I suggested we turn on TV and e meal from trays, a custom I despise. supper I helped with the dishes, somethir I dislike. When Donna refused to yield small a matter as stacking the teacu seemed like the last straw, and I blew m



"For this past year I've been under t stress and tension. My job is new and I an unfamiliar field. Sales work is lucrativ chancy, and I've goofed more often th should. Instead of living in a house with to move around in, Donna and Jimmy are cooped up in three small rooms, be it's the best I can afford. By agreement m wife kept our house, our late-model ca $4000 worth of furnishings—which wa actly the way I wanted it. But I'd like to Donna nice things too. I'd figured on ha her that big commission—the commiss didn't get—to invest in furniture for the ment. I've been anxious to fix up our plac ask my sister Kate to dinner. All my kir except Kate, have declined to meet D Their attitude is understandable—they approve of divorce—but it's put a strai me.

"Actually, I've been under a strain since I married my first wife twelve years Lillian and I were high-school sweethea our people attended the same church- our engagement could be called a sort of ily affair. My father financed the dian ring. Being young, idealistic and inex enced, I figured Lillian's physical reserve based on maidenly modesty and I told m marriage would awaken her.

By MUNRO LEAF

This poor scared thing way up in this treetop is a Foolish Climber. Climbing in trees can be fun if we are sensible about it and don't get ourselves into danger by being Foolish Climbers. This one went too high and now it is really in a fix. It is too scared to come down. About a year ago this same foolish Climber broke its arm by climbing on a house that was not finished yet. That is just about as foolish as a Foolish Climber can be.

ng our first year of marriage she pered e to share her bed once a month, and ed to her relatives and friends that I to demanding. I did my best to keep my nhappiness private. My mother had a eart condition, and sparing her shock was much on my mind. For twelve ved a lie. I pretended to be faithful to but I wasn't. My conscience tor-ne with nightmares.

months ago my mother died. After ral, I left Lillian. When we were di-was determined to be financially genrankly, I went into sales work to my income. From my present earn-approximately $8000 a year I pay $50 a month. I mail those checks on I meet my responsibilities to my sons ail. Surely it's only natural that I get patient with Donna's ex-husband indifferent to his responsibilities.

na thinks I'm jealous of Fred. Maybe
t. Jealousy is new to me. Sometimes Donna deliberately provokes me. She t at a political whingding, which she with her boss. It wasn't until much I learned he had been romancing guy is strictly on the make, yet she p an awful row when I insisted she fferent job.

on, we had another set-to when her oss sent her a pair of football tickets ose Bowl game. She refused to return ts and I lost my temper and tore them ran out of the room. When I realized Jimmy were leaving again, I did a fool ired a pistol out the window. I aimed round and, to tell the truth, I don't hat I thought I was doing, except elieving my feelings.

ng our courtship, Donna made me as the center of her life. Now my es mean nothing to her. When I say r hair down, she pins it up. She is a usekeeper. When I explain the con-of having canned meats and vege-aced on a shelf in neat, logical order, s and mixes the cans every which way.
pt for Donna's interference, Jimmy ould be real pals. He is a good kid, ed among women so long that he be licked into shape. She just can't she excuses him from his chores—as did twice as many chores—and she to the discipline he needs for growth racter building. Jimmy's only model hood has been his father, which is r him than having no model at all.
Enna complains every time I warn the out no stock in his father's lies and romises.

n she and I were married, Jimmy had o years waiting for a dog Fred had d him. I bought the dog. I thought Princess would be good for him.
mised the boy an English bicycle. He along a catalogue on his Saturday
d he and Jimmy pored over it, debated gearshifts, trim and color. Of course cycle was forthcoming. Eventually I stand Jimmy's disappointment any nd I went out and bought the bicycle bout two weeks Jimmy did his chores protest. He exercised Princess by her lead to his handle bars and riding and around the block. He was obedi-respectful to me. But then he left his in the driveway and Donna backed and bent the frame. Both she and were outraged—in fact, they staged a d walkout on me—when I said the must be paid for out of his allowance.

taught Jimmy football, soccer, boxuess it may be possible I've concen-oo much energy on him because I feel about my own sons. They were inter-the Little League while I was around.
my ex-wife won't break up a kaffee- to drive them to a game. If I protest on one, she tells me in her sugary voice kids aren't interested in baseball any -they prefer their piano lessons. Every see my boys, I can notice the change in uscular co-ordination, their manner-actions, attitudes. Boys need to learn be men.

"Maybe these sentiments sound dictatorial, but I'm no dictator. Donna knows that. I love her and she loves me. She knows that too. We can work out all our difficulties if she will just stop running away."

THE MARRIAGE COUNSELOR SAYS:

"In childhood Donna escaped the quarreling of her elders by running away. She also collected bonuses. The drama of the flight was a thrill, the overnight stay with her schoolmate pleasant, and next morning she achieved the ambition of every child when her mother appeared and showered her with apologies, affection, special attention. What little girl could fail to glow to such a triumph!

"To escape Buff's contentiousness, Donna revived the childish technique. She had no idea of why she acted as she did, until we reviewed her background. At this time she had a talk with her mother and was surprised to learn that her long-dead stepfather had treated her with reasonable kindness. An ulcer victim, he was querulous about his ill health and restricted diet; most of the supper-table quarrels, so terrifying to an imaginative small girl, had revolved around her mother's greasy cooking. When Donna perceived that she was allowing a juvenile fantasy of a nonexistent bogeyman to affect her years later, she made up her mind.

"Determined to stop running from trouble, she returned to Buff. She and he had started off with an unusual number of complicated problems. Their courtship was brief. When they married, they were barely acquainted with each other's youngsters. The children tied them to a degree of association with their previous spouses; both Lillian and Fred were definite liabilities. Buff was newly launched in an unfamiliar field of employment. He felt guilty because of his divorce, bitter because of the estrangement from his kin. Opinionated and argumentative, his confidence was at low ebb; his mood was defensive and he was at once supersensitive and hypercritical.

"Donna's experiences in business and in her first marriage had trained her to make independent decisions. If she wanted new upholstery and had the cash, she bought it. She and Buff had discussed finances and budgeting only in a sketchy way.

"Soon after Donna started counseling she acknowledged that Buff's pride in his masculinity, a vital part of his personality and appeal for her, had taken quite a beating from his first wife. She began to watch for opportunities to boost his ego, was liberal with compliments. The first evening the two stepped out after the reconciliation, she wore her hair around her shoulders in the style he prefers and she was touched by his gratitude. She took care to provide him no occasion for jealousy.

"Almost immediately Buff became less edgy. Soon he was controlling his temper and there were no all-out explosions. However, he continued to initiate too many of the so-called 'discussions' which he employed as a means of laying down the law. Capitalizing on his vehement belief in the inherent differences between men and women, Donna suggested that the two of them divide their spheres of influence.

"She now has the final say-so in domestic matters—they had an astonishing number of arguments about how to scrape the dishes, peel an onion, mop the floor—and in her own wardrobe. She is allowed to deal with her ex-husband's financial laxity as she pleases.

"Except for the laggard alimony, Buff is undisputed boss of all finances. Their differences over budgeting and household purchases were eased just as soon as Buff disclosed the amount of his income, his prospects, his obligations. Buff is a perfectionist, not an easy kind of person to live with—or to be. To admit that he could provide less adequately for his bride than for his ex-wife was a humbling experience.

"Buff and I spoke little of his family background, but my surmise was that he modeled himself upon an old-style, autocratic father. In one consultation he described a boyhood Saturday when he polished every pair of shoes in the house, some twenty-five pairs. As he was hurrying off to join a group of comrades his father spied a speck of mud behind one heel; the afternoon outing was canceled and he polished all the shoes again. In another interview he related a recurrent dream, which had plagued him since boyhood.

"In the dream Buff sees himself seated in the middle of a bed, attempting in frenzy to make it neatly, smooth out every wrinkle, pull the corners taut—a palpable impossibility while he remains sitting on the bed. Our discussion of this dream helped him to a clearer understanding of his stubborn nature and unrealistic expectations. He granted that no matter how much he and Donna changed, perfection wasn't in the cards for them. He bowed to the hard fact that he must accept his ex-wife's way of bringing up their sons, that his paternal influence was now limited, that children usually pay part of the price of divorce. By agreement Donna doesn't interfere when he disciplines Jimmy—the boy was plainly benefiting from discipline and training—and he refrains from airing his opinions of Jimmy's father. By agreement, too, they talk about Fred and Lillian only when strictly necessary.

"Donna and Buff have made other compromises and are sticking to them. They are now convinced their marriage is on a firm foundation."

Editors' Note: This case history was compiled and condensed from actual records by DOROTHY CAMERON DISNEY

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 380 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Junior College

AMBLER JUNIOR COLLEGE OF TEMPLE UNIVERSITY
Est 1910 as Pa School of Horticulture. Landscape design Horticulture and Liberal Arts. Co-Ed. Accredited A.S. & A.A. degrees. Electives in Horse Husbandry & Horsemanship. 150 acre campus near Phila. Greenhouses, gardens, orchards & stables as labs. Credits transferable to 4-year colleges. Placement and Activities.
BOX L, AMBLER JUNIOR COLLEGE, AMBLER, PA.

Fine & Applied Arts

Ray-Vogue Schools
Commercial Art, Photography, Interior Decoration, Dress Design, Fashion Merchandising with Modeling, Fashion Illustration. Coed. Attractive residence for out of town girls. Enter Oct. 3. Write Registrar, Rm. 706, Specify course.
Ray-Vogue Schools, 750 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

Home Study Schools

CUSTOM Millinery LEARN AT HOME
Earn From the Start! You make beautiful Designer Hats Now and season after training. Easy professional course includes instruction, ALL materials, trimmings, hat shapes, design lessons. Write for FREE Book, "The Art of Custom Millinery."
Academy of Millinery Design, Dept. MJ-61, 150 Park Ave., E. Rutherford, New Jersey

Chicago School of Interior Decoration
Home study training. Approved and supervised. Fine starting point for career. No classes. No wasted time. Text and work kit furnished. Diploma awarded. Send for free booklet.
Chicago School of Interior Decoration, 835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept. 1376, Chicago 14

LEARN TO DRAW IN 3 WEEKS
YES! In just 3 weeks you can be on your way toward high-pay career or hobby in Commercial Art, Painting, Cartooning, Fashion, TV Art, etc. Learn at home, in spare time. TWO 22-pc. art outfits at no extra charge. LOW COST—only 20c a day! Send for FREE School Catalog describing easy course. No salesman will call.
Washington School of Art, Studio 1559, Port Washington, N.Y.

Play Right Away!
ANY INSTRUMENT
Now it's EASY to learn ANY INSTRUMENT—even if you don't know a single note now. No boring exercises. You play delightful pieces RIGHT AWAY from very first lesson! Properly—by note. Simple as A-B-C. You make amazing progress—at home, in spare time, without teacher. Only few cents per lesson. 1,000,000 STUDENTS, including Lawrence Welk.
FREE BOOK Shows how easy it is to learn music this modern way. Write for it. No obligation. No salesman will call upon you. U. S. School of Music, Studio 639, Port Washington, N. Y. (Estab. 1898). Tear this out.

Hotel Training

Hotels Call for Trained Women

You can qualify at home or through resident classes in Washington for a well-paid position in the hotel, motel and hospitality field. Thousands of Lewis graduates, both young and mature, "making good" everywhere. Get into this fast growing field offering sound, substantial opportunities, fine living, luxurious surroundings. Previous experience proved unnecessary. Registration in Lewis Nationwide Placement Service FREE. Send today for FREE Book.
Accredited by N.H.S.C.
Course Approved for ALL Veteran Training
LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL, Room FO-549, Washington 7, D. C. 44th SUCCESSFUL YEAR

Boys' Schools

New York Military Academy
Develops today's Youth for tomorrow's world by building mind, body, character, leadership. R.O.T.C. Graduates all colleges. Infantry, Aeronautics, Artillery, Band scholarships. Grades 5-12 and P.G. Catalog. Est. 1889.
67 Academy Ave., Cornwall-on-Hudson, N.Y.

Fork Union Military Academy
Our One Subject Plan in Upper School (grades 9-12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration. Accredited. ROTC highest rating. Modern bldgs. 2 gyms. 2 indoor pools. Separate Jr. School, grades 5-8. 65rd year. Catalog.
Dr. J.C. Wicker, Box 869, Fork Union, Va.

Coeducational School

Judson School In Arizona. A coed ranch school. Grades 1 to 12. College Preparatory. Accredited. Beautiful location in Paradise Valley near Phoenix. Healthful, warm climate. Small classes. Riding included in tuition. Tennis, swimming, pack trips, fishing, rodeos, riflery, roping, music. 33rd year. Catalog.
David J. Wick, Headmaster, Scottsdale, Arizona

Medical Technology

Northwest Institute of Medical Laboratory Technique Founded 1918. M. D. Supervision. Courses to 12 mos. in clinical laboratory X-ray and EKG. Free placement service. Coed classes start Jan., Apr., July, Oct. Catalog.
3418 E. Lake Street, Minneapolis 6, Minn.

College of Medical Technology
Medical Technician Training. Also X-Ray. Graduates in demand, excellent pay. Free nation-wide placement. Nationally approved school. Dorms. Athletics. Coed. Courses 5 to 15 months. Write for Catalog giving year of high school graduation.
1900-L La Salle Avenue, Minneapolis 3, Minn.

Home Study Schools

National School of Dress Design
Approved supervised home study training. Fine starting point for career. No classes. No wasted time. Text and work kit furnished. Diploma awarded. Low tuition and payments. Send for free booklet.
835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 1376, Chicago 14, Ill.

American School High School at Home. Many Finish in 2 Years. Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H.S. text supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H.S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
American School, Dept. H63, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

WHY DON'T YOU WRITE?
EARN EXTRA MONEY IN SPARETIME writing short stories, articles on homemaking, fashions, hobbies, travel, local, club and church activities. You learn by writing at home under the guidance of professional writer-editors by the fascinating N.I.A. Copy Desk Method.
FREE "Writing Aptitude Test" tells whether you have qualities to become a successful writer. Write for it NOW without cost or obligation. 55th Yr. Licensed by N.Y. State.
NIA NEWSPAPER INSTITUTE OF AMERICA
Suite 5750-P, One Park Avenue, N. Y. 16, N.Y.

Business & Secretarial

Bryant College Bachelor's degree in three yrs. Professional training for business leadership. Business Administration: Accts., Management, Marketing. Exec. Sec'l.; Admin., Legal, Accts., Med. Business Teacher-Ed.; 4 yrs. 2 yr. Sec'l Course. Coed. 25 bldgs., dorms. Vet appr. 98th yr. Sept., Feb. entrance. Catalog:
Ruth West, Bryant College, Providence 6, R. I.

Katharine Gibbs Secretarial. Outstanding training. Three practical courses: One-Year Secretarial, Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years), Special Course for College Women. Residences. Personal placement service. For catalog write:
Admissions Dean, Boston 16, 21 Marlborough St.; New York 17, 230 Park Ave.; Montclair, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.; Providence 6, 155 Angell St.

SHORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS
Write 120 Words Per Minute
Age No Obstacle—LOWEST COST
Famous SPEEDWRITING shorthand. No symbols; no machines, uses ABC's. Easiest to learn and use. Fast preparation for a better position. Nationally used in leading offices and Civil Service. 120 words per minute—50% FASTER than Civil Service requirements. Over 500,000 taught at home or through classroom instruction. The very low cost will surprise you. Typing available. 37th Year. Schools in over 400 cities in U.S., Canada, Cuba and Hawaii. Write for Free Booklet to: School of
DID YOU SEE READER'S DIGEST ARTICLE ON
Speedwriting®
Dept. 9909, 55 W. 42 St., N. Y. 36

desert dri

REAL CREAM DEODORANT anti-perspirant SHULTON

desert dri

Look! Real cream deodorant your fingers need never touch!

New glide-on applicator! Just twist the bottom . . . cream comes out the top!

Now you can have the all-day protection only a real cream deodorant can give plus glide-on convenience—both in new Desert Dri. It glides on and rubs in right from its own exclusive applicator. Not just a rolled-on surface coating, it penetrates for positive all-day protection. Checks perspiration, stops odor, won't damage clothes. 3 months' supply—1.00 plus tax.

© Shulton, Inc., 1960

New Desert Dri®—real cream deodorant—anti-perspirant by Shulton

HOME

JOURNAL

OCTOBER · 1960

35¢

AZINE WOMEN BELIEVE IN

ES—HOW YOU
E MORE MOROUS IN URS

lete ensed Novel

O DRESS WELL
ACTICALLY
NG

oung nor Hatfields
ome

DERFUL RCAN FOOD
oor pages ipes from OURNAL
OOK

Child's e Depends ucation
RAL RICKOVER

CROSBY—WANT TO UP UGHTER

PUBLIC LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CALIF
2 1960

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CALIF
PUBL BL J JUL 61

Step into the golden age of vinyl floors

It's here with Palatial Corlon—a breath-taking new Armstrong sheet vinyl floor. Wh sparkling golden tracery, Palatial turns the classic beauty of marble into lavish m elegance. It comes in white, black and six gentle colorings, and costs about $195 installed in a 12′ x 15′ area. FREE! Booklet of color sc and a list of stores that have Palatial Corlon. Write Armstrong, 6010 King St., Lancaster, Pa. In Canada, Dept. 100-A, Box 919, Montrea

Style 87001. Use Palatial Corlon upstairs, ground level, w

Palatial Corlon is one of the famous Armstrong VINYL FLOC

1860-1960 Beginning our second century of o

Ladies' Home JOURNAL

October 1960

VOL. LXXVII NO. 10

Journalities

Catharine Boyd

I was the youngest of a large family in Wilmington, Delaware," says THARINE BOYD. "My mother spoiled me and everybody else bossed me, so I read and scribbled." She lives with her husband, three children, e Persian cats and a French poodle in Berwyn, Pennsylvania. "My teen-year-old criticizes everything I write for one per cent of the sale; eginning to think it's worth more." The White Dress, page 60, dramatizes one family's solution to a problem often faced but rarely discussed.

H. B. Rickover

HYMAN GEORGE RICKOVER (Your Child's Future Depends on Education, ge 98) was graduated from the U.S. aval Academy in 1922 and advanced through grades to vice admiral. He as assigned to the atomic-submarine project with the Atomic Energy ommission in 1946, and is generally dited for the successful development of the first atomic-powered sub. He is equally famous as a positive and vigorous critic of education and routinely donates payment for his writing to organizations working to improve education in the U.S.

Esther Bubley

Photographer ESTHER BUBLEY'S work is the best expression of herself—quiet, unassuming, sensitive. Her hotos for this month's How America ives ("Through All My Housework in an Hour," page 184) are typical. She never forces pictures; she knows the picture will project itself. Such an art has brought her nearly every honor a photographer can achieve. When not en route to some other point on the globe, she lives quietly in midtown Manhattan.

Condensed Novel Complete in This Issue

56 Peaceable Lane By Keith Wheeler

Stories

58 Operation Terror (Second part of three) By The Gordons
60 The White Dress By Catharine Boyd
78 Mrs. Fay Dines on Zebra By Hortense Calisher

Special Features

11 The Discrepancy Between Democratic Ideals and Realities By Dorothy Thompson
24 Teen-Time Billionaires By Pat Boone
30 Russian Children Don't Whine, Squabble or Break Things—Why? By Benjamin Spock, M.D.
47 Tell Me, Doctor By Goodrich C. Schauffler, M.D.
72 Because Women Care
72 Candidate's Wife By Margaret Hickey
73 Editorial By Beatrice Blackmar Gould
80 How I Want to Bring Up My Daughter By Bing Crosby, as told to Bob Willett
93 The Young Governor Hatfields at Home
98 Your Child's Future Depends on Education By H. G. Rickover, Vice Admiral, USN
139 Hope for Victims of Stroke By Robert A. Kuhn, M.D.
184 How America Lives: "Through All My Housework in an Hour" By Betty Hannah Hoffman

General Features

4 Letters Our Readers Write Us
23 Under Cover By Bernardine Kielty
38 There's a Man in the House By Harlan Miller
42 Making Marriage Work By Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D.
55 Fifty Years Ago • Journal About Town
190 This Is a Paper Plopper By Munro Leaf
192 Ask Any Woman By Marcelene Cox

Fashion and Beauty

74 You Too Can Be Beautiful in 24 Hours By Dawn Crowell Norman
82 You'll Wear Your Winter Coat at Least 100 Times a Year! By Wilhela Cushman 86 Paris in America By Wilhela Cushman
88 How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing! By Bet Hart
90 The Journal's Gem of a Wardrobe By Nora O'Leary

Food

62 Ladies' Home Journal Cookbook Portfolio

Architecture, Homemaking, Interior Decoration

92 Classic Simplicity By John Brenneman
94 A New Kitchen for the Governor By Margaret Davidson
96 Contemporary Comfort in a Victorian Bedroom By Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland

Poems

29 Only the Heart By Georgie Starbuck Galbraith
100 From the Hills By Dionis Coffin Riggs
121 Constable Painting By Sara King Carleton
126 The Potential By Dilys Laing
130 Rhymes From Young Mother Goose By C. S. Jennison
145 Inquiry By Elizabeth McFarland

Cover Photograph by Jon Abbot

CHANGE OF ADDRESS. At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent. • Ladies' Home Journal, ©1960 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Thursday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Second-class postage paid at Philadelphia, Pa., and at additional mailing offices. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada. The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence. Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice. Unconditional Guaranty. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed. The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; E. Huber Ulrich, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Ford F. Robinson, Sr. Vice Pres. and Manager, Business Department; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Maurice S. Gould, Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, Holiday and The American Home.

reducing equipment, tractors, rivets, tires, electric contractors whatever you need—

Find it Fast In The Yellow Pages

Advertisers displaying this emblem make your shopping easy.

LETTERS
OUR READERS WRITE US

MICHIGAN

WHEN THE DOCTOR WON'T COME

Dear Madam: I have been appalled to discover that doctors in this state—or at least in the town in which I now live—seem to have agreed to make no more house calls on patients, no matter how ill they may be. You are always asked to bundle the patient up and bring him to the doctor's office. Quite apart from the harm this may do to him, this must also be a danger to others. It seems to me the public has a right to far better service than it is now getting! Yours very sincerely,
Lansing MRS. L.M. BEECH

NEW YORK CITY

EITHER IMMORAL OR FATTENING?

Dear Editors: On Wednesday I blamed the laundry because my shirt collars had "shrunk." Yesterday I noticed that my favorite suit was too tight around the waist. Today, with once-a-year honesty, I faced the facts. I am getting heavy again. In the words of corpulent Alexander Woollcott, everything I like seems to be either immoral or fattening.

My doctor's diet regimen will be successful. I know, because I've gone through it before. What will be hard to bear will be his question, asked more in sadness than in anger, "Why can't you just be careful all the time, so you won't have to go through this torture?"

This year, though no less ashamed, I think I have an answer: How can I think about declining baked potato while remembering all the other good self-help advice with which all the U.S. is salvoed? Is it possible to specify black coffee while switching to filters, getting eight hours' sleep, having an annual checkup, mailing Christmas packages early, and aiding public schools? Here in America, land of human perfectability, I am at the same time urged to learn the mambo, save for old age, "live a little now," install an air conditioner and protect national parks. I shouldn't wonder that "one out of ten Americans suffers from mental illness." Small wonder, too, I forget creeping calories.

There are compulsive eaters, but I'm not one of them. It's the casual olive, the single peanut, the unnoticed cheese dip taken while I try to be a well-adjusted member of society. I nibble while being a "good listener," while considering the other man's point of view, while never arguing politics or religion, and during the time I "consider her feelings" and Strontium 90. While reading at night to "keep up with world knowledge," I often go to the icebox. I get round, perhaps, because I keep trying to be a well-rounded man! DISGRUNTLED

COLORADO

LASTING SOLUTION TO POOR TV

Dear Editors: Of course we should fight for intelligent programing on TV. But how better can we protect our children than by giving them homes in which Christian principles are practiced, not just preached? Sincerely,
Denver LYNNE N. P[illegible]

TEXAS

8 REASONS WHY CHILDREN GET GRAY

Dear Editors:

1.
a. "Haven't I told you a million tim[es] not to interrupt when someone [is] talking?"
b. "Mother and daddy, guess what hap[pened] at ——"
"For heaven's sake, go wash you[r] face!"

2.
a. "Why did you embarrass me in fro[nt] of my friends?"
b. "I don't care if Tommy can hear m[e] let me tell you, young man ——"

3.
a. & b. "STOP YELLING AT YOU[R] BROTHER! THERE IS NO EX[-] CUSE FOR THAT!"

4.
a. Mother (pouring a glass of milk fo[r] 5-year-old): "When are you goin[g] to learn to do things for yourself?"
b. Mother (mopping up spilled milk) "How many times have I told you t[o] let me help you with things lik[e] that?"

5.
a. (8 P.M.) "I wish I could go to be[d] now. I can't understand why yo[u] fight it."
b. (8 A.M.) "Stop that right now o[r] you're going straight to bed!"

6.
a. "Don't bother me with that now[.] Can't you see I'm busy?"
b. "Don't bother me with that now[.] Can't you see I'm trying to rest?"

7.
a. "The least you can do is say 'Hello' to our guests."
b. Parent, passing child's friend i[n] yard: "——".

8.
a. "When you aren't sure what to d[o] in a situation, try to remember wha[t] mother and daddy do."
b. See above.

Houston JANIS PATTON CONRAD

OHIO

I'M TIRED OF BEING YOUNG!

Dear Editors: Here I sit, "somewhere" in my thirties, in Bermuda shorts and sneakers, my hair in the "All-American college-girl pageboy."

I have before me a torn-out fashion ad, labeled "She bakes for the library, chairmans the P.T.A., cooks, and still looks pretty as a teenager."

I also have a copy of Harry A. Overstreet's The Mature Mind, which I have just got around to reading. And high time. Dr. Overstreet has just hit me with the pulverizing idea that every sick society has been made up of immature people—from those who crucified

CONTINUED ON PAGE 6

Why tell him it's make-up...he's convinced it's you!

©Revlon, Inc., 1960

And it is you . . . your complexion perfected by the lasting loveliness of delicate color

Just smooth on Revlon 'Touch-and-Glow' and see a soft, warm change come over your complexion. It's the way you feel in candlelight . . . the way you look in any light when your make-up is Revlon 'Touch-and-Glow'.

So quick, so easy...goes on in minutes—stays freshly glowing all through the day. Just choose your shade from one of eleven beautifully blended skin tones . . . and see your complexion bloom with a beautiful new glow.

'Touch-and-Glow' Liquid Make-up for a delicate glow of color . . . matching Face Powder for a soft velvet finish . . . Pressed Powder Compact for perfect touch-ups.

'Touch-and-Glow' . . . by Revlon

Electrasol ends FOAM CHOKE-UP in your dishwasher

How new-formula discovery gives you spotless, film-free dishwashing!

New formula Electrasol frees your dishwasher from the sluggishness caused by foam choke-up! Releases torrents of water for all-out full spray action! Dishes come out spotless, your silver gleaming, your glasses sparkling . . . without a hint of dulling film . . . every single time! So let Electrasol restore full spray action to your dishwasher . . . whatever make you own!

Here is how foam choke-up builds up from food remains on dishes to strangle your dishwasher's cleaning power. Dishes come out muggy, glasses spotty, silver is streaked!

Here's how new Electrasol with its exclusive chemical formula frees your machine for full spray action. Dishes come out spot-free, glasses crystal-clear, silver dazzle-bright!

Does what no other dishwasher detergent can do . . . even in hardest water!

© 1960.

Another famous product of ECONOMICS LABORATORY, INC., St. Paul, Minn.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

Jesus to those who persecuted the Jews. And certainly our own society needs to be well and mature more desperately than any did before.

So I look down at my bare knees and ask, "Am I mature? So why, then, am I disguised as a high-school girl?"

I am a woman, married, with three school-aged children. I'm a matron, that's what I am—but that's a repugnant word that immediately conjures up a lumpy, frumpy, bedraggled character in a house dress; and in our suburban block, no "gal" ever wears a house dress. We all dress like our teenage daughters. If we didn't, you couldn't tell us from our mothers.

Where is the golden maturity casting a mellowing glow on us older women? In America we worship the cult of youth. But suddenly I'm tired of trying to be dewily, coltishly young—and yet I don't know what else to be. I'm like the woman of whom Kipling said youth had been a habit so long that she could not part with it.

What I may be hankering for, I suppose, is to let myself go, and I know this is treason to my sex, a retreat from the twentieth century, probably even suicidal. But on the other hand, it would be so pleasant and relaxing just to let this veneer of shiny youthfulness peel off, and show the plain, sound, aging wood underneath, and then devote my attention and energy to other, more important things.

Sincerely,
Cuyahoga Falls BETTY FRENCH

PENNSYLVANIA

RH-NEGATIVE BABIES

Dear Editors: I so enjoyed your "Tell Me, Doctor" concerning Rh blood.

For the couples who are afraid to have children because of this, I am enclosing a picture of our five healthy, happy "Rh" children!

Healthy five.

Sincerely yours,
Berlin MRS. TOM MAUST

TEXAS

OUR FAVORITE 1960 GRADUATE

Dear Miss Posson: In 1957 I wrote the Journal that I had been inspired and encouraged by various well-written articles to go back to college to prepare to teach. In May I received my degree—a B.S. in Elementary Education—and will begin teaching this fall.

Sincerely,
Burkburnett SHIRLEY J. MALONE

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

OVER 6,000,000 SUBSCRIBERS MEANS 25,000,000 READERS

Dear Editors: It is with pleasure that Parent and Child, Inc., notes your latest contribution to childbirth education, "The Challenge to American Obstetrics," by Herbert Thoms, M.D., and Bruce Bliven Jr.

At a recent board meeting, the question was raised as to how many women are at least aware of the Education Childbirth movement in this count One answer was, "Well, certainly total readership of the Ladies' Ho Journal has been enthusiastically posed to educated childbirth."

Our thanks for your support.

Sincere
PAT MONTI
Chairman of the Board of Direc
Washington Parent and Child,

CALIFORNIA

TODAY IS SATURDAY!

Dear Editors: It is Saturday mor ing—a cold, rainy day. In many of t houses in my neighborhood the ch dren will soon start the age-old wail "But motherrrrr! What'll I do!" I p away my breakables, and then mak telephone call to a neighbor chil Other phones start to ring, and soon laughing, excited group of young on are coming up my front walk.

After rain clothes are shed, the ch dren swoop to the big, old-fashion trunk which my husband has alrea brought in from the storage room. F this trunk is a veritable treasure che The first lifting of the lid releases hea enly clouds of lavender and the tru itself contains high-heeled shoes, purs of all sizes, gloves (mostly one of kind), two old fur collars, one ve ragged feather boa, one wedding dre (the favorite), velvet and sequined jac ets, satin nightgowns, parts of costum and hats galore, old lace curtains a two velvet drapes. (Everything is "fee good.")

In a black velvet box is jewelry: on of-a-kind earrings, beads, two watch that no longer run, bracelets and a gl tering tiara. Other boxes are filled wi powder puffs, lipstick and eye shado ribbons, bows and artificial flower and there's a fascinating array of pe fume bottles (into which we've p apple-blossom cologne).

A pot of hot chocolate is on the sto and the cooky jar is full—and I find easy chair, well out of traffic but with good view, and settle down with knitting. Very little gets done, thoug because my services as pinner upp and bow tier are in great demand.

These happy rainy days began wh a little girl was my guest for sever days. A couple of hats, an old cockt dress and a pair of silk stockings ke her happily occupied. Then, at a churc rummage sale, I discovered the whi wedding dress and the trunk with i high, humped lid. (My husband paint it a shiny black and papered the insi with gold foil.)

Since the treasure chest loses its fa cination if opened too often, our Sa urdays are varied. We toast marshma lows in the fireplace, and the childre sing. Other times, each child brings a apron and we decorate, bake and e cookies. But our Saturdays are happ days for all of us. My husband go bowling; mothers are grateful for a fe hours' reprieve; and I no longer b moan my childless existence!

Sincerely
Burlingame ANN VERDUG

CANADA

MOVING LOVE STORY

Dear Sirs: The reason for our chang of address is that we fell in love wit the kitchen, laundry, washroom setu of your Portfolio House No. 8! Buil ing the entire house here would hav cost twice as much as we could afford but we worked this wonderful kitche into a standard-type home. It ha turned out to be everything th Journal article promised and more!

Yours sincerely,
Saskatoon THE RAY LORMAN FAMI

New! Easy, modern ways to prepare

ALL-AMERICAN FAVORITES

With Gold Medal Flour and Mazola Corn Oil

Your favorite old-fashioned recipes now brought up-to-date
by the Betty Crocker kitchens

OVEN-BAKED CHICKEN & BISCUITS

Now you can prepare and serve this All-American favorite combination in a single dish. See recipe on page 10.

More ideas on next page

BEST TOSSED SALAD

Fresh . . . light . . . so right . . . a family favorite with a Mazola Corn Oil dressing. (Recipe in new "All-American Favorites" Recipe Booklet. See offer on next page).

FAVORITE APPLE PIE

Gold Medal makes the All-American kind of pie crust . . . the flaky-tender kind. (Recipe in new "All-American Favorites" Recipe Booklet. See offer on next page).

HAMBURGER SKILLET PIE

An all-family, all-time, all-American treat—hamburger—with a modern twist. Recipe on page 10.

For more convenience, for special nutritional benefits, make these All-American favorites with Mazola Corn Oil and Gold Medal Flour

CHOCOLATE CRINKLE COOKIES

Long time favorites, crisp and good . . . easier than ever to make. See recipe on page 10.

Recipes and special offer on next page

TESTED IN THE

Betty Crocker

KITCHENS OF GENERAL MILLS

OVEN-CRISP CHICKEN 'N BISCUITS

- 1 cup GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Enriched Flour
- 2 tsp. salt
- ¼ tsp. pepper
- 2 tsp. paprika
- ½ cup MAZOLA Corn Oil
- 1 cut-up frying chicken

Heat oven to 425° (hot). Mix flour, salt, pepper and paprika in paper bag. Place Mazola in oblong pan, 13 x 9½ x 2″, and set in oven. Shake 3 or 4 pieces of chicken at a time in a bag to coat thoroughly. Place chicken, skin-side-down, in single layer in hot oil. Bake 45 min.; turn.

Meanwhile, make Biscuit dough (recipe below). Roll dough ¼″ thick, cut into biscuits. Push chicken to one side in pan; place biscuits in single layer on other side. Bake another 15 min., or until biscuits are lightly browned and chicken tender.

Place chicken and biscuits on serving platter. For gravy: add 2 tbsp. flour (saved from dredgings) to drippings in pan. Bring to boil. Add about 1½ cups hot water. Boil 1 min. 4 servings.

BISCUITS

Sift 2 cups sifted GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Enriched Flour, 3 tsp. baking powder, 1 tsp. salt. Pour ⅓ cup MAZOLA Corn Oil and ⅔ cup milk into measuring cup, but don't stir. Pour all at once into flour. Stir with fork until mixture cleans sides of bowl. Knead 10 times without additional flour. Roll ¼″ thick between waxed papers. Cut with unfloured biscuit cutter.

HAMBURGER SKILLET PIE WITH SCONE TOPPING

- 1 lb. ground beef
- 1 tbsp. MAZOLA Corn Oil
- ¼ cup GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Enriched Flour
- 2 tsp. salt
- ¼ tsp. pepper
- 2 cups tomato juice
- ¼ cup diced green pepper
- ½ cup chopped onion
- 1 cup diced celery

Heat oven to 425° (hot). In 10″ skillet brown ground beef in Mazola. Drain off excess fat. Stir in flour, salt, pepper and tomato juice. Add green pepper, onion and celery; bring to boil, stirring constantly. Spoon Scone Topping (recipe below) in 6 mounds on top of hot mixture. Bake 30 to 35 min., or until biscuits are golden brown. 4 to 6 servings.

SCONE TOPPING

- 1½ cups sifted GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Enriched Flour
- 2 tsp. baking powder
- 1 tsp. salt
- ⅓ cup MAZOLA Corn Oil
- ⅓ cup milk
- 1 egg, beaten

Sift dry ingredients together into bowl. Add Mazola, milk and egg. Stir just until blended.

CHOCOLATE CRINKLE COOKIES

- ½ cup MAZOLA Corn Oil
- 4 sq. unsweetened chocolate (4 oz.) melted
- 2 cups sugar
- 4 eggs
- 2 tsp. vanilla
- ½ tsp. salt
- 2 cups sifted GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Enriched Flour
- 2 tsp. baking powder
- 1 cup confectioners' sugar

Mix Mazola, chocolate and sugar. Blend in one egg at a time until well mixed. Add vanilla. Stir in salt, flour and baking powder. Chill several hours or overnight. Heat oven to 350° (mod.). Drop teaspoonfuls of dough into confectioners' sugar. Roll around and shape into a ball. Place about 2″ apart on greased baking sheet. Bake 10 to 12 min. Makes about 50 cookies.

Up-to-date recipes for All-American favorites call for Mazola Corn Oil and Gold Medal Flour. Here's why:

- You'll find these recipes easier and quicker to prepare with Mazola because Mazola is pure liquid corn oil . . . gives you new ease in measuring and mixing, plus the special nutritional advantages of pure corn oil. Of all leading brands only Mazola is corn oil . . . highly unsaturated, never hydrogenated.
- Gold Medal is the only flour milled to Betty Crocker's standard for every recipe you bake. It's the only "Kitchen-tested" flour, too. No wonder it's preferred by more than half the women in America . . . no wonder it always helps you bake it better.

YOURS

FREE! NEW 20-PAGE "ALL-AMERICAN FAVORITES" RECIPE BOOKLET

Imagine, a free booklet with handsome color pages, more than 80 easy recipes you can cook with corn oil . . . main dishes, desserts, salads, breads and more, all tested for you in THE BETTY CROCKER KITCHENS! This recipe booklet is delightfully different, but every-day practical, brings old-fashioned recipes up to date.

For Your FREE Cookbook:

See the specially marked bottles of Mazola Corn Oil and sacks of Gold Medal Flour at your grocer's now.

MAZOLA IS A REGISTERED TRADEMARK OF CORN PRODUCTS COMPANY

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

BY DUGAN, FROM THE BARTHOLET COLLECTION, NEW YORK CITY

Artist James Dugan, born and trained in this country, picks subjects from the contemporary American scene. In his abstract painting of a housing development, only the white-spired church is reminiscent of yesterday's New England village.

EXECUTIVE EDITOR
Mary Bass

ASSOCIATE EDITORS
Wilhela Cushman
William E. Fink
Louella C. Shouer
Mary Lea Page
Dawn Crowell Norman
Margaret Davidson
Nora O'Leary
Glenn Matthew White
Donald Stuart
Helen Everitt
Peter Briggs
Anne Einselen
Margaret Parton
Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland
Geraldine Rhoads
Nancy Crawford Wood
William McCleery
John H. Brenneman
Jean Todd Freeman
Nelle Keys Bell
Betty Coe Spicer
Neal Gilkyson Stuart
Stanley Freeman
Hal T. Williams

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
Richard Pratt
Laura Lou Brookman
Hugh MacNair Kahler
Bernardine Kielty
Margaret Hickey
Gladys Denny Shultz
Barbara Benson
Elizabeth McFarland

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES
John Werner
Ruth Mary Packard
Ruth Shapley Matthews
Joseph Di Pietro
Elizabeth Goetsch
Eileen Sharpe
Virginia Price
Joyce Posson
Elizabeth Hart
Dorothy Anne Robinson
Albert Serwazi
Liane Waite
Abbot Mills
Conrad Brown
Anne Fuller

ASSISTANT EDITORS
Victoria Harris
Alice Kastberg
Dorothy Markinko
Jean Anderson
Grant Harris
Jean McClory
Ann Blackmar
Lee Stowell Cullen
Elaine Ward-Hanna
Carole O'Brien

EDITORIAL ASSISTANTS
Hazel Owen
Helen Olchvary
Sally Platt
Mary Jane Engel
Janet M. Boe
Kathleen McDonald
Judith Harkison
Dorothy Shuler
Natalie Schram

The Discrepancy Between Democratic Ideals and Realities

By DOROTHY THOMPSON When this article appears the election campaign will be coming to a climax. We shall have seen the candidates and their supporters on TV and heard, if we keep our radios perpetually turned on, millions of words of oratory and salesmanship. But in substance our choice, from the viewpoint of the policies to be followed during the next four to eight years, will be limited to our choosing between more or less the same thing.

Those families who are restive under the load of Federal, state and local taxes, and the indirect taxes on everything, should not expect alleviation.

Those who hope for a stabilization of prices, so that one can budget one's income, will be disappointed.

And although our foreign policy certainly needs thoughtful reconsideration, it will in all its fundamentals be continued.

The Democrats will have called for and promised a bolder approach, new ideas, fresh and younger leadership, but it is unlikely to come from the party whose leadership during the prewar, war and postwar periods initiated all the policies, foreign and domestic, which the Republicans inherited and, being "modern" Republicans, continued to carry out even when the foreseeable consequences of some of them began to show themselves.

In 1945, only fifteen years ago, the United States had emerged from the war as the only great power in the world. Vast areas of continental Europe, including Western Russia, had been destroyed. More than 20,000,000 people had been displaced from their homes. Great Britain was bankrupt and her empire was crumbling. Germany had been partitioned by the way the war was militarily conducted, which let the Russian armies into Europe beyond the Elbe—and by the demand for Germany's permanent elimination as a great state, which was obviously a Russian intention, but which was most vociferously pushed for in the United States by the proponents of the Morgenthau Plan.

America had suffered no destruction on her soil, her coffers were full, and we alone possessed the then definitive weapon.

We have already been told that we need a strong President. During the twelve years of his presidency Roosevelt had unchallenged power, and he used it personally and CONTINUED ON PAGE 14

Maybelline

SPECIALIZES exclusively IN EVERYTHING TO MAKE EYES BEAUTIFUL

In all the world, nothing does so much to make eyes beautiful as Maybelline, the pure eye make-up you know you can use with perfect confidence. Maybelline offers everything for eye-beauty . . . quality unrivalled, prices unmatched . . . in a wonderful range of precious jewel colors that give eyes shimmering, glimmering lovelines That's why Maybelline is so necessary to every woman who wants to appear perfectly groomed, fashionable . . . as lovely as she was meant to be. Maybelline is a specialist in eye beauty!

Remember, for purity, for complete confidence in your eye make-up insist on Maybelline

Magic Mascara
4 fashion shades

Solid Mascara
4 fashion shades

Cream Mascara
4 fashion shades

Self-sharpening Eyebrow Pencil
7 flattering shades

Eye Shadow Stick
6 iridescent shades

Fluid Eye-liner
8 iridescent shades

Eye-liner Pencil
8 iridescent shades

professional
Eyelash Curler

Brow and Lash Brush n' Comb

precision
Eyebrow Tweezers

In just 15 days you will see how wonderfully

"Ice" Helps Improve Touchy Skins That Break Out*

—without costly facials, "lights", hormone creams or any other complicated skin treatments

New York, N.Y. (Special) Skin scientists have now developed an invisible pharmaceutical ice—Ice-O-Derm®—that promises miraculous new-looking complexions. Ice-O-Derm actually gives timetable results of changes you can see.

Ice-O-Derm replaces present ordinary methods. Fortified by proper nutrition, good circulation and facial cleanliness, it will give you positive results—timetable results or your money back.

*Due to overactive oil glands in skin.

Here is Your Special New 15-Day Complexion Timetable

1ST 5 DAYS

Ingredient number one helps free pores of blackheads, pasty fat and impurities not removed by soap and water—thus helps prevent pimples from spreading. Result: Clearer, fresher skin!

2ND 5 DAYS

Ingredient number two holds moisture in, shields it from sun, winds, steam heat that dry out and wrinkle skin. Result: Softer, moister, skin!

3RD 5 DAYS

Ingredient number three stimulates and improves skin circulation, tightens pores and helps build up natural resistance against surface infection. Result: Firmer, healthier looking skin!

©1960 Shulton, Inc., Pharmaceutical Div., Clifton, N.J.

$1.00

At Drug and Department Stores

FOR THE LOVELIEST HAIR OF YOUR LIFE!

You may be a younger woman seeking to color premature gray . . . or an older woman who wants her gray hair to be glowing, glorious gray.

You may want to brighten and freshen your natural haircolor . . . or change it to a new, more exciting color.

You may want "to try"—with color you can shampoo out. Or you may "be sure"—and want color that lasts.

Whichever woman you are, you're looking for Roux. For Roux is a family of haircolorings—and one of them is designed to answer your specific desire. Visit and talk to your beautician or cosmetician. Learn how happy you can be with haircoloring made with just one thing in mind: the loveliest hair of your life!

ROUX®

"AMERICA'S FIRST FAMILY OF HAIRCOLORINGS"

AT BETTER BEAUTY SALO[illegible] EVERYWHERE

LASTING HAIRCOLORINGS
CREME COLOR SHAMPOO
CREME HAIR TINT
FANCI-TONE

TEMPORARY HAIRCOLORINGS
FANCI FULL RINSE
CREME COLOR RINSE
COLOR CURL HAIR SPRAY HAIR CRAYON

HAIR LIGHTENERS
CREME HAIR LIGHTENER
RAPID HAIR LIGHTENER

AND FOR YOUR HAIR CARE
CREME SHAMPOO
CREME RINSE
HAIRDRESSING

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

arbitrarily. He collected his own advisers on foreign affairs, chief among them Harry Hopkins (who had had no experience whatever of foreign affairs). He treated his Secretaries of State—Cordell Hull and Edward Stettinius—as dummies. He conducted his negotiations with Churchill on a person-to-person basis, and made with him agreements of far-reaching importance without even informing his Secretary of State that they had been reached.

In 1940 Roosevelt sent the Under Secretary, Sumner Welles, on a mission to Europe against Secretary Hull's expressed disapproval. Nothing came of the mission except a permanent Hull-Welles feud.

When Roosevelt died, and Mr. Byrnes was Secretary of State, the latter had not been fully informed of the concessions made to the Soviets in the Far East at Yalta and the Secretary got wind of it from a news story from Moscow. The full text of the Yalta agreement never reached the public until months after it had been signed.

Scores of volumes on the Roosevelt Administration, before and during the war, as well as British memoirs, have made it possible for the careful student to distinguish the Roosevelt myth from Roosevelt realities. Roosevelt was solely responsible for making "unconditional surrender" the sole war aim. It prolonged the war for months. Roosevelt, largely under Hopkins's influence, continued to trust the benignancy of Stalin's Russia implicitly despite the contrary information that he had been constantly receiving from his own intelligence officers.

All men err, but few American Presidents have erred more stubbornly than Roosevelt. Since the processes of history are not reversible, there is little good, except for truth-seeking scholars, in pursuing water that has flowed over the dam. But a myth which historic consequences have revised can be revived as a vote catcher only for the ignorant.

With Roosevelt's death Harry S. Truman entered office utterly unprepared; and in view of his predecessor's health, inexcusably so.

America was still the only world power, and was in sole possession of the atomic bomb. Russia was scared to death and was concentrating, and not unsuccessfully, her espionage activities here and in Great Britain on getting the atomic-know-how secrets.

Then was the time to demand firm agreements from Russia on the conditions that the U.S.A. and the West would accept for a continued great-power peace. Instead we got the idealistic Baruch Plan for the internationalization of the sources of atomic energy, which was not accepted nor acceptable.

But Truman, as he got into his stride, developed real leadership. Under the aegis of the U.N. he took a risk in Korea, which Roosevelt had left unprotected, when Red China was still weak. But he would not allow General MacArthur to drive the Chinese armies out of all Korea because the U.N.—whose members with the exception of a few token forces had spent neither blood nor fortune in that ghastly war—wanted "peace."

Under Truman the American armed forces were enormously strengthened. He saved Greece and Turkey. He initiated the Marshall Plan, the most constructive action in foreign affairs of the whole Democratic period.

Taking note of the overthrow by local Communists of the Czechoslovak government, he announced the doctrine of "containing" further Russian advances into Europe.

It was he and Dean Acheson, his Secretary of State, who, with the Russian armies in force in East Germany and rearming the East Germans, decided to rearm West Germany within the Atlantic Alliance. I believed then, as I do now, there were alternatives that should have been explored. Now there are none.

It was under Truman that the siege of Berlin was raised by airlift. That also was a risk and it ended in Russian admission of defeat but in another agreement that did nothing specifically to protect the civilian population of Berlin from another blockade.

Truman's education was limited and he was no theoretician. But he had common sense. He was not an effective pronouncer of vague and unrealizable ideals, and his star [illegible] more quickly than that of any memor[illegible] President. He was not invited to speak [illegible] Democratic convention, which paid h[illegible] an affectionate tribute. If the Roosevel[illegible] (like all myths) needs to be laid to re[illegible] Truman, who created no myth, deserve[illegible] place in the history of the times.

Woodrow Wilson is always, of [illegible] hailed by his party as one of the great[illegible] think, no objective history which rea[illegible] lyzes his achievements will so describe h[illegible] hopeful belief that the League of Natio[illegible] solve all the world's problems and lea[illegible] universal rule of law was as unmerited [illegible] of the United Nationists which Re[illegible] and Democratic leadership alike sha[illegible]

The United Nations has never yet pr[illegible] war; it has halted armed conflicts and [illegible] uneasy armistices and truces. Decisi[illegible] not taken on the basis of principles bu[illegible] trading of votes, the marshaling o[illegible] power satellites, and the blind voting [illegible] The votes of delegates are not made b[illegible] selves as the result of deliberative pr[illegible] but by their governments at home. [illegible] excellent device to sound out the ho[illegible] intentions of existing governments, an[illegible] limited uses. These might be immen[illegible] tended under conditions which would [illegible] another article.

Great states, able to defend themse[illegible] not entrust matters of life and death t[illegible] count of states that can do neith[illegible] "sovereign equality of all states" is an [illegible] A universal "rule of law" can nei[illegible] formulated in a manner acceptable to [illegible]

The word which God has writ[illegible] on the brow of every man is Ho[illegible]

VICTOR HU[illegible]

with different concepts of law nor e[illegible] under present conditions except by wa[illegible]

Wilson put into the world the "f[illegible] points," every one of which was qua[illegible] sacrificed at the peace conferences.

He also put into the world the doc[illegible] "the self-determination of all peoples."

This was applied in Eastern Europe[illegible] breakup of the ancient Austro-Hu[illegible] complex. Lord Balfour (a Tory) and [illegible] (a Liberal) in the wartime coalition [illegible] wanted to maintain the empire and th[illegible] burgs on a re-formed basis. Austro-H[illegible] needed a physician. Instead it got a ve[illegible] surgeon. A series of small and unviab[illegible] (on bad terms with one another) was [illegible] between Russia and Germany, who[illegible] dependence" rested on the League of [illegible] and alliances with France.

Vienna was my first assignment as a[illegible] correspondent in Europe. I was in m[illegible] ties and abysmally ignorant, but not so[illegible] minded as to believe that Russia, a[illegible] great power, would not survive the re[illegible] and civil wars, or that Germany, bec[illegible] feated, could be kept out of history! [illegible] Europe had been a sphere of influence [illegible] by Russia under czars or commissars.

In 1952 the Republicans campaigne[illegible] intention to "roll back" Russia from [illegible] Europe—without force and apparentl[illegible] Voice of America and the Committ[illegible] Free Europe.

When first the East Germans and t[illegible] Hungarians arose, nothing happen[illegible] such promises are made in this ca[illegible] The implementation of the wish wo[illegible] tainly have meant war, in a place when[illegible] had all the advantages.

Recognizing that idealistic sloga[illegible] "doctrines" are not in themselves [illegible] Wilson's doctrine of self-determinat[illegible] supplementary theories of "sovereig[illegible] ity" undoubtedly speeded up the [illegible] against white, Western rule in Asia [illegible] Middle East.

Another Wilsonian slogan was th[illegible] world must be made safe for democra[illegible]

That "democracy" (as we unders[illegible] has succeeded in long maintaining [illegible]

CONTINUED ON P[illegible]

Copyright 1960, The Nestlé Company, Inc.

EVERYTHING'S COZY WITH COCOA

and Nestlé's makes the very best!

Instantly—feel that wonderful cocoa warmth. Taste that special hot chocolate flavor. Nestlé's is the only instant cocoa with whole milk and sugar—made expressly to be enjoyed hot. It's the only instant cocoa you can make perfectly with water. It's the only one with Vitamins C, B_1, D_3 and Iron. Wake up to this new style, old-time goodness every winter morning. Try it, too, the special way—mixed with milk, topped with whipped cream or a marshmallow. You'll get cozy in no time with Nestlé's® EverReady®—the deluxe instant cocoa in the bright red package.

The only instant cocoa you can make perfectly with water because milk and sugar are in it.

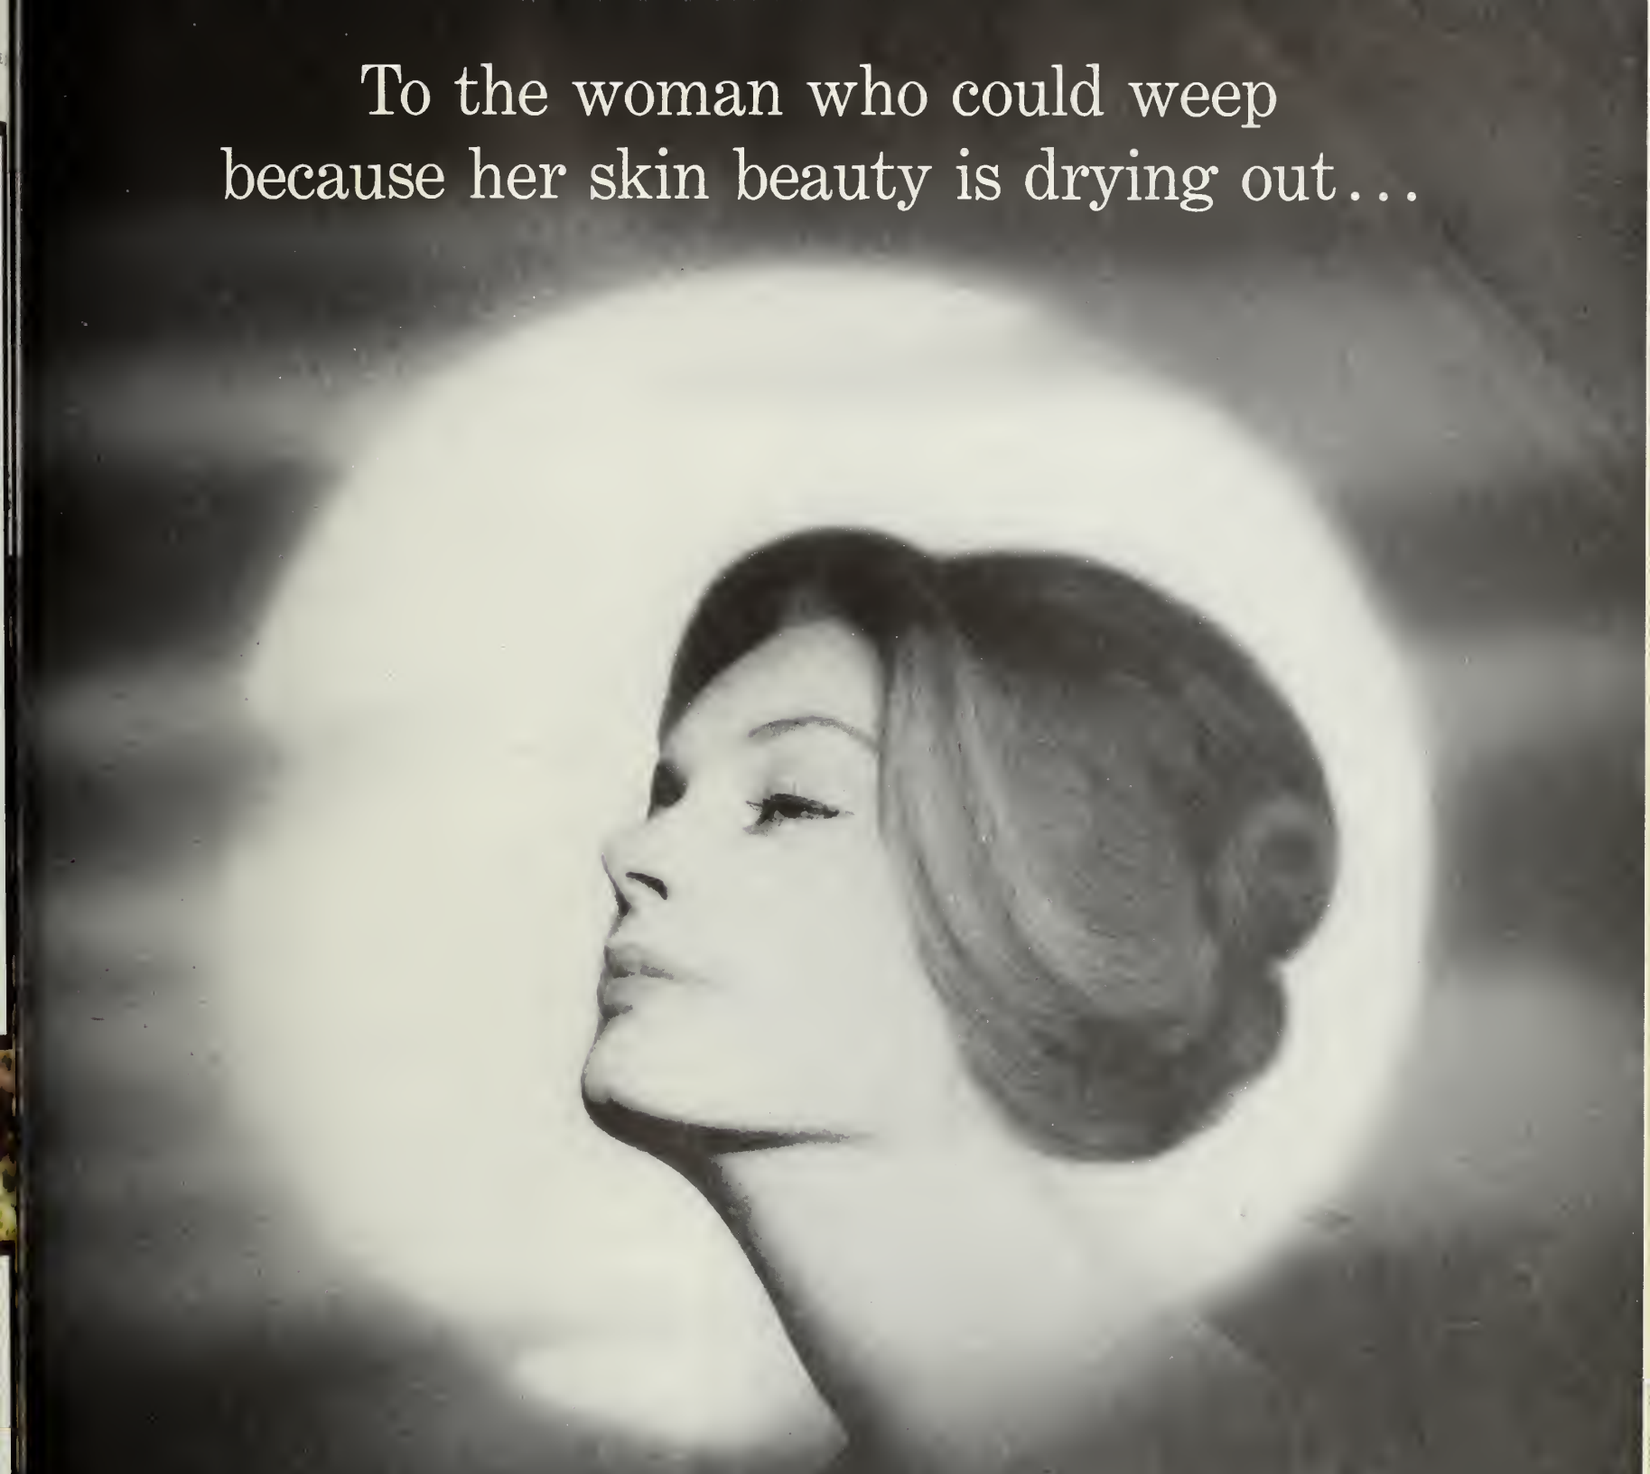
DESIGNED FOR TODAY'S AMERICAN LIVING

ESCORT

Red Cross Shoes

FEATURED IN CANADA AS GOLD CROSS SHOES

BOULEVARD



BOLERO

Magnificent browns... stacked to suit. The rich, warm shades of fall . . . in soft and supple new Red Cross Shoes whose suit-wise ways are smartly underscored by stacked heels on several levels. Note the deft detailing, the knowing tailoring . . . and most important of all: discover the fabulous fit and feel that makes them seem made for your foot alone! Largest selling brand of fine footwear in the world. Styles from 10.99 to 14.99

THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO • THIS PRODUCT HAS NO CONNECTION WHATEVER WITH THE AMERICAN NATIONAL R

To the woman who could weep because her skin beauty is drying out...

If time is showing far too soon on your face . . . If you've tried creams and moisturizers with only fleeting results (and a bit of despair) . . . you'll surely want to know why.

You see, after 25 . . . more and more . . . the skin that needs moisture most can hold it least. Some formulas do little more than sit on your skin; keep it smooth and moist for a while. But moisture, alas, evaporates.

When it goes . . . back come the lines and dryness. And the despair! But 'Moon Drops' works in its own special scientific way. It helps store up and hold your natural moisture inside. This inner flow helps keep your skin misty-moist. And, like plumping up a pillow, it fills out little lines and creases! With 'Moon Drops', there need never be a dry spell for your skin. Years without tears? Indeed.

FOR NIGHT . . . 'Moon Drops' Moisture Balm. Rich, yet not greasy. 3.00, 5.00, 8.00 plus tax.

FOR DAY . . . 'Moon Drops' Moisture Foundation. A light make-up base. 3.00, 5.00 plus tax.

FOR CLEANSING . . . 'Moon Drops' Moisture Cleanser to continue the benefits. 2.00 plus tax.

Revlon 'MOON DROPS'

©1960 REVLON, INC.

make it coffee–

The happiest moments of your day often come in coffee cups! Coffee picks you up, perks you up, sets you up as nothing else can!

make it often–

Fresh every time . . . that's when coffee tastes the best! Use fresh, cold water in a spanking-clean coffee maker, and you're off to a great start!

make it right!

For that rich, old-fashioned coffee flavor, use one Approved Measure of coffee to the cup. And here's a clue to the perfect brew— you spoil it if you boil it. (How about a coffee break right now!)

For your Coffee Brewing Institute Approved Measure in bright red, yellow or blue plastic, with a folder of coffee-making suggestions, send ten cents to PAN-AMERICAN COFFEE BUREAU, P.O. Box 33, Old Chelsea Sta., N. Y. 11.

NUED FROM PAGE 14

nd stable government only in the Anglo- ınd North European countries was not ıto account by the ideologues. Applied eoples everywhere it was, and is, cer- lead, first to chaos and eventually to . The real problem is how to make racy" safe for the world.

ave, as I write this, an immediate case —that of African Congo. What is the Republic? What is the Congo?

the latter part of the nineteenth cen- enormous territory traversed by the ongo River was an unexplored jungle, d by primitive savages. British African rs H. M. Stanley and David Living- rst charted it in part. Subsequently uropean interests, primarily British, and Belgian, led to the formation of ngo Free State," a sort of consortium, a series of agreements it became an- Belgium as late as 1908.

ean administrators before and after nexation had to contend with Arab aders carrying their human cargoes to ddle East (this trade was broken even- y war), and with cannibalism which throughout the area, and undoubt- l exists. The Congo was never a "na- ut a congeries of tribes led by chief- nstantly fighting (and devouring) one , or practicing quasi-religious rituals eir subdued enemies, of torture and

The most important lesson in life is simply this: never hurt anybody.
ROUSSEAU

sexuality so revolting that they could perly be described in these pages.*

ner modern myth is that in the "under- ed" areas of the world primitive peace- eoples were living quietly in their na- ocence until the imperialist Western an upset and aroused them by exploi- nd oppression.

jungle has never been peaceful or le. In the earlier days of the Belgian Administration it aroused great criti- ot among the blacks but in England, result was reform. At the time the "re- was declared it was exemplary.

what happened when the republic was and the Belgian Administration and epared to turn the country over to be verned," and Congo, diplomatically ed, was about to be admitted to the he native Congo government could not nor repress the hideous outbreak of that immediately occurred and was upon every white civilian woman who evacuated in time. Women were raped s on end, each by scores of savages, in ence of their children and often their ls, bound to trees.

oes not turn men and their communi- ose ancestors from unrecorded time ed in savage barbarism, into civilized or communities by humanitarian uropean clothes, a generation or two rn elementary, high-school or college n, given faute de mieux to a relatively mber, and the capacity to handle a tool. The call of the blood is still has taken centuries, even millennia, to great civilizations.

tly archaeologists claim to have dis- an endemic civilization and culture of Black Africa in antiquity. What kind zation and what culture, I have not otherwise there are no records of any civilized order existing there except s introduced by white Western men. the equality of races ever been scien- established. Biological science, like all argues from precise and demonstrated t from idealistic theories. Genes are determinants than environment.

white man is driven out of Africa, olutely predictable that the complex * described in African Giant by the writer and explorer Stuart Cloete, a South African. Published by Houghton-Mifflin Company.

industrial, political and administrative structure held together by fewer than 20,000 officials and experts will (as it has already done) collapse. Their work of a lifetime was destroyed in ten days. The jungle will close over the houses and industries they have built. Communications will cease to exist. Woods and landslides will close the roads. "The Leopard men, the Crocodile men will reappear, cannibalism be resumed," wrote Stuart Cloete in a letter to The New York Times.

The economic heart of the region, the one Congo province that has held out so far against the tide of disintegration, is Katanga. It has formally declared its independence of the government (or nongovernment) of Lumumba. Its premier, Moise Tshombe, has apparently kept control of his police force and maintained collaboration with such Belgian troops as are at hand. It has accepted the replacement of Belgian troops by U.N. units, but only to maintain order. The Katanga area includes the great copper, cobalt and uranium mines whose products can be moved by rail through British East Africa no matter what happens in the lower Congo basin.

Katanga has exactly as much right to formal independence as the Congo in general, and it has been reported that the leaders of two neighboring provinces, Kivu and Kasal, want federation with it. But though an immediate Western decision has been called for, none has been forthcoming as I write.

One thing is fairly certain. If the Westerners go, sooner or later another nation, probably China, will replace the whites, and eventually their civilization will do what the white one abnegated. Ideology has little to do with it. The risings in Africa are racial wars.

In domestic policy as well, ideals must be checked by recognition of realities.

The Democratic platform enumerated a series of "rights" for all Americans: the right to a useful and remunerative job; the right of every farmer to a "decent" living; the right of every family to a "decent" home; the right of every child to a good education; the right to adequate medical care.

These are not "rights" at all. They are goods and services to be provided by the state to those who cannot provide them for themselves, out of the resources of all the people. And none of them can be guaranteed by the state in any free society, or universally maintained without coercion. A "useful and remunerative job" is possible only if its recipient pulls his weight and earns it. A decent home assumes a decent family to live in it; a decent living for the farmer assumes that he and his family know and practice decent living and "the" farmer does not exist! Farmers are millionaires in organized big business. And they are families scratching a subsistence from poor soil on backwoods farms, doomed to economic extinction no matter what hopes politicians may hold forth. "Adequate" medical care is subject to definition and limitation wherever the state gives it, and is not a "right" but a paid-for insurance. Every child and youth in America has access to a "good" education, according to what the states and their educators consider "good" and the teachers they can provide, and it is not the right but the enforceable obligation of parents to send their children to schools. But no government can educate a child who despises and rejects the opportunities offered. Education demands the active co-operation of the student.

And no nation can long exist as a great one, if the industrious, strong, creative, self-reliant, ingenious and patriotic are penalized to the point of discouragement by being forced to carry the load of those who are not.

The character and not the standard of living of a people is determinant. The ultimate test of the Welfare State is whether it does, or does not, succeed in improving the national character, and fostering the primary virtues, which are the sterner ones of courage, determination, duty, fortitude and personal responsibility.

And there are always barbarians living within every society, even the most civilized. Nor can the most humane society protect itself by humanitarian ideals against those of its members who cannot or will not govern or restrain themselves. These cannot be self-governed.

END

CRISS-CROSS PIZZAS: COMBINE 4½ OZ. CAN UNDERWOOD DEVILED HAM, 8 OZ. TOMATO SAUCE, 1 TBSP. MINCED ONION, ½ TSP. OREGANO, 2 TBSP. GRATED PARMESAN CHEESE. SPREAD ON 8 TOASTED ENGLISH MUFFIN HALVES, ADD CHEESE STRIPS. BROIL.

Discovered: Delicious new pizza idea... made with Underwood Deviled Ham. Name: Criss-Cross pizzas... so easy! Remarks: Hearty ham flavor, just minutes to make. Suggested course: To your grocer to buy several cans of Underwood Deviled Ham.

P.S. The handy ham made from fine whole hams.

FOR OTHER SNACK RECIPES WRITE: ANNE UNDERWOOD, DEPT. L100, RED DEVIL LANE, WATERTOWN 72, MASS.

Beautiful Hair

B R E C K

SPECIAL RCA VICTOR RECORD OFFE

15 CLASSICAL AND POPULAR SELECTIONS IN ONE ALBUM

$4.98 Value for Only $1 in living stereo or regular L.P.

EXCLUSIVE OFFER RCA VICTOR, Box 18, Rockaway, N. J.

I enclose $1.00 and a box top, label (or facsimile) from a BRECK Preparation for each album desired. Please send me my "New Sound America Loves Best" Preview Album in (check one): ☐ stereo ☐ regular L.P.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ Zone _____ State _____

Offer expires May 1, 1961 Allow 30 days for delivery 3

This new RCA Victor Preview Album is available only throu Beautiful Hair BRECK. Send $1.00 and a box top or label fr any Breck Preparation and receive your preview album featur
Rosemary Clooney, Mario Lanza, Ames Brothers, Henry Manc
Arthur Fiedler, Morton Gould, Perez Prado and other artis

TWO GOLDEN OFFERS.

Beautiful Hair

BRECK

SPECIAL BRECK SHAMPOO TRIAL OFFER

TRIAL SIZE FREE WITH PURCHASE OF REGULAR SIZE

90¢ Value for Only 60¢

…is your opportunity to try Breck Shampoo at a specially …rable price. You receive as a bonus a thirty cent trial size …reck Shampoo with the purchase of a regular sixty cent …ze—five and one-half ounces of Breck Shampoo—a 90 cent …lue for only 60 cents. Available wherever cosmetics are sold.

There are three Breck Shampoos for three different hair conditions. One Breck Shampoo is for dry hair, another is for oily hair, and a third is for normal hair. Select the Breck Shampoo for your individual hair condition. Take advantage of this special offer and enjoy lustrous, beautiful hair.

BEAUTIFUL MUSIC AND BEAUTIFUL HAIR

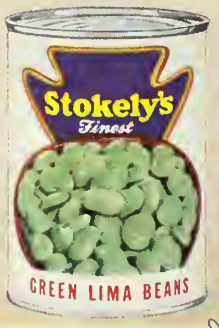
For variety...for nutrition...for easy fixing...

there's no vegetable like beans

If your family's partial to green beans, pair their favorite with a new partner. To Stokely's Finest Green Beans add sliced, sautéed mushrooms. Easy-to-fix, delicious. And Stokely's Finest are . . .

young, tender and stringless

Shellie Beans combine the flavor of tender-green beans with nut-like shelled-out beans. For "occasions" add bacon or onion or sweet-sour sauce. See Stokely's Finest Shellie Beans label for recipe. And remember . . .



only Stokely-Van Camp makes 'em!

As a snack or main-meal dish, heat Stokely's Finest Lima Beans with Van Camp's Vienna Sausage. Tasty and high in nutrition. Or serve the beans hot with butter seasoned to taste. Stokely's Finest Lima Beans are . . .

tender and full of flavor!

and no beans as delicious as Stokely-Van Camp's

"Hold your hat.
Here comes his State of the Union message."

DRAWING BY RICHTER
© 1956 THE NEW YORKER MAGAZINE, INC.

UNDER COVER

By BERNARDINE KIELTY

